2. The shoe of witness (Dt 25^{9–10}, Ru 4^{7–8}).—From the latter passage we learn that it was an ancient custom in Israel, when property was sold or any right given up, to take off the sandal and hand it to the purchaser or the person to whom the right was transferred. In the former passage the husband's brother allows his sandal to be taken off by the widow, who at the same time reproaches him both by act and word for renouncing an honourable privilege and duty. The removal of the shoe became a sort of documentary evidence. The possession of one shoe by the widow was to her like a bill of divorce to a betrothed or married woman, setting her free to marry another; and the possession of the corresponding shoe by the man remained his protective proof that all claims had been formally settled.

3. 'Upon Edom will I cast my shoe' (Ps 60⁶ = 108⁶).—From the context the leading idea in this expression appears to be that of taking possession of or claiming as one's own. Possibly the casting of the shoe upon a piece of land may have been a legal symbol, similar to that considered above, of a claim to ownership. Or the meaning may be, 'Unto Edom do I cast my shoe,' Edom being then represented as the slave to whom his master tosses his sandals (see Driver, Par. Psalt. p. 169). Duhm also suggests that the allusions to Edom and Moab are designedly contemptuous, the latter being represented as a washing-basin for the feet, while Edom is thought of as a kind of corner into which dirty shoes may be cast.

The 'shoes' (AV and RVm) of Dt 33³ should be 'bolts' or 'bars' (RV). The Heb. is בָּרָזִים (cf. בָּרָזִים of Ca 5², Neh 3³, 6. 13. 14. 15).

SHOHAM (שׁוֹחָם [on this word see art. ONYX]; B 'Ioodu, A 'Ioodu, Luc. 'Ieoodu).—A Merarite, 1 Ch 24²⁷.

SHOMER.—1. 1 Ch 7³². See SEMER, No. 3. 2. 2 K 12²¹. See SHIMEATH.

SHOPHACH.—See SHOBACH.

SHOSHANNIM, SHOSHANNIM EDUTH.—See PSALMS, p. 155*.

SHOVEL.—1. [שֹׁבֵל], only in plur. שֹׁבְלִים (from root שִׁב = 'sweep together,' with collat. idea of carrying away, Is 28¹⁷ [only]), occurs 9 times (Ex 27² 38³, Nu 4¹⁴ [all P], 1 K 7⁴⁰, 43, 2 K 25¹⁴, 2 Ch 4¹¹, 16, Jer 52¹⁸), always in a list of utensils belonging to the tabernacle or the temple. There is no reason to doubt that shovels for removing the ashes from the altar are meant (cf. AVm note at Jer 52¹⁸).

The LXX has in 1 K 7⁴⁰, 43 (26, 31) θεμάσπερος ('tongs or pincers' for taking hold of hot metal or coals), in 2 K 25¹⁴ it transliterates ισμύς (so B; A strangely ισάμια). In the other passages of the LXX either the Heb. word is not represented at all, or it is difficult to say what stands for it in the Gr. text, which differs from the MT both in the order and in the number of utensils mentioned.

2. שֹׁבֵל Is 30²⁴ [only]. This stands for the broad, shallow winnowing shovel (the πρόον of Mt 3¹², Lk 3¹⁷; cf. the use of the Gr. word [not found in LXX] in Hom. Il. xiii. 588; Aeschyl. Fr. 194; Sophocl. Fr. 931; Theocr. vii. 156) with which corn after threshing was thrown up against the wind to clear it of the chaff. It is to be distinguished from the קֶרֶן (Arab. midrā) mentioned along with it in Is 30²⁴ (elsewhere only Jer 15⁷ fig. of winnowing, i.e. chastising, the people),* which was a fork with 5 or 6 prongs, used in the process of winnowing, along with the שֹׁבֵל, in the way described in art. AGRICULTURE, vol. i. p. 51*, where both instruments are figured (cf. Wetzstein ap. Del. Jes. 2 707 ff.). The EV of Is 30²⁴ would therefore be improved by reading 'winnowed with the shovel and with the fork' for 'winnowed with the shovel and with the fan.' The word 'fan,' which is misleading at best, ought, if retained in our version at all, to be used for שֹׁבֵל, not for קֶרֶן.

SHREWD.—Sir 8¹⁹ only, 'Open not thine heart to every man, lest he requite thee with a shrewd turn' (καὶ μὴ ἀναφέρτω σοὶ χάρις: the sense, says Bissell, is given correctly by AV, χάρις meaning here 'an ill turn'; but RV renders literally, 'And let him not return thee a favour.' [Is 'shrewd' a tr. of ψευδής, which is read before χάρις in some good MSS and by the Lat. falsam gratiam?]).

The Eng. word 'shrewd' is a participial adj. meaning 'malicious,' originally the ptp. of shrewen, to curse. The verb shrewen was formed from the subet. 'shrew,' an Anglo-Sax. word, meaning a scolding or cursing person, usually a woman. In Shaks. 'shrewd' has the general sense of 'bad'; it is applied to the contents of a paper, to news, to days and nights. The modern sense of 'clever' perhaps occurs in Troil. and Cress. i. ii. 206—'He has a shrewd wit, I can tell you.' But the usual meaning is 'sharp-tongued,' 'shrewish,' as in Much Ado, ii. i. 20, 'Thou wilt never get thee a husband, if thou be so shrewd of thy tongue.' The expression in Sirach (a 'shrewd turn') occurs in Alt's Well, iii. v. 71 and Henry VIII. v. iii. 178. So Latimer, Seven Sermons, 96, 'The greatest man in a realme can not so hurte a judge as the poore wyddow, suche a shrewede turne she can do him.'
J. HASTINGS.

SHRINE.—See under DIANA, vol. i. p. 606*.

SHROUD.—Coming from the Anglo-Sax. scrud, a garment (connected with shred, as a portion torn off for some purpose), 'shroud' meant originally any piece of clothing. Thus Piers Plowman, ProL 2—

'I shope me in shroudes as I a shepe [= shepherd] were,
In habite as an heremite unholy of workes';

* The verb שִׁב in the sense of 'fan,' 'winnow,' 'sift,' occurs (in Qal and Piel) as follows: Ru 3², Is 30²⁴ 41¹⁶ (mountains as object), Jer 4¹¹ (fig. of purification, שִׁבְּתִי) 15⁷ (fig., see above), Ps 139³ (fig., 'thou sittest [or winnowest, i.e. scrutinizest narrowly] my path and my couch,'—Driver, Par. Psalt. ad loc.). Elsewhere the root has the sense of 'scatter,' 'disperse' (Qal, Piel) or 'be scattered' (Niph., Pual).

and Chapman, Odysseys, vi. 274—

'Give my nakedness
Some shroud to shelter it, if to these seas
Linen or woollen you have brought to cleanse.'

But the meaning was soon restricted to clothing for the dead, a winding-sheet. So usually in Shaks., as Love's Labour's Lost, v. ii. 479—

'Die when you will, a smock shall be your shroud.'

There was, however, a side application of the word, to express covering or shelter of any kind. Thus Milton, Comus, 147—

'Run to your shrouds, within these brakes and trees'; and PL x. 1067—

'The winds
Blow moist and keen, shattering the graceful locks
Of these fair spreading trees: which bids us seek Some better shroud, some better warmth to cherish
Our limbs benumb'd.'

This is the meaning of the word in Ezk 31³, its only occurrence in AV, 'Behold, the Assyrian was a cedar in Lebanon with fair branches, and with a shadowing shroud' (Heb. שֹׁרֵת, a thicket or forest; LXX omits; Vulg. frondibus nemorosus).

J. HASTINGS.

SHUA (שׁוּא).—The father of Judah's Canaanite wife, Gn 38², 12 (A Σαῦα, Luc. Σοῦε), who appears in 1 Ch 2² (RV) as Bath-shua (B θυγάτηρ Ἀθας, A . . . Σαῦας, Luc. . . . Σοῦε).

SHUAH (שׁוּחַ).—A son of Abraham and Keturah, Gn 25², 1 Ch 1³² (A Σοῦε, Luc. Σοῦε, B in latter passage Σῶε). The tribe represented by this name may perhaps be the Suchu of the cuneiform inscriptions, on the right bank of the Euphrates south of Carchemish (so Dillm., Holzinger, et al.). BILDAD the Shuhite (שׁוּחִי) of Job 2¹¹ (ὁ Σαυχάλων τύραννος) 8¹ 18¹ 25¹ 42⁹ (ὁ Σαυχ(ε)λης) is prob. intended to be thought of as belonging to this tribe.

SHUAL (שׁוּאָל; B Σουλὰ, A Σουδλ, Luc. Σουδν).—An Asherite, 1 Ch 7³⁶.

SHUAL, THE LAND OF (שׁוּאָל עֵרֶק 'the land of the jackal'; B ἡ Σαυγάλ, Luc. ἡ γῆ Σαυγάλ).—When the Philistines encamped at Michmash, they sent out three foraging parties. One of these 'turned unto the way that leadeth to Ophrah, unto the land of Shual' (1 S 13¹⁷). Another party went westward towards Beth-horon, and the third apparently eastward toward the wilderness. The road to Ophrah must have run northward between the last two routes, and the 'land of Shual' must consequently have been to the north of Michmash (Mukhmās), and not far from Ophrah, which is very generally identified with the village et-Taiyibeh, to the east of Bethel (PEF Mem. ii. 293). C. W. WILSON.

SHUBAEL.—See SHEBUEL.

SHUHAH (שׁוּחַ).—A brother of Chelub (i.e. CALEB), 1 Ch 4¹¹. Instead of 'Chelub the brother of Shuhah,' LXX BA read Χαλὲβ πατήρ Ἀσχα, 'Caleb, father of Ascha' (i.e. ACHSAH, Jos 15^{15a}, Jg 1^{11a}, 1 Ch 2⁴⁹); Luc. has Χαλὲβ ὁ ἀδελφὸς Σουά.

SHUHAM (שׁוּחַם).—A son of Dan, Nu 26⁴³ (B Σαμελ, A Σαμειδή, F Σαμλ, Luc. Σαμέλ), called in Gn 46²⁸ HUSHIM. The gentile name Shuhamites (שׁוּחַמִּי); B ὁ Σαμελ, A ὁ Σαμειδή, F ὁ Σαμλ, Luc. ὁ Σαμέλ) also occurs in Nu 26⁴³.

SHUHITE.—See SHUAH.

SHULAMMITE.—See SONG OF SONGS.

SHUMATHITES (שׁוּמַתִּי; B Ἰσραμαθεῖμ, A Ἰσραμαθεῖν, Luc. δ Σαμαθί). — One of the families of Kiriath-jearim, 1 Ch 28. Nothing is known of this family, or the origin of its name.

SHUNAMMITE.—See next article.

SHUNEM (שֻׁנָם; in Joshua B Σουνάν, A Σουνάμ, Luc. Συνήμ; in 1 Sam. B and Luc. Σωμάν, A Γωνάμάν; in 2 Kings B Σουμάν, B^{ms} Luc. Σωμάν, A^{ms} via Σιωνάμ, A^{ms} Σιωμάμ). — A place-name mentioned three times in the OT (Jos 19¹⁸, 1 S 28⁴, 2 K 4⁹). In Joshua it is named in the enumeration of the towns and villages belonging to Issachar. Eusebius-Jerome identify it with a village 5 Roman miles south of Tabor, in their time called Σουλήμ (Lag. Onom. 2 pp. 183, 284). There is still a hamlet in this same locality named Sûlem or Sôlam. It lies on the slopes of Jebel Dahi, the hill which faces Jezreel from the north. It looks across to Gilboa, which bounds the southern side of the valley that lies at the foot of Jebel Dahi. It has therefore been identified with the camping-ground of the Philistines before their victory over Saul (1 S 28⁴). Saul's army is supposed to have occupied the ground at the foot of Gilboa. If so, the valley lay between the hostile armies. It runs eastward from Jezreel (Zer'in) to the Jordan. Shunem is almost at its N.W. extremity. The district is described in Robinson, BRP iii. 168 ff.

There is precedent for distinguishing the Shunem of 2 K 4⁹ from that already identified. Eusebius-Jerome say it was a place in the territory of Sebaste (Samaria), i. e. ἡ πόλις Σ., within the district of Akrahatta (Lag. Onom. 2 pp. 184, 285). They give Sanim as the later name. If Akrahatta is the 'toparchy' earlier known as part of Judaea, lying considerably south-east of Samaria, it is too far from Carmel to be very probable. But even Sôlam is not within the easy reach of Carmel implied by v. 28⁷. The statement that Elisha frequently passed Shunem (v. 9) gives more help than any other in determining its situation. It seems to imply that Shunem was a place near his home or on the direct road to a locality which he frequented. Now Samaria was Elisha's home (62 64⁴, cf. 2²⁰), and Carmel appears to have been a favourite resort and the destination of his journeys when he passed through Shunem (48³, cf. 2²⁰). But Sôlam is 8 or 9 hours from Samaria, and decidedly off the road from there to Carmel. The claim of Sanim should therefore perhaps be left open. Whether it was near Samaria or not, if it lay on the way to Carmel the situation would be more appropriate than that of Sôlam. Near Taanach a place Sôlim is marked on the maps. It is not far from the eastern extremity of Carmel, and might be made a stopping-place on the way from Samaria.

An inhabitant of Shunem is a Shunammite (שֻׁנָמִית; B Σωμανεύρις, A (in Kings generally) Σουμανίτης, Luc. Σωμανίρις), perhaps also called a Shulamite (see SONG OF SONGS, p. 592^b). The vowel of the second syllable is in both cases a, as it is in the oldest spellings of the place-name also (LXX and the Egyptian transcription Shanama [Shanmâ] given by W. M. Müller, Asien u. Europa, p. 170). The interchange of the l and the n is further exemplified in the modern name Sôlam compared with Shunem. The former may be a variant which existed even in biblical times.

Two women are designated Shunammities in the Old Testament. One is ABISHAG (1 K 13. 15 21⁷, 21. 22). The other is simply named 'the Shunammite' (2 K 4. 12. 23. 30). She is one of those who play a part in the history of ELISHA (2 K 4. 37 81-6). Her own history is interesting as a picture of domestic and social life, and particularly as an example of the position a Hebrew woman might occupy at the head of a household. Her power of initiative and freedom to act are prominent features in the narrative. It would almost appear as if she were proprietor of the land which belonged to the family, or perhaps rather an heiress who had brought wealth to her husband (4⁸ 'a great woman', cf. 1 S 25², 2 K 4. 13 8³). It has been supposed that by the date of the events recorded in ch. 8 she was a widow. Even in these circumstances her independence is notable. W. B. STEVENSON.

SHUNI (שֻׁנִי). — A son of Gad, Gn 46¹⁶ (A Σαυνίς, D and Luc. Σαυνίς), Nu 26¹⁵ (24) (B Σουνί, AF Σουνί, Luc. Σουνί). The gentile name Shunites (שֻׁנִיִּים) also occurs in the latter passage.

SHUPHAM, SHUPHAMITES, SHUPPIM.—See MUPPIM and SHEPHUPHAM.

SHUR (שֹׁר; LXX usually Σορ, but Gn 25¹⁸ Σουηλ, 1 S 15⁷ Ασσουρ, 27⁸ a confused doublet - σορ τετεχισμένων). — The name of a place, or district, on the N.E. border of Egypt. It is mentioned Gn 16⁷ (where the angel finds Hagar 'by the fountain on the way to Shur'), 20¹ (Abraham dwelt 'between Kadesh and Shur, and sojourned in Gerar'), 25¹⁸ (the Ishmaelites dwelt 'from Havilah—prob. N.E. Arabia—unto Shur that is in front of—i.e. east of—Egypt'; cf. 1 S 15⁷ 27⁸), and Ex 15²² (where the Israelites, after the passage of the Red Sea, go out into 'the wilderness of Shur,' i.e. the wilderness bordering upon it). The 'way to Shur' was no doubt the principal caravan route leading from Hebron and Beersheba into Egypt, and having close to it (Gn 16¹⁴) the well Beer-lahai-roi. Though the general position of Shur is thus clear, the precise meaning of the expression is, however, uncertain. A line of fortresses, if not, as others think, an actual wall (anbu), had been built at a very early date, as a defence against invaders from the East; * and as the Heb. שֹׁר means a wall, it has been often thought that this is what the term denotes.† Others, starting from the same meaning of 'Shur,' have supposed it to denote a long range of white cliffs, running parallel with the coast, some 12-14 miles E. of the Gulf of Suez, now called Jebel er-Râhah, which at a distance presents the appearance of a wall (so F. W. Holland in Recovery of Jerus. 527; Porter in Kitto, iii. 1079 f.; Palmer, Desert of Exodus, i. 38 f., and others): it is said, indeed, that this range is still called by the Arabs Jebel es-Sâr (Rowlands in Williams' Holy City, i. 465). It is, however, some objection to both these views that שֹׁר is an Aramaic (Ezr 4. 12. 13. 16) rather than a Heb. word (it occurs in Heb. only in poetry, and there but rarely, Gn 49²², Ps 18²⁰=2 S 22³⁰), and also that it has not the art. (as is usual with topographical terms possessing an appellative force, e.g. קִרְיָה, קִרְיָת, קִרְיָת). The most important of the border fortresses referred to above was Ta-ru (Tor), the Selle of the classical writers, often mentioned as the starting-point of military expeditions (Ebers, l.c. 80 f.; Maspero, l.c. 75 [map], 201 n. 4, and esp. Struggle of the Nations, 122 f., 370, 371 f.; Erman, 537), now Tell Abû-Sêfeh, 20 miles S. of Port Said; and W. M. Müller (PSBA x. [1888], 476, As. u. Eur. 162) would identify this fortress with Shur, supposing 'Shur' (wall) to be its original name, represented in Egypt by Ta-ru (Tor).§ S. R. DRIVER.

SHUSHAN (שֻׁשָׁן, Σούσα, Σουσαν). — The Susa (Ad. Est 11³) of the Greeks, now Sus or Shush in S.W. Persia, between the Shapur and the river

* Maspero, Dawn of Civil. 351 f. It is mentioned in the Flight of Sinuhit, under Ueretsen i. (A.C. 2758-2714, Petrie); ibid. 469 n. 471; Petrie, Egypt. Tales, i. 100 f.; W. M. Müller, As. u. Eur. 43 f.; Sayce, HCM 203; Hogarth, Auth. and Arch. 57 f. See also Ebers, Aeg. u. die Bb. Moer's, 78-82; Trumbull, Kadesh-Barnea, 44 ff. The names and destinations of persons passing these fortresses were taken down by officers: see Erman, Life in Ancient Egypt, 537 f.; Hogarth, l.c. 60.

† Brugsch, Hist. of Egypt, ed. 1891, p. 97; Sayce, EHJ 187; Trumbull, 46, 57. Dillm. also thinks it probable.

‡ With representations (from Karnak) of Seti i. returning to it in triumph after his Syrian expedition, in the course of which he is said to have annihilated the Shasu (Bedawin) 'from the fortress of Ta-ru, as far as Pa-Kanana' (prob. a little S. of Hebron) (Brugsch, l.c. 244; Hogarth, 58).

of Dizful (the ancient Koprates). It was for many centuries the capital of Elam, and afterwards one of the three capitals of the Persian empire, and is sometimes described as standing on the Choaspes (Hdt. v. 49; Strab. xv. 3. 4), sometimes on the Euleus (Arr. Exp. Alex. vii. 7; Ptol. vi. 3; Plin. HN vi. 27). This was due to the fact that the Choaspes (now the Kerkhah) originally bifurcated at Pai Pul, 20 miles above Susa, its right branch following its present course, while the left branch flowed east of Susa, absorbing the Shapur 12 miles to the south and afterwards joining the Pasitigris (now the Karun). The ruins of Susa were excavated by Williams and Loftus in 1851-1852, and more recently by Dieulafoy and de Morgan. They covered a space about 6000 ft. long from E. to W., by 4500 ft. broad from N. to S. The greater part of them, however, cover the buildings of the Persian, not of the Elamite, city. On the west is the high mound which marks the site of the Elamite citadel. East of it are the remains of the palace of Darius Hystaspis, and immediately to the north the ruins of the Apadana or audience-chamber, also the work of Darius, which was restored by Artaxerxes Longimanus after a fire, and again by Artax. Mnemon. The walls of the Apadana and palace were adorned with exquisite friezes of enamelled brick, much of which is now in the Louvre.

Susa is probably referred to in Bab. documents of the age of the second dynasty of Ur (c. B.C. 2400) under the name of Sas and Sisa, which is stated to be a city of Elam, but the native name was Susun. This seems to be connected with the words suse-ti and sassa, which in the older and later Susian dialects signified 'former,' and so would mean 'the old' city. In the early days of Bab. history, however, the chief city of Elam was not Susa, but Anzan. Already in B.C. 2285, Kudur-Nankhundi, king of Elam, carried away the image of the goddess Nana from Erech to Susa. Susa, however, has been shown by the recent excavations of de Morgan to have still been at this time a province of Babylonia, inhabited by a Semitic population. It was not until after the rise of the Kassite Dynasty in Babylonia that the kings of Anzan made themselves masters of it. From this time forward Susa was the capital of the non-Semitic Elamite sovereigns, many of whose names have been recorded in the inscriptions of Babylonia as well as in those of Elam itself. These latter, though written in the Bab. cuneiform characters, are in the agglutinative language of Elam, which was closely allied to the Amardian or Neo-Susian dialect of the second column of the Achaemenian inscriptions, and is still but partially deciphered.

About B.C. 647, after a long and desperate struggle, the Elamite forces were annihilated by the Assyrian army of Assurbanipal, and Susa was captured and razed to the ground. The images of its gods and kings were taken to Assyria, and the monuments of its former princes were destroyed, the bones of their occupants being scattered to the winds. When Susa rose again from its ashes we do not know; Xenophon (Cyr. viii. 6. 22) and Strabo (xv. 3. 2) state that Cyrus made it his capital (see also Hdt. iii. 30. 65, 70); but its palace, according to inscriptions found on the site, was built by Darius Hystaspis. In Dn 8² the prophet is said to have had a vision 'at Shushan the palace' in 'the third year of Belshazzar,' but Belshazzar never actually reigned over Babylonia. An account of the palace in the time of Xerxes is given in Est 1³⁻⁷. When Susa was entered by Alexander the Great, he found in it twelve millions sterling and the Persian regalia (Arr. Exp. Alex. iii. 16). After the rise of the kingdom of the Seleucids, Susa gradually fell into decay, being superseded by Babylon and Seleucia. When the kingdom of the Sassanids was conquered by the Arabs, the site of Susa was finally deserted. (Loftus, Chaldaea and Susiana, 1857; Dieulafoy, La Perse, la Chaldée et la Susiane, 1887, L'Acropole de Suse, 1890; Billerbeck, Susa, 1893; de Morgan, Délégation en Perse, vol. ii., containing the Semitic inscriptions found at Susa, edited by Scheil, 1900).

SHUSHANCHITES (שׁוּשַׁנְיָהוּ; B Σουσσαναχαιοι, A Σουσσαναχαιοι).—The Shushanchites or inhabitants of SHUSHAN (Susa) are mentioned in Ezr 4⁹ amongst the colonists settled by OSNAPPAR (Assurbanipal) in Samaria (cf. *KAT*² 375 f., 610 f.).

SHUTHELAH (שׁוּתֶלַח; B Σουτάλα in Numbers, Σωθάλαθ in 1 Chronicles; A Θουσουλδα and Θουσδα in Numbers, Σωθάλα and Σωθέλε in 1 Chronicles; Vulg. Suthala; gentilic name Shuthelahites שׁוּתֶלַחִי; B ὁ Σουταλαί, A ὁ Θουσάλαι).—In Nu 26³⁵⁻³⁷ (P^a) Shuthelah, Becher, and Tahan are given as the clans of Ephraim, and Eran as a 'son' or subdivision of Shuthelah. In the LXX Becher is omitted, Tahan becomes Tanach, and Eran (רַעַן) becomes Eden (עֵדֶן). The parallel passage 1 Ch 7²⁰⁻²² has been variously altered and expanded; instead of a list of three co-ordinate clans and one subdivision, MT has a genealogy beginning with Ephraim and extending to Joshua, into which is inserted an episode concerning certain descendants of Ephraim (for which see BERIAH). Instead of Shuthelah, Becher, and Tahan as clans of Ephraim we have Shuthelah as the son, Bered the grandson, Tahath the great-grandson of Ephraim. As the genealogy proceeds the names repeat themselves. There is a second Shuthelah, and the 'and Telah' (וְתֵלַח) of v. 20 is probably a torso of a third. Tahath occurs again in v. 20, and Tahan of v. 20 is a variant of Tahath. Eleadah and Elead (v. 20^a) are variants of the same name; Zabab is a variant of 'and Bered.' Ladan (לַדָּן) may be a variant of Elead (אֶלֶאֲדָן), and also represent the 'to Eran' (רַעַן) of Numbers. Thus in v. 20 'Shuthelah . . . Eleadah,' (v. 20^a) '[Tahath] . . . Elead,' (v. 20^b) '[Shu]T[h]elah . . . Ladan,' we seem to have three versions of the same genealogy variously supplemented, all three, perhaps, ultimately based on Nu 26³⁵⁻³⁷, combined with some other source, in which Ezer and Elead were subdivisions of the clan Shuthelah. Cf. GENEALOGY, VII. 4.

LXX B has for v. 20^a. 'And the sons of Ephraim: Sothalath. The sons of Laada, Noome his son, Zabad his son, the men of Gath,' etc. The omissions may be due to the carelessness of scribes, but it is also possible that the names omitted by LXX were a very late addition to MT. W. H. BENNETT.

SHUTTLE.—Only Job 7⁶ 'My days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle' (רֶגֶל, prop. 'loom'; cf. Jg 16¹⁴ [the only other occurrence of the Heb. word] and Moore's note there). See art. WEAVING.

SIBRAIM (סִבְרַיִם; B Σεβράμ, A Σεφράμ, Q Σεφραμ; Sabarim).—One of the points on the ideal northern boundary of the Holy Land, described by Ezekiel, was to be 'Sibraim which is between the border of Damascus and the border of Hamath' (Ezk 47¹⁶). Its site is uncertain. Von Kasteren (Buhl, 67) would identify it plausibly with Khurbet Sombariye, between Merj Ayyun and Hermon.

SICCUTH.—See CHIUN and REPHAN.

SICKLE stands in EV of OT for two Heb. words, the distinction between which is not apparent.—1. שִׁכְלָה Dt 16²³; 2. שִׁכְלָה (cf. Aram. magaltā, Arab. manjal) Jer 50 (27)¹⁶, Jl 4 (3)¹³ (fig. of judgment). The LXX in all these passages has δρέπανον, which is also the NT word for 'sickle' (Mk 4²⁹, Rev 14¹⁴, 16, 17, 18 dia 19). See, further, art. AGRICULTURE, and fig. in vol. i. p. 50^a.

SICYON (Σικιών, Συκιών, or Συκιών).—This name occurs in a list of places in 1 Mac 15²², to which Lucius, the consul, on behalf of the Romans, wrote (B.C. 139) to beg them to be friendly to the Jews, and to deliver up to Simon the high priest any fugitives from the Jews that had taken refuge with them. All the places mentioned in this passage were constantly visited by the trading vessels from Syria on their way to Italy. The matter of the letter is most probably authentic, though the form cannot be correct.

Sicyon is a town on the Gulf of Corinth, a few miles to the N.W. of Corinth. The name seems to mean 'cucumber-town.' The town stood originally on the shore with an acropolis above it, and this latter formed the town in the time of the Maccabees. In their time it was always to be found on the side of the Romans, and the direction of the Isthmian games was assigned by them to the inhabitants of Sicyon, though afterwards they were deprived of it. It appears to have been the centre of Roman power for that part of the world.

SIDDIM, VALE OF (סִידִּים רָאָה; LXX ἡ φάραγξ (or κοιλάς) ἡ ἀλυκή; Onk. Sam. vale of fields [i.e. סִידִּים]; on Aq. Theod. see Field. The meaning of סִידִּים is obscure; a connexion with Arab. sidd, 'dam,' 'mound' (Conder, Tent Work, 208), is very doubtful).—The place in which the kings of the five cities of the Kikkar joined battle with Chedorlaomer and his allies (Gn 14²⁻⁸); said in v.¹⁰ to be full of wells of BITUMEN (which see). In v.³ it is identified with the Salt Sea; but this (if the entire sea is meant) is geologically impossible; for the DEAD SEA existed ages before the time of Abraham: either therefore the clause v.³⁰ is a late and incorrect gloss, or the reference (if the narrative is historical) is to the shallow S. part of the Dead Sea (from the peninsula el-Lisān S.-wards), where, in the time of Abraham, there may have been dry land. This view, already allowed by Nöldeke in 1869, has also been adopted by the two geologists who have written most recently upon the subject. Blanckenhorn, in an elaborate geological study 'On the Origin and History of the Dead Sea' (ZDPV, 1896, 1-59), says (pp. 51-53) that to the 'critical geologist' the matter is 'extremely simple': at the beginning of the post-glacial period what is now the shallow S. part of the Dead Sea was fertile soil (like the present Ghūr es-Sāfiyeh, at its S.E. corner [see ZOAR]); but an earthquake took place, which caused a subsidence of the ground, and overthrew all the cities except Zoar; the 'Vale of Siddim' was engulfed by the S. part of the Dead Sea, and the site of the four cities became the present saline morass (6 m. broad by 10 long), es-Sebkha,* S. of the Dead Sea; † a tradition of this prehistoric event is preserved in Gn 19, where it is connected with the history of Lot. Blanckenhorn considers that this earthquake was 'tektonic,' i.e. connected with a dislocation of the earth's crust, taking place at a 'fault' (such as pass along both the E. and the W. sides of the Dead Sea).* Diener, in a criticism of his article,† while agreeing that it was an earthquake which destroyed the four cities, regards it not as 'tektonic,' but rather as a local subsidence, accompanied by an effusion of underground water, which may well have taken place in the age of Abraham (pp. 13-16, 22); as a parallel he quotes the earthquake near Lake Baikal (in Central Asia) in 1862, which broke up a large area of the adjacent alluvial soil, so that it sank, and the lake covered it. Blanckenhorn in his reply (ZDPV, 1898, H. 2, pp. 65-83) maintains (pp. 70-76) that this view is improbable, and inconsistent with the fact that all the conditions for a 'tektonic' earthquake are present in the Jordan Valley; and he supports his opinion by quotations from two high geological authorities, Süss and Hörnes. Which of these two views is the more probable, a writer who is no geologist is naturally not in a position to say; perhaps some one sufficiently conversant with the geology of the district could explain whether it might not be possible to combine them, or, in other words, to suppose that the 'tektonic' dislocation, producing the broader features of the S. end of the Dead Sea, took place at the beginning of the post-glacial period, while the local subsidence, producing the submergence of the 'Vale of Siddim' under the present lagoon, and overthrowing the four cities, may have followed long afterwards, in the days of Abraham.‡

SIDE (Σίδη; Side).—One of the towns to which the Roman Senate sent letters in favour of Simon Maccabæus and the Jews (1 Mac 15²²). It was colonized by Cyme, surrendered to Alexander, became the chief port of the pirates,—who used it as a market to dispose of their plunder,—and was an important town under the Roman emperors. It was closely connected with Aradus in Phœnicia, and the men of Side and Aradus fought side by side in the fleet of Antiochus the Great when it was defeated by the Rhodians off the harbour of Side. The town occupied a low triangular promontory on the coast of Pamphylia. It had two harbours, and was strongly fortified. The ruins, now known as Eski Adalia, are about 10 miles east of the Keupri Su, the river Eurymedon, and are extensive and interesting. They include the remains of a very large theatre, the city walls and their gates, temples, a nymphaeum, streets with covered porticoes, etc. (Murray, Hbk. to Asia Minor, p. 173).

SIDON, SIDONIANS.—See ZIDON, ZIDONIANS.

SIGN (σημ, σημεῖον, signum) is used throughout the Bible of any symbol or token, but more especially of such as mark the relation of man to God and the providential care which God lavishes upon men. The rainbow was the first sign of this (Gn 9¹²) as the token of a Divine covenant. The Jews, from the beginning of their chequered history, counted themselves God's chosen people; and the Dead Sea, see vol. iii. p. 151^a, and art. ZOAR; it is at the S.W. corner of the Dead Sea, also, that, according to Blanckenhorn (pp. 50, 53, and Profil iv. in Tafel iv.), bitumen deposits (cf. Gn 14¹⁰) are particularly abundant.

* See Blanckenhorn's Geol. map.

† Mith. der kais. k. Geogr. Ges. in Wien, 1897, pp. 1-22.

‡ Prof. Hull does not seem either in his PEF Memoir on the Geol. of Arabia Petraea and Palestine or in Mount Seir (pp. 109 ff., 133) to have discussed the special question of the formation of the Sebkha. Blanckenhorn (1898, p. 76) denies that it is a purely alluvial formation.

* The word 'Sebkha' means salt and watery ground.

circumcision was the sign of the covenant relation in which a Jew stood to the God of Abraham (Gn 17¹¹, Ro 4¹¹). Living under the direct rule of Jⁿ, they looked for signs of His power and pledges of His care at every crisis of their fortunes. Such were the plagues of Egypt (Ex 10²); such was the visitation vouchsafed to Gideon (Jg 6¹⁷); such were the events by which Saul was assured of his future dignity as king (1 S 10⁷). The prophets frequently allege their forecasts of the future as signs that their message is from Jⁿ (Is 7¹⁴ 38⁷, Jer 44²⁸, Ezk 14⁹). St. Paul's observation that 'Jews ask for signs' (1 Co 12²) is abundantly illustrated by the Gospels (Mt 12²⁸ 16¹, Lk 11^{16, 28}, Jn 4⁴⁸); they demanded of Christ credentials of His authority to speak in the name of God. It will be observed that a sign need not necessarily be miraculous (see 1 S 2³¹, and esp. Is 8¹⁸ 20³ where the expression sign and wonder is applied to events which were only extraordinary because unexpected); the distinction between natural and supernatural phenomena was not clearly conceived by the simple piety of the Jews.* But (although John did no sign, Jn 10⁴¹) a sign is closely associated with the idea of prophetic prediction and warning. That was the motive of the sign of Jonah (Mt 12³⁹). A sign was given to the shepherds (Lk 2¹²); Simeon declared that Jesus Himself was els σημείον ἀντιλεγόμενον (Lk 2³⁴). Christ's miraculous works are spoken of all through St. John's Gospel as His signs (Jn 3² 4³⁴ etc.); they are the signs of one who declares 'His almighty power most chiefly in showing mercy and pity.' So signs were wrought in His name by the apostles (Mk 16²⁰, Ac 4¹⁰), by Stephen (Ac 6⁸), and by Philip (Ac 8^{6, 13}); and the signs of an apostle are claimed by St. Paul (2 Co 12¹², cf. Ac 15¹²). And, though we may not recognize them when they come, the end of the present dispensation shall be ushered in by signs (Mt 24³⁰, Lk 21²⁵, 2 Th 2⁹, Rev 12¹ 13¹³ 15¹ 16¹⁴ 19³⁰). To seek a sign is not necessarily a mark of faithlessness (see Jn 6²⁶); on the contrary, faith will naturally look for such tokens of the Divine protection. It is the demand for prodigies, τέρατα, which is the mark of an ill-instructed and undisciplined mind (Jn 4⁴⁸). See MIRACLE, NATURE.

SIGNET.—In the early days of civilization the art of writing was practically limited to a class of professional scribes. Every one outside that class, from the king downwards, needed a signet to authenticate the documents with which he was concerned. Herodotus, i. 195, says of the Babylonians, σφραγίδα δὲ ἕκαστος ἔχει. An immense number of these seals have come down to us, Egypt and Assyria being the two great sources from which, directly or by imitation, the leading types have been derived. One of the earliest and most persistent forms is that of the scarab, originating in Egypt, but imitated by the Phœnicians and others. These scarabs were often made of clay or steatite, and bore the owner's name on the flat side. Another very early variety is the Assyrian and Babylonian cylinder of jasper, chalcedony, or other stone, $\frac{3}{4}$ of an inch to $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches long and from $\frac{1}{2}$ inch to 1 in. diam., pierced longitudinally, and worn on a linen or woollen cord round the neck. Ball (Light from the East, p. 24) figures some of these, which are said to range from B.C. 4500 downwards. The name of the owner and of the deity whom he specially worshipped were engraved on them; sacred emblems and scenes are also common, such as a god slaying a lion, a tree guarded by genii. Conical signets, with the device on the broad end and the attachment at the top, have also come down to us from very early ages. Amongst what are classified as 'Hittite' gems there are several other shapes; some almost hemispherical, with hole near the top; some nearly annular; a few stone rings; tablets with a device on the lower side; lenticular gems; square or polygonal tablets, with a design on each side; seals with handles. Some very ancient Greek signets are gold rings with large bezels, on which are designs that originated in Assyria or Egypt. In the Ægean Islands and elsewhere engraved bean-shaped pebbles of various materials have been found, to which the names 'island' or 'lenticular' gems were given. The signets found in Palestine are mainly oval in form. Such of them as bear a device, in addition to a name, are either of Phœn. workmanship or imitations thereof. And the Phœnicians themselves were under the influence of Babylonian or Egyptian craftsmen. Amongst the designs may be mentioned the Phœnician palm-leaf, a border of pomegranates, a bull, a worshipper whose attire reminds us of the Egyptian priests, a winged circle. The matter on which the signet was pressed was wax or prepared clay. There is an allusion to the latter at Job 38¹⁴, and excellent illustrations are to be found in the photographs of jar-sealings given by Flinders Petrie in Royal Tombs of the First Dynasty.

Judah's signet (סֶהוֹן, סֶהוֹן Gn 38^{18, 20}) is worn by a cord (חֵטֶן) round his neck, as the inhabitants of the Arabian towns wear their seal-rings still. He gives it as a pledge, because it was the one thing which could be proved to belong to him, and would serve to identify him. Pharaoh (Gn 41⁴²) took off his signet-ring (חֶטֶן) from his hand and put it on Joseph's; it was the Egyptian custom to wear the signet on the finger (cf. Jer 22²⁴). Joseph was now enabled to sign decrees on behalf of the king. Jer 22²⁴, Hag 2²³, Sir 17²⁴ 49¹¹ indicate the value of the rings in question. Sir 38²⁷ shows that in the 2nd cent. before Christ the seal engravers must have occupied a prominent place amongst the artisans of the day. 2 Ti 2¹⁹ refers either to the two inscriptions which were sometimes engraved on two sides of a seal, or to the authentication of a document by each party affixing his signature. Such passages as 2 Es 2³⁸, To 9⁶ imply that the signet was used as a mark of proprietorship. When Darius (Dn 6¹⁷) seals the den with his own signet (סֶהוֹן) and that of his lords, and when the Jewish authorities (Mt 27⁶⁶) 'made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone,' the idea was that if the impression was broken the fact could not be hidden, for the culprits would not be able to reproduce the stamp. In this connexion it should be remembered that one of Solon's laws forbade gem engravers to keep an impression of any gem they had sold, lest another should be made exactly like it (Diog. Laert. i. 57, in Middleton, Engraved Gems, p. 22). Greek and Roman letter-writers were also so much afraid of their letters being tampered with, that at the close of the epistle they often described the seal. See also RING and SEAL. J. TAYLOR.

SIHON (סִיחֹן and סִיחֹן, cf. for the ending סִיחֹן; BA Σῆων, Luc. Σῶν; Vulg. Schon).—A king of the Amorites defeated by the Israelites at Jahaz after crossing the Arnon. This battle marks the commencement of the struggle for the possession of the land, and the end of the journeyings past friendly tribes with which Israel was forbidden to contend. The account of Sihon's defeat is given in Nu 21²¹⁻²⁸, and is followed by a poetical extract from an older source commemorating a defeat of Moab. The account is repeated in Dt 2²¹⁻³⁷ [with the additional statement that the country was treated as נָקָם (see CURSE)], and in Jg 11¹⁸⁻²⁴. References are made to Sihon's defeat and the assignment of the land in Nu 32³³, Dt 1⁴ 32⁶ 44⁶, 47 29⁷ 31⁴, Jos 21⁹ 91⁰ 12² 13¹⁰ 21²⁷, 1 K 4¹⁹, Neh 9²², Ps 135¹¹ 136¹⁹. 'Sihon' in Jer 48⁴⁶ is in parallelism with 'Heshbon,' and equivalent to the city of Sihon.

In these passages the name of Sihon occurs almost invariably in close connexion with that of Og, king of Bashan. The territories of these two kings became the inheritance of Israel on the E. of the Jordan, and were assigned to Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh. According to Nu 21²⁶ the Amorite king Sihon had, before the coming of Israel, taken from the Moabites the portion of their kingdom lying to the N. of the Arnon. For the criticism of this passage and of the song in Nu 21²⁷⁻³⁰, and discussion of the wars of Sihon against Moab and Israel, see art. MOAB in vol. iii. p. 409 f. A. T. CHAPMAN.

SILAS (Σίλας, in Acts), SILVANUS (Σιλβανός, in Epp.).*—A prophet and leading member (ἡγούμενος) of the primitive church of Jerusalem (Ac 15²²⁻³³), who seems to have possessed the Roman citizenship† (16³⁷). He was sent as a delegate of that church to Antioch, along with Judas Barsabbas as colleague, and in company with Paul and Barnabas, in order to convey to the converted Gentiles of Syria and Cilicia a brotherly greeting, and the epistle which embodied the decrees of the Council of Jerusalem; and also to 'tell them the same things by mouth, with any necessary explanations (Ac 15²²⁻³³). Silas, as well as Judas, remained at Antioch 'for some time,' and, in the exercise of the gift of 'prophecy,' 'exhorted the brethren with many words, and confirmed them' (15³⁰). Thereafter he returned to Jerusalem;‡ but, prior to St. Paul's Second Missionary Journey, Silas came again to Antioch, perhaps along with St. Peter, on the occasion of the latter's visit recorded in Gal 2¹¹, or at St. Paul's invitation after the rupture with Barnabas (Ac 15³⁰). St. Paul's choice of Silas as missionary colleague (15⁴⁰) was particularly appropriate in view of the projected tour 'through Syria and Cilicia' (15⁴¹), to the Gentile Christians, for which Silas had been accredited by the church of Jerusalem (15²²). If Silas possessed the Roman citizenship, this may also have led, in part, to his being selected, in view of missionary 'perils from the Gentiles,' as well as from the Jews. The acceptance of St. Paul's invitation by a leading member of the church of Jerusalem, even after the apostle's ecclesiastical as well as personal difference (Gal 2^{13c}) with Barnabas, the trusted ambassador of that church (Ac 11²²), testifies to the fulness of confidence reposed at that time in St. Paul by the more liberal Jewish Christians.

In company with St. Paul, Silas journeyed not only through Syria and Cilicia, but in Lycaonia, Phrygia, Galatia, and the Troad (Ac 16¹⁻⁸). He crossed over with the apostle to Macedonia, shared his varied experiences at Philippi (16^{12c}),§ accompanied him to Thessalonica, and thence to Berea, where he remained with Timotheus after St. Paul's departure for Athens (17¹⁴). He rejoined St. Paul, apparently, not at Athens, as originally had been intended (17¹⁵), but (owing probably to the apostle's early departure from that city) at Corinth (18⁵).¶ His evangelistic service there is referred to in 2 Co 1¹⁹. In the two letters, sent by St. Paul from Corinth to the Thessalonians, Silvanus is associated with him in the opening salutations. His name then disappears from the history.

That he did not leave Corinth in company with St. Paul appears to be indicated by Ac 18¹⁸, and by the absence of all reference to him in the record of the remaining stages of St. Paul's Second Missionary Journey (18^{19ff.}). That he did not settle at Corinth, in permanent charge of the church there (as suggested by pseudo-Dorotheus, who calls him bishop of Corinth),† may be inferred from the omission of any greeting to him in 1 and 2 Cor., and also from the fact that both Timotheus and Titus act as deputies of St. Paul in Corinth a few years later (1 Co 4¹⁷, 2 Co 8⁶ 12¹⁸). Probably Silas left Corinth during St. Paul's protracted sojourn of 18 months (Ac 18¹¹). He may not have been prepared for longer absence from Jerusalem. Moreover, at Corinth, where the Jewish element in the church was weak (Ac 18⁵), St. Paul does not seem to have felt bound to impose the decrees of the Jerusalem Council (1 Co 8). These decrees were intended, immediately at least, for the churches of Syria and Cilicia; they were 'delivered for to keep' in Lycaonia (Ac 16⁴); but at Corinth the circumstances were different. We can readily understand, however, that the bearer of the Council's communication might deem it improper for him to take part in any deliberate disregard of the Council's compromise between liberty and restriction, and would feel constrained, without any personal quarrel, to separate from one who went beyond what Silas's own fellow-churchmen of Jerusalem would approve. The addition of Timotheus, also, to the missionary party, and the strong personal attachment of St. Paul to him, may have caused Silas to feel that he was no longer indispensable to the apostle, and may thus have loosened the tie between the two men. Beyond question, the attitude of the Jewish Christians towards St. Paul changed considerably prior to the Third Missionary Journey. It was about this time that the Judaistic counter-mission to Galatia and elsewhere originated; and the same broadened ecclesiastical policy of St. Paul, which aroused the hostility of the narrower party in Jerusalem, probably also cooled, to some extent, the cordiality previously subsisting between the apostle and the more liberal section to which Silas belonged.‡

It is highly probable, although not certain, that the Silas or Silvanus who was St. Paul's associate is the Silvanus referred to in 1 P 5¹² as the bearer § of St. Peter's Epistle from Rome || to the Christians of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. The separation of Silas from St. Paul would naturally lead to the resumption of the former's intimate relations with St. Peter, between whom and Silas, as both Jewish Christians of liberal views on the whole, there would be full sympathy; and the description of St. Peter's Silvanus as 'a faithful brother' to the Christians in the above-named provinces, fits in with the experience of St. Paul's colleague, who, long before, had visited a portion, at least, of the churches now addressed by St. Peter, and would be probably known by repute to all. More than ten years had passed since Silvanus had parted from St. Paul. The apostle's last visit to Jerusalem, his charitable errand, his

* Silas may be a contraction of Silvanus (cf. Apollonius from Apollonius), or the original name (perh. = שִׁלָּא 1 Ch 7³³, but see Zahn, Eint. 1. 22 f.), of which Silvanus is a Latinized form. Several persons called Silas are mentioned by Josephus (Ant. xiv. iii. 2, xviii. vi. 7; Vita, 17). The identity of Silas and the Silvanus of 1 Th 1¹, 2 Th 1¹, and 2 Co 1¹⁹, is generally accepted (cf. Ac 17¹⁸); although pseudo-Dorotheus (6th cent.) in his Συγκρισις represents them as separate individuals; and Weizsäcker, with some hesitation (Apost. Age, i. 292 f.), suggests, without reasonable grounds, that the author of Acts has substituted Silas of Jerusalem for the Pauline Silvanus, 'in order to signalize the apostle's connexion with the primitive Church.'

† So Ev. III vii. 381; Mey. Comm.; Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 176; M. Giffert, Ap. Age, 242, etc. On the other side, see Wendt (Comm.), who regards the inclusion of Silas with St. Paul in Ac 16³⁷ as due to 'inaccuracy for the sake of brevity.'

‡ Ac 15³⁴ is prob. an interpolation; it is not found in NA.B. § For vindication of the credibility of Ac 16²³⁻³⁴ (assailed on internal grounds by Weizs., Wendt, and B. Weiss) see Giesecke in SK, 1898, p. 348 ff., and Exp. Times, March 1898, p. 274 f.

* It is possible, however, that Silas (as well as Timotheus) may have come to Athens, and returned to Macedonia for some special purpose. 1 Th 3^{1c} is not decisive on the point. Silas and Timotheus are probably the brethren referred to in 2 Co 1¹⁹ as having brought from Macedonia what supplied St. Paul's needs.

† The same designation is given to Silas in the ἑσπερίαι, or Memorial of Peter and Paul (a compilation, ascribed to the 9th cent., but embodying more ancient material; see Lipsius, Apok. Apost. ii. 9, 10). The testimony, however, of both documents is discredited by their representation of Silvanus as bishop of Thessalonica, apparently owing to 1 Th 1¹, 2 Th 1¹.

‡ This coolness is perhaps suggested by the summary manner in which St. Paul's visit to Jerusalem is referred to in Ac 18²² (see Farrar's Life of St. Paul, ii. p. 5); and it manifests itself, on that apostle's side, in the somewhat disparaging tone of Gal 2⁶, written from Ephesus during St. Paul's Third Journey.

§ Possibly, but not necessarily, the amanuensis also of St. Peter (see vol. iii. p. 790, and Ewald, II vii. 464).

|| The Babylon of 1 P 5¹² is usually interpreted as meaning Rome (see vol. I. 213 f., iii. 769).

conciliatory attitude on that occasion, and his subsequent sufferings for the truth, had doubtless improved the relations between him and Jewish believers (Ac 21. 24¹⁷). The majority of St. Paul's extant letters, moreover, had probably by this time come into circulation, and produced a favourable impression on Hebrew Christians. In 1 Peter extensive use is made of Pauline ideas and phraseology, especially those of the Epistles to the Romans and Ephesians (see vol. iii. 788). Accordingly, since at the time when 1 Peter was written St. Paul either was a prisoner at Rome, or had recently suffered martyrdom, the mission of Silvanus, as representative of both apostles, may have been part of an Apostolic evangelion, expressly designed to undo, in Galatia and in Asia Minor as a whole, the effect of earlier rivalry and friction between the Pauline and the Jewish parties in primitive Christendom. (See vol. iii. p. 791).

The names of both Silas and Silvanus are included, as different individuals, in the list of the 'Seventy' compiled by pseudo-Dorotheos. The position of Silas as a ἡγούμενος of the church at Jerusalem renders it fairly probable that in this instance the catalogue is correct. For the conjecture that Silas is the author of Hebreus (Böhme, Mynster) there appears to be no foundation. The adoption of the name Silvanus by Constantine, the founder of the pseudo-Pauline Paulician heresy in the 7th cent., indicates a conviction that Silas remained faithful essentially to Pauline views.

SILLA (σῖλα; ΒΓααλλδ, ΑΓααλλδ; Sela).—Joash was murdered 'at (AV 'in') the house of Millo, on the way that goeth down to Silla' (2 K 12²⁰). Millo was possibly either the acropolis of Mount Zion or one of its towers, and Silla was, apparently, in the valley below. There is no clue to its position. It has been suggested, from the reading of the LXX, that the Hebrew name may, originally, have commenced with gai 'ravine,' as in the case of Ge-hinnom. SILOAM.—A place mentioned, apparently, four times in Scripture: (1) Is 8⁶ 'the waters of Shiloah' (שִׁילֹחַ 'shooting forth' or 'sent forth'; B Σειλωμ, A Σιλωμ; Luc., Aq., Symm., Theod. Σιλωά; Vulg. Siloe). (2) Neh 3¹⁸ 'the pool of Siloah' (RV Shelah, שִׁילֹחַ; BA κολυμβήθρα τῶν κωδίων: * piscina Siloe). (3) Jn 9⁷ 'the pool of Siloam' (κ. τοῦ Σιλωμ; nataforia Siloe). (4) Lk 13⁴ 'the tower in Siloam' (ὁ πύργος ἐν τῷ Σιλωμ; turris in Siloe). The Rabbis and early Jewish travellers use the word with the article (מִשְׁכַּח hash-Shiloh) as in the Bible. Josephus gives the name as Σιλωά, Σιλωās, and Σιλωμ; the Greek Fathers have Σιλωμ; and the Latin Fathers, following the Vulgate, have Siloe and Syloe; Arabic Ain Silwān.

Excepting the statement in Neh 3¹⁵ that the wall of the 'pool of the Shelah' was close to the king's gardens, which were on the south side of Jerusalem, and the fair inference that the wall of the pool formed part of the fortifications of the city, the Bible gives no indication of position. Josephus, on the other hand, distinctly states (BJ v. iv. 1) that the spring (πηγή) of Siloam was at the end or mouth of the Tyropæon ravine, which separated the hill of the upper city and the lower hill. This position is indicated in other passages (BJ ii. xvi. 2; v. iv. 2, vi. 1, xii. 2; vi. viii. 5), and agrees with the statements of Jerome, who writes of the fons Siloe as flowing 'in radicibus Montis Moria' (in Matt. 10), and 'ad radices Montis Zion' (in Is. 8⁶); and also as watering the gardens of Hinnom and Tophet (in Jer. 8. 19⁶ 32²⁰). The Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333) and all later pilgrims place Siloam near the mouth of the valley that runs through the midst of Jerusalem, and there is every reason to believe that its general position is represented by the present Ain Silwān and Birket Silwān.

The Birket Silwān, situated in the narrowest part of the Tyropæon ravine, is an artificial pool, which receives its supply of water, by transmission through a rock-hewn tunnel, from the Ain Sitti Mariam, or Fountain of the Virgin—an intermittent spring in the Valley of the Kidron. A little below the B. Silwān, at the very mouth of the ravine, which is here closed by a dam of masonry, there is a second and larger pool, known as the Birket el-Hamra. This pool, long filled with soil, and now an open cess-pit, received the surplus waters of Siloam before they were utilized in the irrigation of the gardens which once filled the open space below the junction of the Tyropæon with the Valley of the Kidron.

The Fountain of the Virgin, the only true spring at Jerusalem, is very generally identified with GIHON, and the changes made in the distribution of its waters are intimately connected with the history of Siloam.* After the capture of Jerusalem by the Hebrews, possibly during the reign of Solomon, the water of the spring was impounded in a reservoir in the Kidron Valley, and used for irrigating the king's gardens, which filled the valley to the south. This reservoir, the site of which is lost, is called by Josephus (BJ v. iv. 2) 'Solomon's Pool.' After a time the water was carried by a rock-hewn conduit (discovered by Dr. Schick, PEFSt, 1886, p. 197 ff.; 1891, p. 13 ff.) down the west side of the Kidron Valley, and through the extremity of Mt. Moriah, to a pool in the Tyropæon, so that it might be more accessible to dwellers in the lower parts of the city. To this conduit, with its slight fall and gently flowing stream, Isaiah possibly referred when he compared (Is 8⁶) 'the waters of Shiloah that go softly'—typical of the unseen working of God and of the prosperity that would follow the confidence in Jehovah which he was urging upon the people—with the turbulent waters of the mighty Euphrates overflowing their banks,—an emblem of the overwhelming violence of the great world-power, Assyria, with which the people were seeking alliance.

At a later period the winding rock-hewn tunnel which connects the Fountain of the Virgin with the Birket Silwān was made, and the water of the spring was collected in the two reservoirs in the Tyropæon Valley. The execution of this remarkable work may be ascribed with much probability to Hezekiah, who, prior to the Assyrian invasion, stopped 'the upper spring of the waters of Gihon, and brought it straight down to (or on) the west side of the city of David' (2 Ch 32²⁰, cf. 2 Ch 32⁴, Sir 48¹⁷). In June 1880 a Hebrew inscription (see Literature at end) in old Semitic characters was discovered on the east side of the tunnel, about 25 ft. from its exit at Siloam. The inscription records that the tunnel was excavated from both ends, that the workmen met in the middle, and that the length was 1200 cubits.* There is no name of any king, and this, with the absence of a date, seems to indicate that the inscription was cut by one of the workmen employed, and had no official character. The form of the letters is not opposed to the view that the tunnel was made during the reign of Hezekiah. The serpentine course of the tunnel is attributed by M. Clermont-Ganneau (Les Tombeaux de David et des rois de Juda et le Tunnel-Aqueduc de Siloe, 1897) to the prior existence of the rock-hewn tombs of the kings, which he places immediately north of the great southern bend. The view that this curve is due to design, and not to accident or bad workmanship, is supported by the existence of shafts from the surface which determined its direction at two important points (PEFSt, 1882, plan, p. 123).

* Shelah is possibly a corrupt form of the earlier Shilohāh, due to a change in the pronunciation, or in the spelling of the word during the period that intervened between Isaiah and Nehemiah. The meaning of shelah in Hebrew is 'dart,' but in Talmudic Hebrew 'skin'; and the LXX adopted the latter interpretation. They and the earlier Rabbis appear to have regarded the pool of the Shelah, or of the 'sheep-skins,' as being distinct from the pool of Siloam.

* The Targ. Jon., Pesh., and Arab. VSS read 'Shiloh' for 'Gihon' in 1 K 1³.

Excavation has shown that the present Birket Silwadn has been constructed within the limits of the ancient pool of Siloam. The original pool measured 71 ft. from N. to S. and 75 ft. from E. to W., and was for the most part excavated in the rock. A flight of rock-hewn steps led down to it from the city, and it could be emptied by a sluiceway at its southern end. After the return from the Captivity, possibly during the reign of Herod, a covered arcade, 12 ft. wide, 22½ ft. high, and roofed with large flat slabs of stone, was erected in the pool, and ran round its four sides. This was probably the condition of the pool when Christ told the blind man (Jn 9) to go and wash 'in the pool of Siloam (which is by interpretation, Sent).'[†]

In the 6th cent. a three-aisled church was built, with its high altar directly above the point at which the stream issued from the tunnel, and its south aisle over the northern arcade of the pool. The church was entered from the north, on which side there were an atrium, and a narthex with a flight of steps leading down to the level of the north aisle. It appears to have been the work of the empress Eudocia, who is said to have included the pool of Siloam within the city wall. In the reign of Justinian the basilica was converted into a domed church, which is noticed by Antoninus Martyr (c. 570), the only pilgrim who mentions a church at Siloam.‡ The church must afterwards have been destroyed, probably during the Persian invasion (614), for it is not again mentioned (Bliss, Excavations at Jerusalem, pp. 132-210; Guthe, 'Ausgrabungen bei Jerusalem,' in ZDPV v. p. 52ff.).

The larger pool, Birket el-Hamra,|| has not been completely examined, but excavation has shown that it is partially cut in the rock, and that the dam of masonry at its lower end, which has a thickness of 20 to 8 ft., and is strengthened by buttresses, is at one point 44 ft. high. The construction of the dam, and the manner in which its masonry is bonded into the rock at either end, shows that, like the dam of the Birket Israil, it formed part of the defences of the city (Bliss, l.c.). The pool is probably the work of Hezekiah, and referred to (Is 22¹¹) as the mikveh, or 'ditch (ItV reservoir) between the two walls for the waters of the old pool.' The dam is apparently the wall of the 'pool (bērickhah) of the Shelah' repaired by Shallun (Neh 3¹⁸). This pool is mentioned by the Bordeaux Pilgrim, by Antoninus Martyr, and other pilgrims, and, in the Middle Ages, it was frequently called Natatoria Siloe, to distinguish it from the upper pool of Siloam. The tunnel and

* Conder, in his very complete description of the tunnel (PEFSt, 1882, p. 122ff.), gives its length as 1700·8 ft., or, approximately, 1200 cubits of 17 in., and states that the point of junction was 944 ft. from the Siloam end. See also PEFMem. 'Jerusalem,' p. 345.

† On the play upon the meaning of the word, and on the parallelism between 'the sent one' and 'the sent water,' see Basil on Is 8.

‡ The position of the church with regard to the pool is not unlike that of St. Mary in probatia, in the Pool of Bethesda near the Church of St. Anne.

§ The church is also mentioned in the life of St. Peter the Iberian (409-488).

the pools are possibly referred to in 2 Ch 32⁴, Is 22²⁰, and Sir 48¹⁷.

The water of Siloam is described by Josephus as being sweet and abundant (BJ v. iv. 1); and by the Rabbis, who attributed digestive properties to it, as being clear and sweet. On the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles, water from the spring was poured upon the altar (Neubauer, Géog. du Talmud, p. 145 f.). In 985 Mukaddasi, a native of Jerusalem, calls the water 'fairly good'; but the author of the Marasid (c. 1300) says that it was then no longer sweet. Writers of the 15th and 16th cents. call it brackish but wholesome. As the spring depends upon the annual rainfall for its supply, the water, which percolates through vast accumulations of refuse, must to a certain extent be impure, but it is still used for drinking purposes by the villagers of Silwān and by the poor of Jerusalem. In consequence of the miracle wrought on the blind man, the water and pool are held in much honour by Jews, Christians, and Moslems. Healing properties, especially in the case of eye diseases, have been attributed to the water from the early days of Christianity, and numerous legends have gathered round it. Christians believed that it came from Shiloh or from Mt. Zion; Moslems, that on the night of 'Arafat it came underground from the holy well, Zemzem, at Mecca. A small perennial stream flows from the Fountain of the Virgin to the Pool of Siloam, and its volume is increased, at uncertain times, by a sudden rush of water from the spring. The Bordeaux Pilgrim, Jerome (in Is. 8⁶), and most of the pilgrims, write of the increased flow as periodic; but in reality it varies greatly, and is dependent upon the rainfall and the season. During a wet winter the stream swells two or three times a day, whilst in summer the rise takes place only once in two or three days. All knowledge of the tunnel through which the stream runs was lost for several centuries, and it was first rediscovered in the 13th cent. It may perhaps even be inferred from the silence of Josephus that the Fountain of the Virgin was unknown to him, and that it was first opened, after its closure by Hezekiah, some centuries later.

After the capture of Jerusalem by the Arabs a village sprang up in the valley below the pool. In 1047 Nasir-i-Khusrau found an endowed hospital, with salaried physicians, and many buildings, erected for charitable purposes, near the spring. Early in the 12th cent. there was a small monastery at Siloam, but about 1300 the buildings were in ruins, and the irrigated gardens, which had been bequeathed by one of the Khalifs to the poor of Jerusalem, had disappeared. By the middle of the 17th cent. the pools were filled with rubbish, and the tradition, which had lingered into the 16th cent., that a church dedicated to the Salvator illuminator had once stood above the mouth of the tunnel, was lost. The village of Siloam, Kefr Silwān, on the left bank of the Kidron Valley, at the foot of the Mount of Olives, is of comparatively recent growth. Christian anchorites, and afterwards Moslems, are alluded to as living in the caves; but Quaresmius, in the 17th cent., is the first to distinctly mention the village by its present name (Guy le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems; Tobler, Die Siloahquelle und der Ölberg; P.P. Text Society translations).

The 'tower in Siloam' (Lk 13⁴), of which nothing further is known, may have been one of the towers in the city wall near the pool.

SILVER (שֶׁטַח [Aram. שֶׁטַח], ἀργυρος, ἀργύρεος) comes next to gold in the list of precious metals. Its value arises partly from its comparative rarity, and partly from its properties of resistance to corrosion, brilliant white lustre, malleability, ductility, and the like, which make it a specially suitable material for artistic workmanship. The knowledge and use of silver in classical and Bible lands go back to prehistoric times. This metal appears in Homer as put to a great variety of purposes. Vessels and ornaments made of it were found by Schliemann at Mycenae. Silver is equally in evidence among the remains of the ancient Egyptians, Assyrians, and Hittites. It is repeatedly mentioned in the Tel el-Amarna tablets.

Silver is rarely found in the native state, and has almost always to be extracted from some form of ore. The principal Asiatic source of it in ancient times was in the mountains of Armenia and Kurdistan. Homer (Il. ii. 837) refers to the special excellence of the silver brought from Alybē in Pontus. The mines of these regions have been wrought by the Turkish Government in modern times. In Europe the silver mines of Laurium in Attica were of considerable importance, and proved a rich source of wealth to Athens. There were also mines in Thrace and Epirus. But the most abundant supplies of silver were obtained from Spain. The workings there were at first in the hands of the Carthaginians, and it was when the Romans obtained possession of them that silver first became plentiful in Italy, though it had previously been used in art by the Etruscans, who may have derived their supply of the metal from Gaul or from the Phoenicians.

Silver was obtained from its compounds by smelting along with other metallic ores, of which that of lead was essential to the process. At a high temperature the lead combined with the impurities in the silver to form a heavy 'slag,' which separated by its weight from the molten silver, leaving the latter pure.

The relative values of gold and silver varied in ancient times. As long as the supply was restricted to Asiatic sources, silver was scarcer than it afterwards became. There are indications of a struggle for supremacy between the two metals at first, and even of a preference for silver to gold in some places. In Egypt silver is always mentioned before gold in the inscriptions, and silver objects are rarer than golden ones in the tombs. From a fragment of Agatharctides it appears that in ancient Arabia silver was reckoned 10 times more valuable than gold. The laws of Menes in Egypt fixed the value of gold as $2\frac{1}{2}$ times that of silver. Herodotus (iii. 95) makes gold equal in value to 13 times its weight of silver. The Egyptian âsem (Gr. ἤλεκτρον [or -os], Lat. electrum) was a highly prized alloy of gold and silver.

Silver was an early form of currency, and at first was reckoned by weight (see MONEY, vol. iii. p. 418 ff.), coinage being unknown among the Hebrews before the Exile. Hence in OT ḥāṣā is frequently tr. ἀργύριον by LXX, and 'money' in EV. It is also occasionally rendered 'price,' and once (Is 7²²) 'silverlings.' Similarly in Apoc. and NT ἀργύριον is often tr. 'money.' 'Piece of silver' stands in one passage (Lk 15⁸) for δραχμή.

The mention of silver in Scripture as a medium of exchange goes back to the time of Abraham (Gn 23¹⁶). Silver is an item constantly enumerated in accounts of wealth, spoil, and tribute. The wealth of Solomon is indicated by his making silver as plentiful as stone in Jerusalem (1 K 10²⁷, Sir 47¹⁸), and that of the restored Jerusalem is described in the promise, 'for iron I will bring silver' (Is 60¹⁷). So Tyre (Zec 9³) and the wicked man (Job 27¹⁶) are said to 'heap up silver as dust.' Idols were made of silver or plated with it. It was the material of various parts of the Tabernacle (sockets, fillets, hooks, etc.), of the trumpets of the priests, and of many of the sacred vessels of the temple. Vessels of silver were a form of votive offering (Nu 7 passim), and were part of the furniture of wealthy private houses (2 Ti 2²⁰). Joseph's divining cup was of silver (Gn 44³⁰). This metal was used for chains (Is 40¹⁰) and ornaments ('jewels,' Gn 24²³; 'pictures,' Pr 25¹¹). Silver 'shrines,' or models of the temple of Diana, were largely made and sold at Ephesus (Ac 19²⁴). Silver mines are referred to in Job 28¹, and the process of refining is alluded to in Pr 17³ 27²¹ 25⁴, Zec 13⁹, Mal 3³ etc. It is described with special fulness in Jer 6²⁰⁻³⁰ (where it is represented as fruitless) and in Ezk 22¹⁷⁻²². In both of these passages special emphasis is laid on the presence of lead among the other metallic ores. These other metals and the impurities combined with them are the 'dross' of silver. 2 Ch 9¹⁴ tells how Solomon obtained silver from Arabia. Tarshish is named as the source of the metal in 2 Ch 9²¹, Jer 10⁹, Ezk 27¹⁴, the second of these passages referring specially to the silver being 'spread into plates.' In 1 Mac 8³ the acquisition of the Spanish mines by the Romans is mentioned. Silversmiths are mentioned in Wis 15⁹ (ἀργυροκόπος) and Ac 19²⁴ (ἀργυροκόπος). There was a guild of this craft at Ephesus, of which in St. Paul's day Demetrius was a leading member. In LXX ἀργυροκόπος is the tr. of ἱγέρ ('founder,' Jg 17⁴) and of ἱγέρ (AV 'founder,' RV [as inf. abs.] 'refine,' Jer 6²⁰, where also ἱγέρ = ἀργυροκόρεω). 'Silver plate' is the equivalent of ἀργύρευμα in Jth 12¹⁵, 1 Mac 15³³. The plumage of doves in sunlight is described in Ps 68¹³ as 'wings covered with silver.' Wisdom and instruction are frequently compared for preciousness to pure silver, as are also the words of God (Ps 12⁶). The refining of silver is a figure for the discipline of the righteous (Ps 66¹⁰, cf. also Is 48¹⁰). Silver turned to dross is a metaphor for moral deterioration (Is 1²², Jer 6²⁰).

SIMEON (יִשְׁמָעֵאל; LXX and NT Συμεών, whence RV form usually employed in NT, Symeon).—A common name amongst the Jews, esp. in its later (Greek) form Simon (see art. PETER (SIMON), ad init.). The Heb. name is used of—1. The second son of Jacob and Leah, Gn 29³². The etymology, or at all events the original signification of the name, is unknown. J, in Gn 29³¹⁻³², characteristically derives it from שָׁמַע (= 'hear'), and reports that 'Leah said, Because the LORD hath heard (shāma') that I am hated, he hath therefore given me this son also, and she called his name Simeon (Shim'on).' Only two incidents in the history of Simeon are related in the Book of Genesis. In conjunction with his brother Levi he is said to have massacred the Shechemites in revenge for the dishonour of his sister Dinah (Gn 34). The details of the story are obscure, and are drawn from several sources, whose standpoint is not always the same. The real significance of this narrative we shall seek to appreciate in art. SIMEON (TRIBE). The other occasion upon which Simeon is mentioned is when Joseph determined to detain one of his brothers in Egypt as security that they would return with Benjamin (Gn 42²⁴). From the circumstance that Simeon is selected for this purpose, it has been supposed that the narrator means to insinuate that he had been the chief actor in the tragedy that led to Joseph's servitude in Egypt. The truculent character of Simeon, as vouched for by the massacre at Shechem, might also be supposed to furnish the justification for his severe treatment; but it is questionable whether the narrator (E) of his detention in Egypt had any such reference in his mind, seeing that among the sources of Gn 34 E has no place, and consequently he may have been ignorant of that story. It is more probable that in Gn 42²⁴ Simeon the second son of Jacob is detained as a hostage rather than Reuben the firstborn, because the latter, according to E (Gn 37²²), had acted a more friendly part than the rest of Joseph's brethren, and had sought to deliver him out of their hands.

The rape of Dinah and the massacre of the Shechemites were commemorated in verse by the Jewish or Samaritan poet Theodotus (c. 200 B.C.). It is instructive to compare the judgment passed upon the act of the two brothers in Gn 49 (cf. 34³⁰) with what we find in some of the literary productions of post-exilic Judaism. Words of disapproval and severe censure give place in the latter to hearty approval and warm eulogy. The contrast is strikingly displayed in the Book of Judith, whose heroine belongs to the tribe of Simeon, and whose estimate of the character and conduct of her progenitor is as different from that ascribed to Jacob in Genesis as her language is offensive to good taste (Jth 9²²; cf. Book of Jubilees, ch. 30).

2. The great-grandfather of Judas Maccabæus, 1 Mac 2¹. 3. An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3³⁰. 4. The 'righteous and devout' (δικαιος καὶ εὐλαβής) man who took the infant Jesus in his arms and blessed Him, on the occasion of the presentation in the temple (Lk 2²⁸). The notion that this Simeon is to be identified with a Rabbi who was the son of Hillel and the father of Gamaliel I. is as precarious as the apocryphal legends about his two sons Charinus and Leucius; see NICODEMUS (GOSPEL OF). The very existence of a Rabbi Simon ben Hillel is doubtful (see Schürer, HJP II. i. 363), and in any case he was not, as late legends assert, president of the Sanhedrin, an office which in the time of Christ was always held by the high priest (see SANHEDRIN, p. 401). If the Simeon of St. Luke had been Hillel's son, it is conceivable that he would have been introduced simply as 'a man in Jerusalem whose name was Simeon'. 5. A prophet and teacher at Antioch, whose surname was NIGER (Ac 13¹). 6. Ac 15¹⁴, 2 P 1¹ (RVm). See PETER (SIMON), vol. iii. p. 756.

J. A. SELBIE.

SIMEON (TRIBE).—The history of this tribe, which theoretically traced its descent to the second son of Jacob and Leah, is involved in considerable obscurity. From the fact that Shaul, the eponymous head of one of its families, is called 'the son of the Canaanitish woman' (Gn 46¹⁰, Ex 6¹⁵), we may infer that it contained a considerable admixture of non-Israelitish elements. From Jg 1²⁻¹⁷ we learn that, at the beginning of the conquest of Canaan, Simeon joined his forces with those of Judah. It was probably not long thereafter that Simeon and Levi together sought to gain a settlement in Mount Ephraim, which was then occupied by the Canaanites. Such at least is a plausible interpretation of the tradition which underlies the narrative of Gn 34. Upon any theory it is difficult to disentangle the details of that story, for the chapter in question is, in its present form, not homogeneous, and the different narratives date from different periods, and are inspired by different motives (cf. artt. HAMOR, and JACOB in vol. ii. p. 530 f.). None of these narratives is at all suitable to pre-Mosaic times, and there is much plausibility in the theory of Wellhausen, that we have here a reminiscence of an attempt on the part of Dinah bat-Leah (a branch of Simeon) and the other Simeonites, in conjunction with Levi, to possess themselves of the town of Shechem by treacherously taking advantage of the friendly relations that had hitherto subsisted between them and the Canaanites.

Whatever degree of success may have attended the enterprise at first, its ultimate consequences were most disastrous, for the Canaanites of the surrounding districts appear to have attacked and practically annihilated the invaders (cf. Moore, Judges, 240). This explains the insignificance or the entire absence of Simeon in the subsequent history of Israel. The shattered remnants of this tribe, which had begun its warlike activity in alliance with Judah, now fell back upon the latter for protection and a share of the land (Jos 19⁹).

In the Song of Deborah (Jg 5), in which the tribes of Israel are praised or blamed according to the part they had played in the struggle, both Judah and Simeon are passed over—Judah probably because at this period it pursued its own aims in complete separation from the northern tribes (cf. Gn 35), Simeon because it was practically part of Judah.

The absence of Simeon in the Blessing of Moses (Dt 33) has been felt to be more surprising, and various explanations have been offered, or attempts made to supply the omission. A and some other MSS of the LXX, indeed, insert Simeon in v. 8⁶ 'Let Reuben live and not die, and let Simeon be many in number' (Σιμων ζήτω καὶ ἡ ἀριθμία αὐτοῦ). This, however, may be simply a deliberate correction of the text, devoid of any support from Heb. MSS. Other solutions of the difficulty have been proposed by Kohler (Der Segen Jacobs, 5) and Graetz (Gesch. d. Juden, II. i. 486 f.) which have been accepted with modifications by Heilprin (Hist. Poetry of the Hebrews, i. 113 ff.) and Bacon (Triple Tradition of the Exodus, 270 f.). Founding upon the unnatural shortness of the blessing of Judah, and the character of Levi's blessing, which seems too warlike for a non-secular tribe, Kohler conjectures that v. 7 has fallen out of its place and should follow v. 10, so that vv. 7, 11 would form the blessing of Judah. Graetz boldly substitutes 'Simeon' for 'Judah' in v. 7, a method of procedure which is approved by Heilprin and Bacon as far as v. 7^a is concerned, while at the same time they change the order of the verses as Kohler proposed. We thus obtain (v. 7^a) as the blessing of Simeon, 'Hear, O Jehovah, the voice of Simeon, and bring him to his people' (the latter phrase perhaps referring to the Simeonites who, according to 1 Ch 4⁴², found a settlement in Mt. Seir). The blessing of Judah would then be contained in v. 7^b 'Judah with his hands contends, etc.', and v. 11 'Bless, Lord, his substance, etc.'—But, however plausible these explanations may be, there will probably be little hesitation in assenting to the judgment of Dillmann (approved by Driver), that the corrections of the text which they involve are 'too violent' to be probable. The death-blow which Simeon received so early in his career is quite sufficient to account for the non-mention of him in Dt 33, even if we ascribe a considerable antiquity to that chapter.

The early decadence of this tribe is implied also in the priestly narrative of the Hexateuch, for while at the first census (Nu 1²⁸) Simeon counted 59,300, at the second (26¹⁴) it had fallen to 22,200. Knowing the methods and the motives of the Chronicler, we can of course attach no importance to his introducing the tribe of Simeon as numerous in the time of David (1 Ch 12²⁰), especially when we observe that elsewhere even he is compelled to acknowledge its feebleness (1 Ch 4²⁷).

The question has been needlessly raised, To which of the two divisions did the tribe of Simeon attach itself at the disruption of the kingdom? The truth is that long before that event this tribe had ceased to have any independent existence, having been practically absorbed by Judah. The Chronicler, indeed, perhaps in order to make up the number ten, appears to reckon Simeon as belonging to the N. kingdom (2 Ch 15³⁴; cf. Ezk 48^{24-25, 33}, Rev 7⁷). There is probably more foundation for the tradition which he has preserved of conquests made by Simeonites in the time of Hezekiah (1 Ch 4²⁸⁻³³).

The list of the sons of Simeon is given in Gn 46¹⁰ and Ex 6¹⁵. A different list appears in 1 Ch 4²⁴, which is practically identical with another in Nu 26¹²⁻¹⁴. Simeon's towns are named in Jos 19²⁻⁶ and (with the exception of some deviations due probably to copyists' errors) in 1 Ch 4²⁴. All these towns are in Jos 15^{2-32, 42} reckoned to Judah, and to the same tribe are elsewhere reckoned such of them as Ziklag (1 S 27⁹), Hormah (1 S 30³⁰), and Beersheba (1 K 19⁹). This is in perfect harmony with the conclusion already reached, that Simeon was absorbed by Judah; and this same conclusion is strengthened by the circumstance that after the return from the Exile there is no mention of Simeonites, but only of Judahites as dwelling in any of the above cities (Neh 11^{26f.}).

In addition to what is contained in the OT, the Pal.-Jewish literature supplies a multitude of details regarding the tribe of Simeon and its eponymous head (cf. especially Test. of Twelve Patr. and Bk. of Jubilees). These stories are too manifestly apocryphal to merit serious consideration; and the basis is not more substantial upon which Dozy (de Israëliten te Mekka) builds his theory that the sanctuary at Mecca was founded by Simeonites in the time of David. In his important monograph, der Stamm Simeon (Meissen, 1866), Graf not only rejects this opinion as wholly devoid of historical support, but subjects to a searching examination the attempt of Movers and Hitzig to discover other OT allusions besides those of the Chronicler to Simeonite conquests and settlements outside Palestine. The words of Mic 1¹⁵ 'The glory of Israel shall come even unto Adullam' have been, strangely enough, connected with the history in 1 Ch 4³⁴⁻³⁵. The exegesis by which this result is reached is exceedingly strained, and the interpretation also involves, what was not the case, that Simeon belonged to the N. kingdom. Equally unsuccessful is the attempt to prove that it is the Simeonites of Mt. Seir who put the question in Is 21¹¹ ('Watchman, what of the night?'). The title of the oracle, 'Burden of Dumah,' has been sought to be connected with the DUMAH of Gn 25¹⁴, mentioned as a family of the Ishmaelites side by side with Mibsam and Mishma, which last are in 1 Ch 4³⁵ the names of Simeonite families. The latter circumstance may legitimately be urged in favour of the probability of large admixtures of Ishmaelite as well as Can. elements in the tribe of Simeon. But none of the localities known to us by the name Dumah will suit the topographical necessities of Is 21^{11f.}, and it is far more probable that דומה is a textual error for דומם (Cheyne in SBOT; Marti, Jes. ad loc.), or that Dumah ('silence') is in this instance a symbolical designation of Edom (Del., Dillm., and many others).

Side by side with Dumah we find in Gn 25¹⁴ Massa, to which Hitzig finds a reference in Pr 30¹ 31¹. By an emendation of the text he makes the former read, 'Words of Agur, the son of the queen of Massa,' while the latter is rendered 'Words of (to) Lemuel, king of Massa, which his mother taught him.' Hitzig endeavours to connect Massa with the Simeonite settlement in Mt. Seir; but the very most that the evidence entitles us to infer is that there may have been an Ishmaelite kingdom of Massa, and that its queen, like the queen of Sheba, may have had a traditional reputation for wisdom. That this kingdom, however, had any connexion with the Simeonites of 1 Ch 4³⁵ is not proved, and is on many grounds unlikely.

SIMILITUDE, as used in AV, usually means 'image' or 'likeness.' Cf. Gn 1²⁶ Tind. 'Let us make man in our similitude and after our lykenesse,' and Ezk 8³ Cov. (where the Heb. is כְּמִצָּה), 'The similitude stretched out an honde, and toke me by the hayrie lockes off my heade.' The words so tr^d are (1) כְּמִצָּה (Ps 106³⁰ 144¹⁹), for which see under PATTERN; (2) כְּמִצָּה (Nu 12⁸, Dt 4¹², 15, 16), for which see under IMAGE; and (3) כְּמִצָּה (2 Ch 4³, Dn 10¹⁶), which is usually tr^d 'likeness.' The last is the only word tr^d 'similitude' in RV. The words tr^d 'similitude' in NT are: ὁμοίωμα (Ro 5¹⁴), ὁμοιωσις (Ja 3⁹),* and ὁμοιότης (He 7¹⁵); in each case RV substitutes 'likeness.' See under PATTERN.

But 'similitude' occurs once in the sense of illustration, parable, proverb: Hos 12¹⁰ 'I have multiplied visions, and used similitudes' (רָאָה, from רָאָה [the root of רָאָה] 'to be like,' Piel 'to liken'). Cf. Mt 13³ Tind. 'And he spake many thynges to them in similitudes'; He 9⁹ Tind. 'Which was a similitude for the tyme then present'; and Lk 4²³ Rhem. 'Certes, you wil say to me this similitude, Physician, cure thyself.'

SIMON (Σίμων), one of the commonest names amongst the Jews, is a later (Greek) form of SIMEON (cf. Ac 15⁴, where St. James, in referring to St. Peter, uses the archaic form of his name). This form is naturally confined to the Apocr. and NT.

* For the distinction between ὁμοιωσις and ὁμοιότης see Mayor on Ja 3⁹.

i. IN THE APOCRYPHA.—The name belongs to—
1. Simon I., the high priest who succeeded Onias I. during the Ptolemaic domination (c. 300 B.C.). According to Josephus (Ant. XII. ii. 5) he obtained the surname of 'the Just' (δίκαιος), a designation intended, probably, to emphasize his strict legalism in opposition to the Hellenizing tendency of the majority of the high priests of the Greek period. In Pirke Aboth (i. 2) he is said to have been one of the last of the Great Synagogue, and the saying is attributed to him: 'On three things the world is stayed, on the Torah, on the Worship [cf. ἡ λατρεία in Ro 9⁴], and on the bestowal of Kindnesses' (Taylor, *Sayings of the Jewish Fathers*², p. 12). It is very doubtful, however, whether Josephus is right in identifying Simon I. with Simon the Just. Herzfeld (ii. 189 ff., 377 f.) and others claim the title for—2. Simon II. (Jos. Ant. XII. iv. 10), the successor of Onias II. (c. 220 B.C.). The same doubt exists as to the subject of the panegyric contained in Sir 50¹². He is designated simply 'Simon the son of Onias the high priest,' a title applicable either to Simon I. or to Simon II. The graphic description, however, contained in this passage leaves the impression on one's mind that Ben Sira (c. 180 B.C.) is speaking of an elder contemporary (Simon II.) of his own rather than of a high priest who had died a century before (Cheyne, Job and Solomon, 180; see, further, Kuenen, Gesam. Abhandl. 153 f.; Schürer, *GJV*² ii. 355 f. [HJP II. i. 355 f.]; Graetz, 'Simon der Gerechte und seine Zeit,' in Monatsschrift, 1857, pp. 45–56). 3. A temple official who, out of ill-will to the high priest ONIAS III., suggested to SELEUCUS IV. the plundering of the temple treasury, 2 Mac 3⁴. See HELIODORUS. 4. Simon the Macabee.—See MACCABEES, vol. iii. p. 185. 5. 1 Es 9³². See CHOSAMEUS.

ii. IN THE NT.—1. The Apostle Peter.—See PETER (SIMON). 2. See SIMON MAGUS. 3. Another of the apostles, Simon the CANANÆAN (which see). 4. A brother of Jesus (Mt 13⁵⁵, Mk 6³). It is very doubtful whether he should be identified with the Symeon who is said to have succeeded James 'the Lord's brother' as bishop of Jerusalem (Euseb. HE iii. 11, iv. 22), and to have suffered martyrdom under Trajan (ib. iii. 32). Hegesippus, whom Euseb. professes to quote, describes this Symeon as son of Clopas, and calls him ἀνεψιός of the Lord, while James and Jude are spoken of as the Lord's ἀδελφοί. See art. BROTHERS OF THE LORD, vol. i. pp. 320^a, 321^b. 5. Simon 'the leper,' in whose house a woman anointed Jesus, Mt 26⁶, Mk 14³. The question of the identity of our Lord's host and the cognate questions connected with the incident of the anointing are exhaustively discussed in art. MARY, vol. iii. p. 279 ff. 6. A Pharisee who invited Jesus to eat with him, Lk 7^{36ff.}. On this occasion we read that a woman that was 'a sinner' (ἁμαρτωλὸς) anointed Jesus' feet. For the relation of this incident to the narratives of Mt 26, Mk 14, and Jn 12, see, again, art. MARY as just cited, and cf. Bruce, Parabolic Teaching of Christ, 250 ff. 7. The father (?) of JUDAS ISCARIOT. In all the passages (Jn 6⁷¹ 13²⁻²⁶) where this Simon is named, the Greek text (Ἰούδας Σίμωνος, 'Judas of Simon') leaves it uncertain what was his relationship to the traitor, but the EV 'Judas the son of Simon' is probably correct. It is very precarious to identify Simon Iscariot (Jn 6⁷¹ 13²⁶) with Simon the Cananæan. 8. A Cyrenian, who was compelled by the Roman soldiers to bear the cross of Jesus (Mt 27³², Mk 15²¹, Lk 23²⁶). He is described by St. Mark as the father of ALEXANDER and RUFUS, names evidently well known in the early Christian Church. The story in the Gospels was perverted by some of the Docetic sects, the Basilidians going the length of maintaining that Simon not only bore the cross, but was actually crucified in mistake for Jesus. 9. The tanner, with whom St. Peter lodged at Joppa (Ac 9¹⁰ 10¹⁶ 17, 32).

SIMON MAGUS.—The name usually given for the sake of distinction to that Simon who is mentioned in only one place in the NT, but to whom, both in Patristic literature and in modern criticism, the part assigned is very considerable. There are some features in the story of the NT which excite our curiosity; the early Fathers have detailed accounts of his false teaching, and give him the doubtful honour of being the first of the heresiarchs, the source and spring of all later heresy; early Christian romance writers embellished his history with many wonderful details, and made him the antagonist of Simon Peter, both in verbal disputations and in the exhibition of magical arts; while a school of modern critics has found in his career and the stories concerning him the chief support for a far-reaching reconstruction of our conceptions of early Christianity. In order to obtain a sound basis for our investigations, it will be useful after examining the account in the NT to go carefully through the Patristic evidence in chronological order, and after that consider the fuller narratives of uncertain date contained in the Clementine literature and Apocryphal Acts. We shall thus be in a better position to estimate the force and value of modern criticism, and be able to offer a probable explanation of the various difficulties that the problem presents.

i. SIMON IN THE NT.—In Ac 8²⁴, where the preaching of Philip in Samaria is described, we are told that 'there was a certain man called Simon, which beforetime in the city used sorcery, and bewitched the people of Samaria, giving out that himself was some great one' (λέγων εἶναι τινα ταυτὸν μέγαν). All the people followed him, and described him as 'that power of God which is called great' (οὗτος ἐστὶν ἡ δύναμις τοῦ θεοῦ ἡ καλουμένη μεγάλη). When the rest of the city was converted, Simon also believed and was baptized, and continued with Philip, amazed at his miracles. When Peter and John came down, they laid hands on the converts, who received the Holy Ghost. Simon then offered Peter money, saying, 'Give me also this power, that on whomsoever I lay hands, he may receive the Holy Ghost.' Peter sternly rebuked him. 'Thy money perish with thee . . . thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter . . . thou art in the gall of bitterness, and the bond of iniquity.' Simon entreated him to pray the Lord that none of those things might come upon him.

It will be more convenient to postpone comments on this passage until we have collected further information on the subject.

ii. PATRISTIC EVIDENCE.—The earliest information outside the NT comes from Justin Martyr, c. 15' (Apol. i. 26, 56 [cf. Eus. HE ii. 13, 14]; Dial. 120). He tells us that Simon was a Samaritan, of the village of Gitta; he came to Rome in the time of Claudius Cæsar; by the power of the demons he worked miracles, and was honoured in Rome as a god, so that a statue was erected in his honour by order of the Senate and people, between the two bridges, bearing the inscription SIMONI DEO SANCTO. Almost all the Samaritans and a few of other nations honour him as the first god (πρῶτος θεός). He took about with him a woman called Helena, who had formerly been a prostitute, and whom he is said to have called the first conception (πρώτη ἐννοια) which came forth from him. He is described as God above 'all rule and authority and power.' We also gather that Justin looked upon him as the originator of heresy and the source whence all later heresies were derived.

As regards one part of this story an interesting discovery has been made. In the year 1574 there was dug up in the place indicated by Justin, namely, in the island of the Tiber, a marble fragment, apparently the base of a statue, with the inscription SEMONI SANCO DEO FIDIO. It is now generally agreed that Justin mistook a statue dedicated to a Sabine deity for one dedicated to Simon (Gruter, Insc. Ant. i. p. 95, n. 5), although whether the mistake was his own or was earlier than himself we cannot say. But nothing in this mistake need invalidate his testimony about Simon in Samaria. Justin himself was a Samaritan; he draws attention at least once (Dial. 12); cf. Apol. ii. 15) to the fact that he had spoken the truth to his own disadvantage. On the subject of the sect which called itself after the name of Simon he must be taken as first-hand evidence. And there are strong grounds for thinking that we have a fuller account which emanates from him. Accounts of Simon Magus are contained in the following heresiological works: Irenæus (I. xvi.), pseudo-Tertullian (i.), Hippolytus (Refutatio, vi.), Philaster (29), Epiphanius (Panarion, 21). Of these, that in Hippolytus' Refutatio consists of two parts; that from § 7 to § 18, containing extracts from a work called ἡ μεγάλη ἀπόφασις, 'the Great Revelation,' presents a different system from that found elsewhere, and will be noticed further on; that in § 19 and § 20 is derived from the same source from which the greater part of the matter in all the other heresiologists comes. It is now generally agreed, and probably on good grounds, that this common source was a treatise (σύστημα) on heresies written by Justin and referred to by himself (Apol. i. 26). The following is the account put together from these different sources:—

Simon was said to have taught that he was the highest God, the most elevated virtue (πρῶτος πάντων δυνάμεις). He carried about with him Helena, who he said was the first conception of his mind, the mother of all, by whom he conceived in his mind to create the angels and archangels. She was also called Wisdom (σοφία), according to pseudo-Tertullian, and Holy Spirit and Prunious (πρυνίους), according to Epiphanius. She, knowing her father's wish, leapt forth from him and created the angels and powers by whom this world and man were created. She was unable to return to her father because of the envy and desire of those whom she had created, and suffered contumely, and was compelled to assume human form. She passed through the centuries, as it were, from one vessel to another, transmuting from one female form to another. She was the Helen about whom the Trojan war was fought; the wooden horse representing the ignorance of the nations. After that she passed from form to form, and lastly became a prostitute in a brothel at Tyre: she was the lost sheep. But since the rulers of the world ruled it ill, and in order to redeem her, the Supreme Power descended to the lower world. He passed through the regions ruled by the principalities and powers, in each region making himself like to those in it, and so among men he appeared as a man. He appeared among the Jews as the Son, in Samaria as the Father, in other nations as the Holy Spirit. In Judæa he had seemed to suffer, but had not. He allowed himself to be called by whatsoever names men liked. He thus succeeded in saving Helena, as she expected. He brought man to a knowledge of himself, and liberated the world and those who were his from the rule of those who had made the world. The Jewish prophecies, he said, were inspired by the angels who made the world. Therefore those who had hope in him and Helena need no longer care for them, but might freely do as they would, for men were saved according to his grace and not according to good works. There was no real difference between good and bad, they were merely accidental distinctions made by the creators of the world. The morality of the sect was, as they are told, in accordance with these principles. Their priests (μυστικοὶ sacerdotes) lived lascivious lives, used magic and incantations, made philtres, had familiar spirits, and had images of Simon and Helena made in the form of Zeus and Athena.

Hegecippus (c. 180), in a corrupt passage quoted by Eus. iv. 22, speaks of Simon, from whom came the Simonians; Cleobius, whence the Cleobians; and Dositheus, whence the Dositheans; and Gorthueus, whence the Gortheni; and Masbotheus, whence the Masbotheans—from these, he says, came the followers of Menander; and he then enumerates the later heretics. It would be interesting to know if this heretical genealogy is independent of Justin.

Tertullian (c. 200) does not seem to have any original information. He knows the story about the statue (Apol. 13). He gives a long account of Simon's system, derived apparently from Irenæus (de Anima, 34). He says that even in his own day the presumption of the sect of Simon is so great that they even presume to raise the souls of the prophets from the lower regions (Ecce hodie eiusdem Simonis luereticos tanta presumptio artis extollit, ut etiam prophetarum animas ab inferis movere se spondent).

Clement of Alexandria (c. 200) gives us little information about Simon. There is a chronological remark in Strom. vii. 17 which is quite inexplicable, and in Strom. ii. 11 he tells us that the followers of Simon wish to be made like the 'Standing One' whom they worship.

In Hippolytus (Refutatio, vi. 7-18) (c. 230 A.D.) extracts are given from a work which evidently described a somewhat different system, and was called 'the Great Revelation.'

The first principle, according to this, is called ἀειπαύτος δίστασις, it is fire or silence; the fire is of two sorts, φανερὰ and ἀφανής, that which is hidden being the secret principle which causes that which is open. The world is derived from the unborn fire (γενετός ἢ ἀγενετός); first came six roots in pairs, male and female, viz. νοῦς and ἰσχυρία, φανὴ and ἑσπέρια, λογισμός and ἰδιουμένη. Corresponding to these are six visible or realized counterparts ἀφανείς and γῆ, ἡλίου and σελήνης, ἄρ and ὄψωρ. A large part of the work is devoted to proving the system by an allegorical use of the OT, but it is interesting to notice that there are elements derived from Aristotle, especially the distinction which runs through the whole of δίστασις and ἰσχυρία. Simon calls himself ὁ ἰστέος, ὁ σπασί, ὁ σπασίματος, implying his pre-existence and his immortality. A short extract will be sufficient to show the character of the book: 'To you then I say what I say, and I write what I write. The writing is this. There are two offshoots of the complete Æons, having neither beginning nor end, from one root, which is the invisible, incomprehensible power silence, of which the one is manifested from above, which is the great power, the intellect of the universe, that administers all things, the male principle; but the other is from below, vast thought, the female principle, generative of all things. Whence corresponding to one another they form a pair (σύνζυγος), and they reveal the middle space as an atmosphere which cannot be comprehended, having neither beginning nor end. But in this is the father who hears and nourishes all things that have beginning and end. This is he who stood, who standeth, who will stand, being a bisexual power, the reflex of the pre-existent, unlimited power which hath neither beginning nor end, being in solitude; for from this the thought which pre-existed in solitude came forth and became twain.'

Besides the extracts from this book, Hippolytus also tells us (vi. 20) that Simon went as far as Rome, where he seduced many by his magical arts, but was opposed by Peter. This is the earliest reference to a contest with St. Peter at Rome, unless the notice in Philaster (see below) was derived from the earlier treatise of Hippolytus, in which case it would belong to the close of the 2nd cent. Hippolytus goes on to give an account of his death, different from any that we have in other sources. At the end of his life Simon stated that if he were buried alive he would rise on the third day. He ordered his disciples to dig a grave and to bury him. They did as they were ordered, 'but he remained away even to the present day. For he was not the Christ.'

Origen (c. 249 A.D.), in the contra Celsum, v. 62, tells us that Celsus, enumerating all the Christian heretics, speaks of Simonians who, worshipping Helena, or a teacher Helenus, are called Heleniani. Origen points out that Celsus has omitted to notice that the Simonians never confess Jesus as the Son of God, but say that Simon is the power of God.

In vi. 11 Origen points out that Simon has no followers, and Dositheus not more than thirty. He adds that this is all the more marvellous, as Simon had taken away for his disciples the danger of death, saying that to sacrifice to idols was a matter of indifference. In the same work (i. 57) we are told that Simon has not thirty followers, or that that is an exaggerated number.

Commodian (c. 250), in Carm. apol. p. 613, speaking of beasts which have had the power of speech by the power of God, tells us of the dog which St. Peter made to speak to Simon. This story is found in the Apocryphal Acts.

The author of the treatise de Rebaptismate, ch. 16 (c. 260 A.D.), tells us of followers of Simon who make fire appear in the water when they baptize.

In the Syriac Didascalia (end of 3rd cent.), vi. 8 and 9 (Lagarde, Syriac text, and in Bunsen, Analecta Antenicana, ii. p. 325), we have a reference to Simon and Cleobius and others of his followers, and an account of the final destruction of Simon in the contest with Peter at Rome. As this work is almost inaccessible, and its evidence is important, the following extracts are given in full:—

Syriac, p. 100, l. 18 ' (Concerning Simon the sorcerer). For the beginning of heresies was on this wise. Satan clothed himself with Simon, a man who was a sorcerer, and of old time was his servant. And when we, by the gift of the Lord our God, and by the power of the Holy Spirit, were doing powers of healing in Jerusalem, and by means of the laying on of hands, the communication of the Holy Spirit was given to those who presented themselves, then he brought to us much silver, and desired that, as he had deprived Adam of the knowledge of life by the eating of the tree, so also he might deprive us of the gift of God by the gift of silver, and might seize our understandings by the gift of riches, in order that we might give to him in exchange for silver the power of the Holy Spirit. And we were all troubled about this. Then Peter looked at Satan, who was dwelling in Simon, and said to him, "Thy silver shall go with thee to destruction, and thou shalt not have part in this matter."

P. 101 ' (Concerning false apostles). But when we divided to the twelve parts for all the world, and went forth among the Gentiles in all the world, to preach the word, then Satan wrought and disturbed the people to send after us false apostles for the refutation of the word. And he sent out from the people one whose name was Cleobius, and joined him to Simon, and also others after them. They of the house of Simon followed me, Peter, and came to corrupt the word. And when he was in Rome he disturbed the Church (much), and turned away many. And showed himself as though flying. And he laid hold of the Gentiles, terrifying them by the power of the working of his sorceries. And in one of the days I went and saw him flying in the air. Then I rose up and said, "By the power of the name of Jesus I cut away thy powers." And he fell, and the ankle of his foot was broken. And then many turned away from him. But others who were worthy of him gave to him. And thus first was established and became that heresy of his. And also by means of other false apostles, etc.

Arnobius (c. 310, contra Gentes, ii. 12) knows of the story of the contest of Simon and Peter at Rome. 'For they had seen,' he says, 'the chariot of Simon Magus and the four flaming horses scattered by the mouth of Peter, and disappearing at the name of Christ.' He had been hurled down, and his legs broken; then, taken to Brundia, worn out with tortures and with shame, he had again thrown himself down from a lofty summit.

Eusebius (c. 324 A.D., HE ii. 13. 14) gives an account of Simon drawn from Justin Martyr and Irenæus, and embellished with somewhat strong vituperative language. He then goes on to refer to a contest with Peter, first in Judæa, then in Rome.

'Forthwith,' he says, 'the above-mentioned impostor was smitten in the eyes of his mind by a Divine and wonderful light, and when first he had been convicted in Judæa by the Apostle Peter of the evil deeds he had committed, he departed in flight on a great journey over the sea from the East to the West, thinking in this way only he would be able to live as he wished.' He tells us that he came to Rome, was assisted there by the devil, obtained great influence, and was honoured by a statue. But during the reign of Claudius, Peter himself came there. 'And when the Divine word thus made its dwelling there, the power of Simon and the man himself were immediately quenched.'

Eusebius and the author of the Syriac Didascalia quoted above are the first writers who speak of both a contest in Judæa and also one in Rome; but there does not seem to be any reason for thinking that either of them had any other source for the former than the Acts of the Apostles. We do not know Eusebius' source for the overthrow of Simon by Peter, and his language is curiously ambiguous. Probably he is giving the common story, drawn from mere apocryphal writing, the worthlessness of which he knows quite well. This makes him avoid both a quotation and direct details.

Cyril of Jerusalem (c. 347, Cat. vi. 14, 15) gives an account based upon the Acts and Justin. He also gives an account of the destruction of Simon when he attempted to fly. It is interesting, as we shall see, to notice that he ascribes the final catastrophe to the joint agency of Peter and Paul, showing that he possessed a story which contained the names of them both.

The work de excidio Hierosolym. iii. 2 (A.D. 368), ascribed to Hegesippus, but probably by Ambrose, gives an account of a contest at Rome of Peter and Paul with Simon. It narrates a considerable number of incidents contained in the Latin Acts.

Philaster (c. 380 A.D.), in his account of heresies (Hæc. xxix.), knows of the contest at Rome with Peter before Nero. He tells us that Simon fled from Jerusalem to escape Peter, and came to Rome, and then narrates the contest. If this came from his source, the early treatise of Hippolytus, it would throw the evidence for it into the 2nd cent.; but as it is absent in the parallel passage of Epiphanius, and as Hippolytus in his later treatise knows the story in another form, it is not probable that it did.

Jerome (in Matt. 24^b) (387 A.D.) tells us that Simon said, 'Ego sum sermo Dei, ego sum speciosus, ego paracletus, ego omnipotens, ego omnia Dei.'

The Apostolic Constitutions, which date from Antioch about the year 400, give the legend of Simon Magus in what we may call its complete form (vi. 7-9)—

The source of all heresy is Simon of Gitta. First of all, the story in the Acts is given. Then comes an account of all the false teachers who went forth into the world. Then of the contest between Simon and Peter at Cæsarea, where the companions of Peter were Zacchæus the publican, and Barnabas, and Nicetas and Aquila, brothers of Clement, 'bishop and citizen of Rome, who had been the disciple of Paul and co-apostle and helper in the gospel.' They discoursed for three days concerning prophecy and the unity of the Godhead. Then Simon, being defeated, fled into Italy. Then comes an account of the contest at Rome of the same character as we shall come across shortly in the Apocryphal Acts.

This account is very much fuller than the narrative contained in the Syriac Didascalia, written probably rather more than a century earlier, and seems to imply a considerable growth of the legend. As will shortly be seen, it implies a knowledge of the Clementine literature in some form, and of the Apocryphal Acts.

In reviewing this catena of passages certain points become clear. During the 2nd cent. all the information, as far as we know, that existed about Simon, is derived from the Acts of the Apostles and the writings of Justin. There seems to be no knowledge of the contest with Peter at Rome, although Justin believed that Simon had visited Rome. In the 3rd cent. we begin to get an account of the contest with Peter, which we find in Hippolytus, Commodian, the authors of the Syriac Didascalia, and Aurelius. Eusebius and the Didascalia contain this legend, with an account of a contest in Palestine, but do not imply anything beyond the narrative of the Acts of the Apostles; Cyril's account seems of much the same character. It is not until we reach the close of the 4th cent. that we find in the Apostolic Constitutions what we may call the completed legend, combining the stories which, as we shall see, are derived from the Clementine literature with those derived from the Apocryphal Acts and the narrative in the Acts of the Apostles. The contrast between the earlier Didascalia and the later Constitutions is from this point of view most instructive. We are now in a position to study the fuller legends.

iii. THE CLEMENTINE LITERATURE AND APOCRYPHAL ACTS.—(a) THE CLEMENTINE HOMILIES AND RECOGNITIONS.—These are two forms of what appear to be an early Christian romance, containing the story of the wanderings of Clement in search of truth, the preaching and missionary journeys of Peter, his contest with Simon Magus, and the reunion of Clement with the lost members of his family—his father, mother, and two brothers. The Recognitions we possess only in a translation made by Rufinus about the year 400; the Homilies contain a somewhat different form of the same story in Greek. There are also a Syriac version and later epitomes which need not trouble us. Neither the Recognitions nor the Homilies contain the story in its original form, both presenting later features; and there is no accepted opinion concerning the date or the sources of the book. But the completed work must belong to a time when the controversy with Marcion's teaching and the preservation of the Divine μωσαϊα were of interest in the Church, i.e. to the early part of the 3rd cent.; and some of the sources may be earlier. The earliest quotations come from Origen (c. 230). The work is clearly not orthodox in doctrine, but presents Ebionite features tinged with the Gnosticism it combats. We will give the account contained in the Homilies, stating at the conclusion the main differences in the narrative of the Recognitions.

The Homilies begin with an account of Clement, of his early religious impulses, of the desire that he had to hear of the new prophet, and of his meeting with Peter at Cæsarea in Palestine. He finds that Peter is, on the next day, to dispute with a certain Simon of Gitta (Bk. i.). The history of Simon is then related by Aquila and Nicetas, who had formerly been his pupils. His father's name was Antonius, his mother, Rachel. He was a Samaritan of the village of Gitta or Githæ, six miles from Samaria. He was educated at Alexandria, and skilled in the wisdom of the Greeks and in magic. He wishes to be considered the highest virtue (ἀρετή), higher than the Creator of the world. He calls himself the Standing One (ὁ ἑστῶς), as signifying that he will always be firmly established (ὁ ἑστῶς ἀπὸ πάντων), and having no cause of corruption in him. The Creator of the world is not the highest God, nor will the dead be raised. He denies Jerusalem and substitutes Mt. Gerizim. He puts himself in the place of Christ. He perverts the Law by his own interpretation of it. He was the chief of the disciples of John the Hemerobaptist. As our Lord had 12 apostles symbolizing the 12 months of the year, so John had 30, of whom one was a woman named Helena, thus symbolizing the 29½ days in a month. The death of John occurred during the absence of Simon in Alexandria, and Dositheus succeeded to his place. Simon, on his return, desiring the headship, pretended to be a disciple, and then accused Dositheus of not delivering the teaching correctly. Dositheus then attempted to beat him with a rod, whereupon Simon became a cloud of smoke. Dositheus, knowing that he was not himself the 'Standing One,' said, 'If you are the Standing One, I will worship you.' Simon claims that he is, becomes head of the sect, and Dositheus shortly afterwards dies. Simon, taking Helena with him, goes about disturbing the people. Helena, he says, had come down from the highest heavens; was mistress (κυρία), the All-mother, and Wisdom (σοφία); for her sake the Greeks and barbarians fought, having formed an image of the truth, for she was really then with the highest God. To aid him in his magical arts, he had killed a boy, and separated the soul from his body, and made an image which he kept concealed in an inner room by which he divined. A description is given of his miracles. He made statues walk. He appears wrapped in fire without being burnt. He is able to fly, to make bread out of stones. He becomes a serpent or a goat. He shows two faces. He can open and shut doors. He makes vessels in his house which wait upon him, without its appearing how they are moved (Bk. ii.).

After some delay, during which Peter has explained the mystical meaning of Scripture, the disputes between him and Simon take place; Simon undertaking to prove from the Scriptures that there is more than one God, and that he whom Peter called God is not the highest God, for he is without foresight, imperfect, incomplete, and exposed to every form of human passion (iii. 38). The disputations last three days. On the fourth day it was found that Simon had fled by night to Tyre, and was there deceiving the people by his magic (iii. 58). Clement, Nicetas, and Aquila are sent on to Tyre, and Simon flees to Sidon, leaving some of his disciples (iv. 6), who, at Tyre, discuss with Clement the Greek fables concerning the gods (Bks. iv.-vi.). Peter comes to Tyre and Sidon, when Simon goes on to Berytus. Peter follows him, and after a slight altercation Simon goes to Tripolis. Peter again follows (Bk. vii.) him, and Simon flees into Syria.

At Tripolis Peter remains a long time. There Clement is baptized, and then they go on towards Antioch in Syria by Orthosia and Antiarad (viii.-xi.). Then comes the story of Clement's family (xii.-xv.), and they go on by Batania, Paltus and Gabala to Laodicea. To Laodicea comes Simon from Antioch, and a long dispute takes place between him and Peter concerning the unity of the Godhead and the existence of evil (xvi.-xix.). Then Faustus, the newly-discovered father of Clement, goes to see Simon. Simon by his magical arts succeeds in making the face of Faustus like his own, and then departs to Antioch, where he accuses Peter of being a magician. Cornelius the centurion has been ordered by the emperor to arrest all magicians. It is for this reason that Simon has changed the face of Faustus, and he escapes to Judea. Faustus then goes to Antioch, and uses the appearance which Simon has given him to destroy the latter's influence. The people think that he is Simon. In Simon's name he recants, confesses his deceit and impostures, and Peter is sent for to come to Antioch.

The main differences which concern us in the Recognitions are as follow: Nothing is said about Simon being a pupil of John. Helena is called Luna (σέληνη). Simon says that Rachel was not really his mother, but that he had previously been conceived by a virgin. The main difference in the book is one of order: instead of two disputes between Peter and Simon—one at Caesarea, the other at Laodicea—we have one dispute at Caesarea, and there most of the matters discussed in the Homilies at Laodicea are placed by this editor (ii. 19-72, iii. 12-48). Reference is made (iii. 63) to Simon having said that he would go to Rome, and that there he would be looked on as a god and honoured with statues, and in iii. 64 it is said that he had been there. The voyage along the Syrian coast-line is treated very shortly, in iv.-vi. we have discourses of Peter, in vii.-ix. the story of Clement. Then at the end of x. Simon comes on the stage again, we have the same story as at the close of the Homilies, only that the father of Clement is called, not Faustus but Faustianus.

It will be noticed that this work seems to fall very easily into separate elements. Bks. i. and vii.-x. 51 are concerned with the story of Clement. Bks. ii. and iii. with the story of the contest of Simon and Peter. Bks. iv.-vi. with sermons of Peter. Bk. x. 52 ff. contains the concluding story concerning Simon, which hardly fits in with this version of the history. The journey along the Phœnician coast is very much attenuated, and there are suggestions that originally Simon went straight to Rome after the contest at Caesarea.

(b) THE LEGENDARY ACTS OF ST. PETER AND ST. PAUL.—The story of Simon in these Acts differs from that in the Clementine literature. Both alike are concerned with contests between Simon Magus and Simon Peter; but while the latter place the scene of the contest in Syria, the Acts place it in Rome. The legends appear in two forms: the one is that contained in the Actus Petri cum Simone, a document of Gnostic origin, believed to have belonged to the collection known as Leucian; the other is the Acts of Peter and Paul (ἑρμηνεία τῶν ἀγίων ἀποστόλων Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου).

(1) According to the Actus Petri cum Simone, after St. Paul had left Rome, a stir arose in that city, about a man called Simon, who was at Aricia, who had worked many miracles, and said he was the great power (magnam virtutem) of God, and without God did nothing. He receives a summons: 'Thou art in Italy God, thou art the saviour of the Romans; hasten quickly to Rome.' He promises to come the next day at the seventh hour, flying through the air at the city gate. At the appointed time smoke is seen approaching, and suddenly Simon appears in the midst. The brethren are in a state of great consternation because Paul is away, and they are left without any to comfort them, and the greater number fall away. Meanwhile the twelve years of Peter's sojourn in Jerusalem are fulfilled, and Christ bids him go to Rome, for Simon, whom he had driven out of Judea, had anticipated him there. We may pass over the account of Peter's voyage and arrival in Rome. He finds Simon living in the house of Marcellus, a Roman senator of great philanthropy, whom he had perverted by his magic. When Peter hears of the manner in which Marcellus has been deceived, he begins an attack on Simon, describing him as a 'ravening wolf, stealing the sheep which are not his.' It was he who inspired Judas to betray Christ, and hardened the heart of Herod and Caiaphas. He then goes to the house of Simon. Being refused admittance, he looses a dog and bids him carry a message. The dog goes in, raises his forefeet, and in a loud voice bids Simon come forth. Marcellus at once recognizes his sin, and, going out, falls at Peter's feet and asks pardon. He explains how he had been persuaded to erect a statue SIMONI IVVENI DEO: 'To Simon, the youthful god.' Further conversations of Simon and of Peter with the dog follow; then it, having fulfilled its mission, dies. Peter then turns a dead sardine into a live fish, and Marcellus, overpowered by these miracles, with the help of his servant turns Simon out of his house. Simon then goes to Peter's home. Peter sends him a message by means of an infant seven months old, who speaks and bids him leave Rome, and keep silence until the following Sabbath.

Peter then narrates the story of how he had rescued a woman named Eubola from Simon in Palestine. Further miracles and discourses of Peter are narrated, and the night before the contest is spent in prayer and fasting. On the day of the contest all Rome comes together, the senators, the prefect, and the officers. First comes a verbal disputation, and in the speech of Peter we notice apparently a Gnostic tendency. The contest begins by Simon making a young man die by his word. An interruption occurs. A woman rushes in saying that her son is dead, and some young men are sent to fetch him. Peter then raises the young man whom Simon had put to death, a favourite of the emperor, and the son of the widow who had been brought to him. Again, the mother of a certain senator, Nicostrates, asks Peter to heal her son. The dead body is brought. Peter challenges Simon to raise it. Simon makes it seem to move, but Peter really raises it. All the people then follow Peter.

Simon still tries to deceive the people by pretended miracles, but Peter exposes him. As no one believes him, he explains that he is going to God: 'Men of Rome, do you think that Peter has shown himself stronger than me, and has overcome me? And do you follow him? You are deceived. To-morrow, leaving you impious and godless men, I will fly to God, whose power I am, having been weakened. If, then, you have fallen, I am he that standeth (ἐγώ εἰμι), and I go to the Father, and will say to him, "Me, the Standing One, thy son, they wished to overthrow; but having refused to agree with them, I have come to thyself." The people come together to see him fly. He appears flying over Rome. Peter prays, and he falls down, having his leg broken in three places. The people stone him, and all follow Peter. Simon is taken to Aricia, and then to Terracina, where he dies.

(2) The Acta Petri et Pauli occur in two forms, the Μαγνητικὴ τῶν ἁγίων ἀποστόλων Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου and the ἑρμηνεία τῶν ἁγίων ἀποστόλων Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου, but the variations between them do not affect the story of Simon. The main point of difference between this story and that which we have just narrated is that St. Paul is here made the companion of St. Peter instead of being represented as having left Rome.

Owing to the success of the preaching of Peter and Paul, the Jews and priests stir up Simon against Peter. Simon is summoned before Nero, and by his miracles convinces Nero of the truth of his claims to be Son of God, and Nero orders Peter and Paul to be brought before him. The contest is first one of words, in which St. Peter quotes a letter of Pontius Pilate about our Lord, then it passes into miracles. Each challenges the other to say what is in their thoughts. Peter blesses and breaks a loaf of bread, and has it prepared to give to the dogs which Simon sends against him to devour him, thus disclosing that he knew what was in Simon's thoughts. Simon then demands that a lofty tower should be erected. Nero remembers how once Simon had appeared to raise himself from the dead after he had been killed three days, and still expects his victory. This Simon had done by making the executioner who had been sent to execute him cut off the head of a ram instead of his own. At this point there is inserted a conversation between Nero and Paul, and then a dispute on the subject of circumcision. Then comes the final test. While Paul prays, it is the part of Peter to oppose Simon. Simon starts flying. Peter then says, 'I adjure you, angels of Satan, who bear him to the air to deceive the hearts of the unbelievers, by God the creator of all, and Jesus Christ, whom on this day He raised from the dead, from this hour no longer bear him, but let him go.' He then falls and dies. Nero puts Peter and Paul in prison, but keeps the body of Simon to see if it will rise on the third day.

It will be noticed in this narrative that the part played by St. Paul is clearly subordinate. His name and his action might really be omitted without serious injury to the narrative. This suggests that very probably the story in its original form came from a source similar to the Actus Petri cum Simone, in which St. Paul is entirely absent.

iv. MODERN CRITICAL VIEWS.—We have now gone sufficiently minutely through all the various vicissitudes which the legends about Simon Magus experienced during the early centuries, and can pass to some equally curious developments of modern criticism.

There is no doubt that the Clementine literature is to some extent Ebionite in character, and might naturally contain anti-Pauline teaching. Starting from this point of view, Baur discovered certain passages in which Simon represented, or seemed to represent, St. Paul. He then propounded the view that Simon the Samaritan was not a historical character, but a term of reproach invented for the Apostle Paul. The contest between Simon Peter and Simon Magus really represented the original conflict of Peter and Paul. Wherever Simon Magus occurs we should read Paul. At first it was clearly understood who this person designated as Simon the Samaritan really was, but as the two parties more and more came together the original meaning was forgotten, and hence we find, even in a book like the Acts of the Apostles, written in a conciliatory interest, fragments of the old contest still embedded. But we have to recognize that the whole of our accepted history of early Christianity is really a conventional ecclesiastical legend, and the real history of the period must be disentangled from the Clementine literature. It is marvellous with what ingenuity the parallel was worked out when once the idea was started. Simon called himself the great power of God. Paul claims that he lived by the power of God (2 Co 12⁹ 13⁹). When Simon offers money to buy the power of conferring the gift of the Holy Ghost, this is an allusion to Paul, who by his contributions for the poor saints at Jerusalem was attempting to obtain the apostleship. Peter telling Simon that he has neither part nor lot in this matter, is really Peter telling Paul that he has not the κλῆρος τῆς ἀποστολῆς.

Lipsius, who had worked out this theory in the most ingenious manner, did so mainly in connexion with his researches into the early history of the story of St. Peter's martyrdom at Rome. The original idea of Peter having visited Rome was Ebionite. 'The tradition of Peter's presence in Rome, which, unhistorical as it is, can only be explained by an anti-Pauline interest, is most universally connected in the most ancient records with his relation to Simon' (Zeller, Acts of the Apostles, i. p. 237, Eng. tr.). Rome must be claimed for true Christianity and the Jewish prince of the apostles, so a story was invented describing the manner in which Peter had visited Rome and there won a great victory over the false apostle, the Samaritan, i.e. Paul. Ultimately, the Roman Church realized how important for their prestige was the visit of Peter to Rome and his martyrdom there, and they adopted this legend in a Catholic sense, Peter and Paul being represented as the first founders of the Roman Church. The difficulty about this theory is that in the documents which we possess the Catholic theory is really the oldest, and therefore it is necessary to invent an early Ebionite Acts of Peter which contain the Ebionite form of the legend. This, according to Lipsius, was the common source of the Simon legend and the Apocryphal Acts, and he devoted great ingenuity to reconstructing it in accordance with his theory. But in his later works Lipsius has given up much of his former theory, although he still holds to the existence of early Ebionite Acts of Peter.

This theory of the identity of Simon Magus and the Apostle Paul is gradually ceasing to be held, and many scholars summarily dismiss it; it is, however, we notice, still accepted by Schmiedel (Encyc. Bibl. i. p. 913), and will, no doubt, be fully worked out by him. At first sight, from the point of view of common-sense, it seems absurd, and as a matter of fact it has very little evidence in its favour. The evidence that there seemed to be arose from a certain method of looking at facts owing to preconceived ideas. Without going into the question more thoroughly than space permits, we may touch upon the following points:—

(i.) It is very doubtful whether the Simon of the Clementines conceals the Apostle Paul.

(ii.) There is little or no evidence for early Ebionite Acts of Peter.

(iii.) The evidence for the Catholic history of the visit of Peter to Rome is earlier and better than that for his visit to Rome to combat Simon Magus. That is a later story (not appearing until the 3rd cent.), arising from the combination of two or three stories.

(iv.) The catena of Patristic evidence given above suggests a quite different account of the growth of the legend.

(i.) How far does the Simon of the Clementines conceal the Apostle Paul?—It is quite natural that the writer of the Clementines, who was probably an Ebionite by extraction, should be anti-Pauline, and any teaching that he would consider erroneous he would put into the mouth of Simon. But how far does the masque of Simon really conceal Paul?

(a) In Hom. xvii. 12-19 Simon defends the thesis that the belief obtained by visions is more certain than that from personal intercourse. Peter maintains that the personal knowledge that he possesses is more trustworthy. This may very naturally be referred to the claim of St. Paul, that he was an apostle because he had seen the Lord in a vision; nor are there wanting verbal parallels. Peter says (ch. 19): εἰ κατήγγελλον μα λήγας, cf. Gal 2¹¹; so again, εἰ δὲ ὁ ἰσχυρὸς μαλὶς ὁρατὸς καὶ μαθητευθεὶς ἀποστείλας ἵσταται, and we know that St. Paul claimed to have visions (2 Co 12¹). This explanation is quite possible; but has not the whole passage probably very much more meaning when applied to the claims made by heretics to have a special revelation superior to the Church revelation?

(b) In Hom. ii. 17 Simon is said to be ἀποσταλὴς εἰς τὰ ἔθνη πρῶτος ἰδὼν. He preaches the false doctrine, the coming of which must precede the true which Peter taught. Is not this Paul going among the heathen and teaching them falsely, to be followed by Peter, who teaches them what is true? So again Hom. iii. 69 Peter says that when he wished to teach the heathen the belief in one God, Simon went further, and taught them to believe in many. In vii. 4-8 Peter tells the people of Tyre that they have been deceived by his forerunner Simon. The second instance clearly takes away from the force of the first, because the false teacher is made to teach the belief in more than one God, and is clearly the first disseminator of Marcionism.

(c) In Hom. xviii. 6-10 we have a condemnation of indiscriminate teaching. This is Peter condemning Paul; but really it will have equal meaning if we suppose it introduced to explain why this special doctrine of the Clementines has only been known to a few.

(d) In Recog. iii. 49 Simon is called a vas electionis . . . maligno, a chosen vessel for evil, cf. Ac 9¹³; and in Recog. ii. 18 he is said to be malignus transformans se in splendorem lucis, cf. 2 Co 11¹⁴. But nothing can be drawn from the last sentence, and the first does not mean much. Why, if Paul is called a chosen vessel in a good sense, should not Simon be called a chosen vessel for evil?

(e) Something more may be said for the expression in the letter of Peter prefixed to the book in which he speaks of ἐχθρὸν ἀνθρώπου ἀποστόλου τῆς καὶ δόξης . . . προσπαύμενος διδασκαλίαν.—Here Paul may well be referred to as 'the enemy' whose doctrine was lawless; but why should not the enemy be simply Simon, who was by tradition the source of all false teaching? Lawlessness does not mean breaking the law, but teaching immorality.

(f) The most significant passage is Recog. i. 70 (a curious episode peculiar to the Recognitions). James by his preaching has very nearly persuaded the high priest and all the people to be baptized when 'homo inimicus' appears and bids them not to be deceived by a magician, and attacks them. He was clearly intended to be Saul (in his unconverted days), but he is specially distinguished from Simon, who is introduced as someone different in the next chapter but one. Paul is quite clearly not Simon here.

It seems very doubtful, indeed, whether Simon is ever intended to represent Paul, nor is there any Pauline teaching put into Simon's mouth. The above passages, which are all the more important quoted, are hardly sufficient to establish the theory that Simon is Paul. The author or compiler of the Clementines really starts from the belief that the Simon of the Acts, whom Peter combated, was the source of all heresy, and so he makes his favourite apostle travel from place to place combating in the person of Simon the false Marcionite teaching of which he was believed to be the originator. This will explain the whole situation, and is much less far-fetched than the explanation which finds St. Paul everywhere.

(ii.) But without forcing this too far, and admitting that the writer may possibly have been intending somewhat delicately to attack Pauline teaching, there is a further question: Is there any evidence for early Ebionite Acts which contained a narrative of Peter and Simon (concealing Paul)?

The theory of Lipsius formerly was that there was an original Ebionite Acts which was the common source of both the Roman legend and the Clementines. He found an external support for this statement in the passage given above from the Apostolic Constitutions, which he boldly said belonged to the earlier portion of that work. This is an admirable illustration of the danger of such statements, and how very untrustworthy are the attempts of any critic, however able, to guess at the original portions of a work. Some years before Lipsius wrote thus, Lagarde had already published his Greek version of the Didascalia, the earlier form of the Constitutions, and disproved the whole theory. There is no external evidence for the existence of early Ebionite Acts as the source of the whole story, and Lipsius has given up the theory in this form, but he still believes in early Ebionite Acts. As a matter of fact, there seems very little evidence for their existence. He finds Ebionite tendencies in some passages of the Acts of Peter and Paul, but the controversy there is not with Jewish Christianity, but with Judaism—and Simon Magus is the champion of Judaism. That is the position that he occupied in the Leucian Acts, and the passages suggest much more a Leucian than an Ebionite origin. It is even more difficult to speak of the sources of the Clementines, but it is very doubtful if it is necessary to assume an Ebionite Acts which contained an account of Simon. The contest between Simon and Peter along the Syrian coast is almost absent from the Recognitions, perhaps the earlier form. With the exception of the concluding incident, which was clearly not part of the original work, the portion concerning Simon resolves itself into the account of his career, which is obviously based largely on Justin, and the disputes with Peter at Caesarea, in which Simon is made the protagonist of Marcionism. The latter would probably be the direct work of the author, and does not demand a source. On no subject connected with the Clementines is it possible to speak with certainty; but this much seems clear, that there is no evidence of Ebionite Acts, and no need to suppose that they existed. They are merely a hypothesis, invented to support preconceived views.

(iii.) If we examine the chronological order of the development of the legend, the Catholic account of the first work of Peter and Paul at Rome is older than the story of Simon and Peter. Both Dionysius of Corinth and Irenaeus know the story of their visit, and both ascribe to them the foundation of the Roman Church. There is no certain trace of the story concerning the contest of Simon and Peter at Rome before the 3rd cent., although as a matter of fact it probably existed in the Leucian Acts not later than the close of the 2nd century. Chronologically, the Catholic story caused the legend, not vice versa.

(iv.) The same is true of the whole growth of the story. We first of all trace the various elements of it as existing in different sources and varying forms. The more complicated and fuller stories are the result of later growth, and not the original source. The simple narrative of the Acts is the earliest, not the latest account. This will come out more clearly in what follows.

v. THE GROWTH OF THE LEGEND.—We are now in a position to sketch tentatively the growth of the whole legend. Our primary authorities must be the Acts and Justin Martyr, because they are chronologically the earlier, and because the acceptance of them explains the rest. Justin Martyr, who lived in Samaria less than 100 years after the time of Simon, was writing about something that he would know. Whether the fully developed system as described by Justin comes directly from the founder of the heresy or was the product of a later member of the school, may of course still be doubted, but the system harmonizes with what we read in the Acts; nor are there any a priori reasons for doubting the story about Simon and the woman he chose to call Helena. The later account of the system which we find in Hippolytus was probably the production of some member of the sect; but it is on the same lines as the older work, and we must remember that the essence of Gnosticism was not orthodoxy but speculation. Different members of the school of Basilides produced very different systems, and in the same way some members of the school of Simon produced the later development described above. The main source of the Clementine literature was directly or indirectly Justin, possibly also Hegesippus, and some of the personal details of his life and connexion with Dositheus may be authentic.

We now pass to the Roman visit. Are there any grounds for thinking that this really took place? Probably not. Of what happened in Samaria, Justin is a first-hand authority; on matters in Rome he would be ignorant and misinformed. He saw the statue, and jumped to the conclusion that Simon, of whom he had known so much, was here represented. It may be noticed that Justin gives no authority for the Roman visit except the statue. In another direction Justin is responsible for the Simon legend, namely, by making him the source and originator of heresy. How far there is an actual historical basis for the idea that Gnosticism was directly or indirectly derived from him may be doubtful. His system exhibits all the elements which go to make up Gnosticism; especially we may notice that there we first find the idea that the highest God was not the creator of the world; but then such tendencies and ideas were in the air. The same influences of dualism and syncretism which worked in his case would work in others. But, anyhow, Simon was the one clear instance of a heretic mentioned in the New Testament. It was natural, therefore, to represent him as the typical arch-heretic, the originator of heresy, and the place which Justin assigned to him at the head of his heretical genealogy was one in which his position was uncontested.

Next comes the Roman contest with Peter. The materials out of which this was constructed were (1) the contest of Peter and Simon in the Acts; (2) the Roman tradition that the Church was founded by Peter; (3) the story of the Simon statue; (4) a story contained in Suetonius (Nero, 12). At games initiated by Nero, some one, personating Icarus, attempted to fly, and the emperor was sprinkled with blood when he fell. The story of Simon's flight towards heaven was probably invented at Rome before the close of the 2nd cent., not later at any rate than the beginning of the 3rd. Whether the author of the Leucian Acts of Peter—a Gnostic—was the first originator or not we cannot say; very probably he was, as he seems to have helped to give Simon Magus a prominent place. According to Photius (Cod. cxiv.) that work taught that the God of the Jews was evil, whose minister Simon was. This would make it very natural that the author we call Leucius should have invented the episode; and the date which we assign later than Justin, but not later than the end of the 2nd cent., harmonizes with other indications. This story, like many other Leucian inventions, was attractive to the orthodox, and therefore we find it here worked up in a comparatively speaking orthodox dress. Paul was introduced as a companion of Peter, not because there had been anything anti-Pauline in the original story, but because the combined activity of Peter and Paul became a favourite subject of legend. For an Ebionite form of this legend there appears to be no evidence. There remains a certain chronological confusion to discuss. According to Justin, it was in the reign of Claudius that Simon came to Rome. The origin of this date was probably the date on the statue which he saw. The earlier form of the story, then, would bring Peter to Rome in the days of Claudius; and in the Actus Petri cum Simone nothing is said about Nero. But the martyrdom of Peter was by tradition under Nero, so that at a later date the legend was changed to Nero's time. Eusebius, however, had before him the earlier account. He brings Simon to Rome under Claudius, and Peter immediately after him. Is not this probably the origin of the 25 years' episcopate of Peter at Rome?

The origin, then, of the Roman legend was probably the Leucian Acts. These are represented for us mainly by the Actus Petri cum Simone, the Leucian affinities of which have been shown by James (Apocrypha Anecdota, ii. p. xxiv); the ᾠδὴς Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου are an orthodox recasting of the story, with the exaggerated miraculous tendency omitted.

A separate line on which the legend developed is represented by the Clementine literature. A combination of arguments would incline us to put its date at the beginning of the 3rd cent. and its origin in Syria. The sources out of which it was composed must be very doubtful, as we have little to go on, but the story is obviously made up of different elements. There is a story of Clement and his relations; there is a story of a dispute with Apion, which sometimes seems to have been put into the mouth of Peter, but in our texts is put into the mouth of Clement. There are certain κηρύγματα or Preachings of Peter, and there is an account of the travels of Peter. But how much of this was derived from earlier sources and how much was the work of the compiler of the legend we have no means of determining. The story of the travels of Peter contained, obviously, an account of his journey from Caesarea to Antioch, of the Churches that he founded during that journey, and the bishops and presbyters that he instituted. This is preserved in both our texts; but was the dispute with Simon Magus part of the original document? It is usually supposed that it must have been; but in the Recognitions, which is generally considered the older form of the story, the part of Simon is confined to Caesarea, and is an episode by itself. Again, does the author know of the Roman contest? The references to Rome occur mainly in the Recognitions, and may have been introduced to adapt the story to a Roman audience. It is quite possible that the introduction of Simon Magus is due to the compiler of the work, and that his only historical source of knowledge about Simon was Justin Martyr and, possibly, Hegesippus.

But if his sources are doubtful, his purpose is more clear. He is an Ebionite Christian by extraction, who has been influenced by the speculative ideas which we associate with Gnosticism, and he writes to reconcile the conflicting claims of Judaism and Christianity. His main tenet is the Divine unity, and therefore he combats the polytheism of the heathen, the dualism of Marcion, and Trinitarianism (if we may use the term). This last feature gives us his date, the period of the Monarchian controversy early in the 3rd cent.; and for this date there is also external evidence. Within the limits of a common Monotheism he hopes to find room for both Jews and Christians, and his references to the establishment of bishops and presbyters by Peter show that he wishes to adopt the existing ecclesiastical organization. There is a certain amount of art in his choice of characters. The defender of polytheism is Apion, perhaps the traditional opponent of Judaism; the attack is put into the mouth of Clement, as obviously more fitted for such work than Peter. The one heretic of the apostolic age, Simon, who was the traditional source of all heresy, is made the exponent of all false Christian teaching, and his natural combatant is Peter. Paul is never mentioned by name, but anything like an overt attack on him would have been quite beside his purpose. There are no doctrines which were ascribed to Paul attacked in the person of Simon. Simon is not Paul, nor intended by the author to be Paul. He was obviously a writer with considerable powers of invention; he had a certain amount of history or legend or tradition, but he may very likely be himself responsible for most of the personal episodes he describes, and for the use he has made of Simon. There is no evidence, at any rate, for any Ebionite Acts which he is supposed to have used, nor any need to imagine them. One more feature must be referred to. Simon is with him the magician as well as the false teacher, and a great deal is said about the magical element, which requires all Peter's miraculous powers to dispel. The whole of this side of the legend appears absurdly puerile to a modern reader. But we are apt to forget that all the tricks Simon claimed to perform were believed in at the time, and that those who claimed to perform magical rites were among the most determined opponents of Christianity. Magic was a real danger, and a very subtle form of false teaching. It was the true spiritual force of Christianity which overcame it; but numerous writers always ascribed this triumph to the exhibition of vulgar miraculous power.

It is maintained that this reconstruction of the history of the Simon legend represents a much more probable and consistent account of the origin of the story than the distorted and complicated theories which have appeared since the time of Baur, and have rested chiefly on unproved hypotheses of sources and fanciful reconstructions of the early historical period.*

vi. THE AFFINITIES OF SIMON'S SYSTEM.—The historical nucleus of the legend is, as we have seen, the narrative in the Acts, part of the story in Justin, the system as described by him belonging either to Simon himself or an earlier follower, and perhaps some incidents recorded by the Clementines. When we accept this as original, the affinities of the system suggested by Baur and his followers become a legitimate explanation. Samaria was a country in which a sort of bastard Judaism came in contact with the old Syrian and Phœnician religions and the newer Hellenic paganism. All these different elements are present in Simon's system. That the relation of himself and Helena is a reminiscence of the Syrian male and female deity is equally natural, whether Helena be a real person (as is probable) or only the personification of an idea. The fact that in one account—that of the Recognitions—she is called Luna (a translation of σελήνη), makes the parallel to the Sun and Moon worship, the Baal and Astarte, more close. Simon represents an almost pre-Christian Gnosticism, and it is significant that only here do we find this very repulsive dualistic element. Simon represents the impostor of the period, whose claims are even more improbable than those of Apollonius of Tyana or Alexander of Abonoteichus. His mind is a medley of Hellenism, Judaism, and Orientalism; out of this he forms a system, in which he himself occupies the first position. The influence of Christianity and then the opposition to it give a certain vitality and force to the ideas he suggests, and in other hands they become fertile and prolific. Later Gnostics were more definitely Christian. The founders of the sects never claimed Divine honours for themselves. They discarded more extravagant features. But they shared with Simon the fundamental doctrine that the Creator of the world was an inferior and, perhaps, a malevolent deity.*

* It may be objected that nothing has been said about the Simon of Cyprus mentioned in Joe. Ant. xx. vii. 4. In the opinion of the present writer the two Simons have nothing to do with one another, and the resemblance of names counts for nothing. There are said to be twenty-four Simons in the Index to Josephus.

vii. SIMON MAGUS AND SIMONY.—In another direction the name of Simon has become used universally for the sin of attempting to purchase spiritual gifts or spiritual preferment for money. Both sorts were included under the sin of Simon. The earliest example seems to be from the Apostolical Canons, where it is said: 'If any bishop, presbyter, or deacon obtain this dignity for money, both he that is ordained and the ordainer shall be deposed, and also cut off from all communion, as Simon Magus was by Peter.' And the instance is often quoted in later canons. The use of the term appears to have arisen through the Canon Law.

viii. SIMON MAGUS AND THE FAUST LEGEND.—There are some curious coincidences, if they are nothing more, between the legend of Simon and the story of Faust. The hero of that legend is supposed to have been a certain Dr. Faust, of Knittlingen, who died in 1540. The legend appears first in a written form in 1587, and was obviously the result of a fertile imagination. It is quite possible that in building up the story reminiscences direct or indirect of the legend of Simon Magus may have come in. The following are points of resemblance: (1) firstly and most clearly the introduction of Helena in both; (2) the name Faustus; (3) the homunculus; (4) in Simon Magus himself we may have a suggestion of Mephistopheles. This connexion may be due to direct literary influence, or we may have here two different versions of a theme which has been common at various times, the contest between Religion and Magic—a contest which we have to believe is far older and more universal than was once thought.

LITERATURE.—(1) On Simon Magus generally. The two most complete expositions of the two opposing points of view are by Miller in Herzog, RE xiv. s.v., and by Lipsius in Schenkels Bibel-Lexicon, v. 301-321. For older works see Mosheim, Inst. hist. eccl. i. 389. There are accounts in all the works on heresies in the Early Church, of which the most useful is that of Hilgenfeld, Die Ketzergeschichte des Urchristenthums, pp. 163 and 453. The most complete account in English is that by Salmon in Dict. Chr. Biog. iv. 681. Other treatises referred to are Simon, 'Leben und Lehre Simon des Magiers,' in Z. f. hist. Theol. 1841, lii. 39; Baur, Das Manichäische Religionsystem, Tübingen, 1831, 467; Die Christliche Gnosis, Tübingen, 1835, p. 300 ff.

SIMPLE, SIMPLICITY.—The words *tr*⁴ 'simple' in AV are (1) *tr*⁴ (from *tr*⁴ to be open), 'openness,' inexperience, descending to 'heedlessness.' In Pr 1²² the abstract use occurs and the word is *tr*⁴ 'simplicity,' elsewhere the meaning is personal, and the translation 'simple' or 'simple one.' In Pr 9⁶ the translation is 'foolish' (RV 'simple ones'). It occurs chiefly in Proverbs (see Oehler, Theol. of OT, ii. 446; Cheyne, Devout Study of Criticism, 388; Schultz, Old Test. Theol. ii. 233 f.). (2) *tr*⁴, only Pr 9¹³, of folly personified. (3) *tr*⁴, 'guileless,' Wis 4¹², Ro 16¹⁹. (4) *tr*⁴, 'sincere,' lit. 'unmixed,' Ro 16¹⁹ (see Trench, Syn. § lvi.).

Simplicity is the tr. of (1) *tr*⁴ in Pr 1²². (2) *tr*⁴ (of which the plu. is *tr*⁴, the Thummim of Heb. oracles) completeness, uprightness (from *tr*⁴ to finish), only 2 S 15¹¹. (3) *tr*⁴, 'onefoldness,' 'singleness,' 'sincerity,' Wis 1¹, 1 Mac 2^{37a}, Ro 12⁶, 2 Co 1¹² 11³. (See Sanday-Headlam on Ro 12⁶; G. Montefiore in JQR vi. 469).

The Eng. adj. 'simple' (used also as a subet.) signifies 'onefold,' 'single' (from Lat. simplex, through Old Fr. simple). This original meaning is seen, e.g., in its application to medicines: thus Gosson, School of Abuse (Arber, p. 37), 'Chiron was . . . a reader of Phisicke, by opening the natures of many simples.' And we still speak of a matter being 'simple' when it is not complicated. When applied to persons the meaning is now 'weak-minded,' 'foolish.' But in AV and older Eng. generally the meaning is never quite so strong as that, and, when it approaches it, always implies moral blame.

1. Inexperienced or unapportioned, as Gn 25²⁷ Tind. 'Jacob was a simple man and dwelled in the tentes.' This is perhaps all that is expressed by the word in Pr 1⁴ 'To give subtilty (RVm 'prudence') to the simple'; 14¹⁵ 'The simple believeth every word'; and especially Ro 16¹⁹ 'I would have you wise unto that which is good, and simple (AVm 'harmless') concerning evil.'

2. This inexperience may be ignorance to be instructed, or weakness to be defended. Thus Ps 19⁷ 'The testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple'; 110⁶ 'The Lord preserveth the simple.' Cf. Hamilton, Catechism, fol. xv, 'Ye that are simple and unleitmit men and wemen shal expressly beleaf al the artikils of your Crede'; Is 53⁸ Cov. 'He shalbe the most symple and despised of all'; 60²² Cov. 'The yngest and leest shal growe in to a thousande, and the symplest in to a stronge people.'

3. But in Proverbs the tendency is to regard inexperience as heedlessness and almost folly, thus 14¹⁸ 'The simple inherit folly'; and as blameworthy, thus 12¹ 'How long, ye simple ones, will ye love simplicity?' Cf. Bunyan, Holy War, 129, 'I heard him say it in Folly Yard, at the house of one Mr. Simple, next door to the sign of the Self-deceiver.'

Simplicity has not quite the same range of meaning as 'simple.' 1. Ignorance or weakness, descending to folly, as Pr 1²², cf. Adams, Works, i. 29—'God, in regard to thy simplicity, brings to naught all their machinations.' 2. Guilelessness, rising to innocence and sincerity, as 2 S 15¹¹ 'They went in their simplicity'; Wis 1¹ 'Think of the Lord with a good heart, and in simplicity of heart seek him'; 1 Mac 2^{37a}, Ro 12⁶ 'He that giveth, let him do it with simplicity' (i.e. ἀπλοῦς, AVm 'liberally,' RV 'with liberality,' RVm 'with singleness'); 2 Co 1¹² 'in simplicity and godly sincerity' (RV (reading with edd. ἀπλοῦς for ἀπλοῦς of TR) 'in holiness'); 11³ 'the simplicity that is in Christ.' Cf. Elyot, Governour, i. 220, 'Trewely in every covenant, bargayne, or promise, ought to be a simplicitie, that is to saye, one playne understandinge or meaning betwene the parties'; and Ac 2⁴⁶ Rhem. 'They tooke their meate with joy and simplicitie of hart.' It is to be observed that 'simplicity' in its modern sense does not occur in AV or RV: to take 2 Co 11³ in the mod. sense is wholly to misunderstand the passage. J. HASTINGS.

SIMPLICITY (ἀπλοῦς, 'singleness,' LXX tr. of *tr*⁴ as also of *tr*⁴) is the characteristic attribute of the man who is whole-hearted and single-hearted. The word ἀπλοῦς is applied by Plato to God, who is 'perfectly simple and true both in word and deed' (Rep. ii. 382 E). It is used to describe the man who plays only one part and does one thing, in contrast to him whose energies are not concentrated but divided over a variety of pursuits (Rep. iii. 397 E). Simplicity is a mark of the just man who wishes to be and not to seem good (Rep. ii. 361 B), while the man of an opposite type who lacks the true virtue of a 'unanimous and harmonious soul' is διπλούς, for he is at war with himself, and is virtually two men, not one (Rep. viii. 554 D). Its close relationship to ἀκακία (guilelessness) is indicated by the fact that in many passages where the LXX has ἀπλότης, Aq. has ἀκακία as tr. of the same word (Ps 79 26¹¹ 41¹³ 78⁷²); its relationship to εὐθύτης (rectitude), by the fact that in LXX ῥῆ' is tr. by both words (1 K 9¹, 1 Ch 29¹⁷). Simplicity describes the moral and mental attitude of the man who is absolutely at one with himself in motive, aim, and end, whether in relation to God or his fellow-men. This unity and concentration of the inner nature gives fullness of spiritual perception, as our Lord shows by a comparison taken from another sphere of vision. 'If, therefore, thine eye be single (ἀπλούς), thy whole body shall be full of light' (Mt 6²², Lk 11³⁴). Such a man is incapable of insincerity, or artifice, or malice, or finesse. Hence he is opposed to the two-souled man, who is driven now Godwards, now earthwards (διψυχος, Ja 1⁸), to the double-hearted (Ps 12²) and the double-tongued (διλόγος, 1 Ti 3⁸; διγλωσσος, Pr 11¹³, Sir 5⁹). In his walk he does not try to go upon two ways (Sir 2¹²), but goes straight to the goal, with his face set thitherward, neither halting, nor lingering, nor diverging. In his obedience to Christ there is no reservation, no element of calculation, only unconditional loyalty (2 Co 11³). In his devotion to God there is no bargaining as to the minimum of disobedience which He may permit (2 K 5¹⁸), in his work for men is no taint of eye-service (Col 3², Eph 6⁶). In his giving there is no admixture of any base element (Ro 12⁸). For he gives as God gives, without any afterthought (Ja 1⁵), for no end save the good of the receiver. The simple one is guileless, and as such, though not free from prejudice, he is open to conviction (Jn 14⁷). Himself incapable of being swayed by ignoble motives, he attributes a similar incapability to others, and thus may be easily deceived; in this way simplicity may so degenerate that it becomes not merely opposed to craftiness, but to prudence (2 S 15¹¹).

In the NT conception prudence is consistent with simplicity, and should be inseparably associated with it (Mt 10¹⁶, Ro 16¹⁹ ἀεπάσις). In the Test. of the Twelve Patriarchs there is a graphic picture of the man of simplicity. He is not a busybody in his doings, nor malicious and slanderous against his neighbours. He never speaks against any one, nor censures the life of any one, but walks in the simplicity of his eyes. He is free from lustful desires; he is unselfish in his beneficence. 'The simple coveteth not gold, defraundeth not his neighbour, longeth not after manifold dainties, delighteth not in varied apparel, doth not picture to himself to live a long life, but only waiteth for the will of God, and the spirits of evil have no power against him' (Testament of Issachar, c. 3-4, Sinkler's tr.).

*SIN.—I. IN THE OLD TESTAMENT.—Prefatory.—The doctrine of sin in the OT must be considered as there given; that is to say, the historical method forbids our taking into account NT interpretations of it—such, for instance, as St. Paul's comments in Romans on the sin of Adam and its consequences. The same method requires that the chronological order of the OT should be followed, but the attempt to do this precisely would so complicate the treatment that it seems best to examine the main divisions of the Heb. Bible as they stand—(1) the Law, (2) the Prophets, (3) the Hagiographa, leaving open such questions as what amount of the Priestly legislation may be considered to be pre-exilic, and what dates are to be assigned to Deuteronomy and the Books of Kings.

Sin is a negative conception, and involves a preceding idea to which it is contrary, namely Righteousness, first attributed to Noah, Gn 6⁹. The righteousness of God is His conformity to the moral law which is His nature, and to His covenants with man. The righteousness of man is conformity to the same moral law and the same covenants. 'Walking with God' (Gn 5²⁴) is but another phrase for righteousness. Sin as the contrary of righteousness is disobedience to God, departing from God, self-assertion against God. Thus the fundamental OT conception of sin is not sin against other men, or against a man's self, but sin against God. The OT anticipates what modern Christian thought has asserted, that the nearest relation of the human soul is its relation to God (Müller, Chr. Doct. of Sin, tr. vol. i. p. 81).

i. THE LAW.—Starting with this hypothesis, let us first see how far it is borne out in the traditions of pre-Mosaic religion.

(1) There is no occasion to enter into the question whether the story of the Fall is to be regarded as both historical and symbolic (Aug. de Civitate Dei, xiii. 21) or merely symbolic (Origen, de Prin. iv. 16). One point comes out clearly: sin is set before us at its very beginning as disobedience to Divine law, an exercise of human free will in conscious opposition to that law, a departure from an original state. There is, however, nothing to imply that that state was a perfect one, as scholastic theology described it. The free communications with God, on which much stress has been laid as evidence of a lofty state, continue after the Fall. (On the supposed contradiction between the results of anthropological science and the idea of a Fall, see Illingworth's Bampton Lectures, Lect. vi.) It must also be observed that the OT does not anywhere teach a corruption of human nature derived from Adam, still less an imputation of his guilt. All that it teaches is the universality of sin in Adam's offspring. But if the descent of all mankind from Adam is taken as a fact, then the universality of sin may be presumed to have some relation to descent from Adam (see Mozley's Lectures and Theological Papers, Lect. on 'Original Sin'). And the prevalent feeling that the nation rather than the individual was the subject of sin (see Clemen, Lehre von der Sünde, p. 42 ff.) would prepare the way for the thought of all mankind being involved in the guilt and penalty of Adam and Eve, when religious thought came to reflect on the relation to God of mankind generally, and not merely of Israel. This reflexion, however, belongs to a later date (2 Esdras and Romans), and the absence of reference to the Fall in OT is remarkable. The three passages usually quoted, Job 31³³ (see RVm), Hos 6⁷ (see RVm), Is 43²⁷ (see Dillmann, ad loc.), are not to the point. Cf., further, Thackeray, St. Paul and Jewish Thought, 31 ff.

(2) The interest of the Cain narrative is, (a) that man is not left to himself either before or after sin. There are voices of God warning, promising, condemning. And (b) sin is already personified; it has gained a positive existence instead of being a mere negation: 'If thou doest not well, sin coucheth at the door,' Gn 4⁷; cf. Sir 27¹⁰.

(3) The next point is the development and increase of sin (Gn 6⁵⁻¹¹⁻¹³). Sin is a parasitic growth which multiplies in its appropriate soil. It is not merely a number of isolated rebellions, but results in a state of sin both in the individual and in the race. This state of sin takes possession of the thoughts of the heart, and its outward effect is violence (פָּחַד) between man and man.

(4) At the Flood the method of God is, so to speak, changed. He recognizes (Gn 6⁵) the predominance of 'the evil imagination' (רָעָה), a term which afterwards plays an important part in Jewish theology (see Weber, Jüd. Theol. p. 213 ff., and Dillmann, ad loc.). Sin must be dealt with in other ways, by an election and a covenant. The one righteous man is taken, special relations are established with him, and a covenant given. This covenant is followed by those with Abraham, and with Israel at Sinai. But these covenants, while designed for salvation, open out, each of them, new possibilities of sin. It is no longer a matter of transgression against undefined moral law, but there are definite ordinances. Sin is not merely the breach of the universal relation between creature and Creator, but the breach of covenant, a revolt (פָּחַד). Moreover, with patriarchal religion, the contrast of faith and unbelief comes in in a definite way (Gn 15¹). Esau's sin also is plainly unbelief. This is gradually shown to be the root of sin, and every particular sin is regarded as a manifestation of it. When, with Abraham, we reach the distinction between those within and those without the covenant, the question arises, Is there a recognition of the moral law and a consciousness of sin in the Gentile world? The question is answered in the affirmative by the case of Abimelech (Gn 20), and the existence of such a law outside the covenant is implied throughout the OT, e.g. Am 1. Thus there is nothing in the OT claim of unique revelation to Israel, which is inconsistent with that consciousness of sin which is to be found in Babylonian, Persian, Vedic, and Greek sources, though there it is sin against Istart, Ahuramazda, or Varuna, not against Jehovah. As to what conduct is sin, the range is narrow, and the moral standard within the covenant does not materially differ from that outside it. Deceit, sensuality, and cruelty are not yet distinctly felt as sinful.

(5) The Mosaic covenant. The terminology of sin now increases and becomes definite, and it will therefore be necessary to examine it in detail. The three most important terms occur together in one verse, Ex 34⁷ (cf. Ps 32²), iniquity (פָּחַד), transgression (פָּחַד), sin (פָּחַד).

(a) Sin.—Three cognate forms in Heb., with no distinction of meaning, express sin as missing one's aim, and correspond to ἀμαρτία and its cognates in NT. The etymology does not suggest a person against whom the sin is committed, and does not necessarily imply intentional wrong-doing. But the use of the word is not limited by its etymology, and the sin may be against man (Gn 40¹, 1 S 20¹) or against God (Ex 32²). Clemen's concession (Lehre von der Sünde, pp. 22, 23), that sin and iniquity meant failure to comply with national custom (Volkssitte), must be qualified by the consideration that national custom was practically religion, and was always associated with supernatural sanction, so that sin against it was considered sin against God, even where God is not mentioned. It is no doubt true that this implicit thought that sin is against God, comes much more distinctly to the surface in Deuteronomy. Two subsidiary uses of פָּחַד must be noticed. Like פָּחַד, it is used for the punishment of sin, as well as for sin itself (Zec 14¹⁹, La 3³⁹). The passage from one sense to the other is seen in Nu 32²². These instances open the question of the meaning of פָּחַד (and פָּחַד) in a class of passages in the Psalms, where modern expositors take them to signify not sin or guilt, but punishment. See Cheyne on Ps 31¹. This double sense of both words is a witness to the Heb. view of the close connexion of sin and suffering, which will demand special attention in Job. Secondly, פָּחַד is used for sin-offering (Lv 4³). This use of the same word for the offence and the offering meets us again under פָּחַד (trespass).

(b) Iniquity (פָּחַד), literally 'perversion,' 'distortion' (but see Driver, Sin. 135 n., who follows Lagarde in distinguishing two roots פָּחַד, one = 'bend, twist,' the other (the root of פָּחַד) = 'err

(from the way)').—It is to be distinguished from (a) as being a quality of actions rather than an act, and it thus acquires the sense of 'guilt,' which might well have been adopted by RV as the rendering of פָּחַד. Guilt as distinguished from sin may be described as the sinner's position in regard to God which results from his sin. Guilt involves punishment, and thus the connotation of פָּחַד is enlarged still further. As Schultz says (OT Theol. ii. p. 306), 'in the consciousness of the pious Israelite, sin, guilt, and punishment are ideas so directly connected that the words for them are interchangeable.' See esp. Gn 4¹³, Lv 26⁴¹. An illustration of this connexion is the phrase 'bear iniquity' (less frequently 'bear sin'), first occurring Gn 4¹³, and frequent in Ezekiel, H and P. The idea is that of being involved in guilt with the inevitable consequence of punishment (Nu 14²⁴), and the phrase is nearly equivalent to the verb פָּחַד; cf. Lv 5¹⁴. It must, however, be noticed that the verb translated 'bear' (נָשָׂא) sometimes has for its subject the person offended against, and is used in the sense of 'taking away' sin. For ref. see Oxf. Heb. Lex. p. 611. In Lv 16²¹ the goat for Azazel 'bears iniquities into a land not inhabited. Here both the senses above mentioned are implied; and the same may be said of the more important passage in Is 53¹², where the Servant of the Lord both bears and takes away the sin of many. Thus this phrase lies at the root of the doctrine of the Atonement.

(d) Wickedness (פָּחַד).—This is sin become a habit or state. Its adjective פָּחַד in plur. describes sinners as a class, 'the wicked'; and is invariably the correlative of פָּחַד ('righteous'); cf. Gn 18²².

Besides the foregoing, three other words require brief notice, פָּחַד with פָּחַד and פָּחַד. AV does not sufficiently distinguish them, rendering פָּחַד 'trespass,' 'transgression,' and פָּחַד or פָּחַד 'trespass,' 'trespass-offering'; whereas פָּחַד is strictly an act of unfaithfulness or treachery towards God or man, producing a state of guiltiness designated by פָּחַד, requiring an offering to atone for it, which offering is also expressed by the same word פָּחַד (RV 'guilt-offering'). See Oehler, OT Theol. § 187. פָּחַד is a word of limited range belonging to the priestly terminology (see Driver, LOT 127 [§ 184]), while פָּחַד and its cognates run through OT. There is in the latter word the sense of a need of compensation, and the guilt-offering is to be regarded as a compensatory offering for an injury done (see Oxf. Heb. Lex. p. 19).

We now proceed to the Mosaic covenant, not merely as contained in Ex 20-23, but as developed in the whole of Ex.-Lv.-Numbers, keeping in mind the widely different dates to which different portions may belong. The object of this law as a whole, if we regard it as providentially developed, appears to be not so much directly to advance morality or to deepen a sense of moral imperfection, as to create a nation within which communion with the One God might be realized and preserved, —or, in other words, to form a hard external shell, within which a higher religious life might be gradually and securely evolved. Hence the political and ceremonial elements were the prominent ones. And hence sin under the Law meant much more neglect, conscious or unconscious, of ceremonial regulations than moral transgression, and no distinction was drawn between the two. This was a necessary first stage. Again, God was the King of the new nation. Thus there was no room for non-religious law. His purview embraced all acts. Therefore there was no distinction between sin and crime. In the present day there are sins which are not regarded by English law as crimes or torts. It was not so in Israel. If an act was outside the Law, it was not sin. He who kept the Law was blameless. Conversely, there are offences against the law of England which the most conscientious would hardly regard as sin; but in Israel all enactments were part of the Divine law, and the breach of any of them was sin. This religious character of law was, of course, not peculiar to Israel. It is characteristic of early Brahmanic law (see Maine, Early Law and Custom, c. ii. esp. p. 42 ff.) and of other systems.

If, as seems probable, Deut. is earlier in date than much of Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, it cannot correctly be called an advance on the views hitherto treated, but at any rate it takes much higher ground. Not only does the love of God and of one's neighbour in Deut. supply the Israelite with new motives for fulfilling express commands, but this love opened new views of duties beyond those commands, and thus enlarged and deepened the sense of sin where these were not fulfilled. There are humane directions which tend to positive virtue. Deut. is not open to Wellhausen's charge against the rest of the Law, 'What holiness required was not to do good, but to avoid sin' (Hist. Isr., Eng. tr. p. 500).

It will now be necessary to examine one class of offences against the Law which has had an important part in providing terminology and forming conceptions of sin. It is acknowledged that the Law of Israel was in great part a reformation and republication of existing Semitic custom, and indeed of customs not exclusively Semitic. This was the case with the class of enactments which related to what was clean (טָהוֹר) and unclean (טָמֵא). These concerned not only food, but persons and things. Offences in respect of these were sin, and punishable with death. There are three explanations of these enactments which must be set aside. Taking them as a whole, it is impossible to regard them as having a moral character. Nor are they designedly allegorical. So far as they disclose this character they possess it not by virtue of direct Divine appointment, but from their origin long before the birth of Israel. They grew out of man's sense of the unseen, his reverence for it, his consciousness of physical and spiritual dangers besetting him. The proof of this lies in the existence of very similar bodies of law as to cleanness and uncleanness, outside Israel, as for instance in the Vendidad (Sacred Books of the East, tr. Darmesteter, vol. iv.). Thirdly, the conception of clean and unclean was not a sanitary one, and had nothing in common (except incidentally) with modern notions of cleanliness. It was rather, that certain things, especially everything connected with birth and death, carried with them an infection of danger and an unfitness for worship. The opposite of uncleanness was holiness, and this too in the Law has an infectious character (Lv 67). The sin-offering is so holy that everything it has touched must be washed, broken, or done away with (see, further, art. UNCLEAN, UNCLEANNESS).

The importance of the foregoing in considering the OT doctrine of sin is as follows: (1) All these enactments enlarged the area of sin (Ro 5²⁰), though no doubt they mainly affected the priests (Montefiore, Hilbert Lect. ix.). At the same time it must be added that to those who observed them they also increased the area of righteousness and the opportunities of conscious joyful obedience. (2) The notion of the holiness of God, to which the system of clean and unclean had a close relation, was so elevated by the prophets, especially by Isaiah, that the terms connected with the system or their equivalents came to supply much of the vocabulary for sin in the NT and in the Christian Church: e.g. the use of such words as καθάρσις, καθαρίσκει cannot be understood without recalling their source in the Law.

The next matters for consideration are the punishment and the forgiveness of sin under the Law.—(1) Punishment. Sin is to be stamped out; the punishment for almost all sin is death. In theory, at any rate, the severity of the Law is amazing. What is taken into account is not so much the ill-desert of the individual, as his guilt involving the nation in guilt, so he must be extirpated (cf. Jos 22²⁰). It is only as regards the nation that punishment is restorative.—(2) Forgiveness. The only sin admitting of individual atonement was sin not committed 'with a high hand' (i.e. not wilful), for which sin-offering and guilt-offering were provided (Lv 4-6⁷); see Westcott, Ep. to Heb. p. 288. The DAY OF ATONEMENT must also be taken into consideration, though its main object appears to have been the purification of holy things and places. That forgiveness was so difficult of attainment, implied and fostered conceptions of God and His wrath which were strongly anthropopathic. One effect was that God was thought of as injured by man's sin; and the guilt-offering had in it, as we have seen, the notion of compensation for injury done. In Job (72³ 35⁶) we find the first explicit contradiction of this thought. But Deuteronomy, if anterior to the priestly legislation, had already provided an antidote. There God's love for Israel is set forth, and the purpose of all His commands is repeatedly stated to be man's good (Dt 6²⁴ 10¹³). His commands give life. Hence God hates sin against Himself because it hurts, not Him, but the sinner.

ii. THE PROPHETS.—(a) The Former Prophets.—If the essence of sin is departure from God, then, in whatever form, idolatry must be the worst sin because the most complete. That is its position throughout the historical books. In Judges it is the cause of all Israel's sufferings. In 1 and 2 Samuel it is comparatively absent, and consequently there is a great burst of national vigour and prosperity. In 1 and 2 Kings the standard by which all reigns are measured is the permission or repression of idolatry. The history of the Northern Kingdom is the history of the continuance and effects of the sin of Jeroboam, and the word 'sin' is almost restricted to that special meaning. The sin of idolatry took different forms, such as degrading the conception of Jahweh, identifying Him with Baal, worshipping Him in heathen fashion and with visible representations, combining His worship with that of other gods, or, far less commonly, forsaking Him altogether for other gods. But in one form or another it is regarded in the historical books as the first and worst of all sins, and rightly so, at that stage of national life.

(b) Yet this view was too concentrated to be complete. It is not to the retrospective record in 1 and 2 Kings that we look for light on the progress of the national conscience, but to contemporary authorities, the so-called Later Prophets, i.e. the prophetic books of the 8th cent., Amos, Hosea, Micah, Isaiah. It is they that develop the moral character and moral requirements of J¹; and as a necessary consequence the range, depth, and danger of sin.

The history of David supplies us with two examples of sin—one flagrant, and the other difficult to regard as sinful. The points which come out in his sin with Bathsheba are (1) possibility of immediate forgiveness on repentance; (2) punishment after forgiveness, severe and protracted; (3) the punishment of the sinner involves suffering for others. This, however, appears more clearly in the next instance, that of the census (2 S 24¹). The point to notice in this is, that the sin is ascribed to the causation of J¹ Himself, just in the same way as the evil spirit which came upon Saul is described as 'from God.' Several other passages, e.g. Jg 9²³, are of the same character. On them Clemon (Lehre von der Sünde, p. 123 ff.) builds the conclusion that God was regarded as the author (Veranstalter) of sin. It is more correct to say that we have in them reflexions of that perplexity about the interaction of Divine control and human freedom which has at all times been felt, and not alone in Israel. For later protests against false inferences from such expressions, see Sir 12¹¹⁻²⁰ and Ja 1¹²⁻¹⁶. What was in Hebrew religion only a hesitation and perplexity, which never produced dangerous results, became in Islam a principle fatal to morality. 'The unbeliever of the unbeliever, the impurity of the impious, and bad actions, come to pass with the foreknowledge, will, predestination, and decree of God, but not with His satisfaction and approval' (Sell, *Faith of Islam*¹, pp. 118, 178).

Amos leads the way in bringing moral offences to the front. He carries on one side of Elijah's work, and the transgressions denounced in Am 1. 2 are offences against justice and humanity between man and man. Micah and Isaiah (e.g. Is 1¹⁰⁻¹⁷) follow Amos. To Hosea the sin of Israel is heinous because it is sin against God's love. In Hosea we have the OT counterpart to 1 John. What Hosea (and indeed all the prophets) did, was to enlarge and deepen the conception of sin indirectly by making men realize far more fully the moral character of God. This work of the prophets, though by far the most important phase in the history of the OT doctrine of sin, is so obvious on the surface of their writings, and has been so often and so fully dealt with (e.g. Robertson Smith, Prophets of Israel, Lect. ii.; Kirkpatrick, Doctrine of the Prophets, passim), that it must here be taken for granted in order to leave room to deal with less obvious contributions and developments. See also Clemon, Lehre von der Sünde, p. 70 f.

Another point in the teaching of the prophets as to sin is their preaching of repentance, both national and individual, outside the covenant (cf. Jonah) as well as within it. The development of individualism by Jeremiah and Ezekiel is a moment of great importance in the doctrine of sin. Hitherto the prominent thought has been that of sin affecting the nation through the individual, and entailing guilt on succeeding generations, though it must be noticed that the heredity of guilt is not allowed as a ground for private revenge (Dt 24¹⁶, 2 K 14³, but cf. 2 S 21¹⁶). Ezekiel attaches his teaching to that of Jeremiah, and works it out. His result is well summed up by A. B. Davidson in his note on Ezk 18, 'the individual man is not involved in the sins and fate of his people or his forefathers.' But even Ezekiel did not dissolve entirely the great predominant OT thought of the solidarity of Israel in respect of sin. There was work for that conception to do in the NT. It made possible the thought of the vicarious atonement of Christ, as representative of the nation and the race (Jn 11⁵¹⁻⁵²). For a strong instance of the sense of sin as national, see Is 64. The feeling has been well expressed by Montefiore: 'At his worst the individual felt he belonged to the people of God, and shared their righteousness; and at his best he still felt the depressing burden of Israel's national sins' (Hibbert Lect. p. 512). The whole question was deeply affected by the obscurity and comparative unimportance of the Heb. expectation of a future life. When that dawned clearly, the importance of the individual dawned with it.

iii. THE HAGIOGRAPHIA. — The Psalms belong largely, though not entirely, to the prophetic school of thought, and either anticipate or develop its teaching, according to the view we may take of their respective dates. It is in the Psalms that we first have a deep view of sin from the sinner's side. In the Prophets we have the historian or preacher denouncing, but in the Psalms the sinner confessing sin, either personal or national. This deep sense of sin arises invariably out of the pressure of suffering in some form; and in some cases, at any rate, is due to the national suffering of the Captivity and Exile. The Psalmist does not repent for fear of future punishment, but from the pressure of present affliction. It is true that we find the consciousness of uprightness and sincere purpose as well as the consciousness of sin (e.g. Ps 26), but this does not contradict the general impression. A special aspect of sin in the Psalms is that of falsehood. The service of J' is thought of as truth, practical truth, much in the same way as in the Gospel and Epp. of St. John; hence sin, its opposite, is untruth, vanity, lies. In the Psalms, as in the Prophets, sin is no longer a matter of strict legalism, of failure to obey. Emotions and affections come in largely (as in some degree in Hosea and Deut.). The Psalmists love God, and look on sin as breaking this happy relation, hiding His face and shutting up His mercies. All this reaches its highest point in Ps 51, with its profound consciousness of sin in the individual and in the race (v. 5, cf. Job 14⁴), hatred of it for its own sake, not merely for its consequences, and hopeful assurance of forgiveness and renewal.

M. Holzman (Lazarus and Steinthal's Zeitschrift für Völkerpsychologie, Bd. xv. 1884) contrasts the doctrine of sin in the Rig Veda with that of the Psalms in the following respects: (1) Varuna (the god addressed) is regarded as himself the cause of man's being deceived into sinning; (2) ceremonial offences are regarded as on the same level with moral, which is certainly not the case in the Psalms; (3) guilt is dreaded not for itself, but solely for its punishment.

In Proverbs the aspect of sin is, of course, wholly different. It is practical religion which is treated here, and this from an external and an intellectual point of view. Righteousness is wisdom, and sin is folly. The sinner is (1) simple (פֶּטִי), (2) a fool (כֹּחַל, see article FOOL), or (3) a scornor (רִצֵּן).

Two characteristics may be specially noticed. (1) Men are sharply divided into good and bad; and though in chs. 1-9 the possibility of change is assumed, there is no reference to sorrow for sin, or conversion from bad to good (see Toy, Proverbs, Introd. p. xiii). This is the attitude towards sinners which is developed and hardened in Sirach, as noticed below. (2) In Proverbs, and still more distinctly in Job, it is the moral state of the individual which occupies attention; for even if Job be typical of Israel, the type is worked out with thorough dramatic truth. The result is that we obtain in these books far more detailed ethical reflexions than are found elsewhere in the OT. Although the religious consciousness of sin cannot be said to be prominent, yet it does find expression in a verse which is the strongest statement in OT of the universality of human sinfulness, namely Pr 20⁹; and throughout Pr 10-24 the approval or disapproval of the Lord often recurs as the standard of action.

The Book of Job presents features of far greater interest, and represents the furthest advance in the doctrine of sin prior to the NT. Its results may be classed under three heads. (1) The Law being designedly excluded from the drama, the sins which come in question are purely ethical and nowhere ritual. The spread of sin is definitely acknowledged as universal; it is inherent in human nature (Job 4¹⁷ RVm, 14⁴ 15¹¹⁻¹³), and it includes sins of thought and desire. This latter point comes out most fully in Job 31, where we get the author's conception of sin, a very wide and penetrating one, not less remarkable for inwardness than the Sermon on the Mount. (2) The close relation between sin and suffering, believed in by Israel in early times, and implied by the double sense of חָטָא and נָזַל (see above), is in this book shown to be at any rate not a necessary one. Sin does not always bring suffering, and suffering does not always imply sin. But this result is something very different from denying altogether such a relation between the two, a denial which would at a blow cut away the ground from under the religious life of Prophets and Psalms. (3) The character of sin as affecting God comes in for treatment incidentally. Expression is given to two false guesses: (a) that God watches man's transgressions with something approaching satisfaction, Job 14¹⁶⁻¹⁷; (b) that human sin cannot affect Him, Job 7²¹ RV; cf. Elihu in 35⁶. Of these (a) is merely one of the rash words which fall from the sufferer, but (b), as confirmed by Elihu, shows Jewish thought strongly, perhaps dangerously, in reaction against its earlier anthropopathic conceptions.

Ecclesiastes contributes little except the final decisive conviction of the universality of sinfulness, 'Surely there is not a righteous man upon earth that doeth good and sinneth not' (Ec 7²¹).

II. IN THE APOCRYPHA. — Sirach. — As in Proverbs, so in Sirach the righteous and the wicked under various names form two great classes over against one another (33¹²⁻¹⁵), and it is to the former class only that the writer addresses himself. Fools are incapable of amendment. Turning from sin (8⁶) is only the repentance of the righteous; and, with the exception of 17²⁶, the attitude of Sirach prefigures that attitude towards sinners which it was the great work of Jesus to challenge and set aside by His example (Lk 15²). Yet Sirach denies to sinners the excuse that they cannot help themselves. It is not God who causes man to sin (see above, I. ii.). The author's assertion of human freedom and responsibility is striking and powerful, if somewhat too broad (Sir 15¹¹⁻²⁰). It is not in any degree limited by the statement of 25²⁴ that Eve's sin brought death upon the race, for the inheritance of death by every man does not necessarily imply a doctrine of original sin.* The philosophy of

* See important art. by F. R. Tennant (Journal Theol. Studies, II. 6, p. 207), published since this art. was written. He sums up thus: 'The Fall (according to Sirach) was the cause of death, but only the beginning of sin.' Cf. Thackeray, l.c.

Sirach accounts for physical evil in creation as a necessary complement to moral evil in man, and designed for its punishment; see Sir 39²⁸⁻³¹ 40⁸⁻¹¹.

Wisdom of Solomon.—In this book, notwithstanding the totally different atmosphere produced by (1) a hope full of immortality (3¹), and (2) the practical identification of Wisdom with the Spirit of God (9¹⁷), the ground thought is the same as that of Sirach, namely, that sin is ignorance, and that it is the intellectual side of man that must by 'discipline' be fortified against it. The character of the book is therefore, at first sight, in the strongest contrast with the words of Christ, 'I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou didst hide these things from the wise and understanding, and didst reveal them unto babes' (Mt 11²⁵). Yet if the above-mentioned identification of Wisdom with the Holy Spirit be pressed a little further, the contradiction disappears (cf. 1 Co 2¹³). It should be noted that Wis 12¹⁰, which appears to make for a doctrine of inborn sin, applies only to the Canaanites, and not to mankind at large. The idea of the derivation of a universal taint from Adam's transgression is altogether wanting.

Prayer of Manasses.—We here encounter the first unqualified presentation of the later Judaic belief in the complete sinlessness of the patriarchs ('Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, which have not sinned against thee,' 4). This attribute was extended afterwards to many other OT personages (see Weber, Jüd. Theol. 2 pp. 32 and 54 ff.). Lk 15⁷ does not necessarily admit the existence of absolute human sinlessness, and must be interpreted, ad hominem, as addressed to Pharisees and scribes (see 15²) in a spirit not far removed from irony. St. Paul expressly dissociates himself from the above tendency (Ro 3²³), but Rev 14⁵ seems to show traces of it.

2 Esdras (chs. 3-14).—This book ought in strictness to be dealt with separately, as being post-Christian (prob. A.D. 81-96). Its close relation (along with Apoc. Baruch, see BARUCH [APOCALYPSE OF]) to the line of thought in the Ep. to Romans has been fully brought out in Sanday-Headlam, Romans; see esp. p. 137. We learn from 2 Esdras that at the time at which it was written there was in Judaism a doctrine of inborn inherited sin. It is hard to see how such a doctrine could be expressed more definitely than is the case in 2 Es 4³ 'a grain of evil seed was sown in the heart of Adam from the beginning, and how much wickedness hath it brought forth unto this time.' In the light of this passage the less clear utterances of 2 Es 3¹⁷ and 7⁴⁸ become unambiguous. On the side of human free-will Sanday-Headlam (l.c.) quote 2 Es 8³⁰ 9¹¹ and esp. Apoc. Bar 54¹³ 19. They truly remark that both works 'lay stress at once on the inherited tendency to sin, and on the freedom of choice in those who give way to it' (p. 134). If the biblical doctrine of sin finds its most important expression in Romans, then 2 Esdras, as illustrating Romans, has a special value for the study of the subject. Cf. Thackeray, l.c.

III. IN THE NEW TESTAMENT. — Terminology. —

1. The ἁμαρτία group. ἁμαρτία may mean sin as a habit, a state, a power (so freq. in Romans), and also a single act of sin; while ἁμαρτήματα is restricted to the latter; see Westcott, Epp. John, Add. Note on 1 Jn 1⁹.

2. παράβασις, transgression; παράπτωμα, trespass (more precisely, fall or declination). These two words are closely allied, referring respectively to the consequences on the agent and to the line transgressed. Both presuppose the existence of a law. (Lightfoot, Notes on Epp. St. Paul, Ro 7⁵⁰), and herein they differ from ἁμαρτία. While law multiplies transgression, it reveals sin.

3. ἀνομία, AV iniquity. The word had been so coloured by its LXX use, as a false rendering of פֶּשַׁע, and other words meaning sin, that its proper sense, violation of law, can be certainly recognized only in one passage, 1 Jn 3⁴. In its strict sense it truly represents the conception of sin given in the Epp. of James and John.

4. ἀσέβεια. As ἀνομία is disregard and defiance of God's law, so ἀσέβεια is the same attitude towards God's Person. It expresses the insult and blasphemy involved in sin.

5. ἀδίκια. This word brings forward that side of sin which is against our neighbour and does him a wrong, and as such is common to human and to Divine law (see Westcott, Epp. John 1¹⁷, note for relation of ἀδίκια to ἁμαρτία).

6. ὁφείλημα. Though occurring but once, it has a special importance from being the term for sin chosen by the Lord Himself to be used by us in our daily prayer for forgiveness, the Lukan form ἁμαρτίας (Lk 11⁴) being probably a paraphrase (see Chase, The Lord's Prayer, p. 54 ff.).—Other words for sin are rather aspects of it, such as falsehood, darkness, ignorance, and do not come under terminology.

i. SYNOPTIC GOSPELS.—Looking back on the OT as a whole, we are struck with the range and completeness of the doctrine of sin which it presents. This accounts for a feature in Christ's teaching as given in the Synoptic Gospels which would otherwise be surprising, namely, the paucity of teaching about sin. Sin is mentioned almost exclusively in connexion with its forgiveness. Jesus appears as one who forgives sin, and not as insisting and enlarging on it, or as convicting of it. It is obvious how different would have been the effect of His ministry on the world, if it had been primarily a ministry of conviction of sin. In the Fourth Gospel He explicitly disclaims such an aim (Jn 12⁴⁷), thus confirming the impression derived from the Synoptists. At the same time it is forgiveness, not indifference. There is no trace of the Ritschlian view, that till He came all sin was practically ignorance, and that sinners only needed to lay aside their sense of guilt. That ignorance, even where it exists, is but a partial and not a sufficient excuse, appears in Lk 12⁴⁷, and the explanation of that passage is that moral ignorance is never total, and only comes near totality by man's own fault. The sharp distinction between sins of ignorance which are forgivable, and sins without ignorance which are not, is untrue to life. The man who sins from ignorance has still some spark of knowledge which is enough to condemn him, and the man who sins against light has still some ignorance, for how can a man in his present limitations realize the gravity of the issues which are presented to him here? For the first point see Lk 23³⁴; the soldiers in their ignorance, nevertheless, need forgiveness; and for the second see the lament over Jerusalem, Lk 19⁴².

The Lord's teaching as to sin, so far as He touched it, was not so much to correct OT doctrine regarding it, as much rather to get rid of a spurious development of it, represented by the legalism and casuistry of the Jewish scribes. The character of prophetic invective appears in one class of discourses only—those addressed to the Pharisees. We are next led to consider what exceptions must be made to the general statement above as to the absence in the Gospels of denunciations of sin. They are as follows:—

(1) Hypocrisy, (2) offences (ἀσέβεια), (3) sin against the Holy Ghost. It will be seen that two of these are closely cognate, and all three attach more or less to the same class of persons.

(1) Hypocrisy, defined Mt 23⁵ 'all their works they do for to be seen of men.' It is in a great degree a new revelation of sin, for the words in OT tr. 'hypocrite' have not that meaning (see art. HYPOCRITE). Yet although no corresponding Heb. word occurs, the condition of soul is described in Is 29¹³, and is quoted as such by Christ (Mk 7⁹). Further, it had already been brought as a charge against the Sadducees by the Pharisees, ἀνθρωποπάροιστοι being used to denote hypocrites (Ps-Sol 48¹⁰). They were now to have the reproach cast back upon themselves by Christ.—(2) Offences. This sin is fairly prominent in OT; as, for instance, the sin of Hophni and Phinehas, who made the Lord's people to transgress (1 S 2²⁴), and still more the sin of Jeroboam. The offence (ἀσέβεια) may be within the man and limited in its operation to him, as in Mt 18⁶ and perhaps 1 Jn 2¹⁶. Or it may involve two persons, the cause of the offence being in one person and the actual stumbling taking place in another, as in Mt 18⁶. Subdividing this latter alternative, we find that the cause of stumbling may be in itself positively sinful, as in the OT instances quoted above, and again as in the attitude of the Pharisees towards Christ, which turned the multitude away from Him. Another instance is that of Simon Peter, whose counsel was an 'offence' to Christ Himself (Mt 16²³). Or, secondly, the cause of offence may be in itself quite an innocent act, as in Ro 14², and only sinful because of its easily foreseen consequences (Ro 14²³). This principle explains the otherwise unnecessary payment of the half-shekel (Mt 17²⁷). Yet, further, the act causing offence may be not only innocent, but necessary in itself, in which case its incidental consequences cannot make it sinful. Christ Himself, His sayings, His cross, are all described in NT as 'offences.' The general teaching, if we anticipate and include St. Paul's development of the subject, is that we are bound to look forward to the probable consequences of our actions, even when those consequences are far from our intentions. Ro 14 grows naturally out of Mt 18²⁰. Nothing is gained by confounding, as Clemens does (Lehre von der Sünde, p. 216 ff.), the sin of causing offences with the general topic of the self-propagation of sin, and its power to bring men into bondage, on which see below, § II. 2.—(3) Sin against the Holy Ghost. This was exemplified in, but is not to be limited to, the attribution to evil spirits of the work of the Holy Spirit in the actions and words of Christ. For a probable explanation of the different judgments pronounced by Christ on blasphemy against the Holy Spirit and that against the Son of man, see art. BLASPHEMY. The persistent denial of the inspiration of Jesus by those who in some measure felt the truth of His claims was an unpardonable sin. The three passages, Mt 12³¹⁻³², Mk 3²⁸⁻²⁹, Lk 12¹⁰, are, like most of the Lord's teaching, not a new unrelated utterance, but rather a republication and adaptation to the Kingdom of God of the ancient law of blasphemy, Lv 24¹⁶. It must be added that the unpardonable sin does not consist in the utterance of particular words, but in the condition of soul which is expressed by them, namely, that persistent resistance to the Holy Ghost which was afterwards emphasized by Stephen (Ac 7⁵¹).

Taking a general survey, it may be said that there are three points which appear specially in the Synoptists of which the last is by far the most important. (1) An extension of the area of sin by the spiritual interpretation of the Mosaic law, and by the new requirements of the Kingdom of God. (2) A limitation of its area by the great principle now clearly formulated, that sin cannot be contracted by physical contact with things ceremonially unclean, but must proceed from within (Mk 7¹⁸, Mt 15¹¹). (3) The Lord's own attitude towards sin in man as a revelation of God's attitude to it, namely forgiveness. The message which He brought and which He entrusted to the apostles (Lk 24⁴⁷) was the forgiveness of sins, and it is this which we find them declaring in Acts and expanding in the Epistles.

ii. THE FOURTH GOSPEL.—The same note is struck by St. John at the outset: 'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world' (Jn 1²⁹). Yet His coming and gracious work opened the possibility of a new sin, that sin of rejection of salvation which overshadows so largely the first twelve chapters of the Fourth Gospel, and reappears under other circumstances in the Ep. to the Hebrews (He 2³ 4¹ 6⁴ 5 10²⁶).

1. In short, the principal teaching as to sin in the Fourth Gospel is the capital nature of the sin of unbelief in Jesus as the Christ the Son of God. There had been unbelief in Galilee, and that unbelief had called forth the severe denunciation in Lk 10¹¹⁻¹⁶. But the unbelief of Judæa was far more marked and general, and the gospel of the Judæan ministry is darkened everywhere by collision with it. This is the sin of which the Holy Spirit will specially convict men, 'of sin because they believe not on me.' Could this sin be regarded as a sin of ignorance? It could not, for Christ had come and manifested Himself. 'If I had not come and spoken unto them, they had not had sin: but now they have no excuse for their sin' (Jn 15²²). We are here close to the sin against the Holy Ghost, which has been already treated. That is a special and aggravated form of the more general sin of unbelief.

It may be added that the sin of unbelief in Jesus as the Christ the Son of God holds in the NT much the same position which idolatry holds in the OT. In each case the sin is the worst sin that can be committed, because it cuts off the soul from God, and so from the source of its life and peace. It is an evil heart of unbelief falling away from the living God (He 3¹²).

2. The second important point in the Fourth Gospel is its emphasis on sin as bondage. The direct teaching is brief, contained in six verses in Jn 8^{31ff.}, but the development afterwards given it by St. Paul in Ro 6 places it in the front of NT teaching on sin. It is perhaps anticipated in Mt 6²⁴ 'ye cannot serve God and mammon.'

3. There are also lesser points worthy of notice. The old question of the connexion of sin and suffering is raised in Jn 9, and its universality is there denied; while, on the other hand, it is clear that it holds good in some cases, as appears in 5¹⁴ 'sin no more, lest a worse thing befall thee.' The passage in Lk 15 as to the slaughter of the Galileans is not precisely to the point, as what is there taught is the general guilt of the nation of which only these few had as yet paid the penalty. Another class of passages bearing on the subject is that distinctive one in which this Gospel gives us, far more fully than the others—the Lord's dealings with individual souls. What is remarkable is His gentleness towards their sins, as, for instance, Jn 4¹⁷ 18 and 8¹¹.

Lastly, we must observe that the principal teaching as to sin in the Gospels, taken as a whole, is that which results from the revelation of a perfect standard of life as shown in Christ. As Ritschl says (vol. iii. Eng. tr. p. 329), 'The only way in which the idea of sin can be formed at all is by comparison with the good.' It is true that Ritschl presses this too far, and seems to imply that no competent standard of morality had existed before the preaching of the Kingdom of God. 'But to affirm the absolute standard is not to deny the relative standard. God was in the preparation for the Kingdom of God as in the realization of that Kingdom in Christ' (Garvie, Ritschlian Theology, p. 303). We must, nevertheless, allow that the coming of Christ and the preaching of the gospel did give a new character to sin. Sin was thus placed in a new relation, that of opposition to the Kingdom of God, and yet, further, it was shown, as in the parable of the Prodigal, to be not only sin against power and wisdom, but also against goodness and love.

iii. EPISTLES.—1. St. James.—Three passages deserve special consideration. (a) The genesis of sin in the individual (Ja 1¹⁴ 15). It comes from the will consenting to a desire for something not lawful. The desire in itself may be innocent (see art. LUST), but, in the case supposed, it can only be gratified at the expense of transgression of moral law. The will surrenders, and the desire is fulfilled in an act of sin (cf. 4¹⁻²). Desire (ἐπιθυμία) here corresponds nearly to 'the flesh' of St. Paul's theology. To understand the bearing of the passage, see Sir 15^{11ff.}, which perhaps suggested it. There the source of evil lies in the freedom of the will. The fact that this freedom is God's gift does not make Him the author of evil, for it is freedom. (b) Sin in relation to law. The Law, rather than Christ, is the central thought of the Epistle, but it is the Law as revealed and interpreted by Christ in the Sermon on the Mount and in His life. It is a perfect law (1²⁵); a law of freedom, i.e. not enforced from without, but freely accepted as the aim and desire of the subject of it (1²⁵ 2¹²); a royal law (2⁸). There is also the thought of the solidarity of the Law, with its consequences on the doctrine of sin. Conscious, wilful transgression of any one point is tantamount to transgression of the whole, for, all being God's will, any transgression is defiance of God's will (2¹⁰). This, so far from being a pedantic conception, is founded on a true spiritual view of the relation of man to God. It is applied to an apparently small matter—respect of persons within the Church, and preference given to the rich over the poor. It must be added that the passage does not justify us in inferring the equality of all sins. It is rather a warning against regarding lesser sins as of no consequence. (c) Forgiveness of sin (5¹³⁻²⁰). Two points deserve notice. (1) The mediation of the Christian community, not of the elders only, in the forgiveness of sins (εὐχθε ὑπὲρ ἀλλήλων, v. 18). This mediation is effected by mutual confession and prayer. It may extend even to the case of a Christian who has actually forsaken the truth (v. 19), and every member of the Church is bidden to consider the blessing which may attend his efforts. The sins covered are certainly those of the sinner who is converted (see Toy on Pr 10¹²). (2) The close connexion in the writer's mind between forgiveness of sin and healing. The passage begins simply with the idea of a case of sickness (v. 14), and goes on to assume that it may perhaps be occasioned by sin (cf. the forgiveness of the paralytic, Mt 9²). The removal of the chastisement and the forgiveness of the sin which occasioned it go together; cf. Ps 103³, which was interpreted in this sense.

2. Hebrews.—The persons addressed had to the full the sense of sin which the OT had prepared and developed, and they had had to part with the ritual which had hitherto cleansed them and brought them nigh. A main purpose of the Epistle is to show them that better provision than the Law could offer is made for these needs in Christ and His priestly sacrifice. Hence the prominent aspect of sin in this Epistle is that of sin as guilt, as the cause of the separation between man and God, barring access to Him. The work of Christ is the restoration of communion, and the earlier portion of the Epistle reaches its goal in He 10¹⁰. Besides the general teaching as to the removal of guilt, the Epistle deals with a particular form of sin, that of falling away from grace. It is written to men in danger of lapsing into their former Judaism, not merely as individuals, but as a body (see 6¹², 10²⁶). The sin as to which the Hebrews are warned is not ordinary sin after baptism to which every Christian is liable, but nothing less than apostasy. It should also be observed that He 2¹¹ sets a final seal on the gradually developed conviction that much of human suffering is not a consequence of sin, but a means to perfection.

3. St. Paul.—Lechler (Apostolic Times, Eng. tr. vol. i. p. 340) asks what is the kernel, the life-centre of St. Paul's Christian feeling and doctrine, and replies, 'God's grace in Christ towards the guilt-laden sinner.' It is not merely that St. Paul as a theologian felt that the most important aspect of the gospel was that of a remedy for sin, but that the gospel was that remedy for himself. He had felt as few men have felt, his own sinfulness. In this respect we recognize a contrast between him and other NT writers. If it is in the Epistle to the Romans that we find the full development of St. Paul's hamartiology, it is because the question there propounded is, How is man to be righteous before God? For that purpose man's present sinfulness must first be set forth, and that is done systematically in Ro 1-3²¹, and incidentally throughout the Epistle. The teaching of St. Paul, esp. in Romans, on the subject will be considered under the following heads: (a) universality of sin; (b) heredity of sin; (c) the seat of sin; (d) sin as a power; (e) sin and law; (f) sin and death; (g) death to sin.

(a) Universality of sin.—The Jewish and the Gentile worlds had to be dealt with separately. In the Jewish world there had been preparation, but sin against ceremonial law had been so exaggerated as to put out of sight sin against moral law. Here

St. Paul follows Christ Himself, and his exposure in Ro 2⁷ reminds us of Mt 23 and many scattered sayings in the Gospels. Another point regarding Jewish sinfulness has already been noticed under II. (Prayer of Manasses). St. Paul rejects the supposed sinlessness of the patriarchs. We next take his condemnation of the Gentile world, which in Romans comes first. This had become necessary now that the gospel of forgiveness was offered to the Gentiles. It was true that they had had their preparation. The notion of sin is clear enough in Babylonian, Egyptian, and Persian religion, but it is mainly ceremonial sin. In Greek religion there was a truer conception of sin, which reaches its highest representation in Æschylus, the poet of Divine retribution on the sinner. 'The "Prometheus," the "Seven against Thebes," and the "Orestes"' contain a natural testimony of the soul to the reality of sin, and the inevitable penalty which it carries in itself' (Westcott, Religious Thought in the West, p. 94).

But to accompany a gospel of forgiveness some clear arraignment was needed. So, in an epistle addressed to the centre of the Gentile world, this clear arraignment stands in the front. And here the doctrine of the universality of Gentile sin is set on a true foundation, not on the popular Jewish conception that every Gentile was a sinner simply as not knowing the Mosaic law (cf. Gal 2¹⁶, and Lightfoot, in loc.). But, as the sin of the Gentiles did not consist in not having the Mosaic law, so neither did their want of it excuse them. They had the law of conscience or reason (Ro 2¹⁴⁻¹⁶), and sin against this was sin against God.

(b) Heredity of sin.—Here we must distinguish two separate ideas, both of which find expression in Romans, namely, (1) participation in guilt; (2) inheritance of sinful disposition.

(1) In the OT (to use Dorner's words, System Chr. Doct., Eng. tr. vol. ii. p. 325) are already found 'the materials for a conception of moral evil as a generic characteristic, and not merely a matter of the individual person.' A family, a tribe, a nation are conscious of a solidarity in respect of guilt and innocence difficult to realize in an age of strongly developed individual responsibility. It is enough to refer to the guilt in the sense of liability to punishment brought about by the sin of Achan, and by David's census; and to the effect of sin on the land itself (Dt 24⁴). So St. Paul, contemplating not merely a family, tribe, or nation, but all mankind, sees them all affected by the sin of Adam—all reconciled by the obedience of Christ (Ro 5¹²⁻²¹ and cf. Sir 25²⁴). The correspondence between Adam and Christ has taken hold of his mind, it helps him to set forth the work of salvation which the Lord has accomplished. It is not that Adam's sin is actually reckoned against us, but that we are because of it involved in punishment.*

This effect on mankind of the sin of Adam may be inferred (according to Ro 5¹³) from the death of Adam's descendants who lived before the law was given. In the absence of law they were not liable to punishment. To account for their mortality, 'generic' guilt must be assumed. It is evident that such an argument cannot be pressed absolutely, but must be correlated with the statement as to Gentile responsibility without the Law (Ro 2¹²⁻¹⁶); see Sanday-Headlam on Ro 5¹³.

(2) But besides generic participation in Adam's guilt we have also to consider the doctrine of the inheritance from Adam of a sinful nature. In OT the transmission of a sinful nature from parent to child is clearly admitted (Ps 51⁵, Job 14⁴), but it is not traced back to Adam. It is a question whether St. Paul so traces it, for neither Ro 5¹² nor 5¹⁹ is decisive on the point. Taking the section (Ro 5¹²⁻²¹) as a whole, it is difficult to disentangle with certainty the ideas of a transmitted sinful disposition, or of an actual sinfulness of all men, from the idea of the generic guilt of mankind (described above) with which they are closely interwoven. The latter is certainly the leading though not the only thought (cf. v. 12 ἐφ' ᾧ πάντες ἡμαρτοί) of the passage, which is occupied much more with the reign of death than with the reign of sin. The view taken of the sin of Adam is not so much that thereby human nature was infected in itself, but rather that thereby sin, an alien power, got a footing in the world, and, involving all men in actual sin, brought death upon all. This is very far short of the Augustinian doctrine of Original Sin, which appears to be a development of 2 Es 32¹ 4³⁰ rather than of anything to be found in NT. The language of St. Paul ('sin came into the world,' Ro 5¹²) leaves room for the communication of a sinful tendency, not only by heredity in the strict sense of the word, but also by all that interpenetration of the individuals by the race which makes it impossible to regard them as isolated atoms dependent only on birth for their characteristics.*

(c) The seat of sin.—Strictly speaking, this is in the will; but in a wider sense its seat is in that which moves the will, namely, in 'the flesh.' 'The flesh' in St. Paul denotes not merely sensual desires and appetites, but 'man's entire life so far as it is not determined by the Spirit of God.' It may thus denote also man's rational nature. The fleshly mind is 'the God-resisting disposition in virtue of which man in self-sufficiency and pride opposes himself to God, and withdraws himself from the spirit of Divine life and love.'† In short, 'the flesh' is man in his selfishness. But neither the flesh in the material sense, nor human nature on the whole, are in themselves evil; for the body may be brought into subjection (1 Co 9²⁷), may become a temple of the Holy Ghost (1 Co 6¹⁹), and its members may be 'servants to righteousness unto sanctification.'

(d) Sin as a power.—St. Paul regards sin not as an isolated act, nor as an accumulation of acts, but as a power which has gained a lodgment in man (Ro 7¹⁷), enslaving and paralyzing his will. 'The flesh' is only the material medium in which it works. Cf. above, Prefatory (2), and Jn 8³⁴, and see esp. Sanday-Headlam on Ro 5¹²⁻²¹, p. 145.

(e) Sin and law.—Here we have something new, new as the result of conscious reflexion, yet the result of what has gone before. St. Paul looks back on the history of the nation, and of his own spiritual experience, and sees (Ro 8³) τὸ ἀδύνατον τοῦ νόμου (the inability of the Law) for the restraint of sin. The result of law, by itself, must always be sin rather than righteousness. It provoked and revealed sin. 'The strength of sin is the law' (1 Co 15⁵⁶).

(f) Sin and death.—St. Paul, as stated above (b), regarded physical death as the consequence of the Fall, and argues from this premiss in Ro 5¹²⁻²¹. But it is probable that he (like the author of Wisdom) did not separate strictly the conceptions of physical and moral death. He uses the words 'death' and 'life' with a breadth which makes it difficult to say in any particular case which kind of death he is attributing to sin as its effect, e.g. Ro 6²¹⁻²². To him physical death is but the symbol of its far more terrible moral counterpart, final separation from God, and the extinction of the life of the Spirit; cf. Ja 1¹⁵. See Beyschlag, NT Theol., Eng. tr. vol. ii. p. 55 ff.

(g) Death to sin.—The wide use of the idea of 'death,' illustrated above, enabled it to be applied to any absolute final separation of objects hitherto closely related. Hence the entry into union with Christ is death to sin (Ro 6¹¹⁻¹⁴). All that St. Paul has to say on the sinfulness of the flesh, on sin as an inmate of the soul, on sin as a ruling power, relates to the state before justification. The Christian is, as such, dead to sin. St. Paul contemplates the Church (as in Eph. passim) and the Christian in their ideal state. But he is no dreamer; he knows how incompletely the ideal is realized. His delineation of it is his mode of expressing the imperative. His hopefulness as to its realization is not mere opinion, but the experience of a man who himself had felt what he taught, of a teacher who had entered into the heart of the gospel. The doctrine of St. John (see below) converges to the same goal, starting from a different point, and expressed in different phrases. And it must be remembered that 'death to sin' is not equivalent to insensibility to temptation; it is rather deliverance from bondage.

4. St. John (Epistles).—(a) The great contribution which 1 John makes to the doctrine of sin is a paradox. Nowhere is the reality of sin more strongly insisted on as occurring in the Christian life, and nowhere is the sinlessness of the Christian more distinctly asserted. In 1 Jn 1 the sinfulness of Christians is presented in three different aspects (reality, responsibility, fact; see Westcott, in loc.). Again, it is involved in the very purpose of the Epistle (1 Jn 2¹, and cf. 5¹⁶). But in 1 Jn 3⁹ and 5¹⁸ he who is begotten of God and abides in God does not, cannot, sin. St. John is not intentionally putting these opposing statements side by side, but they are called out by different forms of error (πλάνη). While some denied in various ways the reality of sin, others were under the delusion that, for the enlightened, conduct is a matter of indifference. The answer to the first was this: we have sin (1⁸); and, to the second, whosoever abideth in Him sinneth not (3⁹). So far as we sin we fall short of our position as children of God abiding in Him. There must be infirmities needing repeated advocacy and propitiation (2¹⁻²), but the choice of the man is against all sin, and towards complete conformity to the will of God. He still needs to purify himself (3³); but sin is no longer at the centre of the inner life, it has been driven out to the circumference. Further, St. John goes on to teach a certain security against sin, regarded as coming from without. 'The evil one toucheth him not' (5¹⁸). The Christian abides in Christ and is 'kept.' The agency of Satan in occasioning human sin is strongly marked in this Epistle (3⁸⁻¹² 5¹⁸⁻¹⁹), as it had been also in the Lord's teaching recorded by St. John (Jn 8⁴⁴). On the whole section cf. above iii. 3 (g). (b) A second but less important point in 1 John is the sin unto death (5¹⁶). It is inconceivable that this should be some particular kind of sin, the name of which is concealed. A classification of sins as mortal and venial, though not without its grounds and its uses, is alien from the spirit of the gospel, which teaches us that the guilt of sins is estimated by their conditions rather than by the actual thing done. The sin unto death is nearly related to, but not the same as, the sin against the Holy Ghost; again, it is also nearly related to the sin of wilful apostasy, already treated under Ep. to Hebrews. But the three must not be identified. Any sin wilfully persisted in would satisfy the conditions of 1 Jn 5¹⁵, and the 'sin unto death' is perhaps to be regarded as a genus under which the two sins above mentioned are to be classed. St. John does not forbid intercession for such a case, he only says that such a case is not what he is speaking about, and that he cannot attach a distinct promise to such intercession. (c) Another characteristic of these Epistles is the representation of sin and righteousness in the aspect of falsehood and truth (cf. above, Sin in Psalms). Sin is falsehood. It came in with the primal lie, 'thou shalt not die' (cf. Jn 8⁴⁴). It rests for its power upon deceit. But the life of love is the life of truth; it corresponds with the movement of the Divine government, with its purposes of mercy, with the Being and attributes of God (2 Jn 1⁴).

SIN (Σῖν; Σῖν, Σῖν, A in Ezk 30¹⁵ Távς; Vulg. Pelusium).—A city in Egypt mentioned in Ezk 30¹⁵ along with Pathros (Upper Egypt), Zoan (Tanis), Sin, No (Thebes), Noph (Memphis), Aven (Heliopolis), Pi-beseth (Bubastis), and Tehaphnehes (Daphnæ). Arranging these in geographical order, we find them to be the most important cities in the N.E. of the Delta and along its eastern edge leading to Memphis, the capital of Lower Egypt, followed by Pathros (Upper Egypt) and its capital No. Sin is characterized by Ezek. as 'the stronghold of Egypt' (RV), yet it is not mentioned by Jeremiah. LXX tr. it by Sais (the capital of the 26th Dynasty, in power at the time of the prophecy), or Syene, the southern frontier. The latter identification is, however, impossible. In all probability Sin is Pelusium. The name Sin seems, like Pelusium, to be connected with 'mud'; and a modern name that clings to the neighbourhood of Pelusium is et-Fineh, which is from the same root as Sin. Unfortunately, nothing is known of the history of Pelusium before the time of Herodotus, in whose days it was a place of importance owing to the development of commerce by sea; and soon it became the key of Egypt on the N.E., as in the Persian war and long afterwards (Her. II. 17, 164, III. 10). From the wording of Ezek. it would seem to have held this position at a date when Daphnæ was still a great garrison city, guarding the approach to Memphis. The ancient Egyptian name of Pelusium is still unknown. In Coptic it is Peremân, in Arab. el-Fermâ. The ruins are about a mile distant from the sea in the extreme N.E. corner of the Delta. They consist of a long narrow mound parallel to the sea, containing ruins of a temple and a large red brick enclosure, evidently a Byzantine or Arab fortress. At the E. extremity, after a slight gap, is another high mound, nearly touching the desert, and crowned by a structure of red brick. These brick buildings are of the Arab. period. West and south all is barren salt marsh, without a living soul for miles; the marsh is now indeed intersected by the Suez canal, which brings human beings within 20 miles. Yet even down to the 11th cent. A.D. el-Fermâ was a large city, and the country round, though marshy, was to a great extent cultivated and populous. Near the shore were salt-pans, and places for salting fish.

SIN, WILDERNESS OF (Σῖν-ῖν; LXX ἡ ἔρημος Σ(ε)ν; Vulg. desertum Sin).—This 'wilderness' is described in Ex 16¹ as between Elim and Sinai; in 17¹ an encampment in Rephidim is mentioned between Sin and the wilderness of Sinai; and in the itinerary of Nu 33 an encampment by the Red Sea is inserted between Elim and the wilderness of Sin, and two other camping-places besides Rephidim between the wilderness of Sin and the wilderness of Sinai. On the supposition that the traditional site of Sinai is the correct one, the encampment by the sea is generally placed at the end of Wādī Tayibeh, near Râs Abu Selimeh, and the wilderness of Sin may be the open plain a little to the south of this headland. Others put it in Wādī Schellal or Wādī Budrah. This wilderness appears to be different from the wilderness of ZIN (Nu 13²¹ 20¹ 27¹⁴ 33³³ 34³ 4, Dt 32⁶¹, Jos 15¹ 3), in which the Israelites encamped after leaving Mt. Sinai, but the student cannot fail to notice the close similarity of the three names Sinai, Sin, Zin.

A. T. CHAPMAN.

SINAI, MOUNT (Σῖν, Σ(ε)ν).—The impressions derived from a study of the wanderings of the children of Israel as they are recorded in the Scriptures, are found to undergo important modifications as soon as the biblical tradition is supplemented by an actual topographical survey of the peninsula at the head of the Red Sea, which takes its name from Mt. Sinai, and is supposed to contain the famous mountain where the Law was said to have been given to Israel. For while the student of the Scriptures without their topographical supplement would conclude that the route of the Exodus lay entirely outside the pale of civilization, the student of the country is able to affirm with certainty that there was an actual civilization in the peninsula itself; that there were important mines, with at least one port of debarkation for ships coming from Egypt; and that the country was intersected by trade routes which connected the upper end of the Red Sea with regions lying farther north and east; the mines alluded to being contemporary with the earliest Egyptian dynasties, and the trade routes being also, in all probability, of extreme antiquity. And not only are there within the limits of the so-called Sinaitic peninsula the marks of an astonishingly early stage of civilization, but there is also the indication of the existence of early forms of religion, far removed from the semi-fetichism of wandering Arab tribes.

One of these forms of religion was the Egyptian, represented by the temples at Sarbut el-Kadeem on the northern route to Mt. Sinai; it was the natural concomitant of the imported Egyptian influence which came in with the officials who had charge of the mining operations in the west of the peninsula. But besides this form of religion there is reason to suspect that Babylonian religion was also represented, for there are traces in the Babylonian literature of mining and quarrying operations in the eastern part of the peninsula and in the adjacent country of Midian, and these traces are very suggestive of religious concomitants, especially when we find a reflexion of the Babylonian theology in the very name of the sacred mountain. Mount Sinai, in fact, is named after the moon-god Sin (cf. the formation of Mordecai from the name of Marduk); and if this be so, it was from the earliest times a place of sanctity; and the routes that converge upon it would easily acquire the character of haj routes or pilgrim roads. There is therefore no a priori difficulty in the account of the wandering of the children of Israel to a sacred mount, nor any need to regard the sanctity of the place as acquired in the time of the Exodus, or projected back upon the story by later chroniclers.

The real problem lies in the identification of the mountain described in the Pent., especially in view of the fact that the whole of the peninsula is a mass of mountains, many of which are conspicuous objects in the landscape, and certain to have early attracted attention and invited nomenclature. We are assuming that Mt. Sinai is somewhere in the tongue of land at the head of the Red Sea, between the two arms of that sea which constitute respectively the Gulf of 'Akaba and the Gulf of Suez. It should, however, be remembered that Sayce thinks he has grounds for locating Mt. Sinai outside the peninsula and in the land of Midian itself. In this he is following in some points an earlier and more fantastic suggestion of Beke. The advantage of such a theory lies in the fact (1) that Mt. Sinai is closely connected with the land of Midian in the biblical account. Thither Moses escapes from the wrath of Pharaoh, and while engaged in pastoral occupations in that land he sees the theophany of the burning bush. Moreover, his wife and her relations are Midianite. The general opinion is that Midian is on the farther side of 'Akaba to the east and north, and that special evidence is needed if we would include in it the surroundings of the traditional Mt. Sinai. (2) The theory furnishes a new explanation of the encampment of the Israelites by the sea, which on this theory is the Gulf of 'Akaba; (3) it finds a site for the much-disputed Elim in the modern Aileh (ancient Eloth); (4) it explains why nothing is said about the exquisite valley of Feiran by a writer who is so careful to record the palm-trees and springs (certainly of a much inferior quality) at Elim; the identification of Rephidim with Feiran is, on this hypothesis, incorrectly made.

The theory is not lightly to be set aside; the main objection to it lies in the itinerary (which appears to have been one of daily marches along a conventional road). No satisfactory attempt has been made to trace this itinerary to the E. or N. of the Gulf of 'Akaba.

Setting aside, then, the theory of a (trans-'Akaba) Midianite Sinai as inconsistent with the most natural interpretation of the biblical traditions, we proceed to determine the most likely spot within the peninsula to which those traditions can be referred. And first of all we may clear away the apparent confusion between Horeb and Sinai which occurs in the Pent., and has often been perplexing to commentators who had to reconcile such expressions as 'to the mountain of God, even to Horeb' (Ex 3^d), with which cf. 1 K 19th, where Elijah is said to have come 'to the mountain of God, even to Horeb.' Here and in other places 'the mountain of God' is identified with Horeb, i.e. Sinai and Horeb are practically interchangeable. An examination of the sources of the narrative will show that Horeb is the term used for the seat of the Deity in E and D, while Sinai is the term used in J and P. According to the sources, then, we can only say that the centre of the worship of J^h is in Horeb according to the northern tribes, and in Sinai according to the southern; and no further help is forthcoming for the location of Horeb (which may simply mean 'waste').

Returning to the question of the actual mountain involved in the tradition, we have a remarkable divergence of opinion amongst critics and travellers, not a few of whom (especially Lepsius and Ebers) have sought to identify the biblical Sinai with Mt. Serbal, which rises just above the oasis of Feiran to the south. It may be admitted that Serbal is a much more conspicuous object than Jebel Musa (the traditional mountain of the Law), although it is not so lofty. It is also true that the centre of early Christian life in the peninsula in the first centuries of the occupation of the holy places is in the Wady Feiran, which stands for the ancient Paran, the seat of an episcopate and the home of innumerable ascetics, whose caves and rude dwellings may still be traced. We need not be surprised, then, if it should be maintained that the special place of sanctity in the peninsula was not far from the Wady Feiran, in which case Serbal can hardly fail to be the holy mountain. In further support of this it is urged that immediately after the battle with Amalek the Israelites are said (Ex 19th) to have come to Mt. Sinai, or at all events to the wilderness which bears the name of that mountain, and it would therefore seem that the mountain was at no great distance from Rephidim, which is almost universally identified with the Wady Feiran. So that, when we combine the biblical statement of the proximity of Rephidim to Mt. Sinai with the undoubted fact that Feiran is the primitive Christian metropolis, a strong case is made out for identifying the beautiful and imposing Mount Serbal with the biblical Sinai. Various attempts have further been made, by means of quotations from Cosmas Indicopleustes, Eusebius, Jerome, etc., to show that there has been a monastic translation of the accepted site of Sinai from Serbal to Jebel Musa (cf. Lepsius, Tour from Thebes and the Peninsula of Sinai, 1846, tr. by Cottrell; and Ebers, Durch Gosen zum Sinai, 2nd ed. Leipzig, 1881). And it has been affirmed in accordance with this hypothesis that there was no monastery or monastic settlement in the neighbourhood of Jebel Musa before the convent, called popularly after the name of St. Catherine, was built by Justinian.

Unfortunately for this ingenious hypothesis, it has been reduced almost to absurdity by the discovery of a document which is in itself one of the most interesting of pilgrim itineraries, and which for the settlement of the early Christian tradition has immense weight. We refer to the document known as the Peregrinatio Silvie, edited in Rome in 1887 by Gamurrini from an imperfect MS, and since reprinted by J. H. Bernard as a volume of the Palestine Pilgrims' Text Society. The pilgrimage in question is dated in the years 385-388 by its editor, and its authorship is assigned with good reason to a lady from Aquitaine. The imperfect MS opens with topographical details which certainly identify the plain of er-Rahah in front of Jebel Musa ('vallem infinitam ingens* planissima et valde pulchram, et trans vallem apparebat mons sanctus Dei Syna'). And, in fact, the whole of the route which Silvia describes between Egypt and Sinai, and the holy places which she visits, coincide closely with the route and the sanctities recorded in modern books of travel. The theory of the displacement of the traditional Sinai from Serbal to Jebel Musa in the early Christian centuries may therefore be abandoned, and this practically amounts to the final abandonment of the Serbal-Sinai theory itself and the acceptance of the traditional site. Any residual difficulties which are connected with the account of the Exodus and the last stages of the journey to Sinai are probably due to unhistorical elements in the tradition. Mt. Sinai must therefore be sought in the cluster of eminences which includes Jebel Katerina, Jebel Musa, etc. Of these the highest is Jebel Katerina, but it does not appear that any attempt has been successful to find at the foot of Jebel Katerina a suitable place for an Israelite encampment. And in so far as this is the case, the traditional site must be allowed to retain the identification until further light can be thrown on the subject from unexpected quarters.

* Ingens = valde in this document frequently; but here in its natural sense, for she says a little later valle illa quam dicit ingens.

The traditional Sinai is bounded on the north side by the great plain er-Rahah, out of which it rises precipitously; on its east and west sides are wadis named respectively, the one on the east Wady ed-Deir and the one on the west Wady el-Leja. The former takes its name (Valley of the Convent) from the celebrated convent of St. Catherine, which stands upon the slope of the mountain; the derivation of the other name is more obscure. In this western wady are the remains of the convent of the Forty Martyrs (Deir el-Arbain) and a number of other traces of early monastic life, and by this valley it is customary to make the ascent of Jebel Katerina, which lies to the S.W. of Jebel Musa. The northernmost peak of Jebel Musa is called Ras es-Sufsafeh ('Head of the Willow,' probably from a tree growing in one of its gullies), and is commonly taken as the place of promulgation of the Law, for which it is a very striking and suitable site. The height of Sufsafeh is 6937 ft., while the southern peak is somewhat lower. The latter is the true holy place according to the Greek and Arab tradition. There is an ascent to it by a flight of rude steps commencing not far from the convent, and extending, with slight intermission, almost to the summit.

ADDITIONAL NOTE.—Objections to the traditional site of Mt. Sinai.—In the foregoing we have found ourselves closely in accord with the traditional view of the route of the Exodus and of the location of Mt. Sinai. If the Israelites really went into the Sinaitic peninsula, the route and the goal of their wanderings have probably been correctly identified. We have shown that the tradition in favour of Jebel Musa is earlier and more constant than has generally been recognized. But the real difficulty begins with the question whether the biblical Mt. Sinai was in the peninsula, after all. Objection after objection has been raised under this head, and some of them are not easy to refute. (1) The biblical references to Mt. Sinai do not seem to warrant an identification in the limits of the peninsula. Dt 12 gives a distance of 11 days from Horeb to the mountains of Seir, and this would agree well enough with the distance from Jebel Musa. But in other passages, such as Dt 33⁹, Hab 3³, the contiguity between Sinai and Edom seems to be more pronounced: even if we grant a certain freedom of expression to poetical passages, still such language as Dt 33²—

J⁹ came from Sinai,
And rose from Seir unto them, might, in view of Heb. parallelism of the members, imply more than that Sinai was in the direction of Seir. It might be urged in reply that the passage continues—

He shined forth from Mt. Paran,
And came from Meribah Kadesh, and Paran has been commonly identified with Feiran in the peninsula. But this identification has also been questioned on account of the parallelism with Kadesh and other references.

(2) Some of the places in the itinerary of Exodus have apparently been found outside the limits of the peninsula, as Elim in Elath-Elath, and the encampment by the sea in the Gulf of Akaba.

(3) Mt. Sinai is suspiciously connected with the land of Midian, and it has to be shown that the Sinaitic peninsula could be thus described. At the time of the Exodus it was an Egyptian province.

These and other objections have been raised against the traditional theory; their resolution depends upon the final discrimination of the documents underlying the Pent. and upon the results of further archaeological investigations, not only in the peninsula of Sinai but to the N. and E. of it.

SINCERE.—In 1 P 2² 'sincere' is used in the sense of 'unmixed,' 'pure': 'Desire the sincere milk of the word' (τὸ λογικὸν δόλον γάλα, Vulg. sine dolo, Wyc. 'with out gile,' Tind. 'which is without corruption,' Cran. 'which is without disceat,' Gen. 'syncere,' Rhem. 'without guile'; RV goes back to Wyc. and Rhem. 'which is without guile'). For 'sincere' in this sense, cf. Rhem. NT, Preface, p. 16, 'We translate that text which is most sincere, and in our opinion, and as we have proved, incorrupt'; and Cranmer, Works, i. 134, 'If there be none other offence laid against them than this one, it will be much more for the conversion of all the fautors hereof, after mine opinion, that their consciences may be clearly averted from the same by communication of sincere doctrine . . . than by the justice of the law to suffer in such ignorance.' J. HASTINGS.

SINGERS, SINGING.—See artt. PRAISE IN OT. and PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

SINGULAR is properly that which concerns a single person or thing; so AV, after Tindale, in Lv 27² 'When a man shall make a singular vow' (וְכָל אִישׁ, RV 'shall accomplish a vow,' RVm 'make a special vow').* So also Knox, Works, iii. 141, 'Without harness or weapons (except my sling, staf, and stonis) I durst interpryes singular battell aganis him'; Bp. Davenant, Life, 329, 'For my part, I am of opinion that there is no sane or possible Way for any singular person to attain to the comfortable persuasion that hee is Elected unto Salvation, but a Posteriori.' Cf. the phrase 'all and singular,' as in the Act of Uniformity in K. Edward VI. Second Prayer-Book (1552), 'And for their authority in this behalf, be it further likewise enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that all and singular the same Archbishops, Bishops, and all other their officers exercising Ecclesiastical jurisdiction, as well in place exempt, as not exempt, within their dioceses, shall have full power and authority, by this act, to reform, correct, and punish, by censure of the Church, all and singular persons which shall offend within any their jurisdictions or Dioceses.'

Then the single person or thing may be regarded as special and remarkable, as Wis 14¹⁶ 'the singular diligence of the artificer.' Cf. Ridley, Briefe Declaration, 144, 'Origen . . . was compted and judged thi singular teacher in his tyme of Christes religion'; Mt 5⁷ Tind. 'And yf ye be frendly to youre brethren onely, what singular thyng doo ye?' J. HASTINGS.

SINIM (סִינִי; Ἰνέσαι; de terra australi).—The 'land of Sinim' (Is 49¹²) must, from the context, have been in the extreme south or east of the known world. In the south, Sin (Pelusionn, Ezk 30¹⁶) and Syene (Ezk 29¹⁰ 30⁶) have been suggested (the former by Saadya, Bochart, and Ewald; the latter by Cheyne [Introd. to Is. 275, and in SBOT], who would read סִינִי, with J. D. Michaelis, Klostermann, Marti), but these places are perhaps too near. The LXX favours the view that a country in the east was intended, and modern commentators have identified Sinim with China, the land of the Sinae. The name Tsin was known as early as the 12th cent. B.C.; and it was not improbably familiar to the Phoenicians. There was a trade, at a very early date, between the extreme east and southern Arabia and the Persian Gulf. This interpretation of the name Sinim as referring to China, which was first suggested by Gesenius, is strongly opposed by Dillm. (Jesaja, ad loc.), Duhm, and Richtofen (China, i. 436 f., 504). Dillm. e.g. points out that no Israelites could have been in China at the time of this prophecy, that we should expect סִינִי not 'c, and the name Tsin (derived from a dynasty of 255 B.C.) could not have been yet in use in Babylon.

SINITES (סִינִי; A δ' Ἀσσυρίαις, Luc. δ' Ἀσσυρίαις).—

* On the vocalization and meaning of the Heb. word see the Comm., especially Dillm.-Ryssel, ad loc.

A Canaanite people, Gn 10¹⁷=1 Ch 1¹⁸. Dillm. (Genesis, ad loc.) compares the name of the ruined city Sin, mentioned by Jerome (Quæst.), as not far from Arka at the foot of Lebanon. Strabo (xvi. ii. 18) also names a mountain stronghold Sinna(n) (Σινναρ, accus.) on Lebanon, and a Phœn. city Siānu is named along with Semar and Arka in an Assyr. inscription (Del. Paradies, 282; cf. W. M. Müller, As. u. Europ. 289).

SIN-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE, p. 337^b.

SION.—1. (יִצְהָר; LXX Σηώρ) A name of HERMON, Dt 4⁴⁸. Sion is taken by some to be a textual error for SIRION (יִרְיֹן), the Zidonian name of the same mountain, Dt 3². This view is supported by the reading of the Syr., which, however, is as likely to be a correction of the Hebrew text (Driver, ad loc.). Like SENIR, Sion may have originally been the designation of a particular part of Hermon. 2. See ZION. J. A. SELBIE.

SIPHMOOTH (סִפְמוּת; B Σαφμωθ, A Σαφαμωθ; Seph-moth).—One of the places, 'where David and his men were wont to haunt,' to which a portion of the spoil of the Amalekites was sent after David's return to Ziklag (1 S 30²⁸). It is mentioned with Aroer, now Ararah, to the east of Beer-sheba, and Eshtemoa, now es-Semū'a, in the hill-country S. of Hebron. The site was unknown to Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. s. Σαφαμωθ, Sofamoth), and it has not yet been recovered. It was probably in the Negeb to the S. of Eshtemoa. Riehm (HWB) suggests that Zabdi, the Shiphmite (1 Ch 27²⁷), was a native of Siphmoth and not of Shepham—the change from Sh to S being easily made, and a few MSS reading Ship- for Sph- in 1 Samuel. i. HISTORY.—The history of the book, which in the English Bible retained the Latin name Ecclesiasticus, while it is called in German the book (of) Jesus Sirach or, abbreviated, Sirach, falls into two periods, the second beginning on 13th May 1896, when S. Schechter, Talmudic reader in the University of Cambridge, wrote in a letter to Mrs. A. S. Lewis there, that the fragment of a Hebrew MS of hers, which he had taken with him, represented 'a piece of the original Hebrew of Ecclesiasticus. It is the first time that such a thing was discovered' (see A. S. Lewis, In the Shadow of Sinai: A Story of Travel and Research from 1895 to 1897; Cambridge, 1898, p. 174). Since that day, 39 out of the 51 chapters of which the book consists have been recovered totally or in part in Hebrew from 4 different MSS, and a new period in the history of this book has thus been opened. What we knew about it before that time or believed we knew, is, perhaps, best summed up in the Introduction and Commentary of A. Edersheim, in the Speaker's Commentary ('Apocrypha,' ed. by Henry Wace (London, 1888), ii. 1-239).

ii. IMPORTANCE.—In many respects this book is the most important of the so-called Apocrypha. It is important for the student of history who wishes to trace the Jewish religion in its transition from the OT to the NT, and it is important on account of the influence it exercised and still exercises on the religious life of generations. Both the Jubilee Rhythm of St. Bernard of Clairvaux (partially translated in Hymns Ancient and Modern, 178, 177), and what may be called the German Te Deum, Nun danket alle Gott (ib. 379), are taken from this book. How much has been lost by those parts of the Church which excluded it from their Bibles may be gathered from the use made of it in other parts, not only in the Greek and Roman, which place it on the same footing as the whole Bible, but also in the Lutheran, which placed it among the Apocrypha but made a very large use of it.

On the Latin Church compare especially Augustine. When he collected from the Bible, towards the end of his life, his so-called Speculum, i.e. those passages which he considered useful for the guidance of the religious life, he found in this book more for his purpose (plura hinc operi necessaria) than in any other book of the OT or NT (no fewer than 36 pages out of 285 in the edition of Wehrich [CSEL, vol. xii. 1887]; from Proverbs 21 pages, from Matthew 18). After the excerpts from those books 'quos et Judæi canonicos habent,' he goes on to say 'sed non sunt omittendi et hi quos quidem ante salvatoris adventum constat esse conscriptos, sed eos non receptos a Judæis recipit tamen eisdem salvatoris ecclesia. In his sunt duo qui Salomonis appellantur a pluribus propter quandam sicut existimo eloqui similitudinem. nam Salomonis non esse nihil dubitant quique doctores. nec tamen eius qui Sapientie dicitur quisnam sit autor apparet. Illum vero alterum quem vocamus Ecclesiasticum, quod Jesus quidam scripsit, qui cognominatur Sirach, constat inter eos qui eundem librum totum legerunt.'

As to the Lutheran Church it may be noted that the protocols of the Meistersinger of Nürnberg alone mention about 100 songs all beginning 'Jesus Sirach' or 'Sirach (the wise man)'—see the Indexes published by K. Drescher in vol. 214 (1897) of the Literarische Verein. In 1876 a preacher published the themes and dispositions of 170 sermons on this book,* and the Bible Society of Halle (founded by Francke-Canstein) circulated from 1712-1823 no fewer than 77,106 copies.†

iii. NAME AND PLACE IN THE BIBLE.—(a) Place. (1) The book had at no time a place among the 24 (or 22) books of the Hebrew Bible, though it is quoted in one passage of the Bab. Talmud (Berakoth, 48a) with the quotation-formula אמר ר' יוחנן 'as it is written,' which is used elsewhere only of the acknowledged books; but in the parallel passages the name of the book is added. In two other passages two rabbinical authorities actually quote from our book, while believing themselves to be quoting from Scripture (see Strack, 'Kanon des AT' in *PRE*³ ix. 753). The book is therefore not mentioned in those lists of the canonical books which profess to give the Jewish Canon, as Melito, Origen, Cyril of Jerusalem, Gregory of Nazianzus, Amphilochius, pseudo-Athanasius' Synopsis, Canon of Iodicea, capitulus (Zahn, Geschichte des Kanons, vol. ii.). Epiphanius, de Mens. 4 (Lagarde, Symmicta, ii. 157), says on the two books, mentioned above by Augustine, Wisdom and Sirach: αὗται χρήσιμοι μὲν εἰσι καὶ ὠφέλιμοι, ἀλλ' εἰς ἀριθμὸν τῶν βιβλίων οὐκ ἀναφέρονται; δι' ὃ οὐδὲ ἐν τῷ ἀρῶν (πλῆθος) ἐνετέθησαν, τοὺς ἐστὶν ἐν τῇ τῆς διαθήκης κιβωτῷ.

(2) But Sirach had a sure and prominent place among the books of the Bible in the Greek and

† On the use made of the book in the English Church see below, p. 550^b.

‡ Compare with this assertion Luther's definition of the Apocrypha, as 'Bücher, so der Heiligen Schrift nicht gleich gehalten, und doch nützlich und gut zu lesen sind.'

the text of the book and the Prologus incerti auctoris, the latter being inscribed Σοφία Ἰησοῦ υἱοῦ Σεραφ.

The common Latin designation since Cyprian is Ecclesiasticus, and means, most probably, the Church-book κατ' ἐξοχή, from its frequent use in the Church, especially for the instruction of catechumens.

Ecclesiasticus is used in Cyprian once of Ecclesiastes (Test. 3, 86. 61), once of Wisd. (3, 112 cod. A), of our book (3, 1. 95. 110. 111); it is ascribed to Solomon in 3, 6. 12. 20. 53. 113, Op. 5, Sent. 27, Ep. 3, 2; it is both ascribed to Solomon and called Ecclesiasticus in 2, 1. 3. 35. 51. 96. 97. 109 (see Rönisch, 'die Alltest. Citate bei Cyprian' in Zeitschrift für histor. Theol. 1875, 95). Ambrose writes: 'In Ecclesiastico Syrach, in libro Sapientiae Syrach'; Lactantius (Ep. 25), 'In Ecclesiastico per Salomonem'; it is referred to Solomon also by Vigilius of Thapsus, Anicetus of Burnich; Hilary ('qui nobiscum Salomonis inscribitur, apud Graecos atque Hebraeos [!] Sapientia Sirach habetur'). Jerome says, 'In Sapientia quae Sirach inscribitur.'

The (wrongly) abbreviated inscription of codex B and the editio Sixtina have become prevalent in modern books, even in those of Roman Catholic authors.

(c) Name of the original work.—Jerome (in the Preface to the books of Solomon) writes: 'Fertur et παράθερος Jesu filii Sirach liber, et alius πυθ-επιγραφος qui Sapientia Salomonis inscribitur; quorum priorem Hebraicum repri, nec Ecclesiasticum, ut apud Latinos sed Parabolas prænatum; cui juncti erant Ecclesiastes et Canticum Canticorum, ut similitudinem Salomonis non solum librorum numero, sed etiam materialium genere adaequaret,* secundus apud Hebraeos nusquam est.' This raises the question, What was the original title of the work? The Syriac version, which is based (see § viii.) on the Hebrew, is in Lagarde's edition (from cod. 12,142 of the Brit. Mus., vi cent.) inscribed חכמת רב סירה 'Wisdom of Bar Sira'; in Walton's Polyglot, חכמת רב סירה 'Book of Simeon Asira, which book is called the Wisdom of Bar Sira.' At the end we read (a) Hitherto the words of Jesu bar Simeon, who is called Bar Asira† and (b) 'Endeth to write the Wisdom of Bar Sira.' Walton has (see Lagarde, p. ix) 'Endeth the Wisdom of Bar Asira. In 20 chapters and to God glory in eternity.' The MSS of Pococke and Ussher add after (a) instead of (b) 'Endeth the book of the Wisdom of Jesus the son of Simeon who is called Bar Asira (cod. Ussher 2, Sirak), in which are 2500 words.'

In the Hebrew text we read at the end, 'Hitherto the words of Simeon ben Jeshua who is called ben Sirā. The Wisdom of Simeon ben Jeshua ben Eleazar ben Sirā. The name of Jahweh be blessed from now and till eternity.'

From these Greek, Syriac, and Hebrew statements it would appear that the title of the book was 'Wisdom,' Σοφία, in Heb. חָכְמָה (or סִפְרָה); but how is this to be reconciled with the statement of Jerome that the title was in Hebrew Parabola (i.e. פָּרָבֹלָה)? Is this a confusion with Proverbs, a solution recommended by the fact that in the Hebrew seen by Jerome Eccl. and Cant. followed; or was the copy seen by Jerome not a copy of the original, but a retranslation from the Greek, as already Scaliger suggested? And then, Jewish quotations from Sirach, where they mention not only the name of the author as אביר בן סירה, or in in Symb., after the canonical books of the OT, among which he mentioned 'Salomonis vero tres': 'Sciendum tamen est, quod et alii libri sunt, qui non canonici sed ecclesiastici a maioribus appellati sunt, ut est Sapientia Salomonis et alia Sapientia quae dicitur filii Syrach, qui liber apud Latinos hoc ipso generali vocabulo Ecclesiasticus appellatur, quo vocabulo non auctor libri, sed Scripturae qualitas cognominata est.'

* How are these words to be understood? Just as there are three books of Solomon (Prov., Eccl., Cant.), so there were extracanonical books equal in number and contents (Sirach + Eccl. + Cant.?).

Aramaic בר סירה, or סירה בן סירה, have twice אָבִיר 'the Parabolist said,' or סִפְרָה אביר בן סירה 'a proverb said ben Sira' (see C-N, p. xxiv n. v. liv and p. xx n. x.). The same word סִפְרָה 'proverbs' occurs in the Syriac VS at 50²⁷; the Heb. text has there ספר סירה, and the book is quoted as ספר סירה by Saadia (C-N, p. ix n. 4). The question of the original title is, after all, a puzzle, and new puzzles as to the author's name arise from the newly discovered texts.

iv. THE NAME OF THE AUTHOR.—(a) Hitherto it has been generally held that the author's name was Jesus the son of Sira (Jesus filius Sirach, Jesus Siracida). Especially subsequent to the Reformation this name became current instead of the Latin book-name Ecclesiasticus. Compare the title of the first separate edition of the book in Greek by Joachimi Camerarius (Basileæ, 1551), 'Sententiæ Jesu Siracidae Græce.'* But now new difficulties arise. In the Greek text the author himself (50²⁷) gives his name as Ἰησοῦς υἱὸς Σεραφ 'Eleazar ὁ Ἰεροσολυμιτῆς; † instead of the last word the first hand of codex S had Ἰερεὺς ὁ Σολυμιτῆς; the name Eleazar is omitted by cod. 248 and the Complutensian and Sixtine editions; Eleazar is written in cod. 68 and the Aldine Bible, 'Ελεάζαρος in V 253. The Syriac Hexapla has 'Jesus son of Sirach of Eliezer (ܝܫܘܥ ܕܥܠܝܙܝܪ); the Pesh. omits the passage altogether; in the Latin Vulgate it runs, 'Jesus filius Sirach Jerosolymita'; and now in the Hebrew in the twice-repeated colophon, לסמך בן סירה 'by Shimeon son of Jesus son of Eleazar son of Sirā.' And so the author is called also by Saadia (see S-T, p. 65). Many recent writers think the Hebrew pedigree Simeon—Jesus—Eleazar—Sira a mere clerical error for the sequence Jesus—Simeon—Eleazar—Sira. But it must be pointed out that the name Simeon is firmly attached to the author of this book in the Syriac Church. There he was identified with the Συμεὼν ὁ θεολόγος of the NT, the author of Nunc dimittis. On this identification see especially Georg, bishop of the Arabs (Briefe und Gedichte, ed. Ryssel, p. 59 f., 80 f., 159 f.), who opposes the identification for chronological reasons, the author of the book having lived, according to Georg, 244 years before Christ, in the 65th year of the Greek era, under Euergetes. Cf. further, Gregory Barhebraeus (Scholien, ed. Kaatz), who identifies him at the same time with Simeon (II.) son of Onias; Opuscula Nestoriana (ed. G. Hoffmann, p. 107, 2: 39 §); History of the Blessed Virgin Mary, ed. Budge (p. 36), where cod. B for 'Simeon the old' has 'Simeon Asira'—he becomes priest after

* There is a good story told by Melanchthon, which, whether it refers to this edition or not, ought not to be suppressed: 'Quidam sacrificulus cum in bibliopoli vidisset Syracidem edictum dixit: quam mali homines sunt Lutherani; etiam Christo nomen aliud affingunt: antea vocabatur Christus Jesus, nunc illi vocant eum Jesus Syrach' (see GGN, 1804, 180).

† AV 'Jesus the son of Sirach of Jerusalem'; RV 'Jesus the son of Sirach Eleazar of Jerusalem.' Note the Grecized form of the name (instead of Ἰεροσολυμιτῆς).

‡ That he was called Bar Sirā; they relate that he called his father אביר, because he is the Simeon whose tongue was bound (אִרְבָּן) by the Holy Ghost, till he should see the Christ, and when he had seen Him, he spoke, Let me now part in peace to my fathers.'

§ The Septuagint is said here to have been made 'six years after the return of the children of Israel from Babel, which was the 17th year of the death of Alexander the Greek, and 1400 years after the Law was given to Moses. Simeon the old (אביר), the father of Jesus bar Sira, the Wise, was one of the seventy-two old men just mentioned; and he was the Simeon bar Nathanah bar Chonja (= Sir 50), and Simeon was brother of the priest Eleazar; and it was he who carried our Lord in his arms, and his life was stretched over 216 years, and he called himself with a contemptible name (בִּשְׁמָה בְּרִיטָה), like Abraham, who called himself dust and ashes, and David, who said, I am a worm and no man, סִרָה, i.e. dust from the white-washing, which is beaten off the walls. Instead of Sira the Greek says Asira (אִסְרָה).'

Zechariah the father of John the Baptist, Protev. Jacobi, ch. 24; The Book of the Bes (p. 71): 'Simeon the son of Sira died in peace in his own town.' In one Greek recension of the Lives of the Prophets, Συμὼν ὁ λεγόμενος found a place towards the end between Zechariah the son of Barachiah and Nathan (see Nestle, Marg. und Mat. p. 33). That Simeon θεοδόχος was one of the Seventy, is stated, among Greek writers, by Euthymius Zigabenus, Kedrenus, Nicephorus Kallisti.

The pedigrees we thus obtain are—

| Θ | Σ | Σ | Jesus or |
|----------|------------|---------|-----------------|
| Simeon. | Jesus. | Simeon. | Jesus Bar-Sira. |
| Jesus. | Sirach. | Simeon. | Simeon. |
| Eleazar. | [Eleazar]. | Sira. | |
| Sira. | | | |

It has been suggested by Blau that 'the two traditions, that of the Greek and that of the Syriac, are mutually complementary.' Thus we should have in Θ a combination of both, what textual critics call a conflation. The decision depends on the general question of the value of Θ, see § ix. As to whether Simeon or Eleazar can be identified with one of the known bearers of these names, see below.

(b) The name Sirach.—The latest contribution to Hebrew lexicography, M. Jastrow's Dictionary of the Targumim, etc., contains the following words which come into consideration for the explanation of this name: (1) סיר 'pot'; (2) סיר = Heb. סרסר 'coat of mail'; (3) סירסר 'thorn'; (4) סירסר = the present proper name; (5) סירסר, סירסר f. (a) '[degenerate growth]', 'thorn', 'thornbush'; (b) 'refuse', 'foul matter'; (6) סירסר, סירסר f. 'surrounded place', 'court', 'prison.' From Thes. Syr. we may add (7) סיר = סור, 'Sir'; (8) סירסר = סירסר; and (9) the explanation of the name given by the Syriac lexicographers = סירסר 'thin dust from the walls.' If there was not the constant tradition that the initial letter was ס, the Greek Σ might correspond also to other letters, as ι, or x, or σ, and the name might be connected with: סרסר, סרסר, 'small', 'little', 'lesser', סרסר or סרסר being, in fact, the name of several Jewish Amoraim.

The χ at the end of the Greek form may correspond to י (cf. Σερουχ, Φαλεχ), π (Καλαχ, Μασβαχ), to η (many names in -μελεχ), to ρ (Βαλαχ), to ρ (Αμαληχ, Βαραχ), to still other letters, as ι (Κερεχ, Μαωχ) or η (Βαθαναχ, Δευαχ); but it is most probably a mere representation of the mater lectionis κ; cf. 'Ακελ-δεμαχ, 'Ιωσηφ Lk 3²⁰ = 'τ', the spelling 'Αλλαχ = Allah [Schlatter takes it for υ=υίς]. A. Meyer (Muttersprache Jesu, p. 39) takes the word to mean coat of mail or iris oculi; Ryssel (p. 234), 'more probably thorn or thorn-hedge than mail-coat,' referring to Levy, NHWB iii. 519, 520. Ryssel takes bar-Sira as name of the family; we should thus have only three generations: Jesus, Simeon, Eliezer—not four as in Θ.* In view of the Prologue, 'ὁ πάππος μου Ἰησοῦς,' it seems certain that the author was Jesus (the son of Simeon), and not Simeon the son of Jesus. Whether the translator, too, bore the name of his grandfather, as is stated by the Prologus incerti auctoris, is not certain. This second Prologue, which was first printed from cod. 248 in the Complutensian Polyglot, and was first shown by Hoeschel (1604) to be part of the so-called pseudo-Athanasian Synopsis, begins—

Ἰησοῦς οὗτος Σιράχ μόνος ἦν υἱός, ἔγγονος δὲ Ἰησοῦ θεοφιλέτου αὐτοῦ . . . ὁ οὖν πάππος αὐτοῦ . . . φιλοποιεῖς τὸ γένος ἑαυτοῦ ἐν Ἐβραίοις . . . ὅτι οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν τῷ βίβλῳ ταύτης ὁ σπέρμα Ἰησοῦς οὗτος ἐν τῇ συνταγῇ κατὰ τὸν ἑαυτοῦ ὄνομα, Σιράχ οὗτος μὲν αὐτοῦ πάππος

τῷ οὐκ ἔστιν πατὴρ πατρίσιν Ἰησοῦ· ὁ δὲ αὐτὸς λαβόμενος εἰς τὸ πνεῦμα ἐκπαλαίμενος συντάγματι Σιράχ ἐν τῇ αὐτοῦ καὶ τῷ τοῦ πατρὸς ἀλλὰ μὴ καὶ τῷ πατρὶ ὀνόματι (ἐκπαλαίμενος).

Thus we have the pedigree: Jesus [II, the translator]—Sirach [II]—Jesus [I, the author]—Sirach [I, Eleazar].

Another enlargement has taken place in the translator's Preface, as it seems, in Latin MSS, though it is known to the present writer only from the pre-Lutheran German Bible. There it is stated that the 'anherre' (avus, πάππος) was a son of Josedek (see ch. 49¹²), and one of the Seventy, and that the grandson Jesus the son of Sirach pursued higher studies. Finally, Euergetes is stated in the same connexion to have reigned after Philadelphus, his brother, under whom the Bible had been translated from Hebrew into Greek (see Nestle, 'Zumi Prolog des Ecclesiasticus' in ZATW, 1897, p. 123 f.). Already Isidore of Seville identifies Jesus the son of Sirach with Jeshua the son of Jozedek. This is of course impossible. For the translator states: ἐν γὰρ τῷ ὀγδῷ καὶ τριακστῷ ἔτει ἐπὶ τοῦ Εὐεργέτου βασιλέως παραγεννηθεὶς εἰς Αἴγυπτον καὶ συγχρονίας εὖρον οὐ μικρὰς παιδείας ἀφύμοιον. This date is not to be understood of the 38th year of the life of the translator (Camerarius) nor of any unknown era, but of the reign of Euergetes (see especially Deissmann, Bibelstudien, i. 255 [Eng. tr. 339 ff.]; R 235; Ed. 4 ff. As only Euergetes II. reigned more than 38 years (from B.C. 170 with his brother, from 145 alone, reckoning his years from 170),† it is the year B.C. 132; and as he states that he stayed some time in Egypt (συγχρονίας) before he undertook his task, we may place the translation about 130, and the original some forty or fifty years earlier (B.C. 190–170). Then we must understand the high priest Simon, who is so highly praised in Sir 50^{18c}, from personal knowledge as it seems, to be Simon II. Others, taking πάππος in the sense of 'ancestor,' prefer to place the author more than a hundred years earlier, under Simon I. In the former case it would be possible to identify our author Ἰησοῦς with the high priest Ἰδωρ (175–172); but beyond the identity of the time and name nothing leads to this identification. That the author of our book was high priest is stated by Syncellus (Chron., ed. Dindorf, i. 525); the reading ἱερεὺς ὁ Σολυμετρίης by the first hand of S cannot be more than a clerical error.‡

v. EDITIONS.—(a) The first editions of the Greek text are in the Complutensian Polyglot (c) 1514, from cod. 248 § (see below, p. 544*), in the Aldine Bible (a) 1518, which has been taken for this book

* The word εἰσπρε used here and in the Preface may have the more general meaning 'ancestor,' but in this connexion it will be 'grandfather.' In the Concordance of Hatch-Redpath it is quoted from Symmachus on Zec 1¹, where it seems to belong to Ἀδδῶ.

† On the reign of Euergetes we are well informed through the inscriptions of the temple of Edfu (see Dümichen, Die erste bis jetzt aufgefundenen sichere Angabe über die Regierungszeit eines ägyptischen Königs aus dem alten Reiche, Leipzig, 1874, p. 20 ff.; and Zischr. f. äg. Sprache, 1870). There the years 23, 30, 46, 48, 54 (as the last of this king) are mentioned; the first Toth of his 28th year fell on the 28th Sept. a.c. 143, the first Payni (rise of Sirius) on the 20th–19th July 142.

‡ Here it may be mentioned that in a late compilation (see C.N. pp. xiv f., xxix) Ben-Sira is made the son or grandson of Jeremiah, and has a son Uziel and a grandson Joseph. See Proverbia Ben-Sirae Auctoris antiquissimi, qui credidit fuisse nepos Jeremiae prophetae, Opera J. Drusii, Franeker, 1607. In the Preface Drusius thinks it a probable inference, 'interpretem Græcum Ecclesiastici Josephum fuisse Vzielis filium.' Cf. on this literature the edition of Steinschneider, Alphabetum Siracidis utrumque, Berolini, 1858; and Schürer, GJV 3. 161.

In other legends he has been brought into connexion with Solomon as his uxor or secretary; see above, p. 540*; a legend about Aphkia (the wife of Sirach) and Solomon has been published in Arabic by Mrs. M. D. Gibson in number viii. of the Studia Sinaitica, London, 1901.

§ Sirach was committed with the rest of the 'libri Sapientiales' to the care of Johan de Vergara, who, at the end of his life, had no greater wish than to illustrate Sirach by notes (Alvarus Gomez, de rebus gestis a Franc. Ximenio, lib. 2).

without any doubt from cod. 68; and cod. 68 itself is, to all appearance, for this book a copy of cod. B, so that a represented the text of cod. B in many passages more faithfully than the Sixtine of 1587.* A reprint of a is the edition of Lonicerus† (Argent. 1526); but the editor introduced many changes: for instance, in 3¹, where a has ἐμοῦ τοῦ πατρὸς, Lonicerus put (from the Latin) κλυα τοῦ πατρὸς. That Lonicerus changed his text has been overlooked by subsequent editors and commentators, hence in later books a number of misstatements as to the text of a;‡ Lonicerus in turn was followed by Melanchthon (Basle, 1545), Melanchthon by the edition of Wechel (1597, see art. SEPTUAGINT, p. 440).§ The editors of the Sixtine (b) made use not only of B, but of c a Lonicerus, Melanchthon, and the codd. V 106, 155, 253|| (see on b, above, p. 440*); on Grabe's edition, see p. 440*.

(b) Separate editions of the Apocrypha are mentioned, p. 441^b. The edition of Fritzsche (1871) is the best, but for our particular book quite unsatisfactory (see Nestle, Marg. 1892, pp. 48–58).

(c) Of separate editions of Sirach alone the oldest is: Sententiæ Jesu Siracidae, Græcè summa diligentia et studio singulari editæ, cum necessariis Annotationibus, Joachimo Camerario, Paberggen., autore, Basileæ, 1551, 8vo.¶

It has both Prologues, is the first which numbers the verses, and has useful notes, especially parallels from the classics, but also various readings. In the Prologue, Camerarius writes ἰσχυρὸν for the doubtful ἀσχυρὸν (cf. ἰσχυρὸς and ἀσχυρὸς), which reading has been mentioned in the notes of b and other editions and received into the text by Grabe.

Then comes Σοφία Σειραχ, sive Ecclesiasticus Græcè ad exemplar Romanum, et Latine ex interpretatione J. Drusii, cum castigationibus sive notis eiusdem, Ad Reverendissimum in Christo patrem D. Johannem Whitgiftum archiepiscopum Cantuariensem, etc. Franekeræ, 1596, 4to; with a double appendix, 'Proverbia-Bensiræ' and 'Adagiorum Ebraicorum Decuriæ aliquot nunquam antehac editæ.'

Besides the previous printed editions—among them 'Biblia R. Stephani quæ vulgo Vatablo attribuitur', apparently the edition (Geneva, 1st March) 1557–58—Drusius made use from ch. 20 onward of a collation sent to him through Jan Gruter from Heidelberg. 'Huius enim hortatu Jacobus Kimedontius junior . . . codicem Palatinæ bibliothecæ vetustissimum membranaceum cum editione Camerarii anno 1578 [sic; in his notes he writes 1570] Lipsiæ cussa diligentissime contulerat.' This is apparently the codex 296 of HP.

A most conscientious edition is that of Hoeschel: Sapientia Sirachi sive Ecclesiasticus, Collatis lectionibus variantibus membrarum Augustanarum vetustissimarum et xiv præterea exemplarium. Addita versione Latina vulgata, ex editione Romana, cum notis Davidis Hoeschelii Augustani. In quibus multa SS. Patrum loca illustrantur, Augustæ, 1604.

His codex Augustanus ('H' in the edition of Fritzsche, p. xxii) is apparently codex 70 of HP, now at Munich 551, and deserves the more a fresh collation, as HP gave it only for the

* More than thirty readings quoted by Holmes-Parsons as singular from a turn out to be in reality readings of B. How did 68 really read in these passages? it seems very badly collated, for Holmes-Parsons.

‡ Comp. Bretschneider on 31 'Aldina, Melanth. et Bas. minor: κλυα τοῦ πατρὸς quod et codd. quidam Hoeschelii.' The first and last statements are quite incorrect.

§ D. Hoeschel quotes amongst the editions used by him frequently 'Biblia Parisiæ impressa a R. Stephano, A 1555'. From his quotations it would appear that it is in Greek and Latin with notes. Is there such an edition?

|| This follows from a comparison of the scholia and the Notes of Nobilius in the edition of 1588; comp. on 31 'in aliquibus libris est κλυα τοῦ πατρὸς' (= cod. 253), 'in aliquibus aliis κλυα' [= Lonicerus]. Nobilius quotes at least a dozen readings from a and MSS which are not found in HP.

¶ Kolde (art. 'Camerarius' in PRE³ iii. 689) mentions only the second edition (Lipsiæ, 1593); the same year is given by Hoeschel (1604); but Drusius (1596) and the Catalogue of the British Museum give 1570, 2 vols.

first chapter, and as the codex is closely related to 253 and the Syriac Hexapla.

The source and present place of another MS used by Hoeschel ('Fragmentum MS variæ lectionis aliquot capitulum e scidia Fr. Sylburgii') are unknown to the present writer.

From Hoeschel till Fritzsche not much was done for the textual criticism of a book which needed it greatly. We have—Sententiæ Jesu Siracidae, Græcum textum ad fidem codicum et versionum, emendavit et illustravit, Linde (Gedani, 1795); and Liber Jesu Siracidae Græcè, Ad fidem codicum et versionum emendatus et perpetua annotatione illustratus, a C. G. Bretschneider (Ratisbonæ, 1804), xvi. 758 pp.

Br. is not accurate enough, but he has the merit of having called attention to a witness in textual criticism, the Florilegium of Antonius and Maximus, neglected by most workers in this field.

vi. THE GREEK TEXT.—The problem of textual criticism in this book is of exceptional interest. Luther declares in the Preface to his translation (what pains it had taken him to translate this book may be judged from a comparison with all other copies, Greek, Latin, or German, old or new): 'There have come so many "Klünglinge" over this book, that it would be no wonder if it were totally disfigured, not to be understood, without any use. Like a torn, trampled, and scattered letter, we have gathered it, wiped off the dust, and brought it as far as can be seen.' Some idea of this may be gathered by the English reader from a glance at the margins of RV. There are about eighty marginal notes; fifty times it is stated that a verse or part of a verse or even a series of verses is omitted by many or by the best or the oldest authorities (cf. 1^a, 15^a, 21^a); once only (17¹⁰) 'this line is added by the best authorities'; at other places we read, 'The Greek text here is probably corrupt,' 'the Greek text is here very confused.' The numbering of verses and even of the chapters does not agree. The latter is caused by the misplacement of some leaves (Ryssel says 'two'; and it may have been two, which must have been the inner leaves of a layer, and somewhat more closely written than A and still more than BS*) in the copy from which all the Greek MSS hitherto known have been derived. This fact, first pointed out by O. F. Fritzsche (Ausleg. 169, 170), who was led to his discovery by a similar observation of H. Sauppe on a Heidelberg MS of Lysias†, would not have been recognized with such certainty but for the Latin and Syriac texts, which have the different order.‡ Already Nobilius declared the Latin order to be the better, calling attention especially to the reading κατακληρονομῆσον 'in non nullis (libris)', 'quod optime convenit, si conjungatur cum illis quæ in vulg. c. 36' (a reading received into the text by Grabe, but not to be found elsewhere in HP, quoted by Hoeschel from his codex Augustanus; Camerarius put κατακληρονομῆσαι). Where did the Roman editors get it from? and which is the 'unus vetustus codex,' which according to their repeated statement has, like the Complutensian, the Latin order? It is not the cod. 248,

* Toy (Encyc. Bûl. vol. ii. col. 1173) speaks of the displacement of rolls of the G MS, or possibly of the Hebrew MS from which the Gr. translation was made.

† This accident occurs very often in ancient MSS. In the British Mus. there is a German Bible which has Mt 11–54 after Deuteronomy; at Gotha there is another with the same misplacement. On a misplacement in cod. B see Swete, Introd. p. 131; in a MS of ecclesiastical canons see Turner, JThSt ii. 289; in the Church History of Zacharias of Mitylene see the edition of Brook-Hamilton; in the Homilies of Origen on Jer. see E. Klostermann (Or. iii. p. xlii). For other examples (Plautus, Mostellaria, etc.) see Ed. p. 154.

‡ The strange confusion Melanchthon produced in his edition, by placing the verse καὶ κατακληρονομῆσον in the middle of ch. 33 and λαλεῖτε πρὸς αὐτὸν in the middle of ch. 36, has been partially amended in the edition of 1597.

in spite of the definite statement of Edersheim and others* (see Nestle, Marginalien, 1892, p. 58; J. K. Zenner, 'Ecclesiasticus nach Cod. Vat. 346' in Z. f. Kath. Theol. 1895; Ryssel, p. xxviii; and now the edition of Hart).†

Parsons used for this book fourteen MSS; the two uncials iii. and 23, i.e. AV, but cod. 70 (Hoeschel's Augustanus) only for the Prologue and ch. 1. In the Addenda is to be found for the Prologue the collation of a fifteenth MS (234). Fritzsche excerpted the apparatus of Parsons, but in an insufficient way, and added the collation of C, S, and Hoeschel's Augustanus from his edition of 1604.‡

In Swete's OT in Greek we have a faithful representation of the readings of BACS (=N); but it is now generally acknowledged that the text of these uncials is a very bad one in Sirach.§ It is therefore a great boon that the Syndics of the Cambridge University Press are to publish shortly an edition of the codex Vaticanus 346 (=HP 248, the basis of c) by J. H. A. Hart, who, with the assent of the Syndics, had the kindness to communicate to the present writer, for the benefit of this article, the proofs before publication.||

Of MSS not yet laid under contribution there are known to the present writer:—(1) A palimpsest of the 6th or 7th cent. at St. Petersburg, written in three columns (see Urtext, p. 74; Swete, Introd. p. 147 n. 12). (2) Two palimpsest leaves belonging to cod. 2 in the Patriarchal Library at Jerusalem, ascribed to the 6th cent., containing Prol. and 11-14 129-311, published by J. R. Harris, Biblical Fragments from Mount Sinai, No. 5.

(3) The ῥοσφύρα (ch. 61) is to be found in Cod. Bodl. Miac. 206 (xiv sec.); see Cox, Catalogus, i. 762. This chapter is missing in the MSS 296 and 308* of HP and (at present) in the codex Syro-Hexaplaris Ambrosianus; but there only through the deplorable loss of a leaf.

Of minuscules, two Vienna MSS, Cod. Theol. Gr. xi. and cxlvii., both of which were brought by Busbecq from Constantinople, have been partially collated by Edw. Hatch and quoted as Vienna 1 and 2 in his Essay on the text of Ecclesiasticus (Essays in Biblical Greek, p. 247 ff.). On the confusion about the 308 (or 308*) in HP see Hatch, l.c. 248; and Swete, Introd. p. 150, No. 149.

Now comes the strange fact that our Greek MSS—which, as stated, go back, without any exception, to one and the same copy, in which the dislocation had taken place—show the greatest divergences. For instance, after 14 two lines are inserted by six MSS of HP (23, 55, 70, 106, 248, 253); after v.⁵ again two lines by five MSS (the above without 248); after v.¹⁰ and v.¹² two lines, but only by two MSS (70, 253); after v.¹⁷ one line by two MSS (here, however, not 70 and 253, but 70 and 248); after v.²⁰ two lines by four MSS (70, 106, 248, 253); in v.¹⁰ two words, ἀπ' αὐτῆς, by one MS (70). How is this possible if all go back to the same original? And the variation is increased by the second and third class of our witnesses, the ancient Versions and Patristic Quotations.

vii. VERSIONS AND QUOTATIONS.—(a) In the

* e.g. C. H. Toy (art. 'Ecclesiasticus' in Encyc. Bibl. vol. ii. col. 1173).

† At present the Latin order is found in the edition of Camerarius; can this be meant?

‡ Bretschneider, p. 694: 'Cum Compl. textu maxima ex parte consentit codex Augustanus, cuius lectiones Hoeschelii in critica sacris t. v. nobis dedit, quod modo accuratius ac clarius fecisset voluerim. . . quum . . . haud raro lectiones, neque eas sperandas habere, quorum nullum in reliquis deprehenditur vestigium.' That Hoeschel's codex E is identical with 'Drusii MS Heidelbergense' Bretschneider failed to recognize.

§ Edw. Hatch closes his examination of the text of Sirach with the remark, that as one of the points established by his investigation will be acknowledged 'the inferior value of some of the more famous uncial MSS as compared with some cursives' (Essays, p. 281).

|| One of the characteristics of this MS is the insertion of about 130 glosses, to guard the text against misunderstanding, especially in chs. 1-30; see 131 in ἀλφβητ, 24 ἀνιμις, 321 ἀνιμις, 43 ἀλφβητ, 25 κατὰ μὲν in 511 ἀλφβητ, 677 τὴν αὐτὴν, 68 ἐν μαρτυρίᾳ, 1310 ἀλφβητ, 164 ἐν τῇ, 11 διὰ τῶν, 20 ἐξ, 179 ἐν τῇ, 29 ἀνιμις. Interesting is 1915 παλαιὸς γὰρ γίνεται διαβολὴ ματαίᾳ, because the motive is quite the same as led to the addition of καὶ in Mt. 52. Some of them are found in the Syro-Hexaplaric MS under asterisks, one of these (511) also in one of the Hebrew texts, others in the Latin texts.

first place has to be mentioned the Syriac version by Paul of Tella (c. 616 A.D.), the so-called Syro-Hexaplar, preserved to us through the codex Syro-Hexaplaris Ambrosianus. If we retain the designation Syro-Hexaplar, we must bear in mind that Sirach had no place in Origen's Hexapla; but in one particular respect this Syriac version reminds us of the Hexapla: one of the critical marks of Origen, the asteriscus, appears also in Sirach, at least in its first part up to ch. 13. There are altogether 45 asterisks, and they mark just some of the additions mentioned above. No Greek MS of Sirach seems to have been found as yet with asterisks; but there is scarcely a doubt that the asterisks were not added by Paul of Tella, but were taken over by him from the Greek MS which he translated. This MS contained, before the text of the book, the capitulation, which is found in the so-called Synopsis of Chrysostom (Migne, Patr. Gr. lvi. 575), and some good corrections of the printed text may be gathered from it. Now the question arises the more: Where did these additions come from in this Greek copy? Take the very first one, which has an asterisk in p. 17 ἀπ' αὐτῆς, given in the text in Syriac as ἡ, and on the margin, to remove any ambiguity, in Greek letters as ΑΠΑΤΗΣ. There is a slight difference between p and the solitary Greek witness, from which this addition is known hitherto, Hoeschel's Augustanus (70), inasmuch as the latter gives it after μετὰ πόντος σαρκὸς ('alii non agnoscunt habere voculas neque Athanasius Orat. 3. contra Arian.'), while p has it after κατὰ τὴν δόξαν αὐτοῦ. This makes no difference of sense; in both cases ἀπ' αὐτῆς is a limitation of the preceding αὐτῆς (retained by 70 p): God does not shed out His whole wisdom (αὐτῆς) on all flesh, but only ἀπ' αὐτῆς; it is a mere dogmatical correction; but while appearing hitherto only in a single and late Greek MS—70 is of the 15th cent.—it gains suddenly in strength when shown by p to be perhaps 1000 years older; nevertheless it is a mere gloss, which might be added by any copyist from his own brain, without any source. But what about the lines immediately following, put in p under asterisks in quite the same way?—

* and he gives it to them that love him,

* the gift of the Lord is Wisdom,

* glorious,

* to them to whom he appears he deals

* it in his appearance;

or with the two lines after v.¹²

* the fear of the Lord is a gift from the Lord, for on love he raises paths.*

Both additions are found not in 70 alone, but in 70 and 253. Where do these additions come from?† We must look for more witnesses—versions and quotations.

The versions to be mentioned are the Armenian, Georgian, Ethiopic, Coptic, Arabic.

On the Armenian version and its complicated history see *PRE*³ ii. 68, 69 (= Urtext, p. 128 f.); Ryssel, p. 129; Margoliouth-Edersheim, § ix.; Conybeare (vol. i. p. 153*); Herkenne, pp. 28-33. The older text rests on the authority of a single MS, which breaks off at 427, and has a lacuna from 351¹⁰-381¹⁴, and several omissions besides—e.g. the whole of ch. 8.

* That the critical marks are not absolutely to be trusted is shown by these examples: in the first a line is placed under asterisk ('and he gives it, etc.'), which ought to be free from it; in the second, the second line ('for on love, etc.') ought to have the asterisk.

† Starting from the same observation, that some of the characteristic additions of the cursives 106, 248, 253 are to be found in the Syr.-Hex. with asterisks prefixed, the editor of cod. 248 raises (in a private communication to the present writer, 8th June 1901) the question: Is it possible that Sirach also was found in Origen's Hexapla, and that he knew a Hebrew original and compared the Greek text therewith?

On the Georgian version no more is known to the present writer than what is stated by Holmes at the end of the Præf. in Pent.: 'In Bibliis Georgianis Moscuæ curatis, liber Ecclesiastici et duo libri Macchabeorum, critico usui forte haud inservient.'

The Palæo-Slavonic version, says Margoliouth, 'follows a text similar to that of the Complutensian version, but with only a portion of the additions.' As in other books it is revised from a, the question must be put, whether this be not the case in Sirach also.

The Ethiopic version was published in 1894 as the last work of A. Dillmann (Veteris Testamenti Ethiopici tomus quintus, quo continentur libri Apocryphi, Baruch . . . Judith, Ecclesiasticus, Sapientia . . . Berolini, 1897, 4to. On its confused state see Nestle, Marginalien, p. 58; Dillmann's Epilogus, p. 113 ff.; Herkenne, pp. 33-38; Margoliouth believed he could find in a few places signs of contamination from the Syriac (8^a 22¹⁶ 38³⁰ etc.); but they are of rather doubtful character.

Of Coptic versions the one in the Sahidic dialect is almost complete, existing in a unique MS of the 6th cent. at Turin, and published by P. de Lagarde in his Egyptiaca (Göttingen, 1883; Anastatic reprint, 1897; see his Mittheilungen, i. p. 176 n.). * From a MS in the Museo Borgiano, A. Ciasca published short fragments from chs. 1 and 2 (Sacrorum Bibliorum fragmenta Copto-Sahidica, vol. ii. (1889) p. 218); and the same by E. Amelineau (Fragments de la Version Thébaine de l'Écriture Ancien Testament, Paris, 1889), together with two leaves from a MS at Berlin, containing 6¹⁷⁻⁷¹⁸, 21⁸⁻²², supplying and emending some defects in Lagarde's codex (see Herkenne, pp. 23-27, and Norb. Peters, Die sahidisch-koptische Übersetzung des Buches Ecclesiasticus auf ihren wahren Wert für die Textkritik untersucht Freiburg, 1898).—A fragment in the Bohairic dialect (ch. 2¹⁻⁹) has been published by Lagarde, Orientalia, i. (1879) p. 69; the same piece with some more fragments (chs. 1. 4²⁰⁻⁵² 12¹⁸⁻¹³¹ 22⁷⁻¹⁸ 23⁷⁻¹⁴ 24¹⁻¹¹) by U. Bouriant, Recueil de travaux relatifs à la philologie et à l'archéologie égyptiennes et assyriennes, vol. vii. (Paris, 1886), p. 81 ff.—One piece, finally, has been published by U. Bouriant in the dialect of Akhmîm in the Mémoires publiés par les membres de la mission archéologique française au Caire sous la direction de M. Maspero, I. 2. (Paris, 1885), 255 ff., containing 22¹⁶⁻²³⁴.

In Arabic there seem to exist several versions. One MS, said to be corrected from the Greek, is preserved in the Medicean Library at Florence: in the Prologue the grandson is made to say that he translated the work into Syriac. A compendium of the Arabic version in an imperfect state (5 pages) is preserved, according to Margoliouth, in the Bodleian Library (Hunt. 260).

The version contained in Karshuni in cod. Syr. 179, i., at Paris, is said to be due to Basilus, bishop of Tiberias, but goes back to the Syriac, not the Greek text of Sirach.

All these versions, except the last, rest on the common Greek text; and so do most of the quotations in Greek Fathers. An exceptional position among them is held by Clemens Alexandrinus, whose quotations in important details agree with cod. 248, 253, and the monks Antonius and Maximus.

Of greater importance than the other versions, and of greater value than for other parts of the Greek OT, is—

(b) The Latin Version. It is true that the suggestion first broached by the Roman Catholic commentator Cornelius a Lapide (+1637, Comm. on Sirach, 2 vols., 1634), next mooted by Sabatier, then discussed in a special paper by Ernst Gottlob

Bengel (1769-1826),* that the Latin version was based immediately on the lost Hebrew original, has turned out to be wrong; but even the latest investigation (H. Herkenne, de Veteris Latine Ecclesiastici capitibus i-xliii, Leipzig, 1899) has arrived at the result: 'Nihilur Vetus Latina textu vulgari græco ad textum hebraicum alius recensionis Græce castigato.' It is all the more to be regretted that its text has not yet been published in a satisfactory way.

It is generally believed that the text in our ordinary editions of the Vulgate is the Old Latin untouched by Jerome.† But his expression 'calamo temperavi' does not exclude, in our opinion, those stylistic emendations which we perceive when comparing the current Latin text with older documents, either MSS or quotations.‡

The most convenient edition of the Latin Vulgate is that of van Ess (pub. 1824), which gives on the margin the variations of the Sixtina and Clementina after the Vatican editions of 1590, 1592, 1593, and 1598.

Sabatier (see vol. ii. 53) reprinted the official text with the collation of four MSS 'optimæ notæ' (ib. 389, 'Corbeienses duos, unum Sangermanensem, & alium S. Theoderici ad Rhenum'). The Corbeiensis 1. is now Paris 11,532 (9th cent.; Berger, Histoire de la Vulgate, 104, 107); Sangermanensis 15, now Paris 11,553 (9th cent.; Berger, 65, 408).

In 1740 J. Blanchinus published, in his Vindiciæ canon. script. Vulgatæ Latine editionis, a collation of the codex Toletanus, with Henten's edition (1569); repeated in Migne, Patr. Lat. xxix. 985.

After the collations of the Amiatinus by Heyse-Tischendorf (Lips. 1873) the whole text of this MS was published for Wisd. and Sirach by Lagarde, Mitth. i. 283-377; see also p. 191.

Ph. Thielmann devoted to the Latin Sirach two articles in Wölflin's Archiv, and showed that chs. 44-50 were due to another hand than the rest of the book; the former of European, the chief part of African origin (Archiv für lat. Lexikogr. viii. 501-561, ix. 2, 247 ff.); see vol. ii. p. 10.

The text published by C. Douais (une ancienne version latine de l'Ecclesiastique, Paris, 1895, 4to) is, according to Thielmann and Kennedy, an apparently Spanish text, a revision of the primitive African version (ch. 21¹⁷⁻²²²). In the judgment of the present writer it may be just as well a new translation, independent of the former.

Ph. Thielmann ('Bericht über das gesammelte handschriftliche Material zu einer kritischen Ausgabe der lateinischen Übersetzungen biblischer Bücher des alten Testaments' in Münchener Sitz.-Ber., 1899, ii. 2, 205 ff.) gives for Sirach the collation of twenty-three MSS (1-4 Spanish, 5, 6 Anglo-Saxon, 7-12 French before Charlemagne, 13-16 St. Gall and Italy, 17-19 Theodulf, 20-23 Alcuin), and specimens from fourteen MSS more; some fragments cod. Veron. i. and cod. Ambr. D. 50 f. (olim Bobb.) are of the 6th cent. But still older are the—

QUOTATIONS OF THE LATIN FATHERS.—Augustine's Speculum is mentioned above; it contains whole chapters from Sirach, and its text agrees closely with that of the codex Amiatinus; but other quotations in the writings of Augustine

* 'Ueber die muthmassliche Quelle der alten lateinischen Uebersetzung des Buches Sirach' in Eichhorn's Allgemeine Bibliothek der bibl. Litt., 1796, vii. pp. 832-864.

† Edersheim: 'Jerome tells us expressly that he had left the text of the Vetus Latina untouched (calamo temperavi) in the (apocryphal) Wisdom of Solomon, and in Sirach' (Præf. in edit. libr. Salom. iuxta Sept. interpr., ed. Vallarsi, 10, 436).

‡ Comp. the same expression on his version of the Latin Gospels in the Epistula ad Damasum: 'que nec multum a lectionis Latine consuetudine discrepant, ita calamo temperavi, ut his tantum quæ sensum videbantur mutare correctis, reliqua manere pateremus ut fuerant.'

(collected by Sabatier and Lagarde) show strange variations.

See, for instance, 1521 'laxamentum peccandi' for 'spatium p.' ('spatium' also in the Speculum).^{*} Not a single one of his MSS, as Thielmann informs the present writer, has this word 'laxamentum'; yet it is found for this passage also in that other Speculum [alately ascribed to Augustine, now called liber de divinis scripturis (edited together with the former by Wehrich), and must for internal reasons be considered as the original reading of the Latin version.

For 'opprobrium', 2028, this Speculum has 'supervacuitas' (in no MS of Thielmann); further, 2228 'conservationem' instead of 'custodiam' (no Biblical MS); Augustine 'signaculum astutum' instead of 'certum'; 2532 instead of 'beatificum virum suum' the Liber has 'consentit in angustio viro suo'; in this case Complutensis 1 agreeing with it (only 'angustiis'); 282 instead of 'dum caro sit servat iram' (εἰς αὐτὴν) the Liber has 'copit retinere iram' (= εἰς αὐτὴν); 2911 we find in the Liber the imperative 'animamquitarda' (= ἀναμνησθῆναι), a word to be added to the new Thesaurus Latinae linguae for 'animo fortior esto' of the Vulgate, or 'animamquior esto' of Compl. 1, Metz 7 (first hand, second hand = Vulgate). Here we have three stages of subsequent revisions.

The greatest surprise is 315. By a comparison with the Syriac it seemed clear that instead of διαφθορά we must read διαφορά, and ἀναμνησθῆναι instead of ἀναμνησθῆναι (see Ball, Variorum Apocrypha; Nestle, Marginalien, p. 55). The RV does not materially alter the AV: 'he that followeth destruction shall have the fill of it'; 'qui insequitur destructionem replebitur ea'; for this the Liber has 'qui ins multa, in illis implanabitur', i.e., just as proposed, διαφορά and ἀναμνησθῆναι. Of all MSS collated by Thielmann, only the first hand of Metz 7 has preserved a remembrance of this rendering, reading 'multa in illis implanabitur' (sic).†

Now the questions arise—(1) How have this quotation and the codex of Metz preserved this true reading? (2) How did the wrong text find its way into all the other MSS? Is the latter circumstance due to an intentional revision, and may this revision have been made through Jerome? The former may be due either to a Greek MS which preserved the original text, or to recourse to the Syriac version, or to derivation from the original Hebrew.‡

In all cases the importance of L in its original form and of the early quotations is evident—the worse therefore the neglect of these studies; but still more evident is the value of the Syriac and 'he Hebrew texts.

viii. THE SYRIAC TEXT.—In his edition of the Libri Veteris Testamenti Apocryphi (or deuterocanonici, as he wished to read afterwards) syriace (1861), Lagarde gave to Sirach the first place, to show that he believed with Bendtsen (Specimen exercitationum criticarum in V. T. libros apocryphos e scriptis patrum et antiquis versionibus, Göttingen, 1789), that this version was not made from the Greek, but from the 'Hebrew' (see Lagarde, Symm. i. 88, 17; Mith. i. 191). As this view is now almost universally accepted—it was still debated by Bretschneider and Fritzsche—it need no longer be proved. The question is only whether the translation was not influenced, like other books in the Peshitta, here and there by the Greek version, and whether its text has come down to us in good preservation.

It was first published in the great Polyglot Bibles of Paris and London,—in the latter on the basis of three MSS of Ussher and Pococke; then by Lagarde from the cod. 12,142 in the British

* The variations are partially mere lexical: 433 'veritas' instead of 'iustitia'; 626 'limen' instead of 'gradus'; 1412 'seculum' instead of 'mundus'; others touch the sense or even the underlying Greek text, as 3816 'flectet fortitudinem' (= ισχύς) against 'flectet ceterorum' (αὐξίαν).†

‡ For mere conjectural emendation the rendering seems too clever, or rather not clever enough, for the proper meaning of διαφορά = 'property' has not been recognized. It is quite the same with the preservation of the original order in chs. 31-36 in L. This may be due either to the fact that L was made from a Greek MS which was independent of the one from which our present G texts are derived, or it may have been restored after the Syriac or after the Hebrew. L shares some of the strangest mispellings with G; see 4325 'dominus Jhesus' instead of 'Jesus' 'insulas' (in the official Vulg.).

Museum, which belongs to the 6th cent. (with a collation of Walton's text), and lies before us further in Ceriani's photo-lithographic reproduction of the codex Ambrosianus of about the same age (Milano, 1876-83, folio). It suffered, of course, some textual corruptions, but on the whole there are no such difficulties as arise in connexion with G and L. The other question whether it was influenced by G must, it seems, be answered in the affirmative. This may have been the case already when the version was made, or at a later though very early and only partial revision. The former view seems the more probable (see Ryssel, p. 253). It is a drawback for our purposes that S is rather a paraphrase than a version; nevertheless, the great progress made in the explanation of Sirach by Margoliouth-Edersheim depends on the use made especially of S for the corroboration or correction of G and the restoration of the original Hebrew. These two texts were, so to speak, our Röntgen apparatus, enabling us to see the Hebrew text underlying them.

ix. THE HEBREW TEXTS.—Especially among those who knew the precarious state of the present Greek, Latin, and Syriac texts of Sirach, the surprise and joy were great when the news spread that a fragment of the original Hebrew text had been discovered, and when, after its publication, more and more parts of a Hebrew Sirach came to light, of which in the Church at least, since the days of Jerome, nobody had heard or seen anything, while even among the Jews few scattered quotations had survived, partially in Hebrew and partially in Aramaic (see their collection in C-N). It is impossible to notice all that has been published on these finds. Suffice it to say that after the first private communication (see above, p. 538*) the first public announcement appeared in the Academy of 16th May 1896. (1) The first publication of the text was in the Expositor, July 1896, 1-15 (see on it D. S. Margoliouth in the same periodical, Aug., 140-157); (2) then came nine leaves, which had found their way into the Bodleian Library, published by Cowley and Neubauer, 1897, and re-published by R. Smend (Abhandlungen der K. Ges. der Wiss. zu Göttingen, N. F. ii. 2); after this (3) the chief publication of Taylor-Schechter (Camb. 1899), containing, besides fourteen pages from the first MS (now called B), eight pages from a new MS, now called A; (4) in the Jewish Quarterly Review for Oct. 1899, G. Margoliouth gave four pages from MS B, acquired by the British Museum; (5) I. Lévi published in the Revue des Études Juives for Janvier-Mars, 1900, two pages from a third MS (C) and two from a fourth MS (D), both in the library of the Consistoire Israélite at Paris. The JQR for April 1900, finally, gave four pages of MS A published by E. N. Adler and four of MS C by S. Schechter (6, 7), and (8) in the number for July 1900 (p. 688 ff.) two pages of C belonging to M. Gaster. All the publications were at last brought together most conveniently—if it may be called convenient to study torn and faded leaves of Hebrew MSS—in a splendid publication, Facsimiles of the Fragments hitherto recovered of the Book of Ecclesiasticus in Hebrew (Oxford and Cambridge, MDCCCCI, 60 plates in case).^{*} C, it should be added, consists only of excerpts (see p. 548^b).

But in the meantime—between the second and third publications—there had suddenly fallen a bitter drop into the general joy. D. S. Margoliouth, who had published in 1890 as his Inaugural Lecture an Essay on the place of Ecclesiasticus in Semitic Literature, and before that time had contributed largely to the commentary of Edersheim, declared in a paper on The Origin of the 'Original

* With 'New York, Frowde, 5 dollars,' mentioned by W. Muss-Arnolt in the Theol. and Sem. Lit. for 1900, p. 32.

Hebrew' of Ecclesiasticus (Parker, 1899, 20 pp.), that the newly-discovered Hebrew was not the original, but a retranslation; a certain reading, 43¹³, appeared to him to be a translation of a corruption of a Persian translation of a corrupt reading in the Greek, the work of a Jew, whose native language was Arabic, about the 10th cent. He closed his paper with the remark that 'Mrs. Lewis by her precious discovery has hit biblical criticism harder than it was ever hit before, or is ever likely to be hit again. For, the next time we proceed to parcel out Isaiah, will not our very street boys call out to us, "You who misdate by 1300 years a document before you, what do you know of the dates of the Prophecies and Psalms?"'

Startling even as this was, a similar verdict was pronounced by such a scholar as Bickell, who in earlier years had discovered under the Greek disguise that the closing chapter must have been an alphabetical poem ('Ein alphabetisches Lied Jesus Sirach's. Nachgewiesen von G. B.' in Z. f. kath. Theologie, vi. 319-333), and had tried to restore the very metres of the Hebrew ('Die Strophik des Ecclesiasticus' in Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes, 1892, 87-96). Bickell published his view in a short paper on this alphabetical poem ('Der hebräische Sirachtext eine Rückübersetzung,' ib. 1899, 251-256). Other scholars took up the challenge of Prof. Margoliouth—among them Th. Nöldeke ('Bemerkungen zum hebräischen Ben Sirā' in ZATW xx. [1900] 81-94); Smend (ThLZ, 1899, col. 506); M. D. Gibson (The Record, June 23, 1899, p. 641); Ed. König in a series of papers in the Expos. Times, 1900, and separately (see Literature, 6, at end of present art.) and in other periodicals; see Muss-Arnolt, p. 33.

Fortunately, the new documents which came to light afterwards enable us to place our judgment on a broader basis. The four MSS seem to be all of about the same age, the 11th cent. D is apparently the oldest of them, but even on C Adler remarked: 'From a comparison of paper and character with my earliest fragment from the Genizah, dated 832, there is nothing to induce one to assume that its date is later.' Some passages of Sirach occur in these four MSS twice, a few even three times. Now if 𐤀—to use this symbol for the Hebrew texts—were the original, the MSS of 𐤀 must agree,—apart, of course, from such transcriptional variations as are common to the transmission of works before the invention of Gutenberg,—according to the rule laid down by Jerome on the Latin texts of the Gospels as compared with the Greek, verum non esse quod variat. But what do we find? One of the first verses now lying before us in two MSS of 𐤀 is 4³⁰—

וְכִלְיֵי הַבָּיִת יִשְׁתַּחֲוּ לְפָנֶיךָ.

𐤀 Noli esse sicut leo in domo tua;
everterns domesticos tuos et opprimens subiectos tibi.

וְתִתֵּן הַחַיִּל בְּעֵבְרֶיךָ

'be not a dog in thy house, and rebuking and fearful in thy works.'

Nobody doubted that 'אֶשֶׁ לְעוֹן' and 'a dog' went back to an original לֵבָב, read לֵבָב by 𐤀, and that 'as a lion' was right. Again, in the second member it appeared necessary to seek a common Hebrew equivalent for ἐκτασσομένων on the one hand, and 'rebuking and fearful' on the other; further, for 'slaves' and 'works.' The latter was, so it seemed, found easily: עֲבָדִים, from עָבַד, would = 'slaves,' from עָבַד (Ec 91) = 'works'; the other was more difficult to guess, because ἐκτασσομένων is a hapax legomenon in the Greek Bible, and a rare word, with doubtful meaning; some good examples of it from Ecclesiastical authors may be found in the edition of Hoeschel.*

And now for the texts of 𐤀—

A אֶל תְּהִי כְלָב בְּבֵית
וְסוֹד וְחִדְרָא בְּמִלְאֲכֶךָ

C אֶל תְּהִי כְאֶרֶב בְּבֵית
וְתַחֲסוּ עַל עֲבוֹרֶיךָ

i.e. A 'be not like a dog in thy house, and [—?] and fearful in thy labour.'
C 'be not like a strong lion† in thy house, and raging over thy works.'

Can there be any doubt that A agrees with S and C with 𐤀? Compare especially the second clause, where S has two words, A has also two, S C for one word of 𐤀 has one word. What is more natural than the conclusion that A and C are not the original, but dependent upon S and 𐤀, retranslations, as Margoliouth affirmed of B? But we must not be too rash: we ask, How would a late Jewish translator hit upon סוֹד to render so obscure a word as ἐκτασσομένων? סוֹד is rare in biblical Hebrew (Gn 49⁴, Jer 23³²); it suits the context very well; it might be easily confounded with פֶּחַד 'fear,' and thus explain the rendering of S, and it is a favourite word with Sirach (see 𐤀 8³ 19² 41¹⁷ ms. 42¹⁰ ms., S 19² 23⁴ 6. 16. 17); it may therefore have preserved the original. This supposition gains probability from a comparison of Zeph 3⁴ 'her princes are lions in her midst . . . her prophets are פֶּחַד,' where the two words stand together just as here in clause a and b. Schechter has shown that the whole text of 𐤀 is full of allusions to the OT (cf. p. 548^b: 11³⁰ a reminiscence of Gn 42²). These are used, of course, also by pious Jews of later times; but when the grandson testifies in his prologue that his grandfather 'having given himself to the reading of the Law and the Prophets and the other books of our fathers, and having gained great familiarity therein, was drawn on also himself to write somewhat pertaining to instruction and wisdom,' why should we hesitate to consider those characteristics as belonging to the original?

Take the next verse which lies before us in two MSS of 𐤀—

43¹ 𐤀 *מִן לִשְׁתִּי הָיָה יָדְךָ שׁוּ עֲבָדֶיךָ
וְכִלְיֵי הַבָּיִת יִשְׁתַּחֲוּ לְפָנֶיךָ*

S לֹא תִהְיֶה כְּלֵב בְּבֵית
וְתִתֵּן הַחַיִּל בְּעֵבְרֶיךָ

* In the Thesaurus of Stephanus-Hase 'Ecol 4' and 'Sir 43¹' are quoted as different passages! The wrong form ἐκτασσομένων is translated suspiciat by Grotius. Nobilius gives arreplicus; even Ryssel translates as if it came from ἐκτασσομένων, 'Gespensereher, i.e. argwöhnisch, misstrauisch ohne thatsächlichen Grund. AV 'frantick' (see vol. ii, 66), RV 'fanciful'; Frankel translated אֶבְרָהָם 'cruel' (for 'lion' רֶשֶׁת; פֶּחַד, קִיטָאִי; 'boisterously rebukeful' (whether influenced by 𐤀? or reading עוֹרֵה); on the Coptic see Herkenne, who thought for 𐤀 of some word from 𐤀 (Job 41³), for 𐤀 of 𐤀 (Is 10³⁴), and adduced from the Apophthegmata Antonii et Maximi, p. 602 ('morosus') ἐν τοῖς οἴοις σου καὶ ταπεινὸν τοὺς ὑποτασσόμενους σου (= 𐤀).
† The Hebrew word is different from עָבַד.

† Or slaves, if we derive עֲבָדֶיךָ from עָבַד (Job 13), as suggested to the present writer by Dr. Driver, and independently to the editor by Dr. A. B. Davidson.

§ The first of them כְּלֵב is not clear; see C-N and R (SK, 1900, 378); the latter compares Ps 69⁹. We suspect a corruption of עָבַד = עָבַד, see Expos. Times, xi. 336 note; for כְּלֵב R proposes כְּתֵב or כְּתִיב 'zuwartend, langsam'!

|| The passage is discussed with a different result by Taylor (JThSt, i. 576). He considers אֶרֶץ argel and מִלְחָמָה milhamah to be the original; 𐤀 may have turned the latter into כְּלֵב; the synonymous כְּלֵב with a clerical error accounts for כְּלֵב C. The first two suppositions are natural, but when, where, and why should כְּלֵב have been turned into כְּלֵב, so as to arrive at כְּלֵב?

p agrees in the first clause completely with S, in the second it has

Now take A and C—

|---|-----------------------|
| A | אל חתי ירך פתחה לקחת |
| | קפסאה בחד סתן |
| C | אל חתי ירך כושמת לשאת |
| | ובעת השב קפדה |

that is to say: instead of a common original we have two versions differing more from one another than the two Syriac, every word for which there is more than one Hebrew equivalent available being rendered differently—

|-------------|---------------|
| stretch out | √ שטח and פתח |
| receive | נשא and לקח |
| in | בנה and כחף |
| give (back) | השיב and נתן |
| shut | קפח and קפד |

A third passage is—

|------------------|-------------------------------|
| 5 ^b S | καὶ μὴ πορεύου ἐν πάσῃ ἀτραπῷ |
| S | וכחפא לכל שביל |
| A | תנה ררך שכולת |
| C | ואל חלך לכל שביל |

A is translated by Taylor, 'and turning the way of the stream,' C agrees with S.

Further, v. 11—

|---|----------------------|
| A | ובארץ רוח השב פתחם |
| C | ובארץ ענה תענה נכונה |

C=S with the addition δρθήν, which is found only in 248, 253 and p sub *

V. 12 S εὐλαλῶ
S ביר סן רססלל 'through him that is speaking.'

|----------------------|----------------------------|
| A | ביר בוסא |
| C | ביר בוסה |
| V. 13 ^b S | ἡ πτωχὸς ἀδύων |
| S | רמא להן 'throws them down' |
| A | ספלו |
| C | ספליסו |

(C being, of course, a corruption of A).

|------------------|------------------|
| 7 ^a S | δώρησαι αὐτήν |
| S | הביה give her |
| A | חברה join her |
| C | וכרה grant her.* |

What follows from these passages? That the question is a very complicated one. Not even of C is it possible to say that it is a simple retranslation of S, for even in C there are passages which are at variance with S. On the other hand, it is equally impossible to maintain that S has preserved everywhere the original, independent of S and C. There are passages in S which cannot be explained in any other way than by the supposition that they rest on a corrupt and glossed text, sometimes of S, sometimes of C.

A passage which, for the present writer at least, is perfectly convincing is—25¹⁷. 'The wickedness of a woman . . . darkeneth her countenance like sackcloth,' AV (mg. 'Or, like a bear'), RV as a bear doeth (without even mentioning the other reading).

* 7^a AC עקס עקס, והוא בת רצא, S καὶ ἡ τριτάτη ἐργον μέγα, S ונפוק עשוקא, AC עקס עקס; 'and the trouble (or strife, see S-T p. 47) has gone'; cf. the witty though rude saying of Schopenhauer at the death of an old woman whom he had to care for: obit anus, abit onus. It is clear that here C cannot rest on S.

S B, etc. ὡς σάκκος; S AS, etc. ὡς ἄρκος.

S combining both readings: tanquam ursu. et quasi saccum.

S . . . 'makes pale the face of her husband and makes it black like the colour of a sack'; * now C has חתן כחף 'makes black (his or her; the letters are torn away) face . . . to a bear.'

All rules of textual criticism (the general one: scriptio proclivi praestat ardua, and the special one for Sirach, the agreement between S and C) must be nought, or C is here the retranslation of a corrupt Greek text.

The close connexion of C with S is corroborated by other passages. The very first words preserved in C—it begins 4^a (אח הכהן) קפחן, for which A has the synonymous חסן—do not occur, it is true, in the received Greek text, but in the MSS 106, 248, 253 (c); C even preserved such glosses (mentioned above, p. 544*) as 5¹¹ γινου τυχός (C נתן=?) ἐν ἀκροῶσι σου + ἀγαθὴν (C טובה=106, 248, 253 p), καὶ ἐν μακροθυμίᾳ φθέρῃ γένος + ἀπὸ κρισην + δρθήν (C נכונה=248, 253 p*).

Again, all rules of textual criticism are nought if such additions be not glosses, and glosses added to the Greek, not to the original Hebrew text; and yet they occur in C. S, therefore, is dependent—partially at least—on a glossed text of S, as it is represented by 248, 253.

It is to be hoped that scholars will agree in this, and they may do so the more because this concession does not decide the question for the other MSS ABD, nor even for the whole content of C; C being an exception also in this respect, that it does not give a continuous text, but mere excerpts from chs. 4²²–7²² 18³¹–20⁷; then come suddenly 37¹⁹, 22, 24, 26, followed by 20¹³, and, finally, 25⁸–26³.

If S is chiefly dependent on S, there abound in the other MSS S^{ABD} traces of the influence of S, especially in so-called doublets, passages appearing twice. Cf. 11²¹—

In S we have two lines—

Πέρδιξ θηρευτῆς ἐν καρτίλλῃ, οὕτως καρδία ὑπερηφάνου καὶ ὡς κατάσκοπος ἐπιβλέπει πτωχῶν.

In S three—

sicut perdis inducitur in caveam (v.l. foveam)
'et ut caprea in laqueo, sic et cor superbiorum et sicut prospector videns casum proximi sui.

In S five—like a partridge caught in a cage is the heart of the proud, and like a spy who looks on the fall;

How many are the iniquities of the ungodly!
[cf. S v. 29]
like a dog which enters into every house and robs, so enters the ungodly into every house and disturbs.

In S six or more—

As a bird caught in a cage so is the heart of a proud man;
As a wolf that lieth in wait to tear.
How many are the iniquities of the covetous man!
As a dog is he among those that eat in the house.

* It is difficult to understand how Bickell, Zöckler, Ryssel, RV could prefer the bear, which crept in from the mentioning of lion and dragon in the context; S being independent of S decides for the sack; and then compare parallels like Rev 6¹², but especially 1 Clem. ad Cor. 8, αἱ ἀμαρτίαι ὡς ὕδωρ . . . μέλας γίνονται σαπκάν; see on these variants Nestle, Marginalien, p. 51.

† It is owing to this insertion that we have these fragments three times in B, C, D, with slight variations.

He doeth violence to all . . .
The covetous man cometh and maketh strife in all their goods;
The tale-bearer lieth in wait as a bear for the house of the scornors;
And as a spy he seeth nakedness.

On the two lines of Gr Bochart has written a whole chapter in his Hierozoicum. More than one article would be necessary on the correspondence between κατασκοπος (and its equivalents וִּשְׁמוֹן = וִּשְׁמוֹן = וִּשְׁמוֹן) and the other equivalents. It seems clear that the dog כלב owes its existence to the καταλλος = כלב.

On the arguments adduced by Margoliouth from the Persian we must refer to Nöldeke (ZATW 1900, p. 94); on the question raised by Margoliouth, whether the Sepher ha-paluy, which betrays knowledge of the Cairene texts, is by Saadia or not; and on the age of the Talmudic quotations from Ben-Sira, cf. the papers of Margoliouth on the one hand, and König, Schechter, Abrahams, Bacher, Harkavy, etc., on the other (see Literature).

But that even in C fragments of the original are preserved, see above on 7²⁰. What Jew of later times, who had nothing before him except Gr, ἐκδοῦ θυγατέρα καὶ ἔσθ' τετελεσμένον μέγα ἔργον, could have hit on פֶּה נָחָם? Even with the help of S it would have been difficult to arrive at this text. But there are passages where H offers readings different alike from Gr and S.

A good example occurs in the very first leaf discovered of H, 40¹⁸—

Gr ζῶν αὐτάρκους ἐργάτου γλυκανθήσεται
καὶ ὑπερ ἀμφοτέρω εὐρίσκων θησαυρὸν.

The very context shows that Gr is wrong; instead of the one member αὐτάρκους ἐργάτου there must have been two. Grotius, Grabe, Fritzsche, AV, RV, inserted καὶ and spoiled the sense; for the life of the αὐτάρκους is sweet (ipse suis pollens opibus, Lucretius), but not that of the working man. S gave no help; for the first member is wanting. What a pleasure, then, to read in H— a life of wine and strong drink is sweet; cf. the same pair in v.¹⁰ in H, where Gr had οἶνος καὶ μουσικὰ = וִּין וְשִׁכָר, and S קָחָה חֶמֶד 'old wine.' And what a surprise to find on the margin an additional (though wrong) reading: חַיִּי יִין (C-N = 'that excels in prudence'; but יִין perhaps = αὐτάρκους). The grandson mistook שִׁכָר 'strong drink' for שִׁכָר 'hired worker.'* What a surprise, again, to find the whole margin of this leaf covered with various readings, spellings, notes—one in Persian referring to a different MS.

V.²⁰, where we had read in Gr that 'better than wine and music is the love of wisdom,' in S 'better than old wine the love of a friend,' we now find that the grandfather had written, 'Wine and strong drink make the heart exult, but the love of lovers (דוֹרִים) is above them all.'

Surely it is not going too far to say that with the finding of these texts a new period begins in the history of our book. Where we hitherto were hid (7²³) to bow down the neck of our children from their youth (κάμψαι τὸν πρᾶχλον αὐτῶν—but τὸν πρᾶχλον αὐτῶν is correctly omitted by L and Clemens Alexandrinus (i. 186, 2, ed. Dind.),—we are now advised to marry them early (S HAC = confusion between πρ and πρ).

It is neither possible nor necessary to go on multiplying examples of this kind. A great field

* Bacher, Ryssel, Smend are not satisfied with 'wine and strong drink.' Bacher, comparing Ex 5¹¹, wishes to read שִׁכָר 'who can sleep and has work'; Ryssel with Smend, יִין 'who has plenty, and has paying work.'

waits for patient workers. The task for future editors of Sirach will be to compare most carefully—(1) the witnesses for Gr (MSS,* Versions, Quotations†); (2) the witnesses for S—on the whole, an easy task; (3) the witnesses for H ABCD; and the quotations to be compared with each other, where there is more than one, then with Gr & S. The text, in translation, would have to be given in parallel columns: in the middle what is common to all, at the right and the left the variations, at the bottom would be shown how the variations originated.

On the language of H see in C-N p. xxxi ff. the 'Glossary of Words not found in the Hebrew of the OT, or found in it only in the passages quoted or referred to'; and cf. Nöldeke (ZATW, 1900, p. 94), who was at first in favour of the Oxf. Heb. Lex. beginning to take notice of Ben Sira, but afterwards thought it a safer course that his words should be gathered into an Appendix. The Concordance to the Septuagint by Hatch-Redpath promises for the second part of the Supplement 'A Short Concordance showing the Hebrew equivalents to the Greek in the lately discovered fragments of Ecclesiasticus.' This will be very welcome. To learn what interesting questions are raised, see, for instance, 10¹⁰ סִכְרָא = μικρὸν ἀριστήριον; 18²² (C) תַּעֲנֵת = μικρὸν; 37¹⁸ (C) גִּן 48²²; 5¹¹ (see I. Löw, 'Marginalien zu Kohut's Aruch' in Semitic Studies in Memory of A. Kohut, p. 374); 50²⁷ מִבְּנֵי 50⁹ and Pr 25². The similarity to the language of the 'Psalms,' the late Jewish hymn-writers, seems to militate against the originality of H; but even Schechter cannot deny it: 'If he thought like a Rabbi, he wrote like a Paltan' (cf. Toy in Encyc. Bibl. p. 1167 f.; D. Strauss, Sprachl. Stud. zu den heb. Sirachfragmenten, Zürich, 1900; W. Bacher, Die älteste Talmud. der jud. Schriftauslegung, Leipzig, 1890, p. 207).

x. CONTENTS AND THEOLOGY.—1. It is clear that in many details our views about the contents of the book must be revised since the recent finds; but on the whole the standpoint of the book has been correctly estimated. It has been considered as the chief monument of primitive Sadduceism, and this found corroboration in an unexpected way.

C. Taylor wrote (1877) in the first edition of the Sayings of the Jewish Fathers: 'It has been suggested, with a certain plausibility, that the Book Ecclesi. approximates to the standpoint of the primitive Qadumim as regards its theology, its sacerdotalism, and its want of sympathy with the modern Soferim. The name of Ezra is significantly omitted from its Catalogue of Worthies.' At the same time he called attention to the fact that the Book of the Sadducees and the Book of Ben Sira are placed side by side on the 'Index Expurgatorius' (Sanh. 100b). It must have been gratifying to be able to publish twenty years later, at the end of the Hebrew Ben Sira, a hymn not to be found in the earlier texts, which ends with praise of the Sons of Sadok. See S-T p. 41, the hymn (after ch. 50¹²)—

'O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good;
For his mercy endureth for ever.'

O give thanks unto him that maketh to bud a horn for the house of David;

For his mercy endureth for ever.

O give thanks unto him that chose the sons of Sadok to be priests;

For his mercy endureth for ever.'

* Special attention is due, amongst these, to those of the longer recension, called 'Alexandrian' by Ryssel; cf. A. Schlatter, Das neugefundene hebräische Stück des Sirach. Der Glossator des griechischen Sirach und seine Stellung in der Geschichte der jüdischen Theologie, Göttersloh, 1897 (= 'Beiträge zur Förderung christlicher Theologie,' i. 5, 6). On the passage 26^{18a}, especially 'the tower of death' (= 2 Mac 13⁵; Valerius Maximus, ix. 2), see Nestle, Marginalien, p. 52.

† On the quotations of Clement see esp. O. Stählin, Clemens Alexandrinus und die Septuaginta (Nürnberg, 1901, Progr.), pp. 46-58; note in 18²² μικρὸν.

‡ μακρὸν ἀρρ. all Greek MSS; most ἐκείνου, four κατὰ or ἐκείνου, one ἐκείνου; instead of κατὰ: Hitzig and the corrector of S κατὰ; AV 'The physician cutteth off a long disease'; RV 'It is a long disease, the physician mocketh'; L, combining both readings, 'Languor prolixior gravat medicum; brevem languorem praecidit medicus'; S, 'and his bowels the physician tears' (נָחָם); but, with Herkenne, we may perhaps read נָחָם (= ἐκείνου). Adler's translation of H ('of course quite tentative') is, 'A trace of disease that maketh the physician serene' (נָחָם). It seems best to combine the translation of Hitzig with the reading μακρὸν: 'A little disease baffles the physician.'

2. Among former descriptions of its contents see especially T. K. Cheyne, Job and Solomon, or The Wisdom of the OT, 1887, pp. 179-198, 247 (ch. i.: The wise man turned Scribe—Sirach's moral teaching; ch. ii.: his place in the movement of thought); then the Introduction of Edersheim, and now the article of C. H. Toy (Encyc. Bibl. 1164-1179).

3. In its form and substance the book is a fine example of Hebrew Hokmah-literature, with its lights and shadows. It is no longer the prophet that speaks in it, neither the prophetic speaker of earlier times, nor even the prophetic writer like Ezekiel or Malachi; nor is it a poet like the author of Job; on the other hand, the Rabbi of the Talmud has not yet taken their place; there is scarcely a trace of Haggadah and Halachah in the book. The author is full of respect for the religious literature of the past; he knows himself to be an epigone, but nevertheless he dares to give something of his own. He does not preach as yet from given texts (33¹⁸ 'I awaked up last of all, as one that gathereth after the grape-gatherers; by the blessing of the Lord I profited (got ahead) and filled my winepress like a gatherer of grapes'; cf. also the Prologue). What he has to give is Hokmah, Wisdom, an outcome of that Divine Wisdom which is from the Lord, and is with Him for ever, but given by Him to them that fear Him, especially among His chosen people Israel (17^{17a}, 24^{17a}). But the author does not dwell long in those lofty regions, but turns himself to the wisdom of daily life, giving counsels for all kinds of emergencies, and communicating his observations on men and women, rich and poor, high and low.

4. The book has not received, apparently, its final shape; its contents at least are so varied and loosely arranged that it is difficult to give a table of contents.

See the headings, which are partially preserved in the book itself, in the Greek text from 1530 onwards (ἡ χαρακτὴρ τοῦ βιβλίου; 20¹⁷ λόγοι παραβολῶν; 23¹⁷ παιδεία στοματικῆς; 24¹⁷ αἰνέσις σοφίας; 30¹⁷ περί τιτιανῶν; 16¹⁷ περί βρωμάτων; 44¹⁷ Περὶ τῶν ὕμνων; 51¹⁷ Προεὐχὴ Ἰησοῦ υἱοῦ Σιραχ); the capitulations placed before the book in ancient Greek and Latin texts; the Synopsis of pseudo-Chrysostom; the headings of the AV, which are dropped instead of revised in the RV; careful superscriptions in the German translation of Ryssel; the attempts in the Comm. to find out a plan of the book.

But it would be a pleasant task to give more than a sketch of its moral and religious teachings.

(a) The author's idea of God shows an interesting combination of Jewish piety and Greek philosophy, the former decidedly predominating. What Edersheim considered, on account of its pantheistic ring, as a bold later addition of the younger Siracide, namely 43²⁷ 'We may speak much and yet come short: wherefore in sum he is all' (τὸ πᾶν ἐστὶν αὐτός), is found in II, and means nothing more than that God is to be found in all His work; it does not deny His unity or personality, which is emphasized by the new reading in II 42¹ 'he is one from everlasting' (ἐξ instead of ἑως or ὡς or ὅς). God is the absolute Lord, the righteous judge, the wise ruler, rich in forbearance, though the full conception of Divine fatherhood finds no expression (18^{10, 11}).

(b) Of angels and demons there is scarcely any mention, quite in agreement with the Sadducean standpoint; the central idea is the personified Wisdom, which is seen in nature and history, especially in the history of Israel, first of all in the Law. The prominence given to the Law, both its moral and ritual parts, is one of the features which distinguish Ben Sirā from Proverbs, leading over to the later Rabbinism. But from the latter our author is far removed, especially in his attitude towards the heathen world. He does not despise it, like the Pharisees, nor does he expect any special manifestation of Jahweh for the benefit of His people or the conversion of the nations. As regards the individual, he speaks neither of the resurrection of the body nor of the immortality of the soul—ἀθανασία occurs only in the glossed text 19¹⁰ γυνῶσις ἐντολῶν κυρίου παιδεία ζωῆς, οἱ δὲ ποιῶντες τὰ ἀρεστὰ αὐτῆς ἀθανασίας δένδρον καρποῦνται; see on this point especially Schlatter, pp. 110, 176;—of death and Sheol he thinks like the psalmists.

5. A much larger space is taken up in the book by the ethical and social teachings. Through their pointed form many of Ben Sirā's sayings have remained popular. Much, of course, is to be taken cum grano salis; to guard against misunderstanding, the glosses have been added in MSS like 248, 253. The author is 'generally acute, sometimes a little cynical, never pessimistic' (Toy, l.c. 1178). Most unfavourable is his judgment on the female sex (25^{18a}); friendly is that on physicians (ch. 38); he does not despise wine and music. A great rôle is played by money matters and trade; but almsgiving is the chief part of righteousness, and readiness to forgive is a primary condition of obtaining Divine forgiveness. In some of his precepts he comes near to those of the gospel; the Golden Rule, however, does not occur. No wonder that this book was used in the Church, especially for instruction of the young, almost like a catechism of morals and religion (85th Can. Apost.), and that Augustine embodied so many of its sayings in his Speculum. In modern times one of the few attempts made in England to employ its teaching for religious instruction is the small selection published by E. J. Edwards, School Lessons from Ecclesiasticus (1853). It is to be hoped that, when the critical questions about the book are settled, it may gain in popularity.

NOTE.—USE OF THE BOOK IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—CL. Daubney, The Use of the Apoc. in the Christian Church (London, 1900). For the use of Sirach in NT, he compares about 20 passages, e.g. Mt 614 with 283, 619 with 2912, 1097 with 3294. On Lk 117 Bengel quoted 4310 and remarked: 'Minime proletarium esse Siracide librum, convenientia eius cum angeli sermone docet.' For the Epistle of James, J. B. Mayor (1897) collected thirty-two resemblances to Sirach. The question whether St. Paul did not quote from the Hebrew Sirach in 1 Co 1540 has been raised by Müller ('zum Sirachproblem,' in the Orientalistische Literaturzeitung, June 1900).

Early Christian writers made such extensive use of Wisdom, Sirach, and Baruch that they appear more familiar with them than with several books of the NT. Allusions to Sirach may be discovered in Polycarp, i. (929. 30); Didache, iv. 5 (431); undoubted quotations from Sirach occur in Barnabas, Tertullian, etc.; Eusebius introduces a quotation from 329 by the formula: διδάσκαλος χρίσματος παραγγέλλεται ἡ δὲ διδασκαλία (Dem. Ev. i. i.). On the use made of Sirach in the Roman Church (Breviary and Missal) see W. Schenz, Einführung in die kanonischen Bücher des alten Testaments (Regensburg, 1887, 409). In Britain, Alfred († 1005) seems to have been the first writer to make any investigations touching the Canon, especially the two books Wisd. and Sirach, 'placed with Solomon's works as if he made them; which for likeness of style and profitable use have gone for his; but Jesus the Son of Sirach composed them . . . very large books and read in the church, of long custom, for much good instruction.' In the Prayer-Book of 1549 there were 118 daily lessons from the Apocrypha; that of 1562 had 110, that of 1558 had 125. On the use of Sirach in the 'Homilies' see Daubney, p. 67; on that made by English divines, p. 71 ff. To Archbishop Whitgift († 1604), who declared the Apocrypha 'Parte of the Bible,' and gave command for them to be bound up with the Bible, Drusus dedicated his edition of Sirach (1596).

LITERATURE.—Only a selection can be given. 1. Commentaries: Camerarius, Drusus, Bretschneider (see p. 543), Grotius (best edition: Hug. Grotii Annotationes in VT, curavit Geo. Jo. Lu. 6. Literature since the discovery of the Hebrew texts: On the publication of the texts by Schechter, Cowley-Neubauer (Smend, Lévi), Schechter-Taylor, G. Margoliouth, I. Lévi, E. N. Adler, Schechter, Gaster, see above, p. 546. The Expository Times, vol. vii., has two, vol. viii. again two references to Sirach (p. 262, a review of Hogg on C-N), vol. ix. one, vol. x. seven, vol. xi. twenty-four such references (by the editor, König, D. S. Margoliouth, S. Schechter, J. A. Selbie, I. Abrahams, Eb. Nestle, C. Taylor, W. Bacher). The record of 'Theological and Semitic Literature for the year 1900,' published by Muss-Arnolt (Chicago, 1900), enumerates thirty papers, published (1900) in twenty-two different periodicals. See also JQR: Adler, Harkavy, D. S. Margoliouth, Lévi, Schechter, Tyler; REJ: Bacher, Chajes, Lambert, Lévi; ZATW: Bacher, Nöldeke; RB: Condamine, Grimme, Touzard. Ed. König, in addition to his papers in the Expository Times, which were published separately in German (Die Originalität des neulich entdeckten Sirachtextes), wrote in four other periodicals. Cf., further, in Muss-Arnolt, pp. 32-34, the names: Buhl, Flournois, Halévy, Houtama, Méchineaux, Noordtzi, Peters, Ryssel (in SK, 1900, 3, 4, 1901, 1, 2, 4, a very careful comparison of SB with G and S, to be continued), Schlögl, Strauss, Wilson, Zenner. B. Baentsch, in Theol. Jahrbuch, for 1900, notes 51 books or papers on Sirach.

Even on the Strophic structure of Sirach several papers have been published by H. Grimme (at first in RB, 1900-1901; then separately, Leipzig, Harrassowitz); by Norbert Peters (Theol. Quartalschrift, 1900, pp. 180-193); by Nivard Schlögl in ZDMG liii. (1899), pp. 639-682, and Ecclesiasticus (3912-4916) ope artis crit. et metr. in formam originalem redactus, Wien, 1901, xxv. 72, 4to.

It will be a long time before all the questions connected with Sirach are settled and a critical edition becomes possible.

SIRAH, THE WELL (בֵּרַת הַסִּירָה; BA τὸ φρέαρ τοῦ Σειράμ, Luc. Σειράμ).—The place at which Joab's messengers overtook Abner and brought him back to Hebron, where he was assassinated by Joab (2 S 3³; Jos. Ant. vii. i. 5, Βησράμ). It lay on the road from Hebron to Jerusalem, and is now probably 'Ain Sârah, near Hebron, the 'spring' (ain) having taken the place of the 'well' (bêr). The spring flows from a spout into a small tank, and stands back from the road in a little alley with walls of dry stone on either side (PEF Mem. iii. 314).

SIRION (סִרְיֹן in Dt 3⁹; סִרְיֹן MT and Baer, but Mich. סִרְיֹן, in Ps 29⁹).—The name said to be given

* Nebuchadnezzar wishes to know whether Ben Sira is a prophet, and asks of him the number of trees in the royal gardens. Ben Sira answers that there are thirty kinds: of ten the whole fruit may be eaten; of ten the kernel; of ten the outer parts. Löw gives the list, which is found also in the Bundeshes, on the basis of five texts.

† A great work on Sirach by Norbert Peters is advertised for 1902 by Herder of Freiburg.

by the Zidonians to Mt. HERMON, Dt 3⁹ (Σαμῶν). Like SENIR, it may have originally been the designation of a particular part of the mountain. In Ps 29⁹, where Sirion is coupled with Lebanon, the LXX (confusing with יִשְׁרוּן Jeshurun; cf. its rendering in Dt 32¹⁵ 33⁵, Is 44²) reads ὁ ἡρακλέως.

SISERA (סִיסְרָא; Σισάρᾱ, meaning doubtful; cf. Assy., sasur 'progeny,'—Sayce, Hibbert Lects. 373. Ball, Light from the East, s.v., gives the Assy. form sisseru, saseru, 'child.' Moore, Judges, 112, thinks that the name is not Semitic, and compares Hittite names ending in -sira, Ḫtasira, Manrasira, etc.—W. Max Müller, Asien u. Europa, 332).—

1. Jg 4 and 5, 1 S 12⁹, Ps 83⁹. The history of Sisera is told in a poetic (Jg 5) and a prose form (Jg 4). In the main particulars both agree, but they differ considerably on some important points. The Song of Deborah, as being nearer in date to the events recorded, must be treated as the more authentic source. (1) In 4⁴⁻²² Jabin, king of Hazor, is introduced into the history of Sisera. He is not mentioned in ch. 5, he takes no part in the battle, and his city Hazor, if = Merj Hadire (or near it), a little S. of Kedesh and W. of the lake of Huleh, is far away from the scene of the conflict, and brings impossible situations into the narrative. Sisera is throughout the actual and independent leader; his forces are his own (cf. 4¹³ with 4⁹); to slay him is to carry off the honours of the fight (4⁹). This Jabin-tradition is of the same character as the fragments preserved in Jg 1, and forms the basis of the history in Jos 11¹⁻⁹ [JE]. How it came to be combined with the Sisera-tradition is not clear; perhaps because both were concerned with fighting in Upper Palestine, and because the northern tribes and Canaanites were the combatants in both cases.* The combination must be earlier than the work of the redactor (41³, 4b. pag. 14a. 23. 24), who provided the narrative with an introduction and conclusion (vv. 1³, 23¹), and gave Jabin, who is called merely king of Hazor in v. 7, the unhistorical title of 'king of Canaan' (42²⁸). It is noticeable that 1 S 12⁹ and Ps 83⁹ imply the combination of the Jabin- and Sisera-traditions. (2) In order to harmonize these, Sisera had to be made the general of Jabin's army (4², 7); and this must have been done before the redactor dealt with the narrative. (3) The campaign is on a larger scale in ch. 5 than in ch. 4. In the former Sisera appears at the head of a federation of Canaanite kings (5¹⁹), and attacks the six tribes bordering on the Central Plain. In ch. 4 only Naphtali and Zebulun are engaged (v. 6); the mention of these two tribes only and of Kedesh their headquarters (v. 10) was probably an element in the Jabin-story. (4) The scene of the battle in 5¹⁹ is the left bank of the Kishon; this implies that Barak advanced against Sisera from the S.W. and fell upon him from the Carmel range. In 4¹², 14 Barak attacks the Canaanites from Mt. Tabor, and the battle apparently takes place at its foot. (5) The accounts of Sisera's murder present a striking divergence. In ch. 5 Jael, by an ingenious stratagem, kills him with a tent-mallet while he is standing and drinking out of a deep bowl; in ch. 4 she hammers a tent-peg through his temples while he lies asleep in her tent. Some explain this divergence as a prosaic misunderstanding of the parallelism of 5²⁸ (so Wellhausen, Composition 222; Robertson Smith, OTJC 132), but it is more likely to be due to a different tradition. One important detail is preserved in ch. 4 alone—that Sisera's stronghold was Harosheth hag-goyim (42¹³). This place has been plausibly identified with el-Ḥirithiyeh, on the right bank of the Kishon, commanding the road from the Central Plain to the sea. Perhaps 413.16 imply that Haroshieth was at some distance from the battlefield; so the identification cannot be called certain, and the resemblance of the names, though philologically correct, may be accidental (see Buhl, GAP 214). See arts. DEBORAH and JABIN.

* Budde (Richter u. Samuel, 60) thinks that the person of Barak was the link which connected the two, and that tradition ascribed both victories to him (cf. Jos. Ant. v. v. 4).

SISINNES (Σισίννης).—The governor (ἑταρχος) of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia under Darius, and a contemporary of Zerub., 1 Es 6^{2.7.71}. In Ezr 5², etc., he is called TATTENAI, 'the governor (ἑταρ) beyond the river,' i.e. satrap of the whole of Syria west of the Euphrates.

SISMAI (Σισμαί; BA Σοσμαι, Luc. Σασαμει).—A Jerahmeelite, 1 Ch 2⁴⁰.

SISTER.—See FAMILY.

SITH.—The Anglo-Sax. prep. sith (originally an adverb = 'after') with the pron. dam = them, formed siththan 'after that' (= Ger. seitdem). Then siththan was contracted to sithen, which again became sometimes sith and sometimes sin. The adv. suffix s being added to sithen gave middle Eng. sithens, afterwards spelt sithence to keep the s sharp in pronunciation, like pence for pens, dice for dies; and this was contracted to since, the contraction being helped by the form sin. 'Sith' was used as a prep., an adv., or a conjunction. Thus as adv., Wyc. Works, iii. 114, 'Ffyrst they trow in the Ffadyr, for he ys fyrst persone; aftyr they trow in Jesus Crist, be dyvers artyclys; and sytthe they trow in the Holy Gost'; as prep., Knox, Works, iii. 278, 'Transubstantiation, the byrde that the Devel hatched by Pope Nicolas, and sytthe that time fostered and nurysed by al his children'; and as conj., Berner, Froissart, Pref., 'Among all other I read diligently the four volumes or books of sir John Froissart of the country of Hainault, written in the French tongue, which I judged commodious, necessary and profitable to be had in English, sith they treat of the famous acts done in our parts.'

'Sith' occurs in AV 1611 in Jer 15⁷ 23³⁸, Ezk 35⁶, Zec 4¹⁰ marg., 2 Es 7⁵³, and Ro 5^{head}, and 'sithence' in 2 Es 10¹⁴. As early as 1616 'sithence' was changed into 'since,' and 'sith' was in time changed (by Paris or Blayney) into the same mod. form in all places except Ezk 35⁶, Ro 5^{head}. For 'sithence' cf. Lk 20³⁸ Rhem. 'In the resurrection therefore, whose wife shal she be of them? sithens the seven had her to wife.' 'Sith' often occurs in the Psalms in metre, viz. 16⁸ 22⁸ 31⁴ 33²¹ 50¹⁷ (both versions) 73¹⁰ 86³ 109²¹ 119¹⁵, always as a conjunction. J. HASTINGS.

SITHRI (סִיתְרִי; B Σεργελ, A Σεθελ, Luc. Σερτλ).—A grandson of Kohath, Ex 6²² (P).

SITNAH (סִתְנָה; 'enmity'; Ἐχθρία; Inimicitiae).—The second well dug by the servants of Isaac, and for which they strove with the herdmen of Gerar (Gn 26²¹). The name of the well is derived by J from the disputes over its construction. The site is unknown, but it is supposed to have been in the valley of Gerar, though this is not distinctly stated in the narrative. Palmer (PEFS, 1871, p. 35) finds a reminiscence of the name in Shutnet er Ruheibh, a small valley near Ruheibeh (Rehoboth). Riehm (HWB) apparently means the same place, which he calls Wady esh-Shelein.

SIYAN (סִיָּאן).—The third month, according to the later (Babylonian) mode of reckoning. See TIME.

SKILL.—Skill comes from a Scand. root meaning to separate, discern, and means discernment, understanding. The verb to skill, i.e. to discern or understand, has now gone out of use, but occurs in AV in 1 K 5⁶. 'There is not among us any that can skill (so RV, Amer. RV 'knoweth how') to hew timber,' 2 Ch 27⁸ (all 77; to know), and 2 Ch 34¹² 'all that could skill of (Amer. RV 'were skilful with') instruments of musick' (קָנַן to be skilled in, Hiphil of קָנַן to separate, understand). Cf. Milton, Areopag. (Hales' ed. p. 39), 'A wealthy man addicted to his pleasure and to his profits finds Religion to be a traffick so entangl'd and of so many piddling accounts, that of all mysteries he cannot skill to keep a stock going upon that trade'; Elyot, Governour, ii. 181, 'Whether he be a gentyll man or yoman, a ryche man or a poore, if he sitte nat suerly and can skill of ridyng, the horse casteth him quickly'; and Lk 12²⁸ Tind. 'Ypocrites, ye can skylle of the fasson of the erth and of the skye.'

SLANDER or EVIL-SPEAKING (noun סָוֵן, from [סָוַן] 'glide'; verbs [סָוַן], lit. 'use the tongue'; סָוַן, lit. 'slink about,' and other roots. Greek βλασφημέω, 'speak injuriously'; adj. and subst. βλάσφημος; subst. βλασφημία; διαβάλλω, 'throw over,' 'slander'; διάβολος, adj., and subst. ὁ διάβολος = ὁ ἄνθρωπος).—This sin, of which the tongue is the organ (Pr 18²¹, Ja 3⁸), springs from the heart, as the seat of inner life (Mt 12³⁴ 35 15¹⁸, Mk 7²¹, Lk 6⁴⁵). As a rule, its mental feature is falsehood (Pr 10¹⁸ 12¹⁷ 14^{5.22}) and its emotional hate (1 P 2¹); but even truth may be circulated from motives of malice, and falsehood may be told simply from a perverse pleasure in lying. Hence all tale-bearing, whether false and ill-tempered or not, is blameworthy and injurious (Lv 19¹⁶, Pr 11¹³ 26²⁰ 18⁵, Ezk 22⁹). Against slander and evil-speaking, from which arises much strife (Pr 16²⁷⁻³⁰ 30¹⁰), warnings abound in the OT (Ps 34¹³, Pr 15³³ 30³² 24²⁸) as in the NT (Eph 4³¹, Col 3⁸, Ja 4¹¹, 1 P 3¹⁰), and threats of punishment are not wanting, alike from God (Ps 50¹⁹⁻²² 109³⁰ 140¹¹, Pr 8¹³ 21³⁸) and from man (Ps 101⁵, Pr 19⁶; cf. Ro 3⁸). Slander is a sign of moral corruption (Jer 6²⁸ 9⁴, 2 Ti 3³). As angels abstain from all reviling (2 P 2¹¹, Jude 8), so proneness to slander is regarded as disqualifying for citizenship in the Hebrew commonwealth (Ps 15³ 24⁴) and for membership or office in the Christian Church (Tit 2³, 1 Ti 3¹¹). Instances of slander are recorded (2 S 19²⁷, Dn 3⁸, Neh 6¹³, Ezr 4⁸) against persons, and even against a land (Nu 13³² 14³⁸). Among other forms of persecution to which the pious in Israel were exposed was slander (Ps 31¹³ 41⁵ 27¹³ 35¹¹, Jer 20¹⁰), from which also the members of the Christian Church (1 P 2¹² 4⁴), and especially the apostles, suffered (Ac 19²⁴ 28², 2 Co 6⁸), even as Christ Himself did (Lk 2³⁴, Mk 9³⁰, Mt 11¹⁹), and as He foretold that they would (Mt 5¹¹, Lk 6²²). Christians are warned to give no occasion for it (Tit 2³ 3², 1 P 3¹⁶), as thereby they may bring discredit on the gospel and the Church (Ro 14¹⁶; cf. Ro 2²⁴, 2 P 2², Tit 2¹, 1 Ti 6¹). Among charges later brought against them falsely were cannibalism, incest, atheism, hatred of human race, licentious orgies. When suffering from such slander innocently, they are urged to bear with patience (1 P 3⁹; cf. 1 Co 4¹²) even as Christ did (1 P 2²²; cf. Mt 27³⁰, Mk 15³², Jn 9³⁰), and even to rejoice therein (1 P 4¹⁴).

False witness is but slander carried into a court of justice, and against this sin the ninth commandment is directed (Ex 20¹⁶; cf. 23¹, Dt 5²⁰). Its prevalence in the East (Ezr 4⁹, Lk 3¹⁴ 19⁹) necessitated great severity in punishing it, and in the Pentateuch the law of retaliation is literally enforced regarding it (Dt 19¹⁶⁻¹⁹). To avoid miscarriage of justice, the testimony of one person was not accepted as sufficient by the Jewish law (Nu 35²⁰, Dt 17⁶ 19¹⁵), and this rule was adopted in the Christian Church (2 Co 13¹, 1 Ti 5¹⁹; cf. Mt 18¹⁶). When the charge involved a death sentence, the witnesses had to be first in carrying it out (Dt 17⁷; cf. Ac 7⁵⁸). Yet false witnesses could be found (Dn 6²⁴, 1 K 21¹⁰), as against Jesus (Mt 26^{59, 60}, Mk 14⁵⁶⁻⁵⁷), Stephen (Ac 6¹³), and Paul (Ac 24¹³).

The heinousness of slander is shown by the use of the same Gr. word in NT for sins of speech against God and man (Mt 27³⁹, Lk 23³⁰ 22⁶⁶, Ac 13⁴⁰ 18⁶ 26¹¹, 1 Ti 1²⁰, Tit 3², Ja 2⁷); by our Lord's warning about the unpardonable sin (Mt 12³¹, Mk 3²⁸, Lk 12¹⁰); and by the name ὁ διάβολος, given to the spirit of evil, who is represented as playing the part of slanderer against Job (Job 1⁹⁻¹¹), Joshua the high priest (Zec 3¹), and Christians (Rev 12¹⁰).

SLAVE, SLAVERY.—See SERVANT.

SLAYONIC VERSIONS.—See VERSIONS.

SLEIGHT.—Eph 4¹⁴ 'By the sleight of men' (ἐν τῇ κυβητῇ [Tisch. WH κυβία] τῶν ἀνθρώπων, lit. 'by the dice-playing of men,' from κύβος, a cube, die). Tindale translates 'by the wylynes of men,' which is the meaning of AV 'sleight.' It is of the same root as 'sly,' as if for slyth = 'slyness.' Cf. Ridley, Works, 31, 'The sleights and shifts which craft and wit can invent'; Tymme's Calvin's Genesis, 569, 'Nowe, seeing a lye is damnable of it selfe, therein she sinned the more, that she durst use such deceivable slighes in so holy a matter.' But the word properly means a device, and may be used in a good sense, as Udall's Erasmus' Paraph. i. 106, 'If this invencion and sleight be brought unto your presidente, we will perswade hym, and deliver you from all daunger of this matter'; Elyot, Governour, i. 173, 'It hath ben sene that the waiker persone by the sleight of wrastlyng, hath overthrowen the strengier.' We still have the phrase 'sleight of hand.'

The adverb sleightly is used in the Preface to AV, 'Now, when the father of their Church, who gladly would heale the soare of the daughter of his people softly and sleightly, and make the best of it, findeth so great fault with them for their oddes and jarring, we hope the children have no great cause to vaunt of their uniformitie.'

There is no connexion either in origin or meaning with 'sight,' 'slightly,' which means originally 'flat,' 'smooth.'

SLIME.—See BITUMEN and MORTAR.

SLING (שֶׁלַק šela', σφενδόνη).—A weapon used by the Hebrews, Egyptians, Assyrians, and other Eastern nations, from whom it passed over to the later Greeks. During the best days of Rome, slingers appeared only among the foreign auxiliaries—Greek, Syrian, and African. We know nothing definite concerning the form of the Hebrew sling, but on the Assyrian reliefs slings are shown, made of two thongs, one of which was doubtless released in the act of discharging the stone. The hollow in which the stone was placed was called the hand (קַף kaph, 'the bent hand'). Smooth stones (1 S 17⁴⁰, Job 41²⁸ (20)) * were used by the Hebrews, stones or leaden bullets (μολυβδίδες) by the Roman auxiliaries, as missiles. Slings were employed in attacking fortresses (2 K 3²⁵, 1 Mac 6⁵¹). Among the Israelites the Benjaminite left-handed slingers were famous (Jg 20¹⁶, 1 Ch 12²); David the Judean appears as a slinger only in his contest with Goliath (1 S 17⁴⁰, Sir 47¹). From the prominence given to David's 'staff' in 1 S 17^{40, 43} it is not improbable that his 'sling' was mounted on a staff; the weapon may in fact have been that described by Vegetius, iii. 14, 'Fustibalis fustis est longus pedibus quattuor, cui per medium ligatur funda de corio, et utraque manu impulsus prope ad instar onagri (a powerful military engine) dirigit saxa.' The 'sling' of v. 40 is a gloss on 'staff,' just as 'scrip' is a gloss on 'shepherd's bag.' The sling-stones might be carried either in a bag (so David, 1 S 17⁴⁰) or in the bosom of the outer garment (so the Roman slingers). Abigail (1 S 25²⁴) predicts that God will take the lives of David's enemies out of the bag or purse (בֶּרֶךְ זֶרֶרֹר) in which He holds the lives of men, and will 'sling them out,' i.e. cast them away. In Zec 9¹⁵ hailstones are spoken of as God's slingstones (tr. 'and [His] slingstones shall devour and subdue'; cf. v. 14 'His arrow shall go forth as the lightning'). On the difficult verse Pr 26⁸ 'As he that bindeth a stone in a sling' (מַגְמֵמָה margemah), see Toy in Internat. Crit. Comm. and RV ('a heap of stones').

SMITH.—שֵׁנִי an artificer, a workman, 1 S 13¹⁹, Is 54¹⁶; קִנְיָר a smith (lit. a worker in iron), Is 44¹²; קִנְיָר (lit. locksmith?) 2 K 24^{14, 16}, Jer 24¹ 29². The name smith is common to several metal workers: the goldsmith, the silversmith, the copper-smith, and the ironsmith. The most important of these in ancient times was the coppersmith. Though iron seems to have been known at a very early period, it did not come into common use. Copper, being more easily worked, was the universal metal for tools, arms, and all kinds of utensils. Alloyed with tin it became hard, and was capable of taking a sharp edge: thus it was suitable for knives, swords, spears, axes, etc. The coppersmith is still a very important workman in Syria, for almost all domestic utensils are made of that metal. Pans, pots, trays, caldrons for boiling the grape juice, are made of copper. The goldsmith and silversmith are next in importance, and their methods of working are almost the same as the pictures on the tombs in Egypt show to have been followed by the ancient Egyptians. The silversmith is usually also the tinsmith of a Lebanon village.

Iron ore of the very best quality is abundant in the Lebanon range, and has been worked for ages by the smiths. The forests around supplied the fuel, and the iron obtained was similar to what is known as Swedish iron. It was probably from this iron that the smiths of Damascus made their famous steel. Nearly every village in Syria has its smith, whose business it is to make and repair ploughs, pickaxes, hoes, and the tools for the masons and carpenters. He makes shoes also for horses, mules, donkeys, and for the oxen used for ploughing. The fuel of the smith is charcoal, and two very large circular bellows keep up a steady blast. Smiths in ancient as well as in modern times were noted for the strength of their arms, Is 44².

The discovery of the smith's art is ascribed in Gn 4²² (J) to Tubal-cain (which see) the son of Lamech (see Dillmann, ad loc., and Benzinger, Heb. Arch. 214). A smith at work is graphically portrayed in Sir 38²⁸.

W. CARSLAW.

SMYRNA (Σμύρνα) was an ancient city in the west of Asia Minor, situated at the head of a gulf which runs up about 30 miles into the country. It was at first a colony of Aeolic Greeks, but was taken by an attack from the Ionian colony of Colophon and transformed into an Ionian city.

* Cf. 'Teretes lapides de funda vel fustibulo destinati' (Vegetius, i. 16).

The original Aeolic and Ionian Smyrna was captured by the Lydians, who broke up its constitution as a Greek city about the end of the 7th cent. B.C.; and it existed as a mere Oriental town or series of villages for more than three centuries, till Lysimachus (301-281) refounded it as a Greek city, in a new situation about 3 miles south-west from the ancient site. It has continued ever since an unbroken history as one of the greatest cities of Asia.

Smyrna was a faithful ally of Rome, from the time when the great Italian republic began to interfere in the affairs of the East, choosing that side before Rome had become all-powerful, and remained true to it even during the Mithridatic wars, when a Smyrnan assembly, hearing of the distressed condition of Sulla's army, stripped off their own clothes and sent them to clothe the soldiers; and it was accordingly favoured in the Roman policy, though it suffered during the Civil War after the death of Caesar. That early appreciation of the value of the Roman alliance was undoubtedly due to the position of Smyrna as a great trading city: the exact circumstances are unknown to us, but Smyrna must have been as early as B.C. 200 brought into such relations with the general Mediterranean trade that its interest lay in supporting Rome against Carthage and the allied Seleucid kings of Syria, and against Rhodes (just as the old friendship of Massilia and Rome was due to their common dread of the competition of Carthaginian merchants).

Smyrna was the port at the end of one of the great roads leading from the inner country, Phrygia, Galatia, etc., across Lydia towards the west. It was also the harbour for the whole trade of the fertile Hermus Valley, and was probably hardly second even to Ephesus as an exporting city. Its great wealth is attested by its abundant coinage. It was the chief city of a conventus, and was one of those cities that were dignified with the title of metropolis. It vied with Pergamum and Ephesus for the title of 'First (city) of Asia' (πρώτη Ἀσίας); and the contests between the three great cities were carried to a great height, as each invented new titles for itself or appropriated the titles of the other. In one case, at least, their jealous rivalry led to an appeal to the imperial decision.

In A.D. 23 the cities of Asia obtained permission to found a temple in honour of Tiberius and his mother Julia Augusta, and in 26 several contended for the privilege of having the temple within their walls. The pleadings of the different cities which claimed that honour throw considerable light on the state of the great Asian cities under the early Roman emperors, though only a very brief report has been preserved by Tacitus (Annals, iv. 55, 56). The claim of Pergamum was rejected because it already had the temple dedicated by the province to Augustus: that of Ephesus because it was sufficiently weighted by the worship and the temple of Artemis: that of Laodicea, Tralles, etc., because they were not sufficiently great. Halicarnassus was carefully considered, but at last the choice lay between Sardis and Smyrna. Sardis relied especially on its past history, and quoted, amidst other evidence on its side, a decree passed in its honour by the twelve ancient Etruscan cities. But the Smyrnaeans could appeal to their faithful friendship and alliance with Rome; and they mentioned that they had dedicated a temple to the goddess Rome in B.C. 195, before the eastern cities had learned by experience that Rome was the one supreme power in the world. The claim of Smyrna was preferred to that of Sardis, thus marking the superior dignity of the former in the province. The temple was erected by the provincial council (see ASIAARCH) in Smyrna, which henceforward could claim the Imperial Neokorate, i.e. the title of temple-warden (νεακόρ) of the emperors. The title was not so much prized in the 1st cent.; and the earliest proof that Smyrna had assumed it is in A.D. 98-102. A second and a third Neokorate were afterwards granted to Smyrna (as to Pergamum and Ephesus)—the second by Hadrian (though not mentioned on coins till the reign of his successor Pius), the third by Severus towards the end of his reign (along with the same compliment to Ephesus).

In the Roman time Smyrna was perhaps the most brilliant and splendid of the cities of Asia. No other city of the province could vie with it for the handsomeness of its streets, the excellence of the paving, and the skill with which it was laid out in rectangular blocks; but it was badly drained, and the streets were liable to be flooded in rain. It stretched along the southern shore of the gulf, not far from its eastern extremity. On the west a hill which overhangs the sea was enclosed within its walls; and on the south a still loftier elevation called Pagos, 'the hill,' * 460 ft. high, served as its acropolis, and afforded a strong line of defence for the walls of Lysimachus. The modern city stretches beyond the ancient walls on the east side, but leaves out part of the ancient city on the west. On the lower ground west from Pagos, about the south-western extremity of the city, was the 'Ephesian Gate,' whence issued the ancient road to Metropolis, Ephesus, and the south generally.

Another gate near the modern station of the Hermus Valley Railway is still called the Black Gate (Kara Kapu). The most splendid street in ancient Smyrna was called the Golden Street; it led perhaps from the temple of Zeus on the hill over the sea to the temple of Cybele on the hillock east from Smyrna called Tepejik (if, as is probable, the temple stood there), issuing from the city probably through Kara Kapu.

There was, in addition to the mooring-ground in the open gulf, an inner harbour nearly land-locked, which was sufficiently commodious for ancient vessels. It was in the heart of the modern city; and the Bazaars now occupy part of its area. In A.D. 1402 the entrance to it was blocked by Tamerlane with a mole, to facilitate his assault on the stronghold of the Rhodian Knights beside the sea. Even before that, it had probably been a good deal neglected in the troubles and the weak government that prevailed for centuries; and afterwards under Turkish rule the harbour became more and more choked up, till in the 18th century it finally disappeared.

Smyrna has suffered much from earthquakes. A severe one occurred in A.D. 180, and great shocks seem often to be felt in the latter part of a century. The last was in 1880.

There was no specially famous cultus at Smyrna. The 'Mother of Sipylos' was worshipped in a great temple, which probably stood on the already mentioned mound outside the city on the east side; the priestess of the goddess in front of the city (ἱέρεια Πισυεῖας) is mentioned in an inscription, and the Μετὰ Σίπυλιν is a common type and legend on the coins of Smyrna. But her cultus was common to other cities round Mt. Sipylos, and the Smyrnan worship did not become famous and important like those of Ephesus, Magnesia, etc. The temple of the Nemesis, or Fates, and a Hieron of the Klodonos, in which divination was practised from chance words or phrases or acts, are mentioned; but it seems very probable that those two foundations may have been only a single holy place. According to the legend, the two Nemesis had appeared to Alexander the Great in a dream, and ordered him to rebuild Smyrna. In Smyrna alone was the ordinary singular conception of Nemesis doubled as a pair of divine figures.

Smyrna was one of the cities claiming to be the birthplace of Homer. The poet is often represented on its coins; and there was a building in or near the city, called the Homerion. Tradition connected him with the sacred river, called Meles. The descriptions of the river by Aelius Aristides, and its sacred character, show that it was not any of the varying streams, dry in summer and torrents in the rainy season, which have been identified by different authorities as the Meles (especially the stream on the eastern skirts of the modern city, crossed by Caravan Bridge on the great road leading to the east). The Meles was the unvarying stream rising in the splendid sacred springs called Diana's Bath, more than a mile east from Caravan Bridge, and flowing in a steady uniform stream through a partly artificial channel (as Aristides says) into the gulf. The whole character of the localities, both springs and channel, has been changed by modern engineering operations.

The Church of Smyrna has had an honourable history. The message sent to it among the letters to the seven Churches, Rev 2 and 3, is more uniformly laudatory than those sent to the other Churches; even Philadelphia is hardly praised so highly as Smyrna, and the others are all blamed in varying degrees. But the Smyrnan Church was apparently kept pure by continual suffering: the Church was poor and oppressed: it was not exposed to the dangers of riches, but was rich spiritually. The Jews of Smyrna are described as bitterly hostile. Few or none of them seem to have adopted Christianity, and they are described as not being really Jews, but merely a synagogue of Satan. This probably means both (1) that the Gentile Church of Smyrna represents the true stock of Abraham, while the Jews say they are Jews, claiming the name, but losing the reality of Jewish inheritance; and (2) that the Jews in the city had given way to the temptations of luxury and civilization, and degenerated from Jewish purity and religion. It is an interesting point that, in an inscription of the 2nd century (CIL 3148), we find mentioned as one of the classes of the population 'the erstwhile Jews' (οἱ ποτὲ Ἰουδαῖοι), an enigmatic phrase which probably means 'those who formerly were the nation of the Jews, but who have lost the legal standing of a separate people and are now merged in the numerous class of resident strangers, sprung from various parts of the empire.'

* Pagos is, indubitably, an ancient name; but the hill appears also to have had the special name Mastusia, alluding to its shape as seen from the sea (though the likeness to a breast is seen to be illusory when one goes round it, or ascends).

In the popular outburst which led to the martyrdom of Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna in A.D. 155,[†] the Jews are described as playing a prominent part. The ASIARCH Philippus, who was presiding at the games (which therefore must have been those called Karà Áσιας, celebrated by the provincial council called the Koivon, and held at the various metropoleis in turn), was very unwilling to authorize the deed, and without his permission it could not have been carried out in the stadium on the occasion of the games; but the popular clamour constrained him. The Jews were active also in fetching and arranging the wood to burn the aged bishop. The view that the Jews of Smyrna are described in the Apocalypse as degenerate from the pure religion of their race seems to be confirmed, when we observe that Polycarp's martyrdom occurred on a Saturday afternoon, and the Jews, who were so active against him, must have appeared in the stadium at games which should have been an abomination to them on the Sabbath day.

It is a noteworthy coincidence, which may be intentional, that the Divine Sender of the message to Smyrna, the city which had been destroyed and after 340 years refounded, calls himself 'the first and the last, which was dead and lived again.' The various titles which the Sender of the messages to the Seven Asian cities assumes in each case have sometimes at least an obvious relation to the circumstances of the city to which the message is addressed: that is evidently the case at THYATIRA, and may be in other cases, though we cannot trace the relation. Here, however, it seems very clear. That, of course, is not inconsistent with the equally obvious relation of the title to the immediate circumstances of the Smyrnan Christians as described in Rev 210.¹¹ 'Fear not the thing which thou art about to suffer; behold, assuredly, the devil is about to cast some of you into prison that ye may be tried; and ye shall have tribulation for a term of ten days [i.e. a time not unlimited, but with an end fixed]. Be thou faithful unto death; and I will give thee the garland of life [i.e. the prize which consists in life]. As your city was destroyed, and lived again more glorious than before, so I who died and lived again will give to thee [each individual Christian is singled out and addressed], if thou be true to death, the reward of the true life (τῆς ζωῆς).'

On the other hand, it seems highly improbable that there is here intended any 'allusion to the ritual of the pagan mysteries which prevailed in that city' (as is suggested by Rev. J. W. Blakesley in Smith's DB iii. p. 1335): 'the story of the violent death and reviviscence of Dionysos' was not specially characteristic of Smyrna, or likely to be specially familiar to the Smyrnan Christians. It seems quite unnatural that the Divine Sender of the message should be represented in a character designed to recall that of Dionysos.

It is probable that the writer had in his mind the prize of victory (as in the Greek games), when he spoke of the 'garland of life.' It is indeed quite out of keeping with his usual custom to take a metaphor from such a source: he was not, like St. Paul, brought up in Greek surroundings and accustomed to draw his illustrations from the social life of the Greek cities. But that special metaphor had entered so completely into current language that the writer was hardly conscious of its source: he was probably thinking more of St. Paul's garland of righteousness (2 Ti 4⁸), St. Peter's garland of glory (1 P 5⁴), and above all St. James's garland of life* (1 J 2), than of the athlete's garland. At the same time it is possible, and even probable, that another pagan usage was also in his mind. The worshipper, while engaged in the service of a deity, wore a garland of the kind sacred to that deity,—myrtle in the service of Aphrodite, ivy in that of Dionysos, wild olive in that of Zeus Olympius (out of which, indeed, developed the victor's garland in the Olympian games), and so on. The meaning then would be: 'Be thou faithful to death, and I will give thee the garland of my service, which is of life.' Yet the idea of prize or reward seems inseparable from the passage; and it is only through the victor's garland that the stephanos acquired that connotation. Probably both ideas are united in this passage. The magistrates of hieratic origin, called Stephanephoroi, who were found in Smyrna and the other Asiatic cities generally, are not alluded to in this passage (as has been suggested): such an allusion lends no point to the words.

Again, we notice that, whereas Sardis, the city whose impregnable fortress had twice been captured while its people slept and neglected to watch, is advised to 'be watchful,' Smyrna, the city which boasted of its faithfulness to the Roman alliance, is counselled to 'be faithful [not now to an earthly power, but to God].'

Throughout the messages to the Seven Cities it is evident that the writer knew the circumstances of each city, and alluded to many facts of its present or past life. The references to past history are not gathered from reading and literature. The facts alluded to are of that marked type which would be universally known in each city, and would be appealed to by orators addressing popular assemblies.

The Church in Smyrna is addressed rather as separate from (and persecuted by) the city, than as forming part of the city and characterized by its qualities and sharing in its works (like Sardis and Laodicea). Only the faithfulness and the resurrection of the city are alluded to as proper to the Church. In its separation from and superiority to the society by which it was surrounded lay the glory of the Smyrnan Church; and life is to be its reward for its faithfulness and its patient endurance. Life is the dominant tone in the letter to Smyrna, death in that to Sardis, weakness and indecision in that to the Phrygian LAODICEA. It is remarkable how later history has confirmed the prophecy and the character ascribed to the Church.

Smyrna had a chequered history during the Turkish wars; and it was the last independent Christian city in the whole of Asia Minor. It was thrice captured by the Seljuk Turks in the end of the 11th and beginning of the 12th cent., but was recovered by the Byzantine government; and the emperor John III. Ducas Vatatzes, who resided frequently at Smyrna or at Nymphaion, rebuilt the castle on Mount Pagos (1221-1254). Early in the 14th cent. it passed into Mohammedan possession, and formed a part of the dominions of Aidin, the lord of Guzeli-Hissar, 'the Beautiful Castle' of Tralles; but the Knights of Rhodes seized the lower city, and strengthened the fortifications of the harbour, though the castle on Pagos overhanging the city remained in Turkish hands. Two Osmanli Sultans, Amurath I. and Bayezid, besieged the city and castle of the Knights, but without success. At last in 1402 the hosts of Tamerlane captured the castle; and after he retired the city passed quietly under the power of the Seljuk chiefs of Ayasuluk (Ephesus) and Guzeli-Hissar, until they were reduced by Amurath II. under the Osmanli sway.

The last stronghold of Christianity in Asia Minor, Smyrna still is more occidental in character and more solidly flourishing than any other city of Turkey. It is called by the Turks, accordingly, Giaour Ismir, Infidel Smyrna. The

* Zeller's idea, that St. James imitated this passage of the Apocalypse, seems not acceptable.

* See Mommsen in Historische Zeitschr. xxviii. p. 417. The meaning 'who were once Jews, but have abandoned their religion,' seems quite impossible: renegade Jews would not be called so in an inscription which mentions them in a complimentary way.

† The date, as fixed by Waddington, is nearly, but not absolutely, certain. Harnack considers Waddington's reasoning to be entirely erroneous, but accepts the date on different grounds (Chronol. der altchristl. Litt. i. pp. 365, 721).

Mohammedans number less than a quarter of the population, which totals over 250,000: more than a half is Greek: there are large Jewish and Armenian quarters: colonies from all the chief countries in Europe, from the United States, and from Persia, also are settled there. The views from the sea, and from the summit of Mount Pagos, are among the most exquisite in the whole Mediterranean lands; and the prosperity within the city is, in comparison with all other Turkish towns, plain to the eye. As in the message to the Church, so at the present day, life is the prominent note.

In the early ecclesiastical system Smyrna was a bishopric under the authority, probably, of Ephesus; but, soon after, it was raised to be independent and autokephalos. In the later Notitæ it appears as a metropolis, having six bishoprics subject to it—Phocæa, Clazomenæ, Magnesia ad Sipylum, Archangelos, Sosandra, and Petra.

LITERATURE.—Though Smyrna has been so frequently visited by European travellers of every kind, very little has been written on its history, and no proper study has ever been made of the literary and monumental evidence on the subject. The account given in Sir Charles Wilson's Handbook to Turkey (Murray) is the best, though necessarily very brief. In the Historical Geography of Asia Minor, Ramsay, there are only some inadequate notes, pp. 107–109, 115, 118. An old book in French, by Slaara, on Smyrna, published there, is practically unprocurable. An article by Arist. M. Fontrier, in Bulletin de Corresp. Hellénique, xvi, pp. 379–410, on le Monastère de Lembo (five miles east of Smyrna and one south of Bunarbashi) is by far the best study that has been written on the subject. Numerous picturesque descriptions of the beauty of the scenery may be found in the books of travellers and tourists.

SNAIL.—Two Heb. words are tr^d 'snail' in AV. 1. שָׁחַל hōmel, saūpa, lacerta (Lv 11³⁰). There seems to be no foundation for the AV 'snail.' Other ancient VSS besides the LXX and Vulg. understand the word as referring generically to the lizard. It is in a list of those animals, and prob. one of them. RV tr. it by 'sand-lizard,' which is Lacerta agilis, L., a species of wide distribution. This rendering, however, is a mere surmise.

2. שָׁחַל shabbēlūl, κνός, cera (Ps 58⁸). The Heb. is Shaph. form from the root שָׁחַל bālal, similar to the Arab. balla, 'to moisten.' The rendering 'wax,' of the LXX and Vulg., is amplified by the expressions ἔπεσε πῦρ, supercecidit ignis (from a confusion of שָׁחַל with שָׂחַל). Nevertheless, the modern VSS are unanimous in the rendering 'snail.' The allusion to 'melting away' is explained in two ways: (a) that a snail, in moving from one place to another, leaves a slimy track, which was popularly referred to the dissolution of its body. The Arab. popular name for the snail, bizzāk, 'the spitter,' is derived from this characteristic; (b) Tristram explains it by the fact that, in the dry season, snails attach themselves to rocks, trees, shrubs, or the soil, if possible in a moist situation, or at least one sheltered from the direct rays of the sun. If, however, a snail be long exposed to the sun, it will be dried up in its shell. Tristram thinks that this explains the metaphor of the text.

A large number of species of land and freshwater snails are found in Palestine and Syria. They emerge from their hiding-places after the early rains, and are collected by the natives, and boiled and eaten with great relish.

SNOW (שָׁלֵג; Aram. שָׁלַג [Dn 7⁹]; Gr. χιὼν)* is mentioned in Scripture with a degree of infrequency corresponding to the rarity of its appearance in Palestine proper. Of an actual fall of snow we read only twice in the biblical narrative—in 2S 23²⁰

* The verb שָׁלַג occurs in Ps 68¹⁴ and is tr. in LXX by χιονοῦσθαι. שָׁלַג is tr. by spores in Pr 26¹, and in Pr 31²¹ χρυσὸν appears to be a corruption of χιὼν.

=1 Ch 11², where Benaiah, one of David's mighty men, is described as going down and slaying a lion in a cistern on a snowy day; and in 1 Mac 13², where the horsemen of Tryphon, the usurper king of Syria, were prevented from attacking Simon at Adora (or Adoraim) by reason of 'a very great snow' which fell in the night.

Snow is unknown on the seaboard of Philistia, Sharon, and Phœnicia, and seldom whitens the ground inland below an elevation of 2000 feet. In the Ghôr and the plain of Jericho it never falls. South of Hebron it is rare. Along the summits of the central ridge of Palestine and on the high tableland east of the Jordan snow falls nearly every winter.

The snowfall at Jerusalem, which is 2500 ft. above sea level, may be taken as typical of the whole central ridge. A table is given by Dr. Chaplin in the PEFS (vol. for 1883, p. 32), covering the winters from 1860–1861 to 1881–1882. Out of the twenty-two seasons to which his report refers there were eight when no snow fell, four of these being consecutive (1863, 1864, 1865, 1866). It is not wonderful that in 1864–1865 (see JERUSALEM, vol. II, pp. 536, 536) the water supply from the chief springs entirely failed. From Dr. Chaplin's table we learn that the last few days of December, the months of January and February, and the first fortnight of March make the period within which the snow falls in and around Jerusalem. In 1870 there was a fall of nearly two inches on April 7th and 8th, but this was a very remarkable and extraordinary occurrence. 'For the most part,' says Dr. Chaplin, 'the snow is in small quantity and soon melts, but heavy snowstorms sometimes occur, and the snow may then remain unmelted in the hollows on the hillsides for two or three weeks. The deepest snowfall was in Dec. 23 and 29, 1879, when it measured 17 inches where there was no drift. In Feb. 1874 it was 8½ inches deep, and on March 14, 5 inches.' Sir J. W. Dawson (Egypt and Syria, p. 113) reports that at the Jaffa Gate in Jan. 1884 there were snowdrifts 5 ft. deep. Wallace (Jerusalem the Holy, p. 252) mentions that three heavy falls of snow occurred during Jan. and Feb. 1898, when the weather was exceptionally cold, and much suffering was endured by the people.

Galilee, with a general elevation of 2000 to 2500 ft., is less liable to snowfalls. But sometimes these are heavy. In March 1884 a party riding through N. Galilee was overtaken by a snowstorm which covered the ground to the depth of several inches. It lay during the night, and when the members of the party set out next day after a comfortless encampment the snow still lay white over the landscape, and its glare was almost blinding as the sun poured down his rays in a blaze that threatened sunstroke.

The snow of Lebanon was proverbial (Jer 18¹⁴, Ca 4¹⁰). It is 'the white mountain,' probably because the snow never fails altogether from its summits (for another explanation of the name see LEBANON, ad init.). On the highest cultivated lands the snow covers up the wheat sown by the peasantry and protects it from the cold in winter. The lofty dome of Hermon is white all the winter, and through the summer broad patches and long streaks of snow are to be seen upon its widely-extended mass.

Snow is an emblem of refreshment in Scripture. It may be the glowing aspect of the distant mountain tops that is in the mind of the psalmist when, speaking of the scattering of Jehovah's enemies and the consequent elation of the people, he says, 'Then fell snow on Zalmon' (Ps 68¹⁴; see Delitzsch, in loc.). Lebanon and Hermon with their snowy sides have a delightfully refreshing aspect as the inhabitants of the sultry lowlands look up to them from afar. 'The cold of snow in the time of harvest' (Pr 25¹³) may refer to the sight of snow upon the mountain, but more likely to the snow which is preserved and stored to make cooling drinks in the heat of summer. Just as snow from Lebanon and Hermon was carried as a luxury in Jewish times to Tyre and Sidon and Tiberias, so it is today used in Beyrout and Damascus for mixing with beverages. 'Water like snow' is still the beverage most grateful to the fellahin or to the thirsty traveller. Snow-water is mentioned for its cleansing properties (Job 9³⁰); but the text is doubtful, see Dav. ad loc.; and the rapidity with which the snow disappears in the heat of the sun is noticed by the sacred writers (Job 6¹⁶ 24¹⁹). Snow by reason of its rarity and beauty is one of the wonders of God's power (Job 37⁵, Ps 147¹⁶); the hail and the snow are conceived to be stored in the heavens for use by God in the productiveness of nature (Is 55¹⁰), and in the accomplishment of moral ends (Job 38^{22, 23}; cf. Jos 10¹¹ and 1 Mac 13²¹). To be prepared against its coming, seeing that it keeps its season so precisely, is one of the virtues of the ideal woman (1r 31²¹ 26¹). Snow is taken to express whiteness in the realm of nature—the whiteness of wool, hoary hairs, leprosy, milk (Rev 1¹⁴, cf. Dn 7⁹, Ex 4⁸, Nu 12¹⁰, 2 K 5²⁷, La 4⁷). Snow is the chosen Scripture emblem of stainless moral purity. We are perhaps not at liberty to say it is used of the transfigured Christ (Mk 9³), because the best MSS omit ὡς χιών. But it is taken to describe the purity of the Nazirites of Zion (La 4⁷), of the Ancient of Days (Dn 7⁹), of the Angel of the Resurrection (Mt 28³), of the Risen Lord (Rev 1¹⁴). As against the defilement and condemnation and persistence of sin, it describes the righteousness, forgiveness, and complete acceptance of the penitent believer (Ps 51⁷, Is 1¹⁸).

SNUFFERS, SNUFFDISH.—In three passages of the Priests' Code mention is made of two utensils connected with the golden candlestick, named respectively מְכַהֵי־נֵר melkähayim, and קְרָחִים mahtōth, and rendered by AV in Ex 37²³ 'snuffers' and 'snuffdishes', in 25³⁸ Nu 4⁹ 'tongs' and 'snuffdishes' (so RV also in Ex l.c.)* The mahtōth bear the same name, and were probably of the same shape, as the censers or fire-pans (so Tindale, 1530, 'snuffers and fyrepans'). In them were deposited and removed from the sanctuary the burnt portions of the wicks (see CENSER and TABERNACLE, section on the Candlestick). The melkähayim, as the etymology and the dual form show, was clearly a snuffers (Vulg. emunctoria, forpices, LXX, Ex 38³⁷, Nu 4⁹ αβίδες),† resembling in shape a pair of tongs, like the Roman forceps (illustr. in Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Ant. 3 i. 872), since the same word is used of the tongs with which, in Isaiah's vision, the live coal was lifted from the altar-hearth (Is 6⁶). It was used to trim and adjust the wicks of the lamps, like the acus (the pin for pushing up the wick) which figures in representations of Roman lamps. In later times we hear of a wool or flax comb, reduced to a single tooth, being used for this purpose (Mishna, Kelim xiii. 8 end). The same instrument (melkähayim) is mentioned (1 K 7⁴⁰) in connexion with the lamps of Solomon's temple, in a late addition to 1 K 7 (for 7⁴⁸⁻⁵⁰ see KINGS, vol. ii. p. 864*, the commentaries of Kittel and Benzinger, and esp. Stade's essay cited there), and its parallel 2 Ch 4², in both passages tr^d 'tongs' in AV and RV.

It will thus be seen that in RV 'tongs' is now the uniform rendering of melkähayim in all the passages where it occurs, 'snuffers' being reserved for another word מְזַנְמֵרֵת mēzanmērēth (from זָרַק to prune, trim), also mentioned among the temple furniture (1 K 7⁵⁰ = 2 Ch 4²², 2 K 12¹³ [31¹⁰], 25¹⁴ = Jer 52¹⁸). This, as the etymology again shows, also denotes some species of scissors or snuffers for trimming the lamp-wicks. From a survey of the passages cited in this art. it would appear that mēzanmērēth is the older term of the two, melkähayim being found first in P, and in the later additions influenced by it, in which indeed both terms occur side by side. In all these, further, the material is given as gold, and even 'perfect gold' (2 Ch 4²¹), while in the older and historical sources the material is bronze (cf. 1 K 7⁴⁰).

SO (king of Egypt [Mizraim]; סוֹ מִצְרַיִם, LXX Σωγῶν, Vulg. Sua).—According to 2 K 17⁴ (AV and RV), Shalmaneser, 'king of Assyria, found conspiracy in Hoshea (king of Israel); for he had sent messengers to So, king of Egypt, and offered no present to the king of Assyria.' This was the cause of the invasion that ended in the captivity of Israel. Kings of the Ethiopian dynasty (25th) were reigning at this time in Egypt, and it has been supposed that one of these, either Shabaka or Shabataka, was intended by 'So.'

From cuneiform sources, however, we learn that there was at this time a certain Pir'u, king of Muṣri, and that in B.C. 720, shortly after the fall of Samaria in 722, Sib'i, tartan (commander-in-chief) of Muṣri, was sent by him to the help of Hanno, king of Gaza, against Sargon. It was formerly thought that 'Pir'u, king of Muṣri,' must be 'Pharaoh, king of Egypt,' Muṣri corresponding in general to the Hebrew Mizraim; but Winckler has recently shown that this Muṣri must be distinct from Egypt, and belong rather to North Arabia, in the country of the Nabatæans. He finds the same Muṣri also in the Bible under the name Mizraim, and identifies the biblical 'So, king of Egypt' (Mizraim) with Sib'i, the tartan of the North Arabian Muṣri, proposing to read סוֹ sb for סוֹ sw (So) (see his art. 'Pir'u, king of Muṣri,' in Mittheil. d. vorderas. Gesellsch. 1898, 5).

The identification of So with Shabaka or Shabataka seems impossible. Shishak of the 22nd dynasty, who invaded Judah and Israel in the reign of Jeroboam, is indeed entitled in the Bible מֶלֶךְ מִצְרַיִם 'king of Mizraim,' as were the later 'Pharaohs,' Necho and Hophra. But the position of the somewhat obscure 25th dynasty with regard to the throne of Egypt was peculiar. Tirhaka, who was the last important king of Shabaka's dynasty, is entitled מֶלֶךְ כּוּשׁ 'king of Cush (Ethiopia)' in 2 K 19⁹, and in the cuneiform 'king of Cusi'; we might expect, therefore, to find the other kings of that dynasty bearing the same title 'king of Cush,' rather than 'king of Egypt,' if referred to in any Hebrew or Assyrian record. This is a slight additional argument in favour of Winckler's theory. To the Egyptians themselves every king of Egypt in these later times, whether the Persian Darius, the Macedonian Alexander, the Roman Augustus, or the Ethiopian Tirhaka, was known as the 'Pharaoh,' and this is the title which they all bore in Egyptian legal documents. To the rest of the world Shabaka, the Ethiopian conqueror of Egypt and the founder of the 25th dynasty, presumably would be known as 'king of Ethiopia.'

SOAP, SOPE (סֹפֶה, sofē) is a general name for the class of substances obtained by decomposing fats or oils by an alkali such as soda or potash. Fats and oils are compounds of certain 'fatty acids' with glycerine, and in the process of 'saponification' the alkali combines with the acid to form a soap, while the glycerine is set free. Soaps dissolve readily in water, imparting to it a peculiar slippery or greasy feeling, forming a lather easily, and adding greatly to its cleansing powers.

According to Pliny (H.N. xxviii. 51), soap was an invention of the Gauls, who prepared it from tallow and ashes. They had two kinds of it, the hard and the liquid. Soap-making is the chief industry of modern Palestine. It is carried on in Jaffa, Nablus, Jerusalem, and elsewhere, and the product is exported along the coast, and even to Egypt and Asia Minor. Olive oil is used, and the poorer qualities of it especially are turned to account in this way. The alkali employed is potash, and is locally known as kily. It is obtained by burning certain saliferous desert plants, the chief of which is Salsola kali. This alkali resembles cakes of coarse salt, and contains many impurities, and these accumulate to form great rubbish heaps in the places where soap is made. The potash obtained from the ashes is in the form of a carbonate. This is dissolved in water, and made caustic by treatment with lime. The solution or 'lye' is then boiled, the refuse from the oil-press being used as fuel. Olive oil is added, and after repeated boilings and additions of oil the solution is allowed to cool, when the soap sets in a solid mass.

* The American Revisers, however, prefer 'snuffers' in all three passages.

'Soap' (AV 'sope') appears twice in EV (Jer 22, Mal 32). In each case it is the translation of בַּרָּה, a word connected with the root בָּרָה 'to cleanse.' The previous clause in Jer 22 refers to בָּרָה or mineral alkali (see NITRE). LXX translates בַּרָּה in both places by σολα ('grass'). These facts suggest that vegetable alkali is to be understood rather than soap in the strict sense. The carbonate of potash contained in the ashes of plants has detergent properties similar to those of washing-soda.

Another word, בָּרָה, from the same root, usually rendered 'cleanness,' is tr. 'lye' in RVm in Job 9³⁰, Is 1²⁵, on the supposition that it means the same thing as בַּרָּה, vegetable alkali or a solution of it.

JAMES PATRICK.

SOBER, SOBRIETY.—Both 'sober' and 'temperate' are used in AV in the narrower meaning of 'not drunk' or 'not drunken,' and in the wider meaning of 'moderate,' 'reasonable.' The earliest sense of 'sober' is 'not drunken' (from Fr. sobre, Lat. sobrius, i.e. se-ebrius), and that is now its only meaning; but it early adopted the wider signification, as Piers Plowman, B. xiv. 53—

'Be sobre of syghte and of tonge,
In etynge and in handlynge and in alle thi fyne wittis.'

For an example of sober = not drunk, take Tindale's tr. of Nu 6¹⁸ 'And the absteyner shall shave his heed in the door of the tabernacle of witness, and shall take the heer of his sober heed and put it in the fyre which is under the pease offerynge.' Soberly (Wis 9¹, Ro 12³, Tit 2¹²), soberness (Ac 26²⁸), and sobriety (1 Ti 2⁹⁻¹⁵) are all used in both senses. Cf. Tindale, Pent. (Prologue), 'Behold how soberly and how circumspectly both Abraham and also Isaac behave them selves amonge the infideles'; Tindale, Expos. 127, 'With their fast they destroy the fast which God commandeth, that is, a perpetual soberness to tame the flesh'; Ac 26²⁸ Rhem. 'I speake wordes of veritie and sobrietye'; Ro 12³ Rhem. 'For I say by the grace that is given me, to al that are among you not to be more wise than behoveth to be wise, but to be wise unto sobrietye.'

The words rendered 'sober,' etc., or 'temperate,' etc., in AV and RV are the following:—

1. (a) νῆψω, 1 Th 5⁸, 2 Ti 4⁵, 1 P 1¹³ 47 53 (all 'be sober' in AV except 2 Ti 4⁵ 'watch'; in RV all 'be sober'). In every case the Greek word has the wider meaning of 'moderate.'
- (b) νῆφλιος, 1 Ti 3² (AV 'vigilant'), 311 (AV 'sober'), Tit 2² (AV 'sober'; all 'temperate' in RV). In all these cases the meaning of the Greek is 'not drunken.'
2. (a) σωφρων, 1 Ti 3² (AV 'sober'), Tit 1⁸ (AV 'sober'), 22 (AV 'temperate'), 23 (AV 'discreet'; all 'sober-minded' in RV).
- (b) σωφρονως, Tit 2¹² (AV and RV 'soberly').
- (c) σωφρονισμῶς, Mk 5¹⁵ = Lk 8³⁵ (AV and RV 'in his right mind'), Ro 12³ (φρονεῖτε εἰς τὸ σωφρονεῖν, AV and RV 'to think soberly'), 2 Co 5¹³ (AV 'be sober'), Tit 2⁶ (AV 'be sober-minded'), 1 P 4⁷ (AV 'be sober'; RV in last three 'be of sober mind').

(d) σωφροσύνη, Ac 26²⁸ (AV and RV 'soberness'), 1 Ti 2⁹⁻¹⁵ (AV and RV 'sobriety').

3. (a) ἐνσωφρονισμῷ, Ac 24²⁶, Gal 5²³, 2 P 1^{6b} (AV and RV always 'temperance,' RVm always 'self-control').

(b) ἐνσωφρονίᾳ, Tit 1⁸ (AV and RV 'temperate').

(c) ἐνσωφρονισμῶν, 1 Co 7⁹ (AV 'contain,' RV 'have continency'), 922 (AV and RV 'be temperate').

It thus appears that in RV 'sober,' 'sober-minded,' etc., represent σωφρων and its derivatives, as well as νῆψω; 'temperate' is the tr. of νῆφλιος and of the derivatives of ἐνσωφρονισμῷ; while for ἐν itself 'temperance' is retained from AV, with the marg. 'self-control.'

For the difference between ἐνσωφρονίᾳ and σωφρονισμῶν see Page on Ac 24²⁶.

SOCO, SOCOH (סוּכָּה, סוּכָּה 'branches'; Soccho, Socho).—The form of the name varies in the LXX (see below), and quite needlessly in AV. RV has Socoh everywhere except in 1 Ch 4¹⁸ and 2 Ch 28¹⁸, where it has Soco.

1. A town in the lowland of Judah, mentioned with Adullam and Azekah (Jos 15³³ B Σαωχώ, A Σωχώ). The Philistines, before the battle in which Goliath was slain, assembled at Socoh, and camped between Socoh and Azekah, at Ephes-dammim (1 S 17¹; Jos. Ant. vi. ix. 1). It was in the district of Ben-hesed, one of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 K 4¹⁰); and was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11⁷; Ant. viii. x. 1). In the reign of Ahaz it was taken by the Philistines (2 Ch 28¹⁸).

Eusebius and Jerome (Onom.) mention two villages—one in the mountain, the other in the plain, or an upper and lower Socoh—which were 9 Roman miles from Eleutheropolis, on the road to Jerusalem, and were called Socchoth (Σοκχώθ). Socoh was passed by St. Paula on her way from Jerusalem to Eleutheropolis (Horræi, Ep. Paul. xviii.). This place is now Khurbet Shuweiksh (a diminutive of Shaukeh, the Arabic form of Shoco), on the left bank of Wady es-Sunt, 'the Valley of Elah.' The position, strong by nature, was of strategical importance, for it commanded one of the great highways from the coast to the hill-country of Judah. Beneath Shuweiksh, the Wady es-Sunt makes a great bend, and runs westward instead of from south to north. And here, at the foot of the highland district, the roads from Jerusalem and Hebron unite, before running onwards down the valley to the plains of Philistia. The important part played by Socoh in the wars between the Jews and the Philistines is clearly indicated in the Bible narrative (Rob. *BRP*² ii. 21; PEF Mem. iii. 125; Guérin, Judée, i. 201, 332).

2. A town in the hill-country of Judah, named with Jattir, Dannah, and Debir (Jos 15³⁸ B Σωχδ, A Σωχώ). The Soco of 1 Ch 4¹⁸ is apparently the same place. It is now Khurbet Shuweiksh, to the S.W. of Hebron, and near Eshtemoa. There are some insignificant remains (Rob. *BRP*² i. 494; PEF Mem. iii. 410).

At Socoh, according to the Talmud, was born Antigonus,—the first Jew known to have taken a Greek name,—who was noted as the disciple of Simon the Just, and the master of Sadok, the reputed founder of the Sadducees. It is not, however, known of which of the two Socohs he was a native (Neubauer, Geog. du Talmud, p. 121).

SODOM (סְדֹם, Σόδομα).—One of the five 'cities of the Plain' in the time of Abraham and Lot, destroyed by fire from heaven (Gn 19²⁴) for the wickedness of the inhabitants.* Its position, in the opinion of the present writer, was on the Arabah north of the Dead Sea not far from GOMORRAH (which see). Weighty authorities, however, can be cited in favour of a site at the S. end of the Sea (Dillm. Genesis, 111 f.; Robinson, *BRP*² ii. 187 ff.; G. A. Smith, HGHL 505 ff.; Blanckenhorn, ZDPV xix. (1896) 53 ff.; Baedeker-Socin, Pal. 3, 146; Buhl, GAP 117, 271, 274; see also art. ZOAR). The wickedness of the Sodomites appears to have been so heinous and debasing as to have become proverbial (Gn 13¹³ 18³⁰, La 4⁶, Is 3⁹, cf. 2 P 2⁶, Jude 7). The term 'Sodomite' (סְדוֹמִי) is used in Scripture to describe offences against the laws of nature which were frequently connected with idolatrous practices (cf. Dt 23¹⁷, 1 K 14²⁴ 15¹³, 2 K 23⁷; see art. SODOMITE). The fate of Sodom and Gomorrah is referred to by our Lord as a warning to those who reject the offer of the gospel (Mt 10¹²; cf. Jude 7, 2 P 2⁶). A spiritual or typical meaning is applied to the word in Revelation (11¹⁸).

* The five cities were Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Zoar (Gn 14², Dt 29²²). That the language of St. Jude is not

SODOMITE (סְדוֹמִי, lit. 'sacred'; fem. סְדוֹמִיָּה, inadequately tr. by EV 'harlot,' see note in RVm at Gn 38²¹).—The Eng. word is derived from SODOM [2 Es 7³⁶ 'Sodomites' of AV is used in lit. sense for 'people of Sodom' (so RV)], where unnatural offences prevailed. But the Heb. kədəsh and kədəshāh have in view not ordinary immorality but religious prostitution, i.e. 'immorality practised in the worship of a deity and in the immediate precincts of a temple' (Driver, Deut. 264, where see references to authorities for the widespread existence of this practice). Such λερδομολα of either sex were not tolerated in Israel by the Deuteronomic law (Dt 23¹⁸, 17. 18). The kədəshim are said to have been banished from Judah by Asa (1 K 15¹²). References to them are found also in 1 K 14²⁴ 22⁴⁷ (46), 2 K 23⁷, Job 36¹⁴, while we meet with kədəshōth in Gn 38²¹ and Hos 4¹⁴.

SODOMITISH SEA, THE (mare Sodomiticum), 2 Es 5⁷.—A name for the Dead Sea. One of the signs of the times to come there given is that 'the Sodom sea shall cast out fish (cf. Ezk 47⁷ for the belief that fish could not live in its waters), and make a noise in the night which many have not known.' This is the only passage in the Bible or the Apocr. which directly connects the lake with the Cities of the Plain; and even here the name may be derived from the closeness of Sodom to the lake, and not from the incorrect theory of that city having been submerged by the Dead Sea.

SOLEMN, SOLEMNITY.—Derived through Old Fr. solempne from Lat. sollemnis (from sollus, entire, and annus, a year), 'solemn' means properly that which occurs annually, and is thence applied to any stated or regular occurrence. Thus Mt 27¹⁸ Wyc. 'But for a solempne day (Rhem. 'upon the solempne day') the justise was wonte to delyvere to the puple on bounden'; Lk 24¹ Wyc. 'And his fadir and modir wenten echie yeer into Ierusalem, in the solempne daie of pask' (Rhem. 'at the solempne day of Pasche'). And t'en, as that which was stated, especially when public, was frequently grand or ceremonious, 'solemn' assumes this meaning; thus Shaks. Tit. Andron. ii. i. 112, 'A solemn hunting is in hand'; Macbeth, iii. i. 14, 'To-night we hold a solemn supper, sir.' Such an occasion might be merry or sad, according to its nature; whence Chaucer, Prologue, 209—

'A Frere ther was, a wantoun and a merye,
A limitour, a ful solempne man.'

Chaucer uses the word simply in the sense of 'public' in Persones Tale, 105, 'The spyces of Penitence been three. That oon of hem is solempne, another is commune, and the thridde is privee.'

These examples illustrate the use of the word in AV. In all its numerous occurrences it signifies 'stated' or 'public,' having no Heb. word corresponding to itself, but being used along with assembly or meeting for מִסְבָּח or מִסְבָּח (see Driver on Am 5²¹); with feast or day sometimes (as Nu 10¹⁰, La 1⁴, Hos 2¹¹) for מִסְבָּח * (prop. stated time, then used esp. of stated sacred seasons [see Lv 23² RVm 'appointed seasons']) 'solemn feast'; also thrice in AV (Nah 1¹², Mal 2⁸, Ps 81³) for מִסְבָּח, and (with keep) for מִסְבָּח Dt 6¹⁸ [RV omits 'solemn,' harmonizing with Lv 23³⁰].† It is easy to understand how the modern sense of 'serious,' 'grave,' or 'gloomy' arose, but in AV that sense is never present.

The expression 'with a solemn sound' occurs in Ps 92³ ('Upon the harp with a solemn sound'), on which de Witt remarks, 'Heb. higgayōn, from the verb higgāh, which is imitative of any low, suppressed sound, and especially applicable to the soft trill of the harp. The English Bible has the rendering 'solemn sound,' which does not at all represent the meaning of the word.' Not now, for the next verse says, 'For thou, Lord, hast made me glad'; but 'solemn' once expressed gladness as readily as gravity. Elyot (Governour, l. 41) speaks of the theatre as 'an open place where al the people of Rome behelde solempne acts and playes.'

In accordance with the meaning of 'solemn,' solemnity always means a sacred or ceremonious occasion. It is the tr. of hāw, a feast, in Is 30²⁹ ('in the night when a holy solemnity [RV 'a holy feast'] is kept'); and of mō'ēd, a (sacred) season, in Dt 31¹⁶ (RV 'set time'), Is 33²⁰ (RV 'solemnity,' RVm 'set feast'), Ezk 45¹⁷ (RV 'appointed feast'), 46¹¹ (RV 'solemnity,' RVm 'appointed feast'). The word also occurs in Sir 50¹⁹ 'the s. of the Lord' (κῶσμος Κυρίου, RV 'worship of the Lord,' RVm 'Gr. adornment'); and 2 Mac 15³⁸ 'in no case to let that day pass without s.' (ἀπαρασῆματον, RV 'undistinguished'). Cf. Shaks. Mids. Night's Dream, v. i. 376—

'A fortnight hold we this solemnity,
In nightly revels and new jollity.'

And so also solemnly means sacredly or ceremoniously, Gn 43³ 'The man did solemnly protest unto us' (AVm 'Heb. protesting he did protest'); 1 S 8⁹ 'Howbeit yet protest solemnly unto them'; 2 Mac 14¹ 'of the boughs which were used solemnly in the temple' (τῶν νομιζομένων θαλλῶν τοῦ ἱεροῦ). Cf. Fuller, Holy War, 338, 'His [the prince's] clothes are such as may besem his Greatness, especially when he solemnly appears, or presents himself to forrein Embassadors.'

J. HASTINGS.

SOLOMON (שְׁלֹמֹה; BA Σαλωμών, Luc. Σολομών and Σαλομών, NT and Josephus Σολομών).—The third king of Israel, a son of David and Bathsheba.

1. The Name.—Another name Jedidiah (יְדִידְיָה 'beloved of Jah'; B יְדִידְיָה, A Εἰδιδία, Luc. Ἰδιδιά) was given him by the prophet Nathan as a pledge that the Lord would be specially gracious to him, and that his father was restored to the Divine favour. As that name, however, occurs only once (2 S 12²⁵), we may infer that it never came into common use. Not improbably it may have been deemed too sacred for such use. The name Jedidiah has the same root as David, viz. ידד 'a primitive caressing word.' Wellhausen and others conform the Heb. text of 2 S 12²⁵ to the Vulg. and represent David as the originator of the name. The hypothesis is unlikely considering the difference of the relations of David and Nathan to J^h at overtrained in describing the habits of the Gentile inhabitants of Eastern countries will be clear from the account given by Prof. Rawlinson of the character of even the highly civilized Phœnicians of Tyre and Sidon: History of Phœnicia.

the time when the name was given, and that the name was a sacred one and the vehicle of a Divine message. Cheyne (art. 'Jedidiah' in Enc. Bibl.) not only alters the text but makes for it a new context, and so arrives at the original and remarkable result that Jedidiah was David's first son by Bathsheba, and that he called his second son by her not Shēlōmōh, but 'Shillūmō' (שִׁלְמוֹ, i.e. 'his compensation') because of Jedidiah. According to that finding, Solomon was never called Jedidiah. Nor was he entitled to the name of Solomon. His real name was Shillūmō, although no Hebrew king is known to have borne that name. It is difficult to see where, on the hypothesis of Cheyne, the consolation of David could come in. Nor is it probable that any Hebrew king would call his son by the name Shillūmō. Shillūmah is only used in the OT once (Ps 91⁸), and it is in the sense not of compensation but of retribution, the reward of the wicked (so shillūm in Hos 9⁷, Is 34⁸). Shillām and shālōnīm are also each used once (Mic 7³, Is 1²⁸) of 'rewards' in the sense of bribes.

According to one reading of 2 S 12²⁴, it was Bathsheba that gave her son the name of Solomon. She may have done so. In the OT more instances are mentioned of the names of children being given by their mother than by their father. In a number of cases the names are said to have been given by both parents, and that may have been so as regards Solomon, although the evidence for David's participation in the act is positive, and that for Bathsheba's only problematical. According to one account of David's naming of Solomon, he is represented as having acted under the belief that God had expressly directed him to give the child the name he did. The Chronicler (1 Ch 22⁹) describes him as telling his successor that he had himself proposed to build a temple to J^h, but that the word of J^h had forbidden him because of the blood he had shed, while promising him that the work would be accomplished by a son who would bear the name of Solomon, and have a reign of peace and quietness. Whether that statement be historically accurate or not cannot be decided by the merely historical evidence in our possession. There is, however, no internal impossibility in the account of the state of mind ascribed to David. On the contrary, that is psychologically quite natural. The name Shēlōmōh (Solomon) means 'peaceful,' 'pacific,' like the Gr. Irenaeus and Ger. Friedrich. And when Solomon was born, David was a man whose strength had been exhausted in warfare, and who was keenly sensible of the blessings of peace both for a king and a kingdom. Hence it was altogether natural that at that period of time he should have given the name Solomon to a son on whom he placed high expectations and for whom he desired a happier life than his own, and very conceivable even that he may have felt that God directed him to name his child as he did. The name was certainly one which indicated well a prominent and distinctive feature of both the character and reign of Solomon. Although he ruled as an absolute monarch, allowed no rivals, and did not hesitate to crush dangerous adversaries, he was not naturally cruel, and had no taste for war. He was a man of peace—the most peace-loving, perhaps, of the Hebrew kings; and under his sway there was for about forty years in Palestine, not absolute peace indeed, either as regards contentment within or cessation of hostility from without, but such peace as the Hebrew nation had never known before or was ever to know again.

2. The Sources.—The chief sources of information regarding the life and reign of Solomon are contained in the books of Kings and Chronicles. The narrative in Kings (1 K 1–11⁴³) is closely connected with a section of the books of Samuel (2 S 11–20). The latter is also a continuous narrative. It leads steadily up to the story in Kings, and shows in a graphic and picturesque way what obstacles blocked the way of Solomon's accession to the throne, and how unlikely it was that he would have reached it had J^h not specially loved and favoured him. Along with the narrative in Kings it forms a whole in which there is both unity of plan and similarity of style. Both of our oldest sources are far from being contemporary documents. The record in Kings is historically much the more valuable; but the compilation even of Kings cannot have been completed until about 400 years after the death of Solomon. The compilation of Chronicles was not completed until at least three centuries later.

The author of the account in Chron. made use of the account in Kings, and added to it only little information of a strictly historical character. The author of the account in Kings refers (1 K 11⁴¹) to an older account 'the book of the annals of Solomon.' The author of the account in Chron. refers (2 Ch 9²⁹) to (a) 'the words of Nathan the prophet,' (b) 'the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite,' and (c) 'the vision of Iddo the seer.' See artt. KINGS and CHRONICLES. Through the hands of what authors and editors Kings and Chron. passed before they reached their present form no one knows, and even the process by which they became what they are has been only vaguely ascertained. The loss of older records than those which we possess is all the more to be regretted, as both Kings and Chron. were written largely under the influence of religious motives and with a view to religious edification. Merely to record events and trace their connexions, causes, and course of movement had no interest for the authors of them. What they were chiefly concerned with was how they might make known the hand and voice of God in His dealings with Israel, and with her friends and foes. The authors of the accounts in Samuel, Kings, and Chron. were manifestly men of limited views, men of their time, and much influenced in what they wrote by the feelings and beliefs prevalent in their social medium. They are entitled, however, to be credited with honesty and piety in intention. Their account has its faults. Although they assign a comparatively large space to Solomon, they give us no very precise or vivid description either of his private life or public career, and no distinct view of the order of succession of events in his reign. They may not be wholly to blame for that, nor may it be much to be regretted that they did not succeed better. Seemingly, the character of Solomon was one exceptionally difficult to portray. Saul and David were far more interesting personages, and it is natural that they should have been presented in a far more lifelike manner. Solomon is left by his biographers an imposing but very indistinct figure. Was that, however, not just as it should be? Was not want of reality his great want? If so, could he have been more truly and wisely represented than he was? The accounts given of him in both Kings and Chron. are priestly in tone and tendency, but that in Chron. is much more so than that in Kings. The general view given of the character and reign of Solomon in the latter is far more discriminating than that in the former. While in Kings the glory of Solomon is dwelt on with patriotic pride, the mischievousness of his conduct is also clearly set forth, whereas in Chron. what tends to glorify him is alone dwelt on, and what was unworthy of his reputation, judged of from a Levitical point of view, is either passed over unnoticed or very slightly indicated. There are no traces, however, of conscious dishonesty in the Chronicler, no grounds for holding him to have stated what he did not believe, while it is of great advantage to have two accounts which so far agree and so far differ. The Chronicler assumed certain preconceptions current in his age as to the history of his people to be unquestionably true, and wrote his history in conformity with those preconceptions. That, however, is what all historians do, even the most advanced and critical. History cannot be written without preconceptions, and preconceptions cannot but lead to conclusions which must appear to those who do not accept them falsifications of the historical data. The Chronicler's pride in the glory of Solomon and in the position attained by Israel under him, the exaggerated importance which he assigned to priests and priestly things, his prodigality as regards number, and other peculiarities, are themselves most instructive, because characteristic of him not as an individual merely, but also as a representative of the time and society to which he belonged. His estimate of the conduct of Solomon does not substantially differ from that given in Kings. It amounts to a severe condemnation—one all the more severe coming as it does from a writer so biased in his favour—of the evil which he had done notwithstanding his vast means and opportunities of doing good.

The fragments of ancient historians quoted by Josephus (Ant. viii. ii. 6), by Eusebius of Caesarea (Præp. Ev. ix. 34), and by Clemens Alex. (Strom. i. 386) add little, if anything, to our knowledge of Solomon beyond what is stated in Kings and Chronicles. The narrative of Josephus himself in Ant. viii. i.–viii. depends almost entirely on the Biblical records. Where he deviates from them, he is rarely to be trusted. It is noteworthy that he describes Solomon as a powerful sorcerer. That had already become in his time a generally accepted belief among the Jews, and probably was not confined to them. It is especially as a sorcerer and lord over the elements, animals, aphræts and jinn, that he is renowned in the East. The Oriental imagination has run riot in the invention of legends regarding him.*

The writings long attributed to Solomon, to be found in the OT or the Apocrypha, cannot in the present state of opinion among Biblical critics as to their authorship be assumed to supply materials for his biography. He may have been the author of a few of the Psalms and a number of the Proverbs, but to prove him so and to establish which are his is difficult. The SONG OF SONGS cannot be his, but it has a historical value dependent neither upon its date nor its authorship, but on its testimony to the impression which Solomon's character had left on certain Jewish minds. The WISDOM OF SOLOMON, which professes to have Solomon for author, shows what impression he had left on a very different class of minds at a still later date. As to the relation of ECCLESIASTES to Solomon, see art. in the present work and in Enc. Biblica; cf. also Sir 42¹⁸⁻²². Considerable sidelight has been cast on the Solomonic age in Israel by archaeological and historical investigations, but it has not so much increased our knowledge of Solomon himself as of his buildings, the topography of his capital, the geography of his kingdom, the ethnology and ancient history of it, and the state of the countries with which the Israel of his time was brought into contact,—subjects which cannot be dealt with in this article. Modern criticism of the Biblical sources has dispelled many erroneous views regarding Solomon's life and reign; but it has, of course, not increased, and cannot be expected to increase, that knowledge of positive facts regarding them, which is the great desideratum.

Or.*, Herbelot's Bibl. Or. 333, and the historians Abulfeda, Tabari, and Ludolph (Hist. Eth.) may also be referred to. M. D. Conway in his Solomon and Solomonic Literature (Open Court Pub. Co., Chicago, 1900) deals with the Solomon mythology as a whole in an ingenious but often very arbitrary way. He considers 'the external and historical data insufficient to prove certainly that an individual Solomon ever existed' (p. 1).

3. Birth, parentage, and training.—The account of the birth of Solomon in 2 S 12²⁴⁻²⁵ conveys the impression that he was the second child of David and Bathsheba. The lists of their children in 2 S 5¹⁴, 1 Ch 3⁶, and 1 Ch 14⁴, on the other hand, seem to imply that he was their fourth child, their youngest son, and that Shammua (or Shimea), Shobab, and Nathan had been previously born to them, as in all those lists his name is mentioned last. No quite satisfactory explanation of the apparent discrepancy has yet been given. The likeliest, perhaps, is that Solomon was mentioned last as being the most important member of the family group, the heir to his father's throne.

Nathan, by his rebuke of David, lost none of his influence with either him or Bathsheba, and continued to be the friend of both. He prophesied good for their child, and strongly supported his cause at the moment when it was most in danger. Owing to that and the vagueness of a phrase in 2 S 12²⁵, he has very generally been held to have had the charge of Solomon's education. There is, however, no real foundation for the opinion. Scarcely any information is given us regarding Solomon previous to his elevation to the throne. It may safely be inferred from what he was in manhood that his education had not been neglected in youth, and that he must have been very receptive of learning and eager to excel in accomplishments; but there is nothing to indicate that he was trained under any prophet, or that he was in sympathy with anything distinctive of prophetic teaching or prophetic ideals of life. There is no trace of Nathan, or any other prophet, having had any influence over him when king. The prophetic ministry almost disappeared during his reign. What prophets there were in Israel in his day were opposed to his policy. Far more probably he was educated in his father's palace. In various respects the court of David must have been the best school possible for the education of David's successor, while in others one most apt to develop the defects so conspicuous in Solomon's after-life. The atmosphere of a court presided over by David, and agitated by the internal dissensions and conflicting passions to which despotic power and polygamy combined necessarily gave rise, cannot have been favourable to his healthy moral growth.

There is no definite information given us as to how far or in what ways he was influenced by his mother; but there can be no reasonable doubt that her influence was considerable. To have retained the hold which she had upon David and the rank which she held among his wives, she must have been more than merely 'a very beautiful woman' (2 S 11²). She must have been also a talented and sagacious one. That she was in close alliance with Nathan, that Adonijah sought her aid on his behalf in the belief that her son would refuse nothing that she asked, and that Solomon received her with the utmost reverence when she presented herself before him, are indications of fact which all point in one direction. We may accordingly infer that she had considerably contributed to the formation of Solomon's character.

4. Adonijah's rebellion.—There is very little further information given regarding Solomon previous to his accession to the throne. The account in 1 Ch 22¹⁻¹⁹ describes David's preparation for the building of the temple, and records his charges to Solomon and the princes. If it be in its proper place in the book—a point on which there is room for difference of opinion—it clearly shows that Adonijah's rebellion was inexcusable. There is, however, nothing elsewhere to correspond to it, nor are there any means afforded us of verifying what needs verification in it. The rebellion of ADONIJAH was what necessitated the elevation of Solomon to the throne before his father's death. Adonijah was then, perhaps, his father's eldest son, and may naturally have considered himself to have had on that ground a preferential claim to the throne. There was at that time, however, no authoritative law or settled precedent to regulate the succession.

Adonijah himself does not seem to have rested his claim on right or precedent, but on the goodwill of the people. 'Thou knowest,' he said to Bathsheba when obviously trying to make the most of his own cause,—'thou knowest that the kingdom was mine, and that all Israel set their faces on me, that I should reign: howbeit the kingdom is turned about, and is become my brother's: for it was his from the Lord' (1 K 2¹⁵). That is a very intelligible view, and all the more so that we know the people of Israel in the time of David and Solomon unquestionably felt that they had some right to consideration in the appointment of their kings. The Northern tribes unmistakably showed that when they rejected Solomon's only son. It is none the less very misleading to speak of Adonijah as 'the rightful heir' to the throne, as Stade and some other critics do. The 'rightful heir to the throne' in an absolute monarchy such as Israel had become under David, was the son nominated by the reigning monarch. It has been so in all such monarchies; and wherever polygamy has prevailed in these monarchies, younger sons have been often appointed to the exclusion of the eldest. The present Shah of Persia is an instance of 'a rightful monarch,' although he has an older and, it is said, exceptionally able brother. The appointment of the youngest son to the throne was very common in the despotisms of India.

Adonijah, it would seem, was 'a very goodly man,' captivating in his manners, fond of display and magnificence, ambitious, and scheming. He made it quite apparent that he wished to be king, assumed royal honours, and gained over to his side powerful allies, in Joab the general of the army, Abiathar the priest, and the princes of the royal house. In a word, he began to play the rôle of the ill-fated Absalom. The conspirators may possibly have deemed that his seniority of birth or superiority of qualifications gave him a right to reign. They may also have possibly deemed that it was expedient for him to ascend the throne at once owing to David's bodily weakness. But they were certainly engaged in a real and formidable conspiracy kept secret from the king, and meant to set him aside and to thwart his wishes. Their attempt does not seem to have been either skillfully planned or strongly supported in popular feeling. The account given of it and of its failure in 1 K 1²⁻³⁰ distinctly conveys that impression.

As soon as divulged, the whole plot came to naught.*

5. Commencement of reign and first acts.—David soon afterwards died, and Solomon succeeded him without opposition. The year in which he began to reign has not been determined, nor are there yet known data for doing so exactly. He is said both in Kings and Chron. to have reigned forty years; but that may be a round, not an exact, number. If exact, however, we may assign about B.C. 970 as the time at which he began to reign, since there are good reasons for considering B.C. 930 as about the first year of Jeroboam's reign—the year in which Solomon died.

The Jewish and Arabic tradition that Solomon was only twelve years old when he began to reign, obviously originated in misconception of the meaning of the words in 1 K 3¹ 'I am but a little child; I know not how to go out or come in,' etc.; words not to be taken literally, but as a humble confession of inadequacy, owing to youth and inexperience, for the great task of royalty. The generally received view that he was about twenty years old when he began to reign cannot be far amiss. According to Josephus, Solomon began to reign when he was fourteen years of age; but, in the same sentence he tells us he reigned eighty years, and died at the age of ninety-four (Ant. viii. vii. 8). He does not mention the source of his information.†

The first concern of Solomon as king naturally was to make his seat secure. The Chronicler characteristically says nothing regarding the way in which he established himself in his kingdom. The whole account, however, in 1 K 2¹³⁻³⁵ seems worthy of credence. It represents Solomon as acting with great decision and vigour, and yet as not inflicting punishment beyond what was deemed necessary. He struck only at the heads of the conspiracy which had been formed against him. Considering that he was an Oriental ruler, not his cruelty but his clemency was exceptional. David is not recorded to have advised the taking of any strong measures against Adonijah, and Solomon had granted him a pardon accompanied with a stern warning. Very naturally, however, and probably quite correctly, he interpreted his request to have Abishag for a wife as a proof that he had not abandoned his pretensions to the throne. Bathsheba, it has been argued, would not have communicated the request to her son if she had deemed it treasonable in intention. Perhaps not, but perhaps also she did not act in earnest for the good of the son of Haggith. Abiathar was leniently dealt with in consideration of his past loyalty. David, according to 1 K 2², had advised the putting to death of Joab; but, even if he did not do so (see art. JOAB), Solomon could not have been expected to spare his life. Joab was the most dangerous enemy he could possibly have in all Israel. He was so resolute, so able, so much a favourite with the army, that even David had not been able to keep him in check. Not inferior, and seemingly even superior, to David as a commander, there was no one left in Israel to compare with him in military ability. His successor Benaiah was a valiant warrior, and an efficient tool for an absolute ruler to have at hand, but there is no evidence that he was a great general. Joab could neither have respect for the character of a man like Solomon, nor sympathy with his policy; indeed a reign like that of Solomon could hardly have been possible so long as Joab was at the head of the Hebrew army. The view of Guthe and others, that David and Solomon hoped that the putting of Joab to death would avert the vengeance which his crimes might otherwise bring upon the house of David may be correct, but it is not necessary to account for his death. Resentment and policy are sufficient to account for it. They also account best for the way in which Shimei was dealt with. It does not appear that he was implicated in the conspiracy, but he had been a bitter enemy of David, was suspected of being still disloyal and hostile to the house of David, and, on account of his influence with the Benjamites, was deemed dangerous to the peace and comfort of the new monarch.

6. Convocation at Gibeon, dream and request.—The way in which Solomon dealt with the enemies whom he had recently feared could not fail greatly to 'strengthen him in his kingdom.' He not only thereby got rid of them, but showed to his subjects that young as he was he was neither weak nor foolish, but a shrewd and capable man who could effectively discharge the functions of a king, and might be hoped to act neither capriciously nor cruelly. To have gained so great a triumph at the very commencement of his reign was enough to secure his popularity, for with the populace of all times and places 'nothing succeeds like success.' When he felt himself secure on his throne he resolved to make manifest his gratitude to J^h, and proceeded to do so on a scale indicative of his taste for magnificence and display in worship, as in other things. He called a convocation of his captains, judges, governors, and heads of houses, at the ancient city of Gibeon, where was a famed bāmāh, 'a great high place,' and there, surrounded by his dignitaries, he offered in thanks to God a thousand burnt-offerings—'a thousandfold holocaust'—on the brazen altar which stood before the sanctuary and could be seen from afar. On the following night the king dreamed that J^h appeared to him and asked what He should give him, and that he replied by asking 'an understanding heart to judge aright' the great people entrusted to his charge while so young and inexperienced. He dreamed also that, because such had been his request, God promised him not only what he asked for—wisdom and knowledge—but also wealth and honour, and, conditionally, however, on conformity to the Divine law, length of days. The dream was naturally accepted by the king as a Divine communication. To Solomon there seems to have never been vouchsafed any clearer or higher form of Divine revelation than the dream.

7. Solomon's judgment.—According to his biographer in Kings, he was soon afforded an opportunity of displaying the wisdom which he had asked for and received. From Gibeon he returned to Jerusalem, where the ark of the covenant was now located in the tabernacle erected by David on Mount Zion, and there also presented offerings to J^h, and likewise made a feast to all his servants. At Jerusalem he was forthwith called to pronounce a decision between two harlots who both claimed the same live child while each affirmed that a dead one was her neighbour's. The way at which he at once arrived at the truth immediately made him famous, and has greatly helped to maintain his reputation for wisdom ever since. It showed an instinctive insight into the workings of the human heart very remarkable in so young a man, and a keenness of practical discernment of a kind invaluable.

* Wellhausen, Stade, and other eminent critics represent Nathan and Bathsheba, Zadok and Benaiah, as conspirators, and the choice of Solomon by David as the result of a palace intrigue. It is possible to think so, but the supposition appears to the present writer to be merely conjectural. As to what is related of David's advice to Solomon in 1 K 2¹⁻¹² and 1 Ch 21⁶⁻¹⁹ and 28-29¹⁻²², see the art. DAVID in the present work, and Enc. Bib., and the commentators mentioned under heading of Literature.

† Perhaps 1 K 3¹⁴ sufficed to suggest to him the eighty years' reign and ninety-four years of life. It is not unlikely, however, that earlier Jewish authors may have written to the same effect. The promise of length of days was a merely conditional one, and Solomon did not fulfil the condition. Stade rightly holds it as certain that Solomon must have reigned over thirty years, but inconclusively infers from 1 K 15¹ and 2 Ch 12¹³ that he could not have reigned forty years (see his GVI i. 307).

able in one whose chief duty was to act as the supreme judge in all disputed cases throughout Israel. That 'all Israel heard of it, and feared the king, for they saw that the wisdom of God was in him, to do judgment,' may well be believed. That there was nothing miraculous in it may as reasonably be admitted. Innumerable examples of the same kind of wisdom as remarkable and as well authenticated might easily be given. Far more wonderful stories of a similar kind are told of Solomon himself, but they are entirely fictitious. The story, as told in 1 K 3¹⁰⁻²⁸, can alone be regarded as historical narrative. Josephus (Ant. VIII. ii. 2) seems to have had no other source of information, yet he gives a very distorted version of it. He represents the king as proposing to divide both the dead and the live child, and the people as privately laughing at the proposal as that of a mere youth.*

8. Solomon's policy dependent on David's.—The task which fell to Solomon was that of building up a kingdom on a foundation already laid and on lines already drawn. A reign like his was only made possible by what Samuel, Saul, and David had accomplished. Samuel, the last of the Judges, was also the first of them whose influence extended over all Israel, and was powerful enough to reconstruct the theocracy on a monarchical basis. Saul, by his struggles with the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and Amalekites, rendered comparatively easy the consolidation of all the tribes of Israel into a nation under David. It was David, however, who made the policy of Solomon feasible, who indicated both by his counsels and example how it could be carried into effect, and who enabled him to start with a sufficiency of the means necessary to enter on his schemes of ambition and to revolutionize the manners and the ideals of Israel. Solomon seems to have done little which his father had not initiated: both imitated the doings and methods of Oriental despots.

9. His military policy.—Solomon had not the genius requisite to extend his kingdom. He seems to have had no military taste or talent; and certainly the glory of the conqueror he but little sought and little won. He was content to maintain and develop what he had inherited, and to abstain from dangerous adventures. The weak condition of the surrounding States would have presented to an ambitious warrior-king a strong temptation to attempt to create a powerful Semitic empire, which, if unified and vivified by faith in J', might have anticipated Islam by a millennium and a half and given the history of Israel a very different direction. Yet Solomon, far from being a feeble or incapable monarch, was an able, shrewd, and enterprising one, who knew well how to magnify his office, further his interests, and attain his ends. He must have had very exceptional administrative talent, and he applied it to military as well as civil organization. Not otherwise could he have preserved for forty years the security and unity of a nation so recently and loosely constituted; kept down its strong disruptive tendencies; and prosecuted a policy which must have been obnoxious to the majority of his subjects. Although he did not increase his territory, he kept a firm hold of it, and made his sphere of influence much wider than his father's had been. His troubles with HADAD, REZON, and JEROBOAM prove nothing to the contrary. The account of them given in 1 K 11¹⁻⁴⁰ is placed—obviously with a view to religious edification—in the closing period of his reign, instead of at or near its commencement; and the information which it conveys, although it may be received as trustworthy so far as it goes, is scanty, and cannot be supplemented either from other Biblical or non-Biblical sources. It does not appear that Solomon's adversaries gained much advantage over him. Hadad was doubtless, and very excusably, as troublesome a neighbour to him and his people as he could be, and did them all the 'mischief' in his power; but there is no evidence that he became king of Edom, or that Edom under him secured independence. The fact that the port of Elath remained in Solomon's hands showed that the king of Israel was the overlord of Edom. As regards Rezon ben-Hadiada, he may have made himself master of Damascus even in the lifetime of David. There is no evidence of David's having had an acknowledged and effective suzerainty over Syria. And, besides, although we are told that Rezon 'was a foe to Israel all the days of Solomon,' it does not appear that he succeeded in seizing any portion of Israelitish territory. Jeroboam's attempt to stir up sedition against him can still less relevantly be referred to as evidence of his weakness, seeing that it was a failure, and Jeroboam did not venture to return from Egypt until he heard that Solomon was dead.

Solomon left out of his military calculations the possibilities neither of invasion from without nor of insurrection from within. He strengthened his capital by the construction of fortifications which David had only begun or merely contemplated. See art. MILLO. He established fortified cities, well-garrisoned and well-provisioned, at well-chosen strategic points (see HAZOR, MEGIDDO, GEZER, BETH-HORON, BAALATH, TAMAR). He thus guarded the kingdom against attack at all its more vulnerable points, as well as increased the safety of the sacred city. By adding to his army a force of 12,000 horsemen and 1400 war chariots, he must have greatly increased its efficiency. The innovation was unpopular among the ultra-conservative and superstitious portion of the community, but it was a real improvement. In the plains of N. Palestine, on the borders of Philistia, and in most directions beyond the national boundaries, cavalry could not fail to be of great advantage. The Canaanites had employed it with success against the Israelites in the time of the Judges. Before its adoption by Solomon it had come into use in all the neighbouring States. Once introduced, it was adhered to so long as Israel and Judah retained their independence.

10. A prominent feature of Solomon's policy was his full recognition of the importance of interna-

* There is no mention of the incident in Chronicles. The story told by Diodorus Siculus of Ariophanes, king of Thrace, in general character resembles very closely that of Kings. On the death of the king of the Cimmerians, three young men appeared before Ariophanes claiming to be the only son of the deceased king, without producing adequate evidence for the truth of their claims. Ariophanes ordered them to hurl a javelin at the corpse of their alleged father. Two consented, but one refused, and he was declared to be the true son and heir of the deceased monarch. Another parallel is the account which Suetonius gives of a judgment of Claudius (Lives of the Twelve Caesars). A woman refused to acknowledge that a young man who claimed to be her son was so. In the absence of other means of deciding on which side was the truth, the emperor ordered the woman to marry the youth, and so obliged her to acknowledge that the latter was her son. Most of the Oriental parallels have a manifestly mythical and fabulous setting. In some of them, however, the resemblance is so close as to amount almost to verbal repetition. See Benfey's Pantschatantra, i. 394-396, ii. 544, also Kleine Schriften, 3rd Abt. 171 ff.; Eng. tr. of the 'Kah-Gyur' (Trübner's Or. Ser.)—the tale of Visakhā; Weber's Indische Streifen, iii. 60 (also T. Steele's An Eastern Love Story, Trübner, 1871, pp. 218 f., 248 f.); Reinh. Kohler, GGA, 1872, pp. 1219-1221; Fausboll, Buddhist Birth Stories, tr. by Rhys Davids, vol. i. xiv-xvi; and Rev. de l'Histoire de Rel. xxxviii. (1898), art. by Leclère, 'Une version cambodgienne du Jugement de Salomon', 176-187. In the last-mentioned version, a mother, her child, a female ogress in woman's form, and a Buddhist Solomon, 'the noble Mohosoth,' are the parties. To the questions whether the stories of the judgments of Solomon, Ariophanes, and Claudius are legendary or historical, and whether the judgment of Solomon originated in the Indian stories or had its origin in India, definite answers do not seem to have been as yet arrived at.

tional alliances. He immensely increased his power and influence by the treaties which he formed with the rulers of neighbouring States. The most advantageous of them was that formed with Hiram, king of Tyre—the continuation of an alliance formed in the time of David, but utilized by Solomon to an immensely greater extent than by David. Without it Solomon could not have given effect either to a commercial policy or to his desire to build the temple and beautify Jerusalem. It was for the manifest benefit of both the contracting parties. To Hiram it ensured, in case of attack from the landward side of his kingdom, the aid of a powerful army in its defence; an abundant supply at all times of such commodities as corn, oil, and wine; an enlarged traffic with the Hebrews by way of Joppa; and the opening up of the Yām Sûph (so-called Red Sea), and of the ocean beyond it, to the enterprise of his mariners and merchants. To Solomon it was equally advantageous. It enabled him to enter into mercantile copartnership with Hiram, and in conjunction with him to have ships trading both in the Mediterranean and the Red Sea. Whatever may have been the exact position of TARSHISH and OPHIR, Solomon must have had vessels on both seas. If Elath and Ezion-geber were open to him, Joppa or Dor was still more so. He was not the man to make a foolish bargain, or to prefer doing business on a small to a large scale. That he derived annually from his foreign trade as much revenue as his historians (1 K 10¹⁴, 2 Ch 9¹³) state is very difficult to believe. The trade, however, may well have been a very lucrative one. And, obviously, without the aid of Hiram and his subjects Solomon could have found neither the ships nor the men necessary to him for engaging in it. Nor was he less dependent on the skill and tastes of Phœnician artists and artisans for the construction and ornamentation of the buildings on which his desires were set, and to which he was to owe so much of his fame in future ages. His own subjects were incapable of supplying workmen of the kind needed, whereas the Phœnicians were famous for their proficiency in architecture and the plastic arts. It was chiefly from Phœnicia that Hebrew art was derived. In that sphere the influence of Egypt on Israel was not direct, but through Phœnicia.*

Next in importance to the Tyrian was the Egyptian alliance (1 K 3¹). The Pharaoh with whom Solomon entered into alliance is not named in the Bible, but must have been one of the last of the Tanite Pharaohs (perhaps the last—Pasebchamu II., called by Manetho Πασεβχης). Solomon obtained a daughter of the Pharaoh for his wife, and received with her as a dowry the town of Gezer, which her father had captured. Gezer was a valuable gift, and the marriage itself seems to have flattered the pride both of Solomon and of his subjects. In the age of the Chronicler and of the Jews of later times the marriage came to be regarded by the pious as disastrous, but there is no trace of such a feeling in the older historical sources. The first great edifice which Solomon caused to be built was not the temple of J^u, but a palace for the Egyptian princess. The daughter of Pharaoh was always the chief personage in his harem. In all probability she had received a much more comprehensive and refined education and training than his Moabite, Ammonite, Edomite, Sidonian, and Hittite wives and concubines. His own tastes, indeed, were of a kind which would have disposed him to imitate the style of life of a Pharaoh, but they must have been strengthened by his marriage with a Pharaoh's daughter. However explained, his ideal of kingship was the ideal which had for ages been conspicuously exemplified in Egypt. Like the Tyrian alliance, the Egyptian alliance was uninterrupted throughout his reign, and of the latter as of the former he would seem to have taken full advantage.* That he bought droves of horses and large numbers of chariots in Egypt and sold them at high prices to Hittite and Syrian kings may be fairly inferred from 1 K 10^{28, 29} and 2 Ch 1^{6, 17}, if by Mizraim in those verses Egypt be meant.† He also promoted and protected the carrying and caravan trade, which extended almost from the Nile to the Euphrates. He saw that the geographical position of Palestine—between the Mediterranean, Red Sea, and the Desert—gave him command of the chief highways of Asiatic commerce, and power to secure to himself a share of the profits of the greatest markets of the then known world (those of Egypt and Chaldaea), fully recognized the importance of trade and commerce, and acted accordingly. Therein lay, perhaps, his greatest originality as a Hebrew ruler. His predecessors—the Judges, Saul, and David—could not do so, continually engaged as they were in fierce struggles with their enemies in and around Palestine. The general result of their struggles made his wider and more humane views and schemes of policy possible and so far realizable; but to himself belongs the credit of their inception and prosecution.‡ Looked at in itself, his foreign policy must be pronounced on the whole a reasonable one. And it had good results. It was a policy of peace; it saved his subjects from the miseries of war; it enriched certain classes and benefited in some degrees other classes; it made the Hebrews better acquainted with the greatness, the wealth, and the state of civilization of the world around them, widened their views, corrected sundry prejudices, suggested improvements, and stimulated activity. It was, perhaps, the chief factor in making the Solomonic age the period of greatest material progress in the history of Israel. Yet it is quite possible to estimate too highly the external policy of Solomon, while quite impossible to estimate it aright without viewing it in relation to his internal policy. There is no evidence that it was disapproved of by his subjects, and he did not enter into, what would have been abhorrent to them, any alliance with the Canaanites; but it was the expression merely of the king's will, not of the national desire, and when the king died no one thought of continuing his policy. On the contrary, so long as the nation retained its national existence, it tended increasingly to self-isolation.

11. As regards the domestic policy of Solomon, the list of his chief officials in 1 K 4 is of special in-

* Neither the general Histories of Antiquity nor the special Histories of Ancient Egypt make any appreciable addition to what the Biblical historians tell us of the connexion between Israel and Egypt during the reign of Solomon. The lack of information is strange.

† Winckler holds that by Mizraim a N. Syrian Muṣri is meant (Alttest. Untersuch. 168 ff., and Alttest. Forsch. i. 24–41, 337, 338). Kittel, Benzinger, and others have accepted his view. Valuable, however, as his new facts are in themselves, they do not prove his Muṣri to be the Mizraim of Kings and Chronicles.

‡ According to Eusebius, as quoted by Eusebius (Præp. Ev. ix.), David began the maritime trade. The statement appears to be merely a conjecture suggested by the fact recorded in 2 S 8¹⁴, 1 K 11^{15, 16}, and 1 Ch 18¹², that David conquered the kingdom of Edom. Possibly David foresaw and suggested the use to which his conquest might be put. It is very unlikely, however, that at so late a stage of life he should have begun such an enterprise, and still more unlikely that, if he had begun it, he should not have got the credit of it.

* In the Histories of Phœnicia by Kenrick, Rawlinson, Movers, Pietschmann, in Renan's Mission en Phénicie, in CIS ii. tome 1 and 2, and in Perrot and Chipiez' Hist. de l'Art, much information is to be obtained as to the relations between the Phœnicians and the Hebrews. The reigns of Hiram and Solomon appear to have been contemporary almost all through, as the former is said (Menander, fr. 1) to have begun to reign when nineteen years old and to have been fifty-three years old when he died. The enumeration given in 1 K 7^{13ff.} of the qualifications of the Hiram who was Solomon's chief architect and artist, indicates what the Phœnicians could teach the Hebrews during the reign of Solomon.

terest, particularly when compared with the lists of those of David in 2 S 8¹⁶⁻¹⁸ and 20²³⁻²⁵, although of too general a nature to be definitely referable to any particular period. The comparison will show that David in the later years of his life had gone far in the direction followed by his son, and that between them they had effected a great revolution—economic, social, and political—in the national life of Israel. The old tribal system had been undermined and shattered, and a monarchical despotism of the only kind known in the East—one none the less a despotism in reality for being a theocracy—had been built up. The will of Solomon was practically the supreme law of his people, and neither priests nor prophets ventured to oppose it or to attempt to limit it. Throughout his reign all power in Israel was centred in himself and carried into effect by his officials. The list of his sārīm (princes or chief ministers) in 1 K 4²⁻⁶ does not contain the name of a single individual who can be supposed to have been an independent adviser. The name of Abiathar should not be in it, as he was a degraded and banished man during Solomon's reign. The sons of Nathan mentioned were much more probably the king's own nephews, the sons of his brother Nathan, than the sons of the prophet Nathan (but see vol. iii. p. 488^b). There was no prophet among Solomon's princes, nor any man not directly and entirely dependent upon him. We are not told that he made any direct attack on the old tribal systems. It seems erroneous to represent as such his division of the territory of Israel (that of Judah was exempted) into twelve districts, over which were appointed twelve 'officers' (nizzābīm), each bound to provide in regular monthly succession victuals for the king and his household, and provender for his horses and dromedaries. Those districts were not coextensive with the tribal territories. The officers to whom they were assigned did not displace the tribal chiefs, and had only a definite specific duty to perform. They were merely 'purveyors' or 'providers' for the king, his annonae curatores. But, although the old tribal system and its chiefs may not have been assailed, the claims of the monarchy were asserted and its powers exercised independently of them. The tribal system and the monarchy coexisted under Solomon, but the latter was so dominant that the king could introduce what changes he pleased. Tribal and personal privileges, rights, and liberties were at his mercy. Doubtless the nation realized only slowly that such was the case, and how dangerous a state of things it was. The monarchy had been a great success, and was regarded as a sacred institution. The king was 'the Lord's anointed.' The new king was young, beautiful in person, a rarely brilliant, attractive, and imposing personality; to outward seeming a perfect king. He was well aware that a great trust had been assigned to him, and he set a high value on equity in judgment and orderliness in administration. Many of his innovations must have been improvements. Some of his enterprises were largely successful. For a season the sun of prosperity shone so brightly on his reign that there may well have been great contentment and rejoicing in Israel. 1 K 4^{20, 25, 34} may be regarded as echoes of that time. But disillusionment was bound to come, and gradually came as what was radically evil in the government of Solomon gradually displayed itself. Entrusted with unlimited power, he yielded to the temptation to abuse it, and to enjoy it mainly for what he deemed his own honour and advantage. His policy, although not uninfluenced by worthy and pious aspirations, must be pronounced essentially selfish. The chief motives of it were the love of pleasure and power, of wealth and splendour and fame; its main object was to promote his own interest, to enrich and glorify himself, and to strengthen and magnify the Davidic dynasty. To obtain his ends he required to have recourse not only to measures obnoxious to chiefs of tribes, elders of cities, and holders of landed property, but to such as were most oppressive to the poorer classes. He reduced the Canaanites to slavery, and employed 180,000 of them in quarrying stones and bearing burdens. From the Israelites he exacted less labour; but they, too, were constrained to give personal services and to submit to heavy exactions. Thirty thousand of them were required to work by relays of ten thousand, every third month, in the forest of Lebanon. The statement to the contrary in 1 K 9²² and 2 Ch 8⁹ is an instructive, patriotic gloss, inconsistent with the general narratives either in Kings or Chronicles. The Hebrews under Solomon were no longer a free people. While not slaves in the strict sense of the word, they were subject to forced labour, 'the levy,' the mas—a term as hateful to them as were its equivalents, corvée or Frohn, in mediæval Europe. David had introduced the form of servitude denoted by it (2 S 20²⁴), but Solomon greatly increased it. The favouritism which he showed towards Judah in connexion with it must have made it all the more offensive to Israel, while it was doubtless one reason why Judah did not join Israel in the revolt against Rehoboam. The evils of the 'levy' could not fail to make themselves increasingly felt in the course of the building operations which were so conspicuous a part of the king's domestic policy. One of his chief aims was to have a strong and magnificent capital. It was a very reasonable aim within proper limits, but these he failed to recognize. To render Jerusalem as far as possible impregnable, and to make it a capital worthy of Israel and of being the centre of its political and especially of its religious life, was manifestly desirable. The fortifications and the temple of Jerusalem were for the benefit of all Israel. Like so many kings of his type, however, Solomon failed to see that there should be limits set to expensive building. He did not adequately realize that the territory of Israel was a very small one, and that, although he and those around him were rich, the general population—one in a transitional stage from pastoral to agricultural—was not. The cost of the superb buildings erected for himself and his dependants, added to the provisioning of a household containing many thousands of persons, the supply of what was required besides food to gratify the desires of his wives and concubines, and the expenditure on his splendid pageants, must have been an enormous burden on his subjects. No truly wise king would have persisted in such a policy. The natural result of it was just what actually happened. Whatever Judah thought, all Israel felt his yoke to have been intolerable; and when his son refused to lighten it, cried out, 'What portion have we in David? neither have we inheritance in the son of Jesse: to your tents, O Israel: now see to thine own house, David' (1 K 12¹⁶). Solomon was responsible for the disruption of the united kingdom of Israel and Judah, and for the consequences of it. That disruption, which led to the loss of the independence of both, was the natural result of the policy on which he acted throughout a forty years' reign.

12. The foregoing observations raise the question, What really was the wisdom which the Biblical historians attributed to Solomon? Certainly it was not wisdom in the higher significations in which the term is used either in the OT or the NT. There is teaching in Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and a few of the Psalms as to a

'wisdom' which is nowhere in Scripture attributed to Solomon. The wisdom of Solomon as described either in Kings or Chron. has very little in common with the wisdom inculcated by St. Paul, St. Peter, and St. James. Further, in what the Biblical writers say of the wisdom of Solomon there is nothing which implies that it included any of the supernatural attainments attributed to him in Jewish, Arabian, and Persian traditions, or even of any scientific or philosophic knowledge properly so called.* And it must be added, that although they ascribe his 'wisdom' to God, a gift in answer to prayer, they do not represent piety—the fear and love of God—as a prominent feature in his 'wisdom.' While declaring him to be the wisest of all men, they do not represent him as an especially devout or righteous man. In that respect David, notwithstanding his many defects and crimes, was regarded by them as far superior to him. So much, then, as to what the wisdom of Solomon was not. As to what it was, it comprehended at least the following elements:—(a) Possession of the qualities of mind—the quickness and accuracy of discernment and the practical sagacity—which are most indispensable to one who constantly requires to decide readily and correctly on which side truth and justice lie in disputed cases. Those qualities were of the utmost importance to a Hebrew king. Judicial functions had been the chief function of the 'judges,' and continued to be so of the kings. The king was the chief justice of the realm. David in his later years had been blamed for neglecting his judicial duties. The prayer of his son, on his accession to the throne, was for the knowledge and wisdom which would qualify him for the fulfilment of those duties. The judgment which he pronounced on the dispute between the two harlots was regarded by the people as evidence that his prayer had been granted. Seeking justice was by the Hebrews held to be sacred, inasmuch as it involved 'inquiry of God.' Almost all the Oriental legends regarding Solomon's wisdom which are not utterly extravagant are those which give the same kind of instances. An excellent and able judge, however, may not be an eminently good and wise man. He may be sadly lacking in true wisdom. (b) Possession of comparatively extensive knowledge and varied culture for a man of the time in which he lived. That Solomon was widely observant and inquisitive, interested in all that came under his notice and was likely to add to his knowledge, and that he could talk instructively on a great variety of subjects,—on trees and plants, beasts and fowls, creeping things and fishes, etc.,—must be admitted. 'The largeness of heart (rôhabh lëbh), even as the sand that is on the seashore,' ascribed to him in 1 K 4²⁹ [Heb. 5⁹], means merely, if properly understood, a comprehensiveness of mind, a many-sidedness of intelligence, of great and indefinite extent. There is nothing exaggerated or incredible in the phrase, which may perhaps have suggested what has been so finely said of Plato: 'His pliant genius sits close to universal reality, like the sea which fits into all the sinuosities of the land. Not a shore of thought was left untouched by his murmuring lip' (Ferrier, Inst. Met. p. 165). The wisdom of Solomon was wisdom at a very different stage from the wisdom of Socrates or Plato; but they may have been alike in implying 'largeness of heart,' universality of intellectual interests and activity. (c) There have also to be included in the wisdom of Solomon skill in propounding and solving riddles, in putting and answering hard and abstruse questions, and the faculty of expressing himself in mëshâlim, similitudes and parables, and proverbial or gnomic sentences which sum up in a pithy and memorable form the findings of prudential sagacity and moral reflexion. 1 K 4³³ states that he 'spoke three thousand proverbs.' One reason given for the visit of the queen of Sheba to his court was her desire to test the report which she had heard of him by 'proving him with hard questions.' The Phœnician historians quoted by Josephus (Ant. VIII. v. 3) relate that the Hebrew and the Tyrian king entered into a contest to determine which of them could solve riddles best, and that the former was at first successful, and won largely from his opponent, until the latter got the assistance of a very acute youth called Abdeemon, when Solomon was always defeated, and had to pay much money back to Hiram (see art. RIDDLE). In the time of Solomon, Israel passed from its heroic and imaginative age into a positive and practical one, resembling the stage in Hellenic history in which originated the practical maxims of the Greek 'sages' and the verses of the Greek 'gnomic' poets. The result in Israel was the rise of a new way of thinking and the beginnings of a new kind of literature, the whole development of which must have been greatly influenced by the character and reign of Solomon. How much, if anything, he personally contributed by speech or writing to the 'Wisdom literature' we do not know, and yet perhaps the whole of it, Biblical and Apocryphal, may be not inappropriately termed Solomonic. At the same time no one has probably been so overpraised for 'wisdom' as he, and that alike by Mohammedans, Jews, and Christians.* See, further, art. WISDOM.

* The knowledge of the language of birds attributed to Solomon in Jewish, Arabic, and Persian traditions was in Greek mythology ascribed to Tiresias. The Rabbis represented Solomon as the originator of the science and philosophy of the Greeks, Romans, and their successors. Aristotle was supposed to have gained his knowledge of natural history by appropriating Solomon's MSS when Alexander entered Alexandria. The Spanish theologian J. de Pineda, in lib. iii. pp. 111-208 of his De Rebus Salomonis, attributes to him mathematical, physical, astronomical, botanical, economic, ethical, and political writings, as well as many scientific discoveries. Theophilus Gale, Phil. Gener. § 8, maintains that Pythagoras and Plato got their symbolical and the Stoics their ethical philosophy, Hippocrates his knowledge of medicine, Aristotle of animals, and Theophrastus of plants—ex Salomonis schola. How greatly exaggerated, down even to recent times, has been his knowledge of theology may be learned from many of the commentaries published on the 'Song of Solomon,' and even from the 'headings' of our AV of that book.

13. Solomon is represented as excelling all contemporary kings in wealth as well as in wisdom. His father is said to have left him for building the temple 'one hundred thousand talents of gold and a thousand thousand talents of silver' (1 Ch 22¹⁴), a sum calculated to be equivalent to £1,025,000,000 sterling.† His annual revenue in money is stated (1 K 10¹⁴, 2 Ch 9¹³) to have amounted to 666 talents of gold, equal to £4,095,900 (see art. MONEY, vol. iii. p. 420^b); and besides payments in money he received large payments in kind, both from his own subjects and from foreigners. Hence he was able to spend vast sums in luxury and display. His great ivory throne, which came to figure so largely in Oriental tradition, was overlaid with pure gold; the shields of his bodyguard and the utensils of his palace

* For an admirable comparative study of Hebrew and Greek proverbial literature see H. Bois, La Poésie Gnomique chez les Hébreux et les Grecs: Salomon et Théognis, Toulouse, 1896. A careful comparative study of Hebrew and Egyptian proverbial wisdom is a great desideratum. Wisdom books akin to the Proverbs of the OT, and partly to Ecclesiastes, were produced in Egypt from about B.C. 3500 until about A.D. 200. It cannot reasonably be supposed that in the age of Solomon they were wholly unknown to the Hebrews. The sayings in the oldest of them—the Instructions or Maxims of Ptahhotep—often strikingly resemble those in Proverbs. Before and during the reign of Solomon Egypt was open both to Greeks and Jews. It does not follow that any of the Hebrew Wisdom books were composed in the time of Solomon.

† Prideaux's estimate, long generally accepted, was considerably less, viz. £833,000,000. Yet he added, 'the sum is so prodigious, as to give reason to think that the talents whereby the sum is reckoned were another sort of talents of a far less value than the Mosaic talents, of which an account is given in the preface' (Old and New Testament Connected, p. 5).

were all of gold. Silver, we are told, was nothing accounted of in his days; he made silver to be in Jerusalem as stones. Such is the account given us of his wealth. What are we to think of it? The statement as to the sum amassed by David for the building of the temple is, of course, incredibly large. The amount of annual revenue assigned to Solomon is not so, although very large. Probably it may have been his income merely for an exceptional year or years. That he was the wealthiest king known to his Hebrew contemporaries may well be believed. But even what is said of his wealth in Kings and Chron. suggests that he was only rich after the fashion of Oriental kings. His golden targes, golden utensils, and throne overlaid with gold, seem to imply that he could find little productive use for his gold. Gold came into circulation as money among the Hebrews only in the time of David, and probably it was little used by them as such in the time of Solomon. Various peoples have passed through a stage in which a pound of gold was willingly exchanged for a pound of silver or even of copper: The Shahs of Persia and Emirs of Scinde were not wealthier than are European monarchs, although they had, as a rule, vastly more treasure in the form of jewels and the precious metals. The value of the material of money depends largely on its purchasing power and rapidity of circulation. Had Solomon's silver, and still more had his gold, much of either? It is not likely that they had. Although he may have made silver as stones 'in Jerusalem,' there is nothing to indicate that it was plentiful outside of Jerusalem. There was gold in abundance at the court and among the king's officers and favourites, but there is no evidence of its having reached the farmers and peasants of Palestine. Probably in the form of money most of it got into the hands of the Phœnicians and other foreign traders. By the great extension of the royal domains during his reign, Solomon must have increased his real wealth more than by the importation of gold; but such enrichment of himself implied the impoverishment of his subjects, and that in a country of very small extent, and of which the real prosperity mainly depended on agriculture. The money spent on magnificent buildings must have been to a large extent wasted. We may believe, therefore, almost all that we are told about the wealth of Solomon, and yet believe also that even his economic policy was foolish, and tended to national bankruptcy and the ruin of his dynasty.

14. Closely connected with the wisdom and wealth of Solomon was his 'fame' and 'glory.' The 'fame' of Solomon denoted by the Hebrew words shēm (1 K 4³¹), shēmūah (1 K 10⁷, 2 Ch 9⁸), and shēma (1 K 10¹, 2 Ch 9¹),—name, hearing, report,—was, like all fame, an external thing, 'a fancied life in others' breath.' The 'glory' of Solomon, although denoted in the NT by the same term (doxa) as 'the glory of the Son of Man,' was a very different kind of glory. It was not glory of the highest order, the glory of essential excellence, but a superficial glory attainable by striving after effect, by the lavish display and expenditure of wealth, by showy talents, by courting popularity, and the like. The glory which Solomon sought for he obtained in an extraordinary measure in his lifetime, and it grew in the course of ages to the most extravagant proportion. Orientals are fond of display and pomp, and doubtless, at least for a lengthened period, Solomon, with his good disposition and brilliant gifts and conspicuous success, must have seemed to his subjects an almost ideal king. He gave Israel a place among the nations which it had never previously held, secured to it peace and prosperity, perfected its organization and administration, and so transformed, adorned, and enriched Jerusalem as to make it appear the central city, the joy and pride of the whole earth. Not only to the Hebrews but to all the peoples of the Semitic world he must have seemed the foremost monarch of the age. His intellectual gifts and acquisitions were so displayed as to cause him to be regarded as a paragon of wisdom, one whose knowledge and judgment had never been equalled, a sage and ruler superior to all others on the earth. Hence we are told many princes and renowned men came from afar to visit him, to see the grandeur of his court, to hear the wisdom of his words, and to pay him homage and present him with gifts. Of all his visitors, the queen of SHEBA naturally made the greatest impression. She was a much more exalted personage than the princes and sheikhs with whom the Israelites were familiar. She came from 'the uttermost parts of the earth' (Mt 12⁴²); came in high state 'with a very great train with camels that bare incense and very much gold and precious stones' (1 K 10²); came, it would appear, attracted purely by the fame of the wisdom, and especially of the religious wisdom, of Solomon; and departed leaving magnificent gifts, confessing that what she had heard was not half of what she had found to be true, and thanking and blessing the God of Israel.

The above is, in substance, all that is related of the famous visit of the Sabæan queen to Solomon; and it is also the origin and basis of all that has been fabled about herself and her visit by the Rabbis, Arabs, Persians, and Abyssinians. Many modern critics pronounce even the Biblical account of it (1 K 10¹⁻¹³, repeated in 2 Ch 9¹⁻¹³) to be manifestly legendary. And it may be a legend. There is no historical evidence to the contrary except the clear and positive statement made by Kings. But it is certainly not manifestly legendary. Wellhausen, Stade, Klostermann, Benzinger, and other eminent critics all content themselves with mere assertion to that effect.

The fame of the glory of Solomon was largely posthumous. Great as it was among his contemporaries, the whole course of subsequent Hebrew history tended to increase it. After his reign the Hebrew people passed through stages of humiliation and affliction while clinging tenaciously to the belief that they were God's elect and had a glorious future before them. To endure the present, they were always providentially constrained to magnify the past. The more they sank, the more they comforted themselves by thinking of what they had been and imagining what they could be. And the age of Solomon was the golden age of their history, and Solomon himself their most brilliant and renowned king. Hence there was in the OT an idealization of kingship founded on the character of the personality, life, and reign of Solomon, and impelled and guided by a truly Divine inspiration which has been of immense significance to the world. It forms a large and precious portion of Messianic prophecy. The initial impulse to the close connexion of Solomon with it may, perhaps, have been Nathan's promise to David (2 S 7¹¹⁻¹⁶ and 1 Ch 17¹⁰⁻¹⁴) that J^o would raise up to him a seed that should build up the house of the Lord, and whose kingdom and throne would be established for ever. As soon, however, as we go further we find ourselves in an altogether unreal world. Jewish Rabbis indulged in the most extravagant exaggerations as to the gifts and glory of Solomon. Christian writers followed suit, and showed themselves almost as credulous and inventive.

15. Religion of Solomon.—The Biblical historiographers who have treated of the reign of Solomon regarded him as having fallen far short of his father in piety. While pronouncing David a man according to God's own heart (1 S 12¹⁴, 1 K 11^{33, 38}), they have so spoken of Solomon's death (1 K 11⁴, 2 Ch 9³¹) as to have given rise to a long controversy among the Church Fathers as to his salvation.*

* St. Augustine and the Latin Fathers generally pronounced against, and St. Chrysostom and the Greek Fathers in favour of, belief in his salvation. Calmet, in his Dict., s.v. 'Salomon, Nouvelle Dissert. de la salut du Salomon,' has collected the opinions. Dante unites him in Paradise with the four great schoolmen, and makes Aquinas thus describe him:—

'The fifth light,
Goodliest of all, is by such love inspired,
That all your world craves tidings of his doom:
Within there is the lofty light, endowed
With sapience so profound, if truth be truth,
That with a ken of such wide amplitude
No second has arisen.'

—Par. x. 108-114 (Cary's tr.).

The third line is the rendering of Dante's:

'Che tutto il mondo
Laggiù ne gola di saper novella.'

Now, that Solomon's piety was not so warm and intense as David's is what no one will question, yet that it was in some respects superior may well be maintained, and can even scarcely be denied by any one who attempts to judge of David and Solomon from a Christian standpoint. With good gifts and great qualities, David had terrible defects. While intensely real, his faith in J" was comparatively crude and unenlightened. Hence his piety was compatible with such horrid deeds as his conduct towards Uriah, his allowing the innocent sons of Saul to be 'hung up unto the Lord in Gibeon' (2 S 21⁵⁻⁹), and his ruthless treatment of the Moabites (2 S 8²) and Ammonites (2 S 12³¹).

The memory of Solomon is unstained by such acts. His faith in J", however otherwise inferior to David's, was so much more rational and ethical as to save him from much which David did. He too had faith in J", but a considerably different faith, and one implying a higher and worthier conception of J". The general tendency of his reign was towards spiritual enlightenment. The Solomonic age was not one of spiritual decadence on the whole, but a distinct spiritual advance in important respects on the age of the 'judges' and of the first two kings; and doubtless Solomon contributed more to its being so than any other person. The interest of revelation required a Solomon as well as a Samuel, Saul, or David. David's significance as a king in relation to the Messiah was as a victorious warrior; Solomon's as the prince of peace—no inferior honour. There is no warrant for reckoning Solomon among the sceptics. The son of David could not fail to have been taught to revere and honour J". The commencement of his reign was marked by a display of ardent piety towards J", and the expression of humble dependence on His guidance. Throughout his reign he acted as temporal head of the Hebrew theocracy, as chief of the ministers of J" in Israel. He delighted in the offices of Divine worship. Some have denied, but without apparent proof, that he took part in what have been called distinctly priestly acts—slaying the victims and offering incense. All the other acts of worship—all those which the Hebrew prophets deemed most sacred and spiritual—he is clearly recorded to have performed. In connexion with the building of the temple, he showed his anxiety to render to J" a worthy expression of gratitude for His kindness towards David and himself. His prayer at the dedication of the temple, the substantial authenticity of which there seems to be no reason to doubt, is one of the grandest devotional utterances to be found in pre-Christian devotional literature.

Solomon evidently desired to render the service in the temple beautiful and impressive, the temple itself the chief and central sanctuary in the land, and Jerusalem not only the royal residence and national capital, but the holy city. He thereby, however, displeased those who disliked changes in religion and preferred the old simplicity and rudeness of worship to innovations. They included probably most of the uncultured tribesmen of the north. The seer AHIJAH was at their head. They may have had a considerable amount of truth and reason as well as piety on their side, but not more than the innovators—Solomon, the priests, and all others who were in favour of progress. The changes introduced by Solomon tended to further the spiritual education of the Jewish people, to suggest to receptive minds among them larger and worthier thoughts of God, and to contribute to the permanence and progressiveness of religion in Israel.

16. Alleged Apostasy of Solomon.—The age of Solomon was in the main one of intellectual liberation and religious enlightenment, although to many of his subjects it may have appeared one of scepticism and impiety. That the king abandoned his faith in J" and became an idolater is difficult to believe, while it is easy to conceive how the fama to that effect may have arisen. Solomon built altars for his foreign wives, and allowed them to worship their national gods on earth brought from their native lands and in the language and forms of devotion which were familiar and sacred to them. He did not allow them to proselytize or to attempt to act the part which was afterwards played by Jezebel; and it is even very unlikely, seeing that they were all members of his own household, that he permitted either the cruel or the licentious acts sometimes practised in the worship of certain of their deities. But to Ahijah and his partisans toleration of any worship in Israel except that of J" appeared tantamount to apostasy from J", and the worship of a strange god. They necessarily saw therefore in Solomon's conduct proof that his heart was turned away from J" and given to the foreign gods whom he allowed his wives to worship. They judged of it by a crude and immoral conception of J", while Solomon himself must have seen in it no treason against J", and believed it to be reasonable and right. The religious toleration granted by him to his wives was an almost inevitable consequence of his policy of alliances with foreign rulers through marriages. There was, however, apparently no opposition given or offence taken by his subjects either to his polygamy or his marriage with foreign women. They seem to have regarded his multitude of wives complacently as a sign of his wealth and grandeur. In his polygamy he only followed the example, and probably the advice, of his father. Nor was his offence marriage with foreign wives, although he is not recorded to have married any of his own subjects. Perhaps few of them would have been considered suitable wives for so great a king, and marriages with them could have had no political advantages. It was his religious toleration per se which was condemned, and held to imply disloyalty to J" and the worship of other gods.

That he should have been guilty of the apostasy and sin alleged seems incredible and inexplicable on any supposition except one, viz. that his mode of life had left him prematurely worn out both in body and mind, so as to be, even in the fifth decade of his age, in a senile condition, and hardly responsible for his actions. That is little if anything more than a supposition. Yet it seems to be hinted at by the author of 1 K 11¹⁻⁸, who writes as if willing to excuse and yet unwilling to express himself plainly, when telling us of Solomon's 'cleaving in love to many strange women,' and that 'his heart was turned away after strange gods when he was old' (say over fifty years of age). The erotic element in the Song of Songs, so far as it refers to Solomon, is also, perhaps, in this connexion not to be overlooked. The apocryphal book Sirach, while otherwise glorifying Solomon in the most generous manner, distinctly singles out for condemnation his sensuality as 'what stained his honour and polluted his seed, brought wrath on his children, divided Israel, and made Ephraim a rebel kingdom' (42¹⁹⁻²²). The censure was fully deserved. However numerous and attractive may have been the gifts and good qualities of Solomon, he had two great faults—self-love and self-indulgence. He was blind to the claims of self-sacrifice and self-restraint, and hence was no wise man in the highest sense, but merely the wisest fool of his day. His harem may suffice for proof. If his wives and concubines together really amounted to a thousand women, it would seem to have been the largest of which there is any record in history. It was doubtless monstrously large, and 'eunuchs' were among the attendants in it. Yet Solomon had only one son, and that so: was Rehoboam—'ample,' as Ben Sira says, 'in foolishness and lacking in understanding, who by his counsel let loose the people' (Sir 47³). God's violated law of married love clearly avenged itself on Solomon and condemned his polygamy.

17. Close of Solomon's Career.—Before his death Solomon had largely lost the popularity which he had enjoyed in the earlier years of his reign. He had overtaxed and overburdened his subjects, and made a lavish and wasteful use of the national resources, and the selfishness which led him to do so had defeated its own ends. He had given offence, in a considerable measure, perhaps unnecessary offence, to the prophets and their adherents and to the Ephraimites generally. But the fame he had acquired could not be forgotten, and he had done too much for Israel to be despised or assailed. His reputation was a part, and a large part, of that of the nation. Hence none of his 'adversaries rose against him.' The recollection of what he had been protected him even against his bitterest enemies among the Ephraimites; and Ahijah himself preached the very strange doctrine that God desired Solomon's sins to be overlooked for David's sake, and Rehoboam punished for the transgressions of Solomon (1 K 11²⁷⁻³⁰). But, even although left unmolested, he must surely, when he began to realize that death was not far away, have looked back on his lengthened reign with great dissatisfaction. He had abundant cause for contrition and regret. He had not been a good shepherd of his people. He had sought his own glory far more than their good. He had preferred low aims to high, and could not fail to be conscious thereof. He had impoverished and oppressed large numbers of his subjects. He had not made Israel a thoroughly consolidated nation, as he might and should have done. He had talked wisdom and practised folly. He had through selfishness failed to take advantage of the precious gifts and grand opportunities for usefulness which J^h had granted him. He had professed piety and preached righteousness, yet dishonoured God, degraded himself, and set an evil example to others by his luxury and licentiousness. Looking seriously over his past, he could not but realize that, with all its appearance of splendour, it had been essentially, so far as he was concerned, a deplorable failure, a vanity of vanities, whatever might be made of it by an overruling Providence. He may have been spared the misery of foreseeing that immediately on his death his son would be so foolish as to provoke a disruption of the kingdom, and therefore bring innumerable woes both on Judah and on Israel, but he can hardly have failed to forecast that troublous times for the monarchy were approaching. Throughout almost the whole of his reign the relations between Israel and Egypt had been friendly; by the time of his death the Pharaoh Shishak was meditating war, and five years later he captured Jerusalem, plundered Solomon's temple and palace, and left Rehoboam to substitute shields of brass for his father's shields of gold. The disruption of Israel and Judah was fatal to both, and Solomon even more than Rehoboam was responsible for it. It is not surprising, therefore, that both in Kings and Chronicles, when his death is recorded, he should, notwithstanding all the glory he had gained, receive no word of commendation. All that is said is that 'he slept with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David his father; and Rehoboam his son reigned in his stead' (1 K 11⁴², 2 Ch 9³¹).

SOLOMON'S PORCH.—See PORCH, and TEMPLE, p. 713^b.

SOLOMON'S SERVANTS (שִׁפְיָהוּ; LXX usually δοῦλοι Σαλωμών [but see ad fin.]).—In the two lists of exiles who returned to Jerusalem from Babylon with Zerubbabel, the sons of Solomon's servants are first mentioned immediately after the Nethinim (Ezr 2³⁵⁻³⁷, Neh 7⁵⁷⁻⁵⁹), and then included with them, as though they were subdivisions of the same class: 'All the Nethinim, and the children of Solomon's servants, were three hundred and ninety-two' (Ezr 2³⁶, Neh 7⁶⁰). At Neh 10³⁸ the sons of Solomon's servants appear to be included amongst the Nethinim. At Neh 11³ they are again mentioned along with them; but the parallel list of 1 Ch 9³ contents itself with using the more familiar of the two titles, as though the person who inserted this list did not distinguish between Nethinim and sons of Solomon's servants. As to their position and functions it will therefore be sufficient to refer to art. NETHINIM.

It is clear from Ezk 44^{8t} that non-Israelites were employed for many menial duties connected with the temple service. The caste of foreigners thus referred to may have originated from the body of forced labourers whom Solomon is said to have used in building the temple and other structures (1 K 9²⁰⁻²¹). These would not unnaturally be called Solomon's slaves or servants. After the temple was finished, some of them might be retained for the inferior offices of the house of God, and the title originally bestowed on them would cling to them. In succeeding generations the composition of the class would vary from a number of causes: some families would die out, others would be added from prisoners of war and other sources. Nor is there any difficulty in conceiving of them as holding together in the Exile. We can readily imagine members of the minor orders in the Roman Catholic Church doing so in like circumstances. Torrey (Comp. and Hist. Value of Ezra-Nehemiah, p. 40) thinks that the mention of them is simply an instance of the Chronicler's determination to connect every institution belonging to his own day with David and Solomon. But it may fairly be argued that the very lowliness of the title 'Solomon's slaves' is in favour of its genuineness. No body of men would have been willing to bear it if it had been arbitrarily imposed from without in the days of the second temple. But if it were inherited, the disagreeable connotation would be worn off in the process of time.

The remark made respecting the family names of the Nethinim must be repeated here. They indicate a foreign origin. There can have been only a small number of persons in each of the families, as will be seen by dividing the total number by that of the families. The spelling of the names varies slightly in the two lists, but there is no ground for the distinction Pochereth of Zebaim (Ezr 2³⁷) and Pochereth Zebaim (Neh 7⁵⁹) in AV; in both places RV rightly reproduces Pochereth-hazzebaim. The Pesh. differs from MT in two points. At Ezr 2³⁷—but not at Neh 7⁵⁹—it gets rid of Solomon's servants entirely, reading

'Αβδησά, v.⁸⁶, and υἱοὶ Ἀβδησελμά, v.⁸⁶. At Neh 11³ it makes them dwell at Jerusalem, not in the cities of Judah.

SOMEIS (Σομεῖς, AV Samis), 1 Es 9³⁴=Shimei, Ezr 10³⁸.

SOMETIME, SOMETIMES.—These forms are used indiscriminately in AV, and (except Sir 37¹⁴) always in the sense of 'once upon a time,' 'formerly.' The Gr. is always ποτέ. RV changes in every case: in Wis 5³, Col 3⁷, Tit 3³, 1 P 3²⁰ into 'aforetime'; in Eph 2¹³ 5⁸ into 'once'; in Col 1²¹ into 'in time past.' For the indiscriminate spelling, cf. Melvill, Diary, lx., 'He tuk him to rest, and passed over that haill day, sum tyme in rest, as it seimed, and sum tymes in paine.' For 'sometime,' meaning 'formerly,' cf. La 1¹ Cov. 'Alas, how sitteth the cite so desolate, yt some tyme was full of people?'; and for 'sometimes,' Shaks. Rich. II. i. ii. 54, 'Thy sometimes brother's wife.' Abbott (Shaks. Gram. p. 51) thinks this is the meaning also in Merch. of Venice, I. i. 163—

'Sometimes from her eyes
I did receive fair speechless messages.'

In the mod. sense of 'occasionally' the only example in AV is Sir 37¹⁴ (Gr. ἐπίοτε). But that meaning was quite common at the time. Thus Elyot, Governour, ii. 225, 'Some tyme it [fides] may be called faythe, some tyme credence, other whyles truste'; Tindale, Expos. 30, 'Centurion is a captain of a hundred men; whom I call sometime a centurion, but for the most part a hundercaptain.'

I. THE OLD TESTAMENT AND JEWISH WRITINGS.

—The history of the term 'Son of God' in the pre-

Christian period is the history of a gradual heightening and concentration of meaning in connexion with the culminating point of biblical revelation. The use of the term is at first rather poetic or rhetorical than in the strict sense theological. It is applied to a number of objects in such a way as to invest them with a special dignity and value, or to hint at a special relation of nearness and appreciation on the part of God; but it did not denote any essential partaking in the Divine nature. Only in Christian times does this latter sense come to attach to it.

1. OLD TESTAMENT.—In OT the phrase, or something like it, is used of angels, of human judges, of the theocratic king, of the theocratic people, and of the Messiah. It is this last use which is taken up and further developed in Christianity.

(a) In the first passage that meets us, Gn 6²⁻⁴ (ascribed to the 9th cent. document J), the term is applied to the race of demigods or angelic beings which is conceived as existing before the Flood.

This passage proved rather a stumbling-block to the later Jewish exegesis, and was variously explained. The main body of Septuagint MSS (N B are not extant) tr. literally αἱ υἱαὶ τοῦ θεοῦ (so also Theodotion). A group, including A, paraphrases this (in v.³ but not in v.⁴) as αἱ ἀγγέλοι. Aquila tr. still more literally αἱ υἱαὶ τῶν θεῶν, leaving an opening, as it would seem, for some such sense as that given in the next paragraph. Symm. interprets less equivocally αἱ υἱαὶ τῶν δυναστῶντων, as though the reference was to the profligate sons of the upper or ruling classes. Some modern Jewish commentators, along with Dr. Field (Hexapla, I. 22), make the 'sons of God' = the descendants of Seth, and the 'daughters of men' = the descendants of Cain. But there can be little doubt that the sense is as in Job 1⁶ 21 387, Ps 291 etc.

(b) In one remarkable verse the title seems to be applied to judges or rulers (Ps 82⁶), 'I said, Ye are gods; and all of you sons of the Most High' (cf. v.¹; also Jn 10³⁴). And in a number of places 'judges' are in some way or other equated with 'gods' (Ex 21⁶ RVm and AV, 22²⁸ RVm and AV, 1 S 2²⁵ RVm and AV; in all these places 'God' in RV is lit. 'gods,' elōhīm, according to the familiar idiom).

The origin of this latter usage is not quite clear. It appears to be connected with the fact that judicial or quasi-judicial decisions were given in early times in the form of oracles at some sacred place and in the name of the deity.

It is a further question whether or how far Ps 82⁶ was suggested by this usage. That it was so suggested was the older view; and Duhm (e.g.) still explains of the Hasmonean princes; Baethgen, of heathen rulers. But some recent writers, not without precursors in the earlier days of criticism, take more literally: e.g. Cheyne, of the 'patron angels' of oppressive heathen nations; Wellhausen (ad loc.) and Smend (AT Theol. p. 394 ff.), of the gods of these nations. Most commentators compare Ps 58, reading 'O ye gods' in v.¹.

(c) Of more importance, and indeed on the direct line of Messianic promises, is the designation as applied to the theocratic king. For this the leading passage is the assurance given by Nathan to David, 'I will be his father, and he shall be my son' (2 S 7¹⁴). Many other places point back to this, esp. Ps 89²⁶ 27. But these will meet us again under (e).

(d) Closely associated with the application to the theocratic king is that to the theocratic people. For this we go back primarily to Ex 4²² 'Thou shalt say unto Pharaoh, Thus saith the LORD, Israel is my son, my firstborn,'—an announcement that seems to have been present to the mind of the prophet Hosea when he wrote, 'When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt' (Hos 11¹).

(e) If the title 'son' is given both to the theocratic king and to the theocratic people where these are clearly distinguished from each other, still more inevitable was it that the same title would belong to them when the two ideas coalesce into one, as they do in the passages that may be called more directly Messianic. Conspicuous among these are Pss 89 and 2.

Ps 89.—This psalm is based upon the promises of 2 S 7, but also in v. 7 clearly takes up Ex 42. Hence, while it is agreed that both king and people are in view, opinions differ somewhat as to the degree of prominence to be assigned to each. Cheyne (Comm. on v. 39) has 'no doubt that the Davidic king (or rather 'the Davidic royalty') is meant.' But 'the Davidic house has long been overthrown, and the fate of the nation has a more practical interest for the writer, whose description partly fits the king, partly the people, now become the heir of the old Davidic promises.' In OP p. 118 he pronounces more decidedly for the 'post-exile Jewish Church' in the Persian period (Artaxerxes II. and III.). Strack points out a close resemblance to the state of things under Josiah; Duhm, to that under Alexander Jannæus (c. 88 B.C.). Wellhausen, like Cheyne, explains of the community, which 'in the history of the theocracy succeeded to the place formerly occupied by the kings.'

Ps 2.—Even more central in its bearing upon the history of Christian thought is Ps 2, esp. v. 70. Opinion is leaning rather more than it did to the view expressed by Cheyne, that this psalm has not 'a contemporary historical reference' (though Duhm believes it to have been composed at the accession of Aristobulus I. or Alexander Jannæus; Cheyne himself thinks that the writer 'throws himself back' into the age of David or Solomon, to which, according to Strack, he belongs). What might be called the most modern view is concisely stated by Wellhausen (PB, 'Psalms,' ad loc.): 'The Messiah is the speaker, and the whole psalm is composed in His name. It is not merely the hopes concerning the future to which he gives expression; it is the claims to world-wide dominion already cherished by the Jewish Theocracy. All the heathen are destined to obey the Jews; if they fail to do so, they are rebels. The Messiah is the incarnation of Israel's universal rule. He and Israel are almost identical, and it matters little whether we say that Israel has or is the Messiah. . . . On the day when JHVH founded the Theocracy, He gave it the right to unlimited earthly dominion. This right is involved in the very idea of the Theocracy. Zion, as being the seat of the Divine rule, is, ipso facto, the seat of universal rule.'

It will be seen how the most advanced science of our time is by degrees giving back a full equivalent for the old naïve conception that would make the passages above quoted direct unmediated predictions of the personal Messiah. As applied to the Messiah these prophecies are not unmediated. The steps are one thing, the shrine to which they lead is another. The Scriptures of which we have been speaking mark so many separate contributions to the total result; but the result, when it is attained, has the completeness of an organic whole. A Figure was created—projected as it were upon the clouds—which was invested with all the attributes of a person. And the minds of men were turned towards it in an attitude of expectation. It makes no matter that the lines of this Figure are drawn from different originals. They meet at last in a single portraiture. And we should never have known how perfectly they meet if we had not had the NT picture to compare with that of OT. The most literal fulfilment of prediction would not be more conclusive proof that all the course of the world and all the threads of history are in one guiding Hand.

2. JEWISH WRITINGS.—Ps 2, as it has been rightly observed, stands at the head of a long line of subsequent development. The conception of the Messiah as also 'Son' became a fixed part of the tradition, not perhaps quite so widely extended as might have been expected,—it does not figure at all largely in the Talmud,—and yet sufficiently attested in those forms of Judaism which present the nearest affinities to Christianity.

(i.) The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha.—The title 'Son' as applied to the Messiah occurs only once in the Book of Enoch (105²) in a passage the origin and date of which are uncertain. It does not occur at all in Apoc. of Baruch. But in 4 Ezra (2 Esdras) it seems to be fairly well established. This book is lost in the original (Gr. or Heb. ?), but is preserved in no fewer than five versions, Lat., Syr., Æth., Arab. (two forms), Arm., which are commonly supposed to rank in this order, though the subject has not yet been thoroughly investigated.

The text printed in our Bibles is from the Latin. In 728. 29 this version has evidently passed through Christian hands; Syr. has twice and Arab. once 'my Son Messiah,' Æth. once 'my Servant Messiah' (perhaps = ṣāḥib), and Arm. once 'the Messiah of God.' From this rough statement, which can hardly be pursued into close detail, it will be seen that there is some doubt. In 132² and 37 Lat. Syr. Arab., and in 132² Lat. Syr. identically, and Æth. Arab. approximately, all have 'Son,' which, however, does not appear in the Armenian. A like relation is found in 14⁹, where Lat. Syr. Æth. Codd. Arab. have 'Son'; Æth. Codd. 'sons,' while Arm. drops and paraphrases. The edd., including Hilgenfeld and Gunkel in Kautzsch, Apokr. u. Pseudepigr. d. AT, read 'Son' in all these places; but the reading cannot be regarded as quite secure (cf. Drummond, Jewish Messiah, pp. 285-288).

The strongly Messianic passage in Ps-Sol 1723-51 has not the title 'Son,' but clearly borrows from Ps 2 in v. 26.

(ii.) The Talmud.—Apart from the above instances there is not much evidence for the Messianic interpretation of Ps 2 in the Rabbinic literature. Dalman (Worte Jesu, p. 222) gives three examples of this, one dating c. 210 and another c. 350 A.D.

Two other comments quoted by him are of some interest. The Midrash on Ps 212 concludes thus: 'To whom is this like? To a king who is wrath with his subjects, and the subjects go and make their peace with the king's son, that he may make peace for them. Then when the subjects go to give thanks to the king, he saith to them: Would ye give thanks to me? Go and give them to my son; since, but for him, I should long ago have blotted out the people. So saith God to the nations of the world when they would give thanks to him. Go thank the children of Israel, for without them ye would not have continued for a single hour.'

A late comment in Midr. Tehill. ii. 7 is expressly directed against the Christian interpretation: 'From this passage (Ps 27) an answer may be given to the Minim (Christians) who say the Holy One—blessed be He—has a Son, and thou canst reply to them: it does not mean "A Son art Thou to Me," but "Thou art My Son"; like a servant whom his master encourages by saying to him, "I love thee as my son!"' Although this is set down as 'very late,' it is just the interpretation that would be natural to a Jew.

II. THE NEW TESTAMENT.—In passing over to NT it is important to observe that we should not form an adequate conception of the significance of the title 'Son of God' if we were to confine ourselves to the use of that title alone. It is true that it occurs in some central passages, and true that in these passages the phrase is invested with great depth of meaning. But we should not adequately appreciate this depth, and still less should we understand the mass and volume of NT teaching on this head, if we did not directly connect with the explicit references to the 'Son of God' that other long series of references to God as pre-eminently 'the Father,' and to Christ as pre-eminently 'the Son.' These two lines of usage are really convergent. And we must first consider them separately before we bring them together. It has seemed best first to collect and sift the evidence before seeking to penetrate further into its meaning.

1. THE GOSPELS.—(a) Use of the term 'Son of God.'—The use of this term is perhaps more sparing than we might suppose. And the number of instances on which we can really lay stress will be found to shrink somewhat on examination.

(i.) Incidental uses.—Only in the Fourth Gospel (5²⁵ 9³⁵ [var. lect.] 10³⁶ 11⁴) is the title 'Son of God' used by our Lord expressly of Himself. And although three at least of the places in which it is described as used of Him are of salient importance, this is not the case with others. Instances like Mk 1¹ (where the reading is also not quite certain), Jn 3¹⁸ 20³¹ belong to the evangelists, and are therefore evidence for a later stage of belief than that of the narrative. And we must allow for the possibility that to this later stage are really to be assigned words such as those ascribed to the Baptist in Jn 1³⁴ and to Nathanael in Jn 1⁴⁰. Nor can we be too confident as to the exact wording of the discourses or sayings in Jn 3¹⁸ 5²⁵ 9³⁵ [v.l.] 10³⁶ 11⁴. St. John, even more than the other evangelists, was so intensely absorbed in his own belief in the Godhead of Christ that it was natural to him to antedate expressions which really would be exceptional at the time to which they are referred. Even in the First Gospel (Mt 14³³ 26³³) the absence of the phrase from the Synoptic parallels must cast some doubt upon its originality.

On the other hand, in the cases of the demoniacs (Mk 3¹¹ || 5⁷ ||) and of the centurion at the Cross (Mk 15³⁹ ||) the attestation indeed is excellent, but we cannot deduce anything very tangible (see below, 3 (a)).

(ii.) St. Peter's Confession.—We cannot be surprised if by an application of similar critical methods some scholars (e.g. Dalman, Worte Jesu, p. 224) should also cancel the phrase in the more important connexion of Mt 16¹⁶. Here, in the version of Matthew, Peter's confession runs: 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God'; where Mark has only, 'Thou art the Christ,' and Luke 'The Christ of God.' And no doubt it follows from this that the Marcan document had no more than our present Gospel. Still this passage is not really on all fours with the others that have come before us. For the context clearly proves that Matthew had before him some further tradition, possibly that of the Logia, but in any case a tradition that has the look of being original. Whether this originality extends to the whole phrase may be more than we could assert positively, but to the present writer it appears to be probable that it does. We should more easily understand the apostolic use of the title 'Son of God' if there had been precedents for it on important occasions like this, when it is represented as receiving the sanction of Christ Himself. The whole phrase as it stands, including the epithet 'living God,' calls up such a host of OT associations, and at one step sets the confession so conspicuously in its place amid the whole series of biblical revelations, that we may be loth to let it go.

(iii.) The voice from heaven at the Baptism and Transfiguration.—The next two places that we have to deal with are encircled, like the last, with critical considerations. It may be well first to state the textual facts, so that the reader may have the evidence fully before him.

a. The textual question.—

THE BAPTISM.—

Mt 3¹⁷ καὶ ἰδοὺ φωνὴ ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ λέγουσα· Οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ υἱός μου ὁ ἀγαπητός, ἐν ᾧ εὐδόκησα.

Mk 1¹¹ καὶ φωνὴ ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ· Σὺ εἶ ὁ υἱός μου ὁ ἀγαπητός, ἐν σοὶ εὐδόκησα.

Lk 3²² . . . καὶ φωνὴ ἔξ οὐρανοῦ γινώσκει· Σὺ εἶ ὁ υἱός μου ὁ ἀγαπητός, ἐν σοὶ εὐδόκησα.

Συ εἶ, π. κ. l. codd. Græc. et vers. (inc. Syr. Sin.) fere omni. Τίς μου εἶ σύ (+ ἀγαπητός, Clem. Alex.) ἐν τῷ σέμειον γινώσκω σε, D a b c ff 2¹ r.

THE TRANSFIGURATION.—

Mt 17⁵ καὶ ἰδοὺ φωνὴ ἐκ τοῦ νεφέλης λέγουσα· Οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ υἱός μου ὁ ἀγαπητός, ἐν ᾧ εὐδόκησα· ἀκούετε αὐτοῦ.

Mk 9⁷ καὶ ἰδοὺ φωνὴ ἐκ τοῦ νεφέλης· Οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ υἱός μου ὁ ἀγαπητός, ἀκούετε αὐτοῦ.

Lk 9³⁵ καὶ φωνὴ ἰκίσθη ἐκ τῆς νεφέλης λέγουσα· Οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ υἱός μου ὁ ἐκλεκτός, αὐτοῦ ἀκούετε.

We may also compare Ac 13³³ . . . ἀναστήσας Ἰησοῦν, ὃς καὶ ἐν τῷ ψαλμῷ γινώσκται τῷ κυρίῳ (v.l. ἐν τῷ πρώτῳ ψαλμῷ γινώσκει). Τίς μου εἶ σύ, ἐν τῷ σέμειον γινώσκω σε. Cf. He 1⁵ 5⁶.

The main question here is as to the reading of Lk 3²²: ἐν σέμειον γινώσκω σε is clearly Western, with strong Latin support, though even here the whole family is not included, e l going the other way; the absence of Syriac evidence is also important. The natural inference would be that the reading, although, no doubt, very ancient, was not really primitive. And when we think how strong the temptation would be to assimilate the text of the Gospel to that of the psalm, and how readily this latter text would fall in with ideas that are known to have been current in the 2nd cent., the presumption against its originality is increased. In any case Luke is the only Gospel affected. The agreement of Matthew and Mark is sufficient guarantee that the reading found in them was found also in the common Synop. document. Luke can at most represent only a separate tradition, which hardly in this instance carries with it so much weight as the others.

If the common reading is to be preferred, then the first half of the words presents a coincidence with Ps 27, the second half with Is 42¹. The words heard at the Transfiguration also present a general resemblance to Ps 2. That psalm is directly quoted in Acts and Hebrews.

β. The nature of the Manifestation.—It is characteristic of the OT prophets that the revelations made to them sometimes took the form of remarkable sights and sometimes of remarkable sounds. At least these are the terms in which they are described to us; what exactly were the psychological phenomena corresponding it is beyond our power to say. They belong to the peculiar experience of the Hebrew prophets. The Jewish notions about the Bath Kol are an extension of the same idea (Weber, Jüd. Theol. 3 p. 194 f.).

It is natural to suppose that the manifestations at the Baptism and at the Transfiguration were similar in kind. It is possible that they were known only to Jesus Himself, perhaps in the one case also to the Baptist, and in the other to one or more of the apostles who possessed the prophetic endowment. Through such a channel as this the Divine approval of the Son was in all probability communicated to men. The significance of this Divine testimony will come before us later.

(b) The correlative terms 'Father' and 'Son.'—We are told (Dalman, Worte Jesu, p. 156) that it is contrary to Jewish usage to speak of God as 'the Father,' simply without some such addition as 'who is in heaven.' The only exceptions occur in prayers. It also appears that great care and reserve were used in the application of this title generally. The Targums, where they have occasion to refer to it, adopt a paraphrase.

In this respect the Gospels show a marked contrast. Our Lord does, indeed, make use of the Jewish form (which is found most frequently in Matthew, but cf. also Mk 11²⁶, Lk 11²⁶); and it is probable enough that the real instances of this use may have been more numerous than would appear from our Gospels.

At the same time the Christian use goes far beyond the Jewish limitations. And besides the general use as applied to the disciples, there is a special use in which our Lord reserves it in a peculiar manner to Himself. He nowhere speaks of 'our Father,' numbering Himself with His followers. The Lord's Prayer is not an exception, because it is a form prescribed to the disciples, and constructed entirely for them. The prayers of the Son to the Father are different.

On the other hand, our Lord constantly speaks of 'my Father,' whether with (Mt 7²¹ 10³² 15¹³ 16¹⁷ 18¹⁰ 19³⁵) or without addition. And this use apparently goes back even to His childhood (Lk 2⁴⁹).

The use in question is illustrated in a number of ways. So in the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen, where the 'beloved son' (Mk 12⁶), who is also 'heir,' is distinguished from all other messengers. So again in the parable of the Marriage Feast, which the king makes for his son (Mt 22⁻); where, though the parallel in Lk 14¹⁶ may point to this description as added later, the instance just given would at least show that it lay near at hand; and some further support is given to it by the part played by the 'bridegroom' in the parable of the Ten Virgins.

In any case the whole argument of Mt 17²³ turns on the distinction between 'son' and 'stranger.' And the point of the discussion about Ps 110¹ (Mk 12³⁶⁻³⁷) is just to prove that the Messiah is not 'son of David' in the same sense in which other members of his lineage are spoken of as sons. We shall have occasion to come back to some of these passages presently.

We observe in our Lord's use of the titles 'Father' and 'Son' in connexion with Himself an ascending scale. First, there are the places where He speaks of God as His heavenly Father, or Father in heaven, after ordinary Jewish usage (Mt 7²¹ etc., see above). Then there are the places where He speaks of God as 'my Father' without addition, which are too numerous to need specification. Then we come to a smaller number of passages in which 'the Son' and 'the Father' are at once opposed and associated. And lastly, there are the cases in which mention is made of 'the Father' and 'the Son,' where the correlation is not expressed but implied. The last two classes of passages alone will require some discussion.

The classical passage in the Synoptic Gospels for the correlative use of 'the Father' and 'the Son' is, of course, Mt 11²⁷ ||. By the side of this we have Mk 13³² || [v.l.] and the important and much debated verse Mt 28¹⁹.

Dalman (see pp. 231-235) allows the first of these passages to stand, explaining it as a figurative application of the relation of 'father and son.' The relation of Jesus to Him whom we call 'the Father' is such a relation, and therefore implies mutual knowledge. But the other places, he thinks, bear too close a resemblance to the theological language of the Early Church; and he would set them down, in their present form, to the reflex influence of that language. He questions the use by our Lord Himself of either phrase as a theological term. And this kind of view is, no doubt, widely spread in critical circles.

Now, in the first place, we note that the passages just referred to are not the only evidence for bringing the use in question within the cycle of Synoptic language. We may fairly add to these for this purpose Ac 1⁴⁻⁷ 2³; for not only is the author of Acts the author also of one of our Synoptic Gospels, but it is probable that these early chapters are based upon a document that is very much upon the same level with the sources used in the Synoptics.

Next, we observe that if the use of 'the Father' and 'the Son' as theological terms belongs to the Early Church, it at least goes back to the very first moment at which we possess contemporary evidence for the vocabulary of that Church, and indeed to a date which is not more than 23 years from the Ascension (see 1 Th 1¹). And at the time when we thus first meet with it the use is no novelty, but already firmly and deeply rooted, a thing generally understood in all the Pauline Churches, and so far as we can see, without any hint of question or dispute beyond their borders. As we shall have to illustrate this more at length in the next section, we need not pursue the point further.

These facts demand an explanation. How are we to account for the rapid growth within some 23 to 26 years of a usage already so fixed and stereotyped? Where is the workshop in which it was fashioned, if it did not descend from Christ Himself? When we think of the way in which the best authenticated records of His teaching lead us up to the very verge of the challenged expressions, it seems altogether an easier step to regard them as the natural continuation of that teaching than to seek their origin wholly outside it. Of the two alternatives the former seems not only in other ways the more satisfactory, but really the easier and the more critical.

2. THE REST OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.—The same two convergent lines of doctrine may be traced in the rest of the NT as in the Gospels. Here again we have two groups of passages, the one introducing the title 'Son of God,' and the other speaking rather of 'the Father' and 'the Son.' And here again we find the two groups approach and mutually support each other.

The main difference between the Gospels and the rest of the literature is that, whereas we have seen that in the Gospels there is an ascending scale of expression, corresponding to the gradual unfolding of the new conception in the course of the history, in the Epistolary and other books (which though, as writings, for the most part earlier than the Gospels in point of composition, are later than them in the stage of development to which they have reference),—in these books the process reflected in the Gospels is seen as complete. Both titles, or sets of titles, 'Son of God' and 'Father and Son,' have come to represent definite theologumena. Their content is fixed, and carries with it a distinct doctrinal meaning. The climax to which we have been advancing has been reached, and now simply perpetuates itself. The point gained is not lost again.

(a) The title 'Son of God.'—We open the Epistle which stands at the head of the collection in our Bibles, and the state of belief implied in it is revealed to us in the very first verses (Ro 1¹⁻⁴). We read there that the main subject of the Gospel, or new announcement to mankind, is just this, 'the Son of God.' And the nature of the announcement respecting Him is, that while on one side of His Being He satisfies the conditions expected in the Jewish Messiah by His descent from David, on another side of His Being He is defined or marked out as attaining to a higher designation still. He is nothing less than 'Son of God.' And the incontrovertible proof of His higher nature is to be seen in His victory over death by the Resurrection.

The term 'Son of God' is evidently by this time chosen and established as the standing formula to express what we mean by the Divinity of Christ. If in the OT the term did not necessarily imply Divine origin in the strict sense at all, that state of things has once for all been left behind; and this particular formula has been fixed upon by the Christian consciousness as the shortest and most decisive expression for the proposition in which its whole faith centres.

The inference which we thus draw from the opening verses of Ep. to Romans is confirmed on all hands, and shown to hold good for every branch of the Church. We need not stay to illustrate it further from such passages as Gal 2²⁰, Eph 4¹³ for the Epp. of St. Paul. But Ac 9³⁶ shows that to preach 'that Jesus is the Son of God' was a current way of describing the gospel. A like result follows from 1 Jn 3⁸ (where 'the Son of God was manifested' is a name for what was afterwards called 'the Incarnation'), and 1 Jn 4¹⁵ 5^{9, 10, 13} prove clearly that the confession of Jesus as the Son of God was the cardinal point in the Christian faith. Somewhat more indirectly the same conclusion follows from He 4¹⁴ 10²⁰ and Rev 2¹⁸ (taking up the description of 1¹³⁻¹⁶). The Gospel of St. John (1¹⁴⁻¹⁸) identifies the Only-begotten with the Logos of God.

(b) The titles 'Father' and 'Son.'—In the Prologue to the Fourth Gospel we are in the region of high theology. But the fundamental assumptions of the Epistles (Pauline, Petrine, Johannine, Hebrews) are on the same plane. From the first we have in the greetings of such as begin with greetings frequent reference to the standing correlative 'the Father' and 'the Son.' There never was a time within the range of this literature when the two correlative terms were not understood and accepted as part of the essential vocabulary of Christianity.

When, therefore, we read in Mt 28¹⁹ the command to baptize in the name of the Father and the Son, this combination is one proved to have been in common use less than 25 years after the command is said to have been given; and the complete triad is proved to have been recognized very little later.

We repeat that the matured form in which these conceptions are found in the earliest Epistles seems to us abundantly to justify not only the few places in which they enter into the Synoptic Gospels, but, in principle at least, the more numerous places in which they occur in the Gospel that bears the name of St. John (see below, 3 b i).

Note on the use of $\alpha\upsilon\tau\acute{o}\varsigma$ $\theta\epsilon\acute{o}\varsigma$.—We must reckon with the possibility that $\alpha\upsilon\tau\acute{o}\varsigma$ ($\theta\epsilon\acute{o}\varsigma$) in Ac 3¹³, 26, 43⁷, 34 was intended to be taken in the sense of 'Son.' It certainly has this sense in a number of places in the Apostolic Fathers (see below, III. 1). It is, however, more probable that (as in Mt 12¹⁸) the earlier writers distinctly have in view the 'Servant of Jehovah' of Is 42¹ etc. Only when the preaching of the gospel left Jewish ground and began to spread among peoples ignorant of Heb. were the two senses wholly confused. This process, indeed, was rapid; and the effect was so far good that it blended with the conception of Christ as 'Son' a quantity of valuable teaching relating to the 'Servant' which was most truly applicable to Him (though under another name), and which, but for this, might have met with less attention. On the passages in Acts see esp. an excellent note by Knowling on Ac 3¹³; cf. also what is said by the same writer on 'St. Peter's Discourses,' p. 119 ff.

3. THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THESE TITLES.—

We have now collected most of the data bearing upon our subject. The next step must be to consider their significance under the different conditions in which we have found the titles used. In other words, we shall have to ask what they really meant, in the fulness of their meaning, (a) for the contemporaries of Jesus, both Jewish and non-Jewish; (b) for Jesus Himself; (c) for the apostles, looking back upon and interpreting them.

(a) For contemporaries, Jewish and non-Jewish.

(i.) The populace.—Not much can be extracted from the witness of the demoniacs (Mk 3¹¹ || 5⁷ ||). If we read into it a higher meaning than the words conveyed to the mind of the speaker, it could only be by assuming a providential action outside the working of ordinary laws. The prophecy of Caiaphas (Jn 11⁴⁰⁻⁵²) is perhaps sufficiently parallel to justify us in introducing this; and it is a common belief that, where the human will is most dormant, Divine influences are felt most readily. But, looked at psychologically, the confessions of the demoniacs could not mean more than that they believed themselves to be in the presence of the expected Messiah.

(ii.) The centurion.—In spite of the divergent report of the words of the centurion at the cross in Lk 23⁴⁷, there can be little doubt that the common source of the Synoptic narrative is rightly reproduced by Mark and Matthew, 'Truly this was the Son of God.' As, however, there is no obvious reason why Luke should have altered this, and as there are other details in the history of the Passion for which he appears to have independent authority, it is possible that another version of the words may have reached him; and that version may have as good a chance of being true as that which competes with it. If the words 'Son of God' were really used, the sense attaching to them would depend to some extent on the nationality of the centurion, in regard to which we are in the dark. Probably what was in his mind would be an undefined feeling of awe, and a consciousness that events were happening that transcended his experience and apprehension.

(iii.) The ruling classes.—The question was directly put to our Lord by the high priest, 'Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?' (Mk 14⁶¹). And the assenting answer was treated as blasphemy. Still, it would not follow that this was taken as an assertion of full Divinity. It probably was taken as a claim to be the Messiah. But if the Jews in general thought of the Messiah as superhuman indeed, but not strictly Divine, the high priest (unless it were by such an overruling as we have considered above) is not likely to have meant more than this. The claim might well seem so audacious as to amount to blasphemy even without this aggravation (cf. Holtzmann, Neutest. Theol. i. 266), more especially as it includes the prophecy of a second coming as Judge.

(iv.) The disciples.—The highest point of recognition of our Lord's true nature was no doubt reached in St. Peter's confession. We have seen that there is some presumption (the extent of which we would not exaggerate, though it seems to us real) that St. Peter did actually use the words attributed to him by Matthew. If so, 'the Son of the living God' would be stronger still than the more common phrase without the epithet. Not only (as we have suggested) does this at once bring before the mind a whole mass of most central OT teaching, but by the very fact of varying from and adding to the current phrase it prepares us for a variation from and addition to the meaning. 'The Son' is emphatically taken out of the common category of all others who may be described as 'sons.' And, 'the Son of the living God' is as much as to say 'the Son of Jehovah Himself,' the God of Revelation and Redemption, and the expression of His Personal Being. We are on the way towards the $\alpha\delta\alpha\upsilon\gamma\alpha\sigma\mu\alpha$ $\tau\eta\varsigma$ $\delta\epsilon\acute{\iota}\xi\eta\varsigma$ $\kappa\alpha\iota$ $\chi\alpha\rho\alpha\kappa\tau\eta\rho$ $\tau\eta\varsigma$ $\psi\omicron\upsilon\sigma\tau\alpha\tau\epsilon\omega\varsigma$ of He 1³.

(b) For Jesus Himself.—But the question that concerns us most is, of course, What sense did the title and its equivalents bear for Jesus Himself? And here again we shall have to regard the question from several distinct points of view. We shall do well to look at it, (i.) in the light of our Lord's own filial consciousness; (ii.) in the light of the external testimony borne to Him by the Father; (iii.) with reference to the two distinct things, Messiahship and Divinity; (iv.) and lastly, with reference to the extent to which the Divine Sonship is to be carried back behind the Incarnation.

(i.) The filial consciousness of Jesus.—We have expressed our reluctance to speak too freely of the human consciousness of our Lord (art. JESUS CHRIST, ii. 603). But there can be no question that the central constituent in that consciousness was the complete and unclouded sense of the filial relation, evidenced at once by perfect mutuality of knowledge between the Son and the Father, and perfect submission and response on the part of the Son to the Father's will. On this head it may be said that critics of all shades are agreed (see, e.g., Holtzmann, Neutest. Theol. i. 281 f., with numerous authorities quoted on p. 282; also Harnack, What is Christianity? p. 127 ff.).

But, that being so, it is rather strange that the references to this filial relation in the Synoptic Gospels should be so comparatively few. It is indeed implied in the many places in which (as we have seen) Jesus speaks of 'My Father' in a sense peculiar to Himself. But, apart from these, there are but two conspicuous passages in which the relation in question is described. On the side of action we have the supreme 'obedience unto death' of Mk 14³⁶ || 'Abba, Father, all things are possible unto thee; remove this cup from me: howbeit not what I will, but what thou wilt': with which we may compare the intimacy of inward converse throughout the Passion (Lk 23³⁴, [et al.]⁴⁶). And on the side of knowledge we have the one great passage, Mt 11²⁷ 'No one knoweth the Son, save the Father; neither doth any know the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him.' It is in consequence of this relation that 'all things have been delivered' unto the Son by the Father (ib.), and that whosoever receives the Son receives really the Father who sent Him (Mk 9³⁷ ||).

In the Synoptic Gospels, with these few exceptions, the filial relation is rather felt as an underlying presupposition of the narrative than directly expressed in it. But when we turn to the Fourth Gospel, what has been hitherto of the nature of incidental comment or implication becomes nothing less than a standing theme, worked out in great variety of detail.

The Son is come forth from God, from the Father (Jn 13³ 16²⁷ 29); He is not come of Himself, but is sent by God (842 179); and as He comes forth from God, so also He returns to God (133 1628). He is come in the Father's name (543); not to seek His own will, but the will of Him that sent Him (530 638 1431 1716); to do that will is the support and stay, the ruling function, of His whole being (454). It follows that the Son does not seek His own glory but the Father's (718 830 174); and, as the converse of this, He does not glorify Himself, but is glorified by the Father (1238 1339 175), though the Father is glorified in the Son. The acts of the Son are really the acts of the Father, the natural expression of that perfect intimacy in which they stand to each other (519 20 529 1028 37 38). The reciprocity between them is complete, it is seen in the perfection of their mutual knowledge (729 819 1015 1725); so that the teaching of the Son is really the teaching of the Father (718 824 23 38 1249 50 1410 24 1512). [It is important to note that the after-teaching of the Spirit comes under the same description; He too will 'not speak from himself; but what things soever he shall hear, these shall he speak' (1612; cf. 1513)]. Hence the life and character and words of the Son, taken as a whole, constitute a revelation of the Father such as had never been given before (946 14710; cf. 114 15). The great fundamental fact is that the Son is in the Father and the Father in Him (1028 1411 1741); or, in other words, the Son and the Father are one (1030); a claim which the Jews appear to have understood, for they accused our Lord of 'making himself equal with God' (519).

It was but another aspect of His filial relation that the Son was the object of the Father's unwavering and unfeeling love (Jn 338 520 1017 158 10 1725 24 26; cf. 1141 142); that the Father bears witness to Him (537 818 1290) [and we observe here again that the witness which is borne to the Son by the Father is also borne by the Spirit (1530)]; or, to use a summary Jewish expression, 'him the Father, even God, hath sealed' (627). Nor is it surprising that the prerogatives of the Father are committed to the Son (534 123 1605 177), more particularly the prerogative of judgment (522 27 620), and the power of both possessing and imparting life (520 1122 148 19 172; cf. 14); or that the Son is to be honoured as the Father is honoured (522; cf. 1528 24); or that mankind are invited to 'come' to the Son as the source of all highest nourishment (414 615 737), and as the way to the Father (657 44 146).

It is open to us, if we will, to think that in this collection of sayings there is an element—possibly a somewhat considerable element—that represents not so much what was actually spoken as enlargement or comment embodying the experience and reflexion of the growing Church. It is open to us, if we will, to think that the part played by such sayings in the Gospel is proportionately greater than they would have seemed to bear to any average disciple who had heard the Lord. That it should be so would be perfectly consistent with the Gospel being the work of an apostle. It would be the natural and deliberate result of his setting himself to write a πνευματικὸν εὐαγγέλιον, the object of which was not so much to furnish a photographic reproduction of the events as to fill up gaps and deficiencies in the records of preceding evangelists. But, when every deduction is made, the fact remains that sayings of this character there most certainly were; and not only so, but on the showing of the most critical of critics they supplied the real key-note to the whole history. A scientific examination of the Gospels, whatever else it brings out, brings out this, that the root-element in the consciousness of Jesus was a sense of Sonship to the Divine Father, deeper, clearer, more intimate, more all-embracing and all-absorbing, than ever was vouchsafed to a child of man.

(ii.) The testimony of the Father.—We have spoken so far of what might be called the subjective consciousness of Jesus. As much at least as this not only follows from the logic of the history, but is distinctly revealed to us—in the Synoptic Gospels sufficiently, in the Fourth Gospel abundantly. But to this subjective conviction on His part the narratives tell us that there was also added an objective confirmation. The confirmation was given in the two voices at the Baptism and at the Transfiguration (Mk 1¹¹ || 9² ||), and also—if we take in St. John—by the voice heard at the visit of the Greeks (Jn 12²⁸). How are we to explain these utterances?

If the narratives are well founded, we are not limited in our explanation by any inquiry as to the current contemporary interpretation of such texts as Ps 2⁷, Is 42¹, Dt 18¹⁵, however much the words said to have been spoken contain reminiscences of or allusions to those texts. For the hearing of the voices was what might be called a prophetic hearing. The probability is, as we have hinted above (p. 572), that just as on the third occasion, while the crowd said, 'It thundered,' or 'An angel spake to him,' either in the first instance the Baptist, or in the second instance the three apostles, or perhaps in all three, Jesus Christ Himself alone was aware of something that conveyed a more articulate sense than this. But in any case the sense thus conveyed was conveyed to the spiritual ear by a method analogous to that of prophetic inspiration.

And if, on the occasions in question, the Spirit of God did intimate prophetically to chosen witnesses, more or fewer, a revelation couched partly in the language of the ancient Scriptures, it would by no means follow that the meaning of the revelation was limited to the meaning of those older Scriptures. On the contrary, it would be likely enough that the old words would be charged with new meaning—that, indeed, the revelation contained in them, though linking on to some message of the past, would yet be in substance a new revelation.

We have seen that the ancient Scriptures of which we are speaking contributed, each in its way, to create that Ideal Figure which, in dimensions varying with the apprehending eye and mind, hovered before the imaginations of the contemporaries of Jesus. To Jesus Himself it reached the fullest dimensions of which it was capable. And we may assume that to His mind the announcement 'Thou art my Son' meant not only all that it had ever meant to the most enlightened of seers in the past, but, yet more, all that the response of His own heart told Him that it meant in the present.

It might well content us to put into the words this, and no more. But it is possible, and we should be justified in supposing—not by way of dogmatic assertion, but by way of pious belief—in view of the later history and the progress of subsequent revelation, that the words were intended to suggest a new truth not hitherto made known, viz. that the Son was Son not only in the sense of the Messianic King, or of an Ideal People, but that the idea of Sonship was fulfilled in Him in a way yet more mysterious and yet more essential; in other words, that He was Son, not merely in prophetic contemplation but in actual transcendent fact, before the foundation of the worlds.

(iii.) Messiahship and divinity.—This last possibility brings us to the question, which in any case we shall have to face: What exactly is the meaning of the title 'Son of God'? There is no doubt that it means the expected Messiah,—that at least. But how much more does it mean than that? In particular, does it mean the Son as incarnate, or does it go behind and beyond the Incarnation?

We reserve the last part of this question for a moment. In the meantime we must attempt to define rather more exactly the relation of the title 'Son of God' to the conception of the Messiah. In the popular mind, at the period with which we are concerned, the two things would be simply identical. But, as we so constantly see, our Lord was not content merely to take a popular idea with the conventional stamp upon it. In His hands the popular idea is nearly always remoulded, renewed, brought into harmony with some fresh and powerful reality, and reissued with the signature of that reality.

He had done this with the title SON OF MAN. For the author of the Similitudes in the Book of Enoch and for those who inherited his tradition, the Son of Man was just the Messiah as Judge. But our Lord went back to the original sources of the title, Dn 7¹³ and Ps 8¹; and He thus brought it into living contact with the conception of Man as Man. In His lips it was the Messiah as Man, the perfect Man, in the sense of being more man—more completely embodying in Himself the essence of all that went to make man, more utterly in touch with everything in man—than any who had ever borne the name of man before.

So, too, with the title 'Son of God.' Its meaning was very far from being exhausted by the holding of a certain office or function, such as that of the Messiah. For Jesus the phrase means the absolute fulness of all that it ought to mean—the perfection of Sonship in relation to God; in a word, just all that sum of relations and habitudes of feeling and thought and action that we have seen so amply set before us in the Gospel of St. John. It is the picture of a mind lying open without flaw or impediment to the stream of Divine love pouring in upon it, and responding to that love at once with exquisite sensitiveness and with entire completeness. It is indeed the very perfection of what we mean by religion and the religious attitude of the soul to God.

It thus appears that in the mind of Christ the Jewish conception of the Messiah parted in two directions—one covering all the relationships of man to man, and the other in like manner covering all the relationships of the perfect Man to God. It parted in these directions, and it was resolvable into the two complementary ideals to which they led. And as a matter of fact the life of Christ on earth was the consummate realization of those ideals. [Compare with the above an admirable paragraph in Holtzmann, Neutest. Theol. i. 281 f.]

The Jewish title 'Messiah' had upon it the stamp of something local and temporary; and as such it has lost much of its interest for the modern world. But the two other titles of which we have been speaking imply what is neither local nor temporary, but as permanent as Humanity itself. It is therefore specially under these titles that our Lord most freely revealed Himself.

There is, however, something in the title 'Messiah' which although present was not quite so prominent in the other two. They convey to us as fully as it could be conveyed what Jesus was in Himself. But they do not bring out in the same relief the historical mission that He had in the first instance for His contemporaries and through them for all after-ages. The wonderful birth, the wonderful works, the crucifixion, the resurrection, and the ascension may be viewed as aspects of the work of the Son of Man and of the Son of God,—they are aspects of the work of salvation and of the coming forth from and return to the Father,—but as enacted in space and time they might be more appropriately described as belonging to the manifestation of the Messiah.

What deeper implications are there in the title 'Son of God'? Were the 4th cent. Fathers right in claiming that He who bore this title was not only in the full sense 'Son' but in the full sense 'God,'—that to be the Son of God implied identity of nature or of essence?

We may say with confidence that a Sonship such as is described in the Fourth Gospel would carry with it this conclusion. How could any inferior being either enter so perfectly into the mind of the Father or reflect it so perfectly to man? Of what created being could it be said, 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father'? We need not stay to pick out other expressions that admit of no lower interpretation, because the evangelist has made it clear by his Prologue what construction he himself put upon his own narrative.

But, although this conclusion can really be made good independently of the next and last point that we have to consider, it is to some extent mixed up with it, and it may be well to pass on to this point.

(iv.) Pre-existence.—When we use the title 'Son of God,' how much does it cover? Is it strictly and properly applied to the incarnate Christ, or does it extend backwards before the Incarnation? In other words, does it, or does it not, imply pre-existence? We cannot discuss this question adequately without taking in the rest of the NT. We may, however, provisionally ask what inference would be drawn from the Gospels.

And in regard to these there is no doubt that in the great majority of cases the words would be satisfied by a reference to Christ as incarnate. All the instances in the Synoptic Gospels would come under this head. On the other hand, it is equally little open to question that in the Fourth Gospel Christ is conceived as pre-existent. Nothing could be more explicit than the opening verse. Christ as the Logos was in the beginning with God, and was God. But does this hold good of Him also as the Son? That is more debatable. We have to look about somewhat for expressions that are free from ambiguity. Perhaps there are not any.

The clearest would be the verse Jn 1¹⁸ (which belongs to the evangelist), if we could be sure that the common reading is correct: 'the only-begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father,' seems to speak of this pre-existent condition (= πρὸς τὸν θεόν of v. 1) as though it belonged to Him as Son. But then we are confronted by the well-known question of reading. It must be enough to refer to the elaborate note in WH, and to Dr. Hort's dissertation (1876), with which the present writer, so far as his judgment goes, would express his agreement. But the reading would then be not 'the only-begotten Son,' but 'God only-begotten.' Places like 3¹⁸ [v. l.]³¹, which are unambiguous as to pre-existence, do not clearly connect it with 'the Son.' Indeed the first of these introduces somewhat unexpectedly not the 'Son of God,' but the 'Son of Man,' who must be the Son incarnate. At the same time the terms 'Father' and 'Son' are so correlative that the frequent occurrence of such phrases as 'My Father which sent me,' 'Not any man hath seen the Father save he which is from God,' 'I speak the things which I have seen with my Father,' would seem to suggest that the relation of Father and Son existed before the Son became incarnate. At any rate the great emphasis on the two terms would seem to show that the relation to which they point is not a passing phase, but something that goes deep down into the essence of being.

Or perhaps the case might be stated thus. The burden of proof really seems to lie with those who would refuse to associate the idea of pre-existence with that of Sonship. The many examples in which the term 'Son' is used without any such implication go but a very slight way to exclude it where it is really suggested. In the case of St. John there is a clear presumption that it is so suggested; while in the Synoptic Gospels it is probable that the writers had not reflected upon the subject at all, and did but reproduce a portion of our Lord's teaching upon it. The decision as to how far the Johannine presentation is to be accepted will depend upon the general estimate of the Fourth Gospel as a historical authority. To the present writer it seems in this instance, as in so many others, just to supply what the other Gospels lead us to the verge of without directly supplying.

(c) For the apostles.—We have seen that the apostolic writers freely make use of the title 'Son of God' as a formula to express their Christian faith, or, as we may say in other words, in order to bring out their belief in the Divine side of the nature of Christ. What they meant would be very similar to the well-known exordium of the Second (so-called) Epistle of Clement: 'Brethren, we ought so to think of Jesus Christ as of God (ὡς περὶ Θεοῦ), as of the Judge of quick and dead.' The phrase, in each case, is vague; to define it more exactly will be the work of centuries; but the frame or mould has been provided by which the work of those centuries is to be circumscribed.

The principal question that meets us is the same as that with which we have just been dealing in regard to the Gospels. Does the term 'Son of God,' as used by the apostles, contain any implication of pre-existence, or is it limited to Christ as incarnate?

Here again by far the greater number of passages are ambiguous; if they do not suggest pre-existence and pre-existent relations, they also do not exclude them. There are, however, two passages that bear upon the question more directly.

One is the opening of the Ep. to the Hebrews: 'God, having of old time spoken unto the fathers in the prophets . . . hath at the end of these days spoken unto us in His Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things, through whom also he made the worlds; who being the effulgence of his glory, and the very image of his substance, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had made purification of sins, sat down on the right hand of the majesty on high.'

Two ways of taking this passage are possible. On the one hand, if we argue strictly, it may be urged that there is but one principal clause in the sentence, to which all the other subordinate and relative clauses are referred. This principal clause speaks of the Son [of God]. It would therefore follow that all the relative clauses point back to Him as Son. That is to say, that as Son He made the worlds; as Son He is the effulgence of the Divine glory, the image of the Divine substance; as Son He upheld and upholds all things. That would carry back the Sonship to the time before creation, and would make it an attribute pertaining to the essence of Christ's Godhead.

But, on the other hand, it may be questioned whether we ought in this case to argue strictly. Because the relative clauses refer to the Son, it does not quite necessarily follow that they refer to Him as Son. It may be urged that the main contrast in the passage is between the previous revelations through the prophets and the final revelation through the Son, i.e. the incarnate Son, and that this contrast dominates the whole passage, many parts of which do indeed point to the Son as incarnate ('whom he appointed heir of all things,' 'when he made purification of sins,' 'sat down at the right hand'). The other clauses, which imply pre-existence, would then be referred to the Son not strictly as such, but by a slight and quite natural laxity of language to Him who [afterwards, in view of His incarnation] came to be specially called 'Son.' This second way of taking the passage is not really stretched beyond what is common enough in language, though the first would be more accurate.

The other passage is Col 1⁽¹²⁾.¹⁸ 'the Son of his love . . . who is the image (εἰκών) of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation' (πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως). Now, it is true that in biblical usage the leading idea in πρωτότοκος is that of the legal rights of the firstborn, his precedence over all who are born after him (cf. Ro 8²⁹). But in a context like this, in view of the defining genitive πάσης κτίσεως, it seems wrong to exclude the idea of priority as well (πρὸ πάσης κτίσεως γεννηθείς, Theodrt.; otherwise Haupt, Gefangenschaftsbriefe, p. 27). There is not a direct allusion to Ps 89²⁷ (28), though it is very possible that the Messianic application of that verse led by several steps to the use of the term here. It brings in another cycle of expressions which help to carry back the conception of sonship from the historic to the pre-historic stage. See, further, Lightfoot, Col. ad loc.

Ro 8³, where the Son does not become the Son by being sent, but is already 'God's own Son' (emphatic) before He is sent, tends the same way.

In the Epp. of St. John there is nothing quite conclusive. We are really at the same level as in the Gospel. But, as there, the absolute use of 'the Father' and 'the Son' and of 'God the Father' (1 Jn 2²²⁻²⁴ 4¹⁴ 5¹³, 2 Jn 3. 4. 9, cf. 1 P 1¹², Jude¹) suggests a conception of Sonship which dates back behind the historic manifestation. On Jn 1¹⁸ see above.

Note on the origin of the Christian use of the title 'Son of God.'—In his able and interesting but far too confident and sweeping book, Die Anfänge unserer Religion (Tübingen u. Leipzig, 1901), p. 295, Prof. Wernle of Basel commits himself to the proposition that 'from the OT and from Rabbinism there is no road that leads to the doctrine of the Divinity of Christ.' He allows that the title 'Son of God' is strictly Jewish, but he appears to think that the further step 'Son of God = God' was taken upon Gentile ground, through the lax ideas brought in by the converts from paganism, and their readiness to admit new divinities to the Pantheon. Against this, indeed, ought rightly to be set the fact that the first lesson that they learnt on coming over to Christianity was the great lesson that God is One. But it was not really left to the Gentile Christians to crown an edifice that was incomplete without them. Wernle himself evidently feels that St. Paul had already gone far by identifying Christ with the 'Lord' of OT. He is obliged further to say that in his Christology St. Paul is not really a Jew, and to set down this side of his teaching to a supposed 'mythological tendency' which he himself is unable to account for.

It is one of the ground fallacies of Wernle's book to attribute far too much to the initiative of St. Paul. If the deification of Christ had been really due to him, and if in carrying it out he had been acting in opposition to the sense of the Christian community, we should most certainly have heard of it. But it is quite beyond question that Christ Himself was accused before the Sanhedrin of an extreme form of blasphemy, and that it was upon that charge that He was condemned (Mk 14⁶¹⁻⁶⁴). In the Fourth Gospel we are expressly told that the Jews regarded the claim of Christ as 'making himself equal with God' (Jn 5¹⁸). It is, however, another of Wernle's ground fallacies to treat especially the Jewish element in this Gospel with great one-sidedness (see Synopt. Frage, p. 255, a real blot upon an otherwise excellent book).

The only at all contemporary attempt known to the present writer to distinguish radically between υἱος Θεοῦ and θεός is in Clem. Rom. xvi. 15, 16 (cf. x. 10). It is characteristic of the teaching of that curiously isolated production. At a later date the distinction became the main fulcrum of Arianism.

III. THE EARLY CHURCH.—We might sum up at the point we have reached; but it seems better to pass on a few steps beyond the close of NT. which is not a real break.

1. The sub-Apostolic Fathers.—In the sub-Apostolic writings we find a state of things very similar to that which we have just left behind. There is no doubt a certain amount of usage in which the term 'Son' may be appropriately explained of the Incarnate.

Such would be, e.g., Ignatius, Smyrn. i. 1, 'persuaded as touching our Lord that he is truly of the race of David according to the flesh, but Son of God by the Divine will and power, truly born of a virgin.' This is clearly modelled on Ro 1⁴ (similarly Barn. v. 9, 11).

But even in this writer there are instances where a less restricted sense would seem to be intended, as in the Trinitarian passage, Magn. xiii. 1, 'that ye may prosper in all things . . . in the Son and Father and in the Spirit' (ἐν υἱῷ καὶ πατρὶ καὶ ἐν πνεύματι); and in Rom. inser., '[the Church] which I also salute in the name of Jesus Christ, the Son of the Father' (υἱοῦ πατρὸς). We seem to have here the absolute use of 'Father' and 'Son' as correlative to each other, without reference to the Incarnation. Cf. Magn. vi. 1, 'Jesus Christ, who was with the Father before the worlds and appeared at the end of time'; if the Fatherhood is pre-mundane, the Sonship must also be pre-mundane.

All ambiguity is removed in Barn. vi. 12, where we have the first express reference of the plural in Gn 1st to 'the Son,' 'For the scripture saith concerning us, how he saith to the Son: Let us make,' etc. (cf. v. 5). The strange reading 'Son of God,' foisted into the free quotation of Ex 17¹⁴ in Barn. xii. 9, can hardly be adduced, because Joshua is regarded as a type by anticipation of the Incarnate.

Another quite clear passage is Herm. Sim. ix. 12. 2, where the Son of God, eo nomine, is described as 'anterior to all creation, so that he became the Father's adviser in his creation' (ὁ μὲν υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ πᾶσις τῆς κτίσεως αὐτοῦ προγενέστερός ἐστιν, κ.τ.λ.). This evidently takes up the πρωτότοκος πᾶσις κτίσεως of Col 1st, assuming the doctrine if not actually referring to the words.

Of the group of passages in Patr. Apost. where παῖς is certainly used in the sense of 'Son,' one at least, Ep. Diogn. viii. 9-11, refers unequivocally to the pre-Incarnate, 'having conceived a great and unalterable scheme, he communicated it to his Son alone' (ἀνεκουνώσατο μόνῳ τῷ παιδί). The state of the case appears to be, that while in Patr. Apost. the title is still predominantly referred to the incarnate state, the writers have no sense of being confined to this, and are quite prepared to go beyond it.

When we come to Justin all distinction is obliterated, and the Son is frankly identified with the Logos; Apol. ii. 6, 'But to the Father of all, who is unbegotten, there is no name given. . . . And his Son, who alone is properly called Son, the Word, who also was with him and was begotten before the works, when at first he created and arranged all things by him,' etc. (ὁ δὲ υἱὸς ἐκείνου, ὁ μόνος λεγόμενος κυρίως υἱός, ὁ λόγος πρὸ τῶν ποιμάτων καὶ συνῶν καὶ γεννώμενος, κ.τ.λ.). Here we not only have 'Son' and 'Word' used as convertible, but a special stress is laid on the idea of 'generation' as involved in 'Sonship,' which a little later in Origen took shape in the doctrine of the Eternal Generation (de Princ. i. ii. 4, 9). Before this, in Ignat. Eph. vii. 2, both words γεννητός and ἀγέννητος (v.l. γεννῆτός and ἀγέννητος) had been applied to Christ, but with quite untechnical freedom (cf. Lightfoot, ad loc., and ii. 90-94; also Robertson, Athanasius, pp. 149, 475 n.).

The passage of Justin is very important as a landmark. From that time forwards what might be called the metaphysical treatment of the title

'Son' becomes more and more common until it reaches its climax in the writers of the 4th century.

Notes on the meaning of 'Son' in the Apostles' Creed.—There arose in Germany in the years 1892-1894 a rather sharp discussion about the Apostles' Creed, begun by Harnack and taken up by Zahn, Kattenbusch, Cremer, and others. This also produced in England an admirable little volume of lectures by Dr. Swete (The Apostles' Creed, Cambridge, 1894), which gives a concise account of most of the points at issue. Among these was the question as to the interpretation of the term 'Son' in the Creed, which Harnack wished to limit to the historic, as contrasted with the prehistoric, Sonship. Dr. Swete perhaps (p. 28 ff.) a little overstates both Harnack's contention and the strength of the arguments against it. And yet that contention is really too sweeping, though the point made by Kattenbusch in his recently completed larger work (Das Apost. Symbol, ii. 566 f.), that the clause τὸν γεννητὸν ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς ὡς ὁ πατὴρ ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς, shows that the historic γεννητός was in the author's mind, appears to be valid. It is true that the first interest in this paragraph of the Creed is in historical facts. But at the same time, as Kattenbusch also very rightly observes, there is no antithesis to the Christology of Pre-existence. The question is not really raised; and yet, as we might perhaps put it, the conception of Sonship is left open on that side. We are reminded that the Creed is in its origin Western and not Oriental. And for Western thought more especially, the denial of a purely natural birth may be taken to imply pre-existence.

It should be added that recent research places the origin of the Creed with confidence in the first half of the 2nd cent., and many would say in the first quarter; so that it would be strictly parallel to the Apostolic Fathers.

2. Marcellus of Ancyra.—One episode in the controversies of the 4th cent. has a not inconsiderable reflex bearing on the interpretation of NT.

Marcellus of Ancyra was one of the keenest supporters of Nicene doctrine. He seems, however, to have asserted it on different grounds from those commonly brought forward. The position he took up was in the first instance biblical. We have seen that the Arians exploited in their own interest the title 'Son.' They inferred from it the posteriority and inferiority of Him by whom it was borne. Marcellus appears to have met them by saying that the use which they made of the title was unwarranted and indeed altogether wide of the mark. According to him, the title 'Son' had no reference to origin or to the pre-existent relation of Christ to the Father. The proper term to denote this relation was in his view not 'Son,' but 'Logos.' It appears to be a mistake to say that he denied the 'Trinity' or the distinct hypostatic existence of the Logos, though some of his speculations were not quite easily reconcilable with this. But his main contention was that 'Logos' was the proper name of the pre-Incarnate and 'Son' of the Incarnate, and that the biblical writers observed this distinction, the only apparent exception being cases in which the title 'Son' was used 'prophetically.' Eusebius of Caesarea, who replied to him, marshals an imposing array of no fewer than thirty separate designations which he maintains to have been also used of the Son before the Incarnation; but they are nearly all wide of the mark, and it must be confessed that on this ground the victory rests rather with his opponent (see Euseb. de Eccl. Theol. i. 17-20, Migne, Pat. Gr. xxiv. 856-896; and on the whole controversy, esp. the monograph by Zahn, Marcellus von Ancyra, Gotha, 1867; and Moberly, Atonement and Personality (London, 1901, pp. 208-215).

Conclusion.—From what has been said, it will be seen that the assertion of Marcellus in regard to the biblical usage was really very much in the right direction, though—as is so often the case with the ancients, when they have got hold of a right principle in criticism or exegesis—it is rather too sweeping and unqualified.

As compared with Marcellus and the modern revivers of his opinion, our own conclusion from the evidence passed in review would be, that while it is undoubtedly true that the biblical writers and the other early Christian writers before Justin, start from the Incarnation and are thinking primarily of this, their thought does not necessarily end with it. It seems to point backwards into the dim past behind it. Certainly there is no sharp line of demarcation restricting the meaning of the title to the incarnate state and no other. The writers are so far from guarding themselves against any reference beyond the Incarnation that they seem rather naturally to suggest it. The Son is so called primarily as incarnate. But that which is the essence of the Incarnation must needs be also larger than the Incarnation. It must needs have its roots in the eternity of Godhead. [See esp. a very instructive and carefully balanced discussion in Moberly, Atonement and Personality, pp. 185 ff., 211-215].

LITERATURE.—The most important literature will have been sufficiently indicated in the course of the article. The works to which the writer himself owes most are Dalman's Worte Jesu (Leipzig, 1898), and H. J. Holtzmann's Neutest. Theologie (Freiburg i. B. u. Leipzig, 1897). To these should now be added Harnack's Das Wesen des Christentums (admirably translated under the title What is Christianity? London, 1901), which has a very suggestive treatment of the subject, though too impatient of formulated doctrine; and the portion of Moberly, Atonement and Personality, just referred to. Younger students should not fail to have recourse to Dr. Swete's Apostles' Creed (Cambridge, 1894).

W. SANDAY.

SON OF MAN.—1. An expression occurring in both OT and NT, and used in the following applications. (1) A poet. synonym of 'man,' found in parallelism with 'man' (the word for 'man' in the two clauses being in the original a different one). See the occurrences in § 6; and add Ps 144³⁰ (for בְּנֵי אָדָם ; לְאָדָם). (2) In Ezek. the title under which the prophet is regularly addressed by Jⁿ, 21.³ 31.³ and upwards of 90 times besides. Ezek. has a profound sense of the majesty of Jⁿ; and the expression is no doubt intended to mark the distance which separated the prophet, as one of mankind, from Him. The title is borrowed from Ezek. in Dn 8¹⁷. (3) In the vision in Dn 7 the glorious being whom Dan. sees brought 'with the clouds of heaven' to the Almighty, after the fourth beast (representing the empire of the Seleucids) is slain, to receive an everlasting and universal dominion (v. 14), is described as 'one like unto a son of man' (Aram. כְּבֶן אָדָם). The expression means simply a figure in human form. What the figure was intended to denote has been the subject of much controversy. At an early date (see § 11) it was undoubtedly interpreted of the Messiah, and the same view has been largely held down to the present time (e.g. by Ewald, Riehm, and Behrmann); but in the author's own interpretation of the vision (vv. 18. 22. 27) the 'saints of the Most High' take the place of the 'one like unto a son of man'; and this constitutes a strong ground for concluding that he himself understood by it the glorified and ideal people of Israel (see, further, the present writer's Comm. on Dan. p. 103 ff.). The same expression in Greek ($\delta\mu\omega\iota\sigma\tau\acute{\eta}\varsigma \upsilon\pi\epsilon\rho\ \alpha\nu\theta\rho\omega\pi\acute{\iota}\nu\omicron\upsilon$: see RV) is applied also in Rev 1¹³ 14¹⁴ to the risen and glorified Christ.

2. 'The Son of man' ($\delta\ \upsilon\iota\delta\varsigma\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \alpha\nu\theta\rho\omega\pi\acute{\iota}\nu\omicron\upsilon$) is a designation of Christ, though one confined to the Gospels and Ac 7⁵⁶, and, except Ac 7⁵⁶ (where it occurs in Stephen's dying exclamation*), found only in the mouth of Christ Himself (the quotation in Jn 12³⁴ forming no real exception).

3. The following is a synopsis of the occurrences in the Synoptic Gospels, in the order given, or suggested, by St. Mark:—

|-----------------|-----------------|-----------------|---|
| 9 ⁶ | 2 ¹⁰ | 5 ²⁴ | (hath authority on earth to forgive sins) |
| 12 ⁸ | 2 ²⁸ | 6 ⁵ | (is lord of the sabbath) |

* Cf. the words spoken by James, the brother of the Lord, just before his martyrdom, as reported by Hegesippus, ap. Euseb. ii. 23 (see vol. ii. p. 542^b).

| Mt | Mk | Lk | |
|---------------------|--|----------------------|---|
| 12 ^{30a} | [22 ^c] | 12 ^{10a} | (whoever shall speak a word against the Son of man, etc.) |
| [51 ¹] | | 6 ²² | (when men reproach you, etc., for the Son of man's sake) |
| 10 ²³ | | | (shall not have finished the cities of Israel, till the Son of man be come) |
| [10 ²³] | | 12 ⁹ | (him shall the Son of man also confess before the angels of God) |
| 11 ¹⁹ | | 7 ³⁴ | (came eating and drinking) |
| 8 ³⁰ | | 9 ⁵⁸ | (hath not where to lay his head) |
| [16 ⁴] | [81 ²] | 11 ³⁰ | (as Jonah was three days, etc. [Mt]; as Jonah became a sign unto the Ninevites, etc. [Lk]) |
| 12 ⁴⁰ | | | (he that soweth the good seed is the Son of man)† |
| 13 ³⁷ | | | (will send forth his angels, etc.)‡ |
| 13 ⁴¹ | [82 ⁷] | [91 ⁸] | (who do men say that the Son of man is?) |
| [16 ²¹] | 8 ³¹ | 9 ²² | (must suffer many things, be killed, and rise again) |
| 16 ²⁷ | 8 ³⁶ | 9 ²⁶ | (of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory, etc. [Mk, Lk]; for the Son of man shall come in, etc. [Mt]) |
| 16 ²⁸ | [91 ¹] | [92 ⁷] | (shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming, etc.) |
| 17 ⁹ | 9 ⁹ | [93 ³] | (to tell the vision to no man till the Son of man be risen from the dead) |
| 17 ¹² | 9 ¹² | | (to suffer like Elijah [John the Baptist]) |
| 17 ²² | 9 ³¹ | 9 ⁴⁴ | (shall be delivered into the hands of men, etc., and [Mt, Mk] rise again) |
| 19 ²⁸ | [102 ¹] | [183 ²] | (in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit on the throne, etc.) |
| 20 ¹⁸ | 10 ⁴³ | 18 ³¹ | (to be delivered to the chief priests, etc., and rise again) |
| 20 ²⁸ | 10 ⁴³ [cf. 22 ²⁷] | 17 ²² | (to give his life a ransom for many) |
| 24 ²⁷ | | 17 ²⁴ | (when ye shall desire to see one of the days of the Son of man) |
| 24 ^{30a} | [135 ²] | [217 ²] | (as the lightning . . . so shall be the coming of the Son of man) |
| 24 ^{30b} | 13 ²⁶ | 21 ⁷ | (then shall appear the sign of the Son of man) |
| | | 21 ⁷ | (shall see the Son of man coming in [on] the clouds of heaven) |
| | | 21 ³⁶ | (watch . . . that ye may be able . . . to stand before the Son of man) |
| 24 ³⁷ | | 17 ²⁶ | (as were the days of Noah, so shall be the coming of the Son of man) |
| 24 ³⁸ | [177 ²] | 17 ³⁰ | (as they were in those days . . .) so shall be the coming, etc.) |
| | | 17 ³⁰ | (as the days of Lot . . .) so shall it be in the day that the Son of man is revealed) |
| | | 18 ⁸ | (when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?) |
| | | 19 ¹⁰ | (came to seek and to save that which was lost) |
| 24 ⁴⁴ | [cf. 135 ²] | 12 ⁴⁰ | (in an hour that ye think not, etc.) |
| 25 ³¹ | | | (when the Son of man shall come in his glory) |
| 26 ² | [141 ¹] | [221 ¹] | (after two days the passover cometh, and the Son of man is delivered, etc.) |
| 26 ^{24a} | 14 ^{21a} | 22 ^{22a} | (goeth even as it is written of him) |
| 26 ^{24b} | 14 ^{21b} | [222 ^{2b}] | (woe unto that man through whom the Son of man is betrayed) |
| 26 ⁴⁵ | 14 ⁴¹ | 22 ⁴⁸ | (is betrayed into the hands of sinners) |
| [26 ⁴⁹] | [144 ⁵] | 22 ⁴⁸ | (betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?) |
| 26 ⁶⁴ | 14 ⁶² | 22 ⁶⁹ | (from now ye shall see the Son of man sitting at the right hand of power) |
| [26 ⁶⁹] | [106 ¹] | 24 ⁷ | (saying that the Son of man must be delivered, etc., and rise again) |

Mt 18¹¹ (! Lk 19¹⁰, though in a very different connexion), in Mt 25¹³ the words 'in which the Son of man cometh,' and in Lk 9⁵⁸ the clause 'For the Son of man came not to destroy men's lives but to save them,' are not in the best MSS; cf. RVm on Mt 18¹¹, Lk 9⁵⁸.

The occurrences in the Fourth Gospel are Jn 1⁵¹ 3¹³ 14⁶² 13. 62 8²⁸ 9³⁶ (RBD: cf. RVm), 12³⁴ (see 314²⁸), v. 34 13³¹ (11 [or 12] times). None of these occurrences are parallel to any of those in the Synoptists. See, further, § 23.

4. If the occurrences in the Synoptic Gospels are analyzed, it will be seen that the expression is attributed to Christ upon (probably) 40 distinct occasions,* of which 8 are reported by the three Gospels, 13 by two, and 19 by one. No instance is, however, reported in Mark which is not in one (or both) of the other two Gospels. The occasions fall naturally into two great groups: (1) those in which the reference is to some aspect or other of the earthly work of Christ, in the time of His humility (including, in particular, His sufferings and death); (2) those in which the reference is to His future coming in glory. It is important to bear in mind the fact of these two applications of the expression; for it has some bearing upon recent discussions of the subject. On the crucial passage, Mt 16¹³, see § 19.

5. Before, however, we can proceed to examine the meaning of the title, a prior question must be considered, which has assumed, within recent years, great prominence. Jesus, it is not doubted, spoke, at least as a rule, not Greek but Aramaic; a proper method, therefore, it is urged, requires that we should begin by inquiring how the title would be expressed in Aramaic, and what meaning it would there possess. And when we proceed to translate back ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου into Aramaic an unexpected and startling result discloses itself, which has involved students of the NT in great perplexity.

6. Let us first, for clearness, explain briefly the usage of the expression in Biblical Hebrew.

In Biblical Hebrew, בְּנֵי אָדָם or בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל 'sons of man' (or 'of men,'—אָדָם being a collective term) occurs frequently,—though not so frequently as אָדָם alone, and chiefly in poet. and later Heb.,—to denote mankind in general (Gn 10⁶, 1 S 26¹⁹, 2 S 7¹⁴, Ps 114⁽⁹⁾ 121⁽⁸⁾ 2. 9) 14² etc.).† The sing. בֶּן אָדָם 'son of man' (i.e. not son of an individual man, but son (i.e. member) of the genus man) also occurs, viz. (a) in the address to Ezekiel 21. 3 31. 3, and more than 90 times besides (so also Dn 8¹⁷; cf. Enoch 60¹⁰ 71¹⁴); (b) occasionally in poet. parallelism with אִישׁ or אֲנִי Nu 23¹⁹, Is 51² 56², Jer 49¹⁸ (= v. 30 = 50⁴⁰ = (nearly) 51⁴⁹), Ps 8⁽⁴⁾ 80¹⁷ (18) 146³ (|| נְבִיִּים 'nobles'), Job 16²¹ (|| נָקָר 'man') 25⁶ 35⁹.

7. In Aramaic אָדָם is not found.‡ The term which, speaking generally, corresponds is אָנֹשׁ, אָנִישׁ (in some dialects contracted, without difference of meaning, to אָנִשׁ), in the status emphaticus (corresponding to the def. art. in Heb.) אָנֹשְׁ, אָנִישְׁ (contr. אָנִישׁ). 'Ēnāshā (nāshā) mostly denotes 'man' in a general or collective sense, though it occurs occasionally (p. 582^b) in an individual sense: 'ēnāsh (nāsh), on the other hand, not infrequently possesses an individual sense, and also often sinks to express nothing more than τις, or 'one' (as in 'every one,' 'no one').

In some Aramaic dialects, however, though not in all, 'son (or sons) of man (men)' is common—in prose, and not merely, as in Heb., chiefly in poetry—in the ordinary sense of man (or men), the distinctive force of bar, 'son,' being no longer felt. The following are the main details of this usage:—

(a) Judean Aramaic.—In Biblical Aramaic, the plur. בְּנֵי אָדָם 'sons of men' occurs Dn 2³⁸ 62¹ ('driven from the sons of men,'—interchanging with 'driven from men' (אֲנָשִׁים), 42³ 32. 33 (22. 29. 30)); elsewhere 'ēnāshā is used, 24³ ('the seed of men'); 41⁶ (13) ('changed from (the heart of) men'); 417. 20. 32 (14. 22. 29) 52¹; 426. 32. 33 (22. 29. 30) (just quoted); 79 ('eyes like the eyes of men'); Ezr 4¹¹ (אָנִישׁ determined by the foll. gen.). 'Ēnāsh occurs in the indeterm. sense of 'a man,' 55 67. 12 (8. 13) ('of any god or man'), 74. 14; and in 'every man,' 'no man,' 210 310 57 612 (13).

* Holsten and Oort reckon 42 occasions, distinguishing Lk 11³⁰ from Mt 12⁴⁰; and Mk 8³⁸ Lk 9²⁶ from Mt 16²⁷.

† So אִישׁ Ps 42 (3) 492 (19) 629 (10), Lk 333.

‡ But read here prob. אֲדָם בֵּין אָדָם ('and between a man, and,' etc.).

§ The Targ., where it has אָדָם בֶּן אָדָם (as in Ezek., for אֲדָם בֶּן אָדָם, and occasionally besides), means 'son of Adam.'

Ezr 6¹¹.* Bar 'ēnāsh, 'a son of man,' occurs only in the passage, of which more will be said below, Dn 7¹⁴ 'one like unto a son of man.'

In the Targ. of Onkelos the plur. אֲנָשִׁים בְּנֵי אָדָם occurs Gn 6¹¹ 11⁸, Nu 23¹⁹, Dt 32³ 36. 36; the sing. bar 'ēnāsh does not occur at all, 'man'—where it is not expressed by נָקָר, נָקָרָא (vir)—being represented always by 'ēnāsh, 'ēnāshā.

In the Targ. of Jonathan (on the prophets) the plur. אֲנָשִׁים occurs at least 20 times (as 1 S 15²⁹ 167. 7 24¹⁰ 26¹⁹); 'ēnāsh frequently (as Jos 15 21¹ 317 106); bar 'ēnāsh only Is 51¹² (cod. Reuchl., in ed. Lag., in בר אדר, 562, Jer 49¹⁸ 33 504⁴⁰ 51⁴⁹, Mic 6⁸—in each case being suggested directly by the Hebrew.

(b) In Nabataean Aramaic (some 30 inscriptions, chiefly sepulchral, mostly of 8–14 lines each, dating from a.c. 9 to a.d. 75),† bar 'ēnāsh does not occur at all. 'Ēnāsh, 'ēnāshā occur pretty frequently, very much as in Daniel, in 'every one,' 'no one,' etc. (see CIS II. i. 1977 2063. 6 2093. 6 2103. 5 2127 etc.).

(c) Galilean Aramaic.—In the Palest. Talm. (3–4 cent. a.d.) bar nāsh (determ. bar nāshā) occurs with great frequency, and means simply a (single, individual) man, as בר נש 'a certain man (did so and so)', הוּא בר נש 'that man,' הוּא בר נש 'this man,' and in a weakened sense, with a neg. or כל 'all,' as 'he went out ולא אשכח בר נש and found no one,' כל בר נש ובר נש (=late Heb. כל איש ואיש) 'every one.'‡ Obviously, in all these cases it would be absurd to render bar-nāsh(ā) by 'son of man.'

In the Palest. Dictionary (the 'Evangeliarium Hierosolymitanum,' ed. Erizzo, 1861, ed. Lagarde, in his Bibl. Syr. 1892), of the 5th cent. a.d., the usage is similar: bar-nāsh standing regularly for 'a man' (as אֲנָשׁ בְּרִישׁ = ἀνθρώπος or ἀνθρώπος vir, Lk 23⁴³ 43³ 1030 151¹ etc.); and bar-nāshā (determ.) for 'a man,' as Mt 44 1230. 30 2624. 24, Lk 829. 33. 35 etc.

The same usage prevails in the Palest. Targum on the Pent., and on the Hagiographa (c. 7th cent. a.d.): see, for instance, bar nāsh in Lv 21 41 51. 2 4. 1 etc. ('if a man do so and so': Onk. in all such passages אֲנִישׁ), Ps 90¹⁸ (for בֶּן אָדָם) 115⁴ 118⁸ 8 144³ 4 etc.; † and bar nāshā in 'that man,' Lv 720¹ 810. 2 174 9 19⁶ etc. (Onk. always אֲנִישׁ), Ps 84. 5 56¹² 60¹³ 119¹⁵⁴.

(d) In Syriac, bar-nāsh, bar-nāshā, in the meaning 'man,' are very common. Examples: Lk Ex 13¹³, Is 44¹³, Jer 26 10¹⁴, Ezk 14. 10. 30 108. 14, Dn 7⁸; for ܐܢܫܐ; Curet. and Pesh., Mt 44 1212 45 1511. 11 18 10⁶, Pesh. Mk 388. 27, Jn 22⁷ 3. 23. 24, and (in 'every man') Ro 29 34 1218 1619 (ܐܢܫܐ), and elsewhere. ¶

8. It thus appears that bar nāsh(ā) is a common Aramaic expression, in which the force of the 'son' has been so weakened by time as virtually to have disappeared, so that it practically means nothing more nor less than man (homo, Mensch,—not vir). The natural Aramaic original of ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου would, however, seem to be bar-nāshā. If, now, our Lord spoke Aramaic, and denoted Himself by this expression, what meaning can He have intended to convey by it? To this question, which is by no means a simple one, different answers have been given.

(1) C. B. E. Uloth, who, it seems, was the first to set himself to answer it, came to the conclusion that Jesus called Himself 'the man,' meaning by the expression to point to His creaturely frailty and humility.

(2) Erdmans argued that the expression was not in the days of Christ a Mess. title, and was not used by Him as such. In opposition to the prevalent Mess. expectations, Jesus called Himself 'the man,' meaning it to be understood that He was a man, and not more. Translated literally into Greek, it was not understood, and under the influence of apocalyptic phraseology (Dn 7¹³ etc.) made into a title of Christ.*

(3) Wellhausen, in 1894 and 1897, also considered that Jesus intended by the term to speak of Himself as 'the man,' meaning, however, by the expression the one who completely fulfilled the idea of man, and who as such was in specially close relation to the Father; and the early Christians, not understanding how He could have so described Himself, in translating rendered barnāshā falsely by ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου instead of by ὁ ἀνθρώπος: the expression was thus brought into connexion with Dn 7¹³, and so became a standing Messianic designation of Christ.†

(4) Arnold Meyer‡ called attention to the fact that in Aramaic, in particular in the Aramaic spoken in Galilee, it was not unusual for a person to speak of him- (or her-) self as 'this man,' 'this woman' (הוּא אִישׁ, הִיא אִשְׁתּוֹ, §, and also that there are, even in the OT, passages in which, though the general term 'man' is used, the reference is clearly to the speaker (Job 3²³ 16²¹); and he applied this principle to the explanation of at least some of the passages in the Gospels: sometimes, in using the expression, Jesus spoke of men in general (as Mk 2²⁸ 'Therefore man is lord of the sabbath,' 12³²), sometimes He pointed by it to Himself (as Mk 2¹⁰ 'that ye may know that a man hath authority on earth to forgive sins,' Mt 8²⁰, 11¹⁹ 'a man came eating and drinking,' etc.): the early Greek-speaking Christians, translating it by ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, combined with it associations derived from Dn 7¹³. This explanation does not carry us very far. It is true, it might in the abstract (see § 22) be adopted for some of the passages cited; but otherwise the expression used in the Gospels is not, as in the Galilean phrase quoted, 'this man'; nor does Meyer make any attempt to show how in the numerous other passages concerned, the predictions of sufferings and the eschatological utterances, the expression 'a man' could have been naturally employed by Christ (cf. Fiebig, p. 74 f.).

(5) Lietzmann, as the result of a careful examination of the existing evidence, literary and philological, rejecting the solutions of his predecessors, reached the startling conclusion|| that 'Jesus never applied to Himself the title "son of man" at all, because it does not exist in Aramaic, and upon linguistic grounds cannot exist,—on account, viz., of the fact mentioned above, that barnāshā, though it is lit. 'the son of man,' in actual usage means simply 'the man,' so that the distinction made in the Greek between ὁ ἀνθρώπος and ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου could not have existed in Aramaic (both expressions being translations of the same word, barnāshā). The evangelical tradition which attributes to Christ the use of this title is consequently false. The title arose in Greek: υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου, as a translation of barnāshā in such passages as Mk 2¹⁰, 28, sounded strange; it was consequently, under the influence of Dn 7¹³, turned, under the form ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, into a title of Christ, first in the apocalyptic discourses declaring His future παρουσία, and afterwards more generally in other discourses (pp. 91–95). And Lietzmann supports this conclusion by various subsidiary arguments, of which the principal are: (1) the fact that 'the son of man' was not accepted Messianic title in the age of Christ; (2) the absence of the expression from the writings of St. Paul, which, he claims, is scarcely conceivable had it really been used habitually by Christ; (3) its absence likewise from the literature of the sub-apostolic ages, the Didache, Clement, Polycarp, the Shepherd of Hermas, etc., after a review of which Lietzmann finds it to be first alluded to by the Gnostic sect of Ophites (pp. 62–69), Marcion (c. 120–150 A.D.), and Ignatius (Ephes. xx. 2, τῷ υἱῷ ἀνθρώπου καὶ υἱῷ θεοῦ). And Wellhausen, though for long he could not bring himself to such a tour de force ('Gewaltstreich'), was forced ultimately to agree with Lietzmann. The sense in which he formerly (see above) supposed Christ to have used the expression he now considered to be too abstract, and could consequently find no alternative left but, bold as the step might appear, to deny that Christ used the expression at all. The title originated in Dn 7¹³, being attributed first to Jesus in the eschatological passages (cf. Mk 13²⁶, where, as Wellh. observes, 'the son of man' is not expressly identified with the speaker); and its adoption afterwards as a general self-designation of Jesus was perhaps facilitated by a misapprehension of passages such as Mk 2²⁸, in which barnāshā, though meant generally, was interpreted as referring specially to Christ.*

The general conclusion that Christ had not Himself used the title had been reached before, though without the use of the argument based upon the Aramaic, by Volkmar in 1870, and especially by Oort (in De Uitsluiting d' uic tov ā. in het NT, 1893), who, though he allowed that Jesus might have used the expression as a symbol of the future kingdom, argued that He did not use it as a self-designation; it was introduced first as a personal title by the early Christians from apocalyptic literature, and was ascribed afterwards to Jesus Himself by the evangelists.

9. Such a conclusion, conflicting, as it does, with all the direct evidence that we possess on the subject, could not be accepted, except upon the clearest and strongest grounds; and it is not surprising to find the leading NT scholars on the Continent, including even those who approach the Gospel records from a thoroughly critical standpoint, opposed to it. The principal objections may be thus summarized. (1) The variations between this title and the personal pron. presented by many of the parallel narratives (see the Table), show, indeed, that there are occasions on which we cannot be sure whether the term was actually used by our Lord or not, and it might be admitted (see § 22) that there were even other passages in which it had been attributed to Him incorrectly; but that an expression which in the Gospels is attributed solely to Him, and is never used by the evangelists themselves, should in reality have been never used by Him, but have been introduced into the Gospels entirely by the evangelists, implies an inversion of the facts which is hardly credible. (2) The attribution of the expression to Christ does not depend upon isolated texts in individual Gospels; it has in many cases, as the Table shows, the support of the double, and even of the triple, Synoptic tradition. (3) Exactly the same usage is found, moreover, in the independent tradition represented by the Fourth Gospel; and, as Dr. Drummond [§ 24] remarks, 'there seems to be no particular reason for its appearance in this Gospel, except the fact that it was at least believed to be a common expression in the mouth of Jesus.' Direct personal reminiscences unquestionably underlie both these traditions; and, as the same authority further remarks, 'the apostles must have known whether their Master spoke of Himself in the way recorded in the Gospels or not; and the Gospels are sufficiently near apostolical sources to make us pause before admitting that the Church is responsible for the appearance of so striking a characteristic' as this title in the mouth of Christ. (4) Even assuming that the title was introduced into the eschatological passages in the manner supposed, it is difficult to conjecture a motive for extending the usage to a number of other passages of an entirely different character (Baldensperger [§ 24], p. 254). (5) As regards the supposition that the ascription of the expression to Christ was due to the early Church, Dr. Drummond observes: 'The Church was more likely to omit than to insert the phrase. Reliance is placed on the silence of Christian writers to show that the phrase was not known. The Gospels conclusively prove that it was known; and to imagine that it was a favourite expression just during the period when the Gospels were composed, and that before that time it was not known, and after that time it was not in common use, is to construct history to suit the hypothesis. The Church would have preferred some title apparently higher and more dignified.' (6) St. Paul, it is urged, never uses the title. But neither do the evangelists in speaking of Christ, and yet their own narratives show that they were acquainted with it, and believed it to have been used by Christ. Unless Ac 7⁵⁵ is to be eliminated as unhistorical, along with the numerous occurrences of the title in the mouth of Christ found in the Gospels, it must have been known at the time of Stephen's martyrdom as a designation of Jesus; for otherwise there would be no sufficient cause in Stephen's exclamation to account for the fury of the Jews (Drummond). Schmiedel, moreover,* argues at length that the use made of Ps 8 in 1 Co 15²⁷ and He 2⁹⁻⁹ presupposes the acquaintance of the apostles with the expression as a designation of Christ; the fact that they do not use it more frequently is not difficult to explain. They wrote largely for converts from heathenism, who would be liable to misunderstand it; and they naturally chose by preference terms which would give prominence to the Divinity of Christ. The case would be similar with the sub-apostolic writers. Barnab. 12⁹⁻¹⁰, however, which, it had been alleged, was proof that the writer was unacquainted with the title, had been wrongly explained (as Lietzmann afterwards admitted †).

10. All these considerations would, however, undoubtedly have to yield, if it were philologically certain that 'the son of man' could not have been an expression used by our Lord. The reasons adduced in support of this conclusion are, beyond question, weighty; we must consider carefully whether they are conclusive.

In the first place, it must be clearly understood that we have no actual knowledge of the Aram. original used (presumably) by Christ. We have no records of the Galilean dialect as early as the first cent. A.D.; and hence the Aram. original of 'the son of man' is a matter not of actual knowledge, but of inference. Three possibilities must be kept in view. (1) Wellh. says that barnāsh(ā) in the sense of 'man' is common to Aramaic dialects in general; but this statement is in excess of the evidence; its occurrence in the exceptional passage Dn 7¹³ (in which a semi-poetical expression would be but natural) is not proof that it was in general use in that sense in Bibl. Aramaic; and it is not found in other passages of Dn. (as 7⁴⁻⁸), in which, if it were as commonly in use as it is in the Jerus. Talm., it might be naturally expected. It does not occur in the Aram. of Onk., and occurs but rarely in that of Jon. (§ 7a); and though Wellh. (pp. vi, 195) explains its absence from these Targums by the fact that their authors adhered closely to the Heb. (in which, as pointed out in § 6, the sing. 'son of man' is of rare occurrence), yet it is not certain that this explanation is the correct one. The Pal. Targ. on the Psalms and Job, and the Pesh., are also in general literal translations, and yet bar nāsh(ā) occurs in both frequently (cf. above, § 7 (c), (d)).

Onk. uses regularly אִנְשָׁא for 'soul' (=person), Lv 21 42 27 51 2 4 etc.; and אִנְשָׁא for 'that soul', Gn 17 14, Ex 31 14, Lv 7 30. 21. 27 198 206 and elsewhere. In all these passages pseudo-Jon. uses as regularly 'barnāshā', 'barnāshā.' So in Dt 31 3 (for אִנְשָׁא pseudo-Jon. has אִנְשָׁא, while Onk. has אִנְשָׁא; and in the expression 'the work of man's (or men's) hands' אִנְשָׁא is rendered by barnāsh(ā) in the Palest. Targums (Ps 115 4 135 15, 2 Oh 32 19), but by 'enāshā in Onk. (Dt 4 39) and Jon. (2 K 19 18, Is 37 19). Similarly אִנְשָׁא is rendered in the Pal. Targums by barnāsh(ā), Ps 85 9 103 15 104 15 etc., but by 'enāshā in Jon. (Is 137 24 51 12 56). Cf. also Ps 118 8 (Pal. Targ.: אִנְשָׁא) with Jer 17 9 (Jon.: אִנְשָׁא). So Fiebig, p. 11.

It is true ('enāshā is used mostly as a collective term; but Wellh.'s argument (p. v) to show that it is used so always, and that consequently, unless bar 'enāsh(ā) were in use, there would have been no means of expressing the idea of (a single, particular) man (homo) in Aram., is surely not conclusive; for in Onk. אִנְשָׁא, as has been just shown, occurs repeatedly in the sense of that man (comp. in Heb. the analogous individual and collective applications of אִישׁ). So Fiebig, p. 11.

The Aram. dialects do differ from one another in details of linguistic usage; * and though barnāsh(ā) is common in the Galilean dialects of the 3rd or 4th cent. A.D., it may not, as Dalman points out, have been equally common in the 1st cent.; and if usage had not at that time obliterated the distinctive force of the first part of the compound, bar nāshā might have been used by Christ in the sense of 'the Son of man.' It must, however, be allowed that Fiebig [§ 24] has made it probable (pp. 33-36, 59 f.) from quotations in the Jerus. Talm. that bar nāsh(ā) = 'man' was current in Galilee in the 2nd cent. A.D.

(2) In the Sin. (Curet.) and Pesh. versions of NT, 'the Son of man' is, for distinction from the barnāshā which stands for ὁ ἀνθρώπος, always represented by b'rēh d'nāshā † (lit. his son, that of man, —the pleonasm being an idiom very common in Aram.), —grammatically (Nöld.), 'a more strongly determined form of barnāshā.' If in the Aram. spoken in the time of Christ barnāsh(ā) was really in common use in the sense of 'man,' there does not seem to be any sufficient reason why, if our Lord desired to express the idea of 'the Son of man,' He should not have made use of this expression. There would be nothing unsuitable in its being an unusual and emphatic one; and that there was some Semitic expression bearing this meaning appears, as Hilgenfeld has pointed out, § from the fact that in the Gospel acc. to the Hebrews, which Jerome himself translated from Aramaic (or, as he elsewhere says, from Hebrew), there was a saying of Christ, addressed to James, which (in Jerome's tr.) reads, 'Frater mi, comede panem tuum, quia resurrexit filius hominis a dormientibus.' ‡

From a communication printed by Dr. Drummond, ¶ it appears that Prof. Nöldeke also is disposed to agree with Wellhausen. To differ from Prof. Nöldeke on a point of Aramaic or Arabic

* See, for some illustrations, Dalm. Gramm. 34-40.

† B'rēh d'nāshā 'Son of the son of man' is certainly a 'theological barbarism'; it does not, however, occur (as Wellh., by an oversight, says, p. 194 n.) in the Pesh., but in the Palest. Lectionary.

‡ See, e.g., Dalm., Dialektproben, p. 15, l. 2, בְּרֵיחַ דְּאִישׁ = whose son? בְּרֵיחַ דְּאִישׁ = the son of Hezekiah. So Dn 230 38 39 etc., and constantly in Syriac (as Mt 11 (thrice)). According to Wellh. b'rēh d'nāshā (on account of the sing. suff. and the following virtual plural) is 'unmöglich' (p. vi). But אִנְשָׁא is regularly in the Tgg. construed with a sing.; and Job 730 14 19 33 16, Pesh., are precise formal parallels (see, further, Fiebig, p. 48 ff.); moreover, if the expression were 'impossible' in Syriac, would the authors of the Syriac versions of the Gospels have employed it? § *Z. f. usage would be to court certain error; but from the terms in which he expresses himself, it does not seem that he means to pronounce an absolute philological veto against the position that Jesus may have spoken of Himself in Aramaic as 'the Son of man.'

(3) No doubt our Lord, as a rule, spoke in Aramaic; but, as Prof. Sanday has remarked to the present writer, it is quite possible that He may, upon occasion, have spoken also in Greek. In this case, which is more than a mere abstract possibility, the expression $\delta \text{ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου}$ may actually have been sometimes heard upon His lips.

11. Origin and meaning of the term as used in NT.—Here we must first consider the question whether the term is used in previous or contemporary Jewish literature, and, if so, in what sense. In Dn 7¹³, as has been already remarked, the 'one like unto a son of man' denoted originally, in all probability, the glorified people of Israel; but the expression was undoubtedly interpreted at an early date of the Messiah. The most remarkable evidence of this is afforded by that part of the (composite) Book of Enoch (ch. 37-70), which is commonly known as the 'Similitudes,' and which is attributed generally to the 1st cent. B.C. (see vol. i. pp. 707^b-708^a). Enoch is here represented as carried in his vision into heaven, where he sees the 'Head of Days' (a title of the Almighty suggested by Dn 7¹³) surrounded by an innumerable company of angels (40¹), and beside Him the Messiah, sitting on 'the throne of his glory' (62² & 69^{27, 28}), and executing judgment upon wicked men and angels. The Messiah is often spoken of as the 'Elect One' (Is 42¹); but in ch. 46 he is introduced in terms which more particularly concern us here—

46¹ 'And there I saw One who had a head of days (i.e. an aged head), and his head was white like wool (Dn 7⁹), and with him was another one whose face was as the appearance of a man, and his face was full of graciousness, like one of the holy angels. ² And I asked the angel who went with me, and showed me all the hidden things, concerning that son of man, who he was, and whence he was, and why he went with the Head of Days. And he answered and said unto me, ³ This is the son of man who hath righteousness, with whom dwelleth righteousness, and who reveals all the treasures of that which is hidden, because the Lord of Spirits hath chosen him, and his lot before the Lord of Spirits hath surpassed everything in uprightness for ever. ⁴ And this son of man whom thou hast seen will arouse the kings and the mighty ones from their couches, and the strong ones from their thrones, and execute judgment upon them.'

The judgment is described most fully in ch. 62—

62² 'And the Lord of Spirits seated him (the Elect One) on the throne of his glory, and the spirit of righteousness was poured out upon him, and the word of his mouth slew all the sinners (Is 11⁴), and all the unrighteous were destroyed before his face. . . . ⁵ And their countenance will fall, and pain will seize them, when they see that son of man sitting on the throne of his glory. . . . ⁶ And all the kings and the mighty and the exalted and those who rule the earth will fall down on their faces before him, and worship, and set their hope upon that son of man, and will petition him and supplicate for mercy at his hands.' But it will be too late: the 'angels of punishment' will take them in charge, and carry them away to their appointed doom. But the righteous will be saved on that day; ¹⁴ 'and the Lord of Spirits will abide over them, and with that son of man will they eat and lie down and rise up for ever and ever.' Cf. 63²⁷ 'And he sat on the throne of his glory, and the sum of judgment was committed unto him, the son of man, and he caused the sinners and those who have led the world astray to pass away and be destroyed from off the face of the earth.'

The 'son of man' of the 'Similitudes' is thus an august, superhuman being, who is seated on his throne beside the Almighty, and exercises in particular the functions of judge. This representation, it is to be observed, though based, no doubt, upon that of Dn 7, is not identical with it: in Daniel it is God who is the judge; but the 'one like unto a son of man' appears upon the scene only after the judgment is completed, and he comes, not to exercise judgment, but to receive a kingdom.

It has been much disputed whether 'the son of man' is a title in the Similitudes or not.

The expressions used are, 'that (zeku or se'etu) son of man' (46² 48² 62² [see Charles, or Beer, in Kautzsch's Apokryphen, ad loc., vv. 9-14 (831) 6098. 22. 29 701 7117], 'this son of man' (46⁴), and 'the son of man' (46⁵ [see Dillm. Eth. Gram. § 194] 627 6927). On the one side, it is argued, Enoch sees in his vision a human form (46¹), which is afterwards (46² etc.) referred to as 'that (or this) son of man,'—'son of man' rather than simply 'man,' being (presumably) employed, partly on account of Dn 7¹³ (which the context shows to be in the writer's mind), partly as being a rather more distinct and individual term. 'The son of man' of 46² 627 6927 might similarly be nothing more than an expression referring back to 46¹; and the same, it is urged, might be said even of $\delta \text{ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου}$, if, as is possible (see esp. Charles, Eschatology, p. 214 f.), this were the Greek which lay before the Ethiopic translator.* On the other hand, the somewhat marked prominence of the term is an indication that some significance attaches to it; else why does the writer not say 'the Elect one' (as 49² 51² 52² 54² ad.), or 'the Anointed one' (as 48¹⁰ 52²)?

On the whole, it may probably be fairly said, as is claimed by Baldensperger (§ 24, p. 246), and admitted by Dr. Drummond (p. 544), that the expression, even if not a title in Enoch, is next door to becoming one, and that the step of making it a title is one which at any time afterwards might be readily taken. If, however, the view of 'the son of man' adopted in this art. (§§ 17, 21) be the correct one, it will be seen to be a matter of indifference whether the expression was a 'title' in Enoch or not.

The reader ought, however, to be aware that it can hardly be said to be certain that the 'Similitudes' are of pre-Christian origin; though this is the view taken by the great majority of critics, who urge in particular that, had they been written (or interpolated) under Christian influence, the allusions to the historical Christ would have been more definite. See Schürer², ii. 626 (3 iii. 201 f.).

12. Another passage, which, though of post-Christian date (probably A.D. 81-96), seems to show no traces of Christian influence (see vol. ii. p. 766^a), and deserves to be quoted in the same connexion, is 2 (4) Es 13³⁸. Here Ezra is represented as seeing in a dream the sea disturbed by a wind, and a 'man,' who is declared afterwards (v. 38) to be God's appointed judge and deliverer (i.e., though the word itself is not used, the Messiah), ascending out of it—'And I beheld, and, lo, this wind caused to come up from the midst of the sea as it were the likeness of a man, and I beheld, and, lo, that man flew with the clouds of heaven (cf. Dn 7¹⁴); and when he turned his countenance to look, all things trembled that were seen under him.' In the sequel, the same 'man' that came up out of the sea, as he is termed (v. 5, cf. vv. 28, 31), destroys by a 'flaming breath,' proceeding out of his mouth, the multitudes which assemble against him, and calls back to the land of Israel the ten tribes (vv. 10¹ 12. 28-46).

Here then at least the Messiah is described, with evident reference to Dn 7¹³, as a 'man.'

Dr. Charles has called attention also to 4 Es 6¹ in the Syr., Eth., and Arab. versions (the world to be judged finally—first by [Arab. on account of] a 'man' [Syr. ܒܝܪ ܒܢ ܐܢܫܐ],—or, to judge from the Eth. vers., by a 'son of man,'—and afterwards by God: see Hilgenf. Mess. Jud. pp. 223, 275, 334); but the statement is inconsistent with 6², and is open to the suspicion of being a Christian interpolation (cf. Hilgenf. p. 64 n.).

13. In spite, however, of the usage of the 'Similitudes,' and of 2 Es 13³⁸, it seems clear that 'the Son of man' was no generally accepted title of the Messiah in the days of Christ. Dalm. (Die Worte Jesu, 197-204) shows that nothing exists in Jewish authorities in favour of such a supposition. The same conclusion is supported by the testimony of the Gospels. 'It is inconceivable that the Lord should have adopted a title which was popularly held to be synonymous with that of Messiah, while He carefully avoided the title of Messiah itself' (Westcott). The reply that He used it enigmatically is not to the point; for though He might have signified by it something different from the popular conception of the Messiah, it would still (ex hypo.) have been the Messiah, which those who heard Him would have understood Him to mean. Upon the same supposition, moreover, His use of it could not but have excited the hostility of the Jews, of which, however (in this connexion), the Gospels afford no trace: the 'blasphemy' of Mt 26⁶⁸=Mk 16⁷⁴ consisted evidently not in His use of this title, but in the Divine prerogatives predicated of Himself as the bearer of it. The most that might be supposed is, that though not generally current as a title of the Messiah, it was familiar in that sense in the particular circle to which the 'Similitudes' belonged (above, vol. ii. 622^b, cf. 616^a).

* The Eth. zeku and se'etu not infrequently, in translations from the Greek, represent the Greek art. (Charles, l.c.: Dillm. Eth. Lex. col. 1057, 919). They are not, however, used in the Eth. NT in the tr. of $\delta \text{ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου}$. (Dr. Charles, in his tr. of 602² 28. 29 701, has not represented the Eth. 'that').

14. In considering the meaning of the title, it ought to be clearly understood that it is not anywhere explained in the NT, so that whatever view of it be adopted must be a matter of conjecture and inference. To the same cause is due what is generally allowed to be the great difficulty of the question, and also the wide divergence of the conclusions which have been reached regarding it. The question is further complicated by the fact that there are two possible starting-points for the investigation: is the name a mere title, taken, as it were mechanically, from Dn 7¹³, and so a mere periphrasis for 'Messiah'? or does the significance of the title lie in the four words of which it consists, and is the meaning which our Lord intended to convey by it to be ascertained by an analysis of these words? Or may the interpretations suggested by these two opposite points of view be in any way combined? Or, on the other hand, whichever of these interpretations be adopted, does it logically render the other unnecessary and superfluous [cf. § 20. 12]? Still further difficulties arise when the details of its usage in the Gospels are considered, as, for instance, the very different predicates associated with it; and further divergent conclusions are arrived at, corresponding to the view taken by the individual critic of the chronology of our Lord's discourses, and other questions of Gospel criticism.

15. Two main views may be said to have been advocated. According to one view, the title has no meaning of its own,* it is intended simply to point to the 'one like unto a son of man' in Dn 7¹³,† and so to express, directly and distinctly, the Messiahship of Jesus. According to the other view, the title, though it may have been chosen with an eye to Dn 7¹³, expressed primarily the thought that Jesus was, in some special sense, a man above other men, the supreme representative of humanity, and only indirectly, especially towards the close of His ministry, suggested in addition the thought of His Messiahship. High authorities can be quoted for both these views. Thus Holtzmann writes (NT Theol. 1897, p. 247), 'The title certainly originates in Dn 7¹³. Jesus adopts Daniel's view of the future kingdom: close beside this is in Daniel the figure of the "one like unto a son of man" who receives the kingdom from God, and in whom therefore it was natural for Jesus to see Himself prefigured: even though in Daniel the figure symbolized only the kingdom (and not its head), still here was the person who would establish it: Jesus, by His adoption of the title, implied that it would not be established apart from Himself.' He did not, however, this being the sense of the title, use it before Peter's confession (pp. 250 top, 260, 263

[cf. below, § 19]). 'Jesus,' Holtzmann continues, 'throws into the title whatever is characteristic of His mission and ministry. He makes it the exclusive designation of the person who is to represent and realize the ideas expressed by it. Just because He is conscious that this mission brings with it earthly privation and suffering, and even death, the "Son of man" becomes the subject of predications relating not only to future glory, but also to earthly humiliation and death. Thus Jesus is, and is called, the "Son of man," on the one hand wherever by forgiving and healing, by teaching and suffering, He proclaims, represents, or extends the kingdom; on the other hand, and especially, when, coming in glory, He completes it. As the kingdom is a present as well as a future reality, so the title "Son of man" bears reference to His work in the present not less than in the future' (pp. 250-3, abridged).

Upon this view the first art. (4) points to Dn 7¹³ (Holtzm. p. 264 n.; Schmiedel, p. 264), the second (705) results simply by a kind of attraction, from the presence of the first (Schmiedel, l.c.; Winer, Gramm. § 19, 20-4).

16. In what is here said of the use of the title, there is much that is, of course, perfectly just; but to the view taken of its origin there seem to be objections. In the vision of Daniel the 'one like unto a son of man' is represented as a glorified, heavenly being, and the kingdom is a triumphant kingdom. No account is taken of the long period during which, as a matter of history, the kingdom was gradually and slowly to extend itself among men; it has been finally and universally established in the earth (7¹⁴). Now, if the passages in which our Lord first used the expression had been those in which He describes His future advent in glory, there would have been a direct point of contact with the vision in Daniel, sufficient to account for the title being adopted from it; but, as it is, it is impossible, without most arbitrary treatment of the Gospel narratives, to suppose that to have been the case; and thus, with the passages in which He is actually represented as first using it, and which all deal with various aspects of His life in humility upon earth, there is no point of contact in Daniel at all. As Westcott (Speaker's Comm. on St. John, p. 34) says, 'It is out of the question to suppose that the definite article simply expressed "the prophetic son of man." The manner in which the title is first used excludes such an interpretation.' There is nothing, viz., in the manner in which the title is first used—or indeed chiefly used—in the Synoptic Gospels, to suggest a reference to Daniel, or to lead to the supposition that our Lord intended by His use of it to bring before His hearers the transcendent, heavenly being represented in Daniel. A being, conscious, indeed, of his authority and of the high mission entrusted to him, but presenting all the outward marks of earthly humility, and only in the future destined to assume heavenly majesty, is surely what the title denotes in the Gospels. Holtzmann's identification of the kingdom pictured in Daniel, not with the kingdom of Christ in its final glory, but with the kingdom at the time of His founding it during His earthly ministry, is not natural. There is equally little, not to say less, to suggest that the title is borrowed from the 'Similitudes' of Enoch. It is also difficult not to think (in spite of Holtzm. p. 253 f.) that it is intended to express primarily, and also more fully and distinctively than even Holsten (§ 20. 11) allows, some meaning directly involved in the words of which it consists (analogous, for instance, to that of its correlative, the 'Son of God').

17. The other main view may be stated substantially, as is done by B. Weiss (NT Theol. 1884,

* Schmiedel, p. 264: 'The name is given (viz. by Dn 7¹³); what it signifies is matter not for an analytical judgment, but for a synthetical one; i.e. it is to be ascertained from "predicates defining the work or office of the Messiah." Cf. Holtzm. p. 253 bottom, 264 n.; Wellh. p. 214.

† Cf. H. A. W. Meyer on Mt 8²⁰ (altered in the 8th ed. by B. Weiss).

§ 16). (1) Our Lord adopted this title just because it was not a current title of the Messiah. In view of the expectations of a personal Messiah which prevailed at the time, Dn 7¹³ could certainly in His day be interpreted only of the Messiah; but, even so, He could not assume that this particular passage would be so generally known that the expression, 'the Son of man,' would be at once understood as referring to it. The case would be different if we could presuppose the use made of Daniel in Enoch; but, even if the pre-Christian origin of the 'Similitudes' be granted, it is far from clear that they were familiarly known in the circles in which our Lord's ministry principally lay. Only when Jesus in the eschatological passages directed attention to Dn 7¹³ could the title be understood generally as a Messianic designation. This view of His use of the title agrees with the manner in which, during all the earlier part of His ministry, He avoided any direct announcement of His Messiahship, in order not to lend encouragement to the unspiritual ideas attaching to the popular conception of the Messiah. (2) For His hearers the idea expressed by the title would be that He was not a 'son of man' like all others, but that He was 'the son of man,' one who, in virtue of His character and personality, held a unique position among men. It did not designate merely His humanity (for this must have been evident to all who saw Him), but it marked Him out as in some sense a special or representative man. (3) Christ's statements respecting the 'Son of man,' the functions, office, and divinely appointed destinies assigned to him, point to one who has a mission higher than that of an ordinary prophet, i.e. indirectly to one who is also the Messiah. They speak of Him, for instance, as in various ways proclaiming or establishing the kingdom of God. He has authority to forgive sins; and He gives His life a ransom for many. He is contrasted with John the Baptist, who is merely a forerunner. The sufferings of the Son of man are divinely appointed (δεῖ,—Mk 8³¹ || al.), because it is implied in the OT that God's plan of salvation would not be finally realized upon earth without the suffering and death of the servant of God by whom it would be accomplished. (4) Lastly, in the prophecies of the Second Advent, our Lord alluded so clearly to Dn 7¹³ that though He does not expressly identify Himself with the 'one like unto a son of man' there spoken of, those who heard Him, and who identified the figure in Daniel with the Messiah, could not but conclude that He meant by the term that particular 'son of man' who was to be the Messiah.*

Upon this view the second art. (τὸν) is generic or collective (Winer, § 27. 1; Gn 66. 7 82¹ 96, 2 S 7¹⁹, Mk 22⁷, Jn 2²⁵), the first art. (ὁ) specifies the individual of the genus meant (Weiss, § 166).

18. This opinion, that the title, viz., even though it may have been suggested by Dn 7¹³, was nevertheless intended, and even intended primarily, to express in some manner the relation of Jesus to humanity, has been largely held (see § 20; and the references in Holtzm. pp. 254, 255). It has, however, been objected to it that if the title denoted the 'ideal' or 'representative' man, the predicates affirmed of it could be only those which were involved in the idea itself,—i.e., to speak technically, were the predicates of analytical, not of synthetical judgments, which obviously is not the case with the predicates affirmed of the 'Son of man' in the Gospels. This would, no doubt, be true if the title were understood to be a designation of the 'ideal' man, but not if (abandoning this abstract expression) it be understood to design-nate a particular, individual man, embodying in their highest perfection the attributes of humanity. And this is the sense in which Weiss and Westcott (§ 20), for instance, understand the title. There will then be no difficulty in understanding the predicates affirmed of the 'Son of man' as synthetical judgments: they will result, in other words, not from an analysis of the idea of 'man,' but from the experience, present or future, of the particular individual actually denoted by the term. As Holtzmann, though himself preferring the other view, writes (p. 254), 'The possibility is by no means excluded that the conception of the Messiah was rooted in the idea of man, and that Jesus, in choosing this designation, instead of others that were open to Him, intended thereby to express His relationship to humanity.'

The fact just mentioned has been made the ground of a further objection to the same opinion. As has just been shown, if we start from the idea of 'man,' none of the predicates applied in the Gospels to the 'Son of man' can be obtained from an analysis of that idea. But if we start from the equation (given by Dn 7¹³) 'Son of man' = 'Messiah,' then all these predicates become analytical judgments; they are, it is said, derivable, at least largely, from the idea of 'Messiah' itself; they are expressions, not of Jesus' conception of 'man,' but of His conception of His Messiahship.* And hence it is concluded that the term was used by Him as properly and primarily signifying 'Messiah.' It may be doubted if this conclusion necessarily follows from the premises. If the term denoted Jesus primarily as a Man above other men, a Man with a unique position and mission, this position and mission would, from another point of view, be also those of the 'Messiah'; and the predicates describing different aspects of His work and ministry would accordingly be those belonging to Him as 'Messiah.' The offices and functions ascribed to the 'Son of man' in the Gospels are deduced by Weiss, starting from the idea of 'man,' not less naturally than by Holtzmann, starting from the idea of 'Messiah.'

19. Two questions, intimately connected, remain to be considered, which also, as will appear, have a bearing upon the question of the origin of the title. At what period in His ministry did our Lord first use the title? And in what sense was it understood by those who heard it? Or, to put the possible alternatives unambiguously, did it veil or reveal His Messiahship? It is clear that our Lord only declared His Messiahship gradually. The question put by Him to the disciples at Caesarea Philippi, and Peter's reply (Mt 16¹³⁻¹⁶ = Mk 8²⁷⁻³⁰ = Lk 9¹⁸⁻²⁰), particularly when taken in connexion with our Lord's comment in Mt 16¹⁷, make it evident that up to that time He had not openly declared Himself as the Messiah; and the prohibitions in Mt 16²⁰ = Mk 8³⁰ = Lk 9²¹, and Mt 17⁹ = Mk 9⁹, cf. Lk 9³⁶, show that He still did not wish the fact to be known to the people generally. In the Synoptic Gospels there are, however (see the Table, § 3), 9 passages in Matthew, 2 in Mark, and 4 in Luke, in which the title 'Son of man' is ascribed to our Lord before the occasion at Caesarea Philippi. If, then, the title was a current Mess. title, or even if His hearers, when He used it, were likely at once to perceive a reference to Dn 7¹³, it is clear that He must, by His use of it, have revealed His Messiahship, from virtually the beginning of His ministry, both to His disciples and to the people at large. This, however, as we have just seen, was inconsistent with His avowed purpose. Hence those who believe that it was a current Mess. title are obliged to get rid of those passages in the Gospels which represent our Lord

* The views of Bruce, Kingdom of God 2 (1890), 172-78, and of Stevens, NT Theol. (1899), 51-53, while somewhat differently put, do not differ materially from that of Weiss.

* Holsten [§ 10. 11], pp. 26-39; cf. Lietzmann, 14, 15, 24.

as using it before Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi. Matthew (in whom most of the passages occur) is the evangelist who, generally, displays the least regard for historical sequence, and sometimes groups incidents and sayings together merely on account of material resemblances; he even represents the disciples as owning Jesus to be the 'Son of God' (14²³: no || in Mk 6^{51f.} Jn 6³²) before the confession at Caesarea Philippi. Hence there is no difficulty in supposing that Mt 10⁻³ 13⁴¹ (in which, whatever view be taken of the meaning of the title, the predicates applied to it, describing the Second Advent, show that the Messiah is referred to) are placed too early in our Lord's ministry;* and the same supposition might be reasonably made (upon the assumption that 'the Son of man' was a Mess. title) in the case of some other passages, as Mt 8⁻⁹ 12⁴⁰;† but it is difficult to think that Mk 2¹⁰ = Mt 9⁶ = Lk 5²⁴, Mk 2⁻³ = Mt 12⁶ = Lk 6⁵, [Mk 3^{28f.} =] Mt 12³² = Lk 12¹⁰, can be so misplaced. Nevertheless, those who believe 'the Son of man' to be an explicit Mess. title are obliged to assume this (cf. § 20. 12), or else to hold either that Jesus never used the title at all, or (so Holtzm. p. 263, cf. 256 f.) that, on at least the three last-named occasions, He spoke of 'man' in general (see, further on these passages, § 22).‡

The second of these alternatives we have already found ourselves unable to accept; but does either the first or the third suffice to remove the difficulty? Is it really credible that our Lord first used the expression of Himself, after Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi? Is not the familiar manner in which He used the title, if not in the question put to Peter (Mt 16¹³, but not Mk 8²⁷, Lk 9¹⁸), yet directly after it (Mk 8³¹, Lk 9²²), without exciting any comment or surprise, sufficient evidence that it must have been often used by Him previously, and that it was an expression which, whatever special ideas it may have been intended to convey, was well understood to denote Himself? These considerations, as it seems to the present writer, constitute a strong argument against the supposition that it was a current Mess. title, or even (without supposing as much as this) that it was adopted by our Lord as a Mess. title, for the purpose of proclaiming His Messiahship.

The title, we thus seem forced to conclude, was used by our Lord in His Galilean ministry; but it did not suggest to those who heard it Mess. associations, until it came to be connected with predictions of the Second Advent; it thus did not reveal, but veil, His Messiahship. Christ's use of the term was pedagogic. It veiled His Messiahship during the earlier part of His ministry, till the time was ripe for Him to avow it openly.§ By His adoption of it, He found a means, on the one hand, of not denying even in public His consciousness of His unique mission, and, on the other hand, of lending no countenance to the crude and illusory hopes which attached to popular ideas of the Messiah (Weiss, Leben Jesu, i. 429).

20. The following summary (which makes no pretension to be exhaustive) may be useful to the reader, partly as illustrating, especially when taken in connexion with the views that have been already stated, the great diversity of opinion which has prevailed—and in part prevails still—with regard to the meaning of the title, partly as exemplifying the lines along which attempts have been principally made to solve the problems which it presents.

1. Neander (Leben Jesu, 1837, 129 ff.; Eng. tr.⁴ p. 99). The title denotes Jesus on His human side, as One belonging to humanity, who in His humanity has done as much for it, through whom it is glorified, and who has realized most completely the ideal ('Urbild') of humanity.

2. Haur (Z. Wiss. Theol. 1860, 274-292; NT Theol. 1864, 77-83). Not at the time a current title of the Messiah, but chosen by Jesus in opposition to prevalent Jewish conceptions of a victorious, earthly Messiah. It emphasized His humanity, His subjection to the needs and experiences of ordinary men; and denoted Him also as one who made all the deepest human interests His own, and had the wide human sympathies expressed, for instance, in the Beatitudes. It was suggested by Dn 7¹³; and Jesus adopted it as a title, which, while possessing no popular Mess. associations, was adapted to express the Mess. idea in its higher significance.

3. Hilgenfeld (Z. Wiss. Th. 1863, 327-334; cf. 1894, 16 f.). Not a current Mess. title. Suggested by Dn 7¹³, but used by Jesus with the object of giving prominence to His humanity, and of emphasizing the humility and external lowliness which in His person were combined with the exalted dignity of the Messiah. It thus in a veiled manner pointed to His Messiahship. Jesus, by uniting spiritual loftiness with earthly lowliness, 'transfigured' the popular Jewish idea of the Messiah.

4. Weissäcker (Evangel. Gesch. 1864, 426-431). Not a current Mess. title (for, if it had been, Jesus would have been attacked for appropriating it); and adopted by Jesus, not from Dn 7¹³, but from Ezekiel, to designate Himself specially as a prophet. The Mess. sense, derived from Dn 7¹³, was attached to it only at a later period of our Lord's life.

5. Holtzmann (in 1865; Z. Wiss. Th. 212-237). Not a current title of the Messiah (for else Jesus would have been attacked for using it), but borrowed by Him as a Mess. title from Dn 7¹³, 'the expression used by Dn. reflecting itself in His consciousness in a universal and human sense.' It thus denoted Him not merely as the Messiah, but as 'the bearer of all human dignity and rights,' as 'one who held a peculiar and central position among the vol. van menschen.' Not being a current Mess. title, it was a riddle to those who heard it, and served to veil, not to reveal, His Messiahship.

6. Keim (Der Gesch. Christus, 1865, p. 105 f.; Jesus of Naz. tr. iii. 79-92). The title had a double aspect: on the basis first of Ps 84⁶, though afterwards also of Dn 7¹³, it expressed Jesus' sense on the one hand of His human lowliness, on the other hand of His Messianic dignity: in particular, He intended by His use of it to show that even in His capacity as Messiah He was part and parcel of humanity, and to teach His disciples that it was pre-eminently His vocation to serve and suffer for humanity.

7. Wittichen (1868). In Dn 7¹³ the 'son of man' represents the ethical character of the future Isr. dominion, as opposed to the worldly heathen dominions; this idea is, however, first embodied in an individual in Enoch, from which book Jesus adopted the title. He designated Himself by it as the perfect representative of the idea of man, especially on its ethical side, and at the same time as the Messiah, the chosen organ for the fuller realization of this idea in the world. The idea as presented in Enoch is spiritualized and morally deepened by Jesus, and also combined by Him with associations derived from the OT 'servant of Jehovah.'

8. Westcott (l.c. 1880). The title is a new one, not derived from Dn 7¹³; and it expresses Christ's relation not to a family, or to a nation, but to all humanity. There is nothing in the Gospels to show that it was understood as a title of the Messiah. The idea of the true humanity of Christ lies at the foundation of it. He was the representative of the whole race, in whom the complete conception of manhood was absolutely attained, and who exhibited all the truest and noblest attributes of the race. Cf. Stanton, The Jewish and Christian Messiah, 1886, p. 246: 'It is clear that Christ by His phrase represented Himself as the head, the type, the ideal of the race.'

9. Wendt, 1890 (The Teaching of Jesus, ii. 139-151). Not a current Mess. title. Dn 7¹³ suggested the combination of creaturely frailty and lowliness with high dignity; and so Jesus, when He used the title, taught that He was a frail human creature, and yet showed that He remembered the proph. word that the Mess. dignity was to belong to 'one like unto a son of man.' It was no announcement of His Mess. claims, but rather propounded a problem for His hearers to reflect upon.

10. J. E. Carpenter (The First Three Gospels, their Origin and Relations, 1890, pp. 118-120, 244-257, 372-388). Jesus never used the expression to designate Himself: He employed it only in the eschatological passages, and in these it was used by Him symbolically to denote the establishment of God's kingdom of righteousness upon earth. The primitive Church understood the expression in a personal sense, and then ascribed it, as a Mess. title, to Jesus Himself.

11. Holsten (Z. f. Wiss. Theol. 1891, pp. 1-79). The title, though not a current Mess. one, was understood by Jesus in that sense, as appears from the fact that He always uses it to express some aspect of the work or activity of the Messiah (cf. Holtzmann: § 15). It was adopted from Dn 7¹³, though this passage gave only the outer form, the contents being supplied by the experience and knowledge of the historical Jesus (as teacher, sufferer, redeemer, etc.): only thus did He convert 'the visionary form of a Messiah, which He found in Daniel, into His own living Mess. personality' (p. 68, cf. 60). He would

* Some other passages in Matthew, involving the avowal of Jesus' Messiahship, though not with the use of this title, are also probably ante-dated; cf. Holtzmann, p. 259.

† In Lk 6²² [contrast Mt 5¹¹], 7³⁴ = Mt 11¹⁹, Holtzmann (p. 251) doubts whether the title (which he regards as Mess.) is original.

‡ Fiebig, however (§ 24), thinks that in these cases it was simply misunderstood (as = 'man,' 'a man') by those who heard it.

§ Keim. Similarly Baur, Hase, Lange, Ritschl, Harnack, and others, as cited by Holtzmann, p. 261 n. 1, 262 n. 5.

not, however, have appropriated the title, had He not desired to designate Himself as a member of the genus 'man,' and also recognized Himself as the member of the genus referred to in Dn 7¹³ (p. 47). The difficulty (cf. § 18) of understanding how Jesus could have denoted Himself, under the conditions of His earthly life, by a term suggesting only the transcendent Being of Daniel, is met by the supposition (which, however, lacks support in the text of Dn. itself) that the 'one like unto a son of man' in Dn 7¹³ is really to be conceived as having been brought before God, and invested by Him with power and greatness, out of a previous state of earthly humility and weakness (pp. 61, 67 f.). The title was used by Jesus in His Galilean ministry (Mk 2¹⁰ etc.); for though He Himself understood it in a Mess. sense, this was not necessarily placed upon it even by scripture-students, esp. if His own appearance and manner of life did not suggest it: it would be taken naturally by those who heard it, including, up to the time of Peter's confession, even the disciples, to signify simply 'the man.' And this would agree with His own purpose of keeping for a while His Messiahship a secret (pp. 20, 22, 31 f., 70 f.).

12. Baldensperger (Das Selbstbewusstsein Jesu im Lichte der Mess. Hoffnungen seiner Zeit, 1892) emphasizes strongly the prevalence of apocalyptic conceptions in the time of Christ. He rejects emphatically the opinion that the title concealed Jesus' Messiahship, and also the view that it was intended to express any aspect of His humanity. It was (through the influence of Daniel and Enoch) a known Mess. title in the time of Christ; and Jesus adopted it with the express object of proclaiming His Messiahship. It was a triumphant designation of the Messiah; and Jesus connected it with declarations respecting His humiliation and sufferings for the express purpose of showing (in opposition to current Jewish ideas) that these were integral elements in His conception of the Messiah. As, however, it was an open proclamation of His Messiahship, He cannot have used it before Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi: the passages in the Gospels which imply that He did this must be chronologically misplaced. Baldensperger closes with a severe criticism of Holsten for admitting in again 'by a back-door' (see above, No. 11) any reference in the title to the humanity of Jesus, which he had himself shown to be out of the question, as well as unnecessary, in view of the direct derivation of the title from Dn 7¹³ (pp. 182-189); and of Wendt for discovering in the expression anything of the nature of creaturely weakness or humility (pp. 189-192).

13. J. V. Bartlet (Expos., Dec. 1892, 427-443). The title may have been suggested by Dn 7¹³; but as used by Jesus it denotes Him as the ideal representative, partly of humanity in general, partly of the Kingdom of God in particular, especially under those aspects of character which belong to the suffering servant in Deutero-Isaiah.

14. Dolman (Die Worte Jesu, 1898, 191-219; cf. Exp. Times, x. 438-443). Not a current Mess. title, but adopted by Jesus from Dn 7¹³, and very probably also with the thought of Ps 84^f. at the same time, because He was the destined Messiah. It veiled His Messiahship behind a name which emphasized the humanity of its bearer. It implied that He was in some sense a man 'above other men,' but not that He was the 'ideal' man—a conception foreign to Jewish thought, and not at all suggested by the teaching of Jesus. He avoided the term 'Messiah' on account of the false ideas associated with it by the Jews: the 'son of man' in Daniel, on the other hand, was one who was not to win the kingdom by his own strength, but to receive it at the hands of God, and might have to do this through suffering and death: Jesus thus assumed the title as 'a frail child of man, whom God would make Lord of the world.' Probably not used before Peter's confession; the passages in the Gospels which imply that it was, being chronologically misplaced.

15. Gunkel (Z. Wiss. Theol., 1899, 582-590) agrees that in Aram. the term meant only 'the man,' but thinks that there may have been an esoteric eschat. tradition underlying both Daniel, Enoch, and other apocalypses, in which (like other apoc. expressions, as 'the end,' 'the woes,' the 'elect,' 'ἀριζον,' etc.) 'the man' (perhaps orig. 'the man of God,' or 'of heaven') may have come to be used conventionally as a mystic synonym of 'the Messiah': Jesus might thus have adopted it as a self-designation; to outsiders it would mean simply 'the man,' and might be understood, for example, of an ancient prophet, returned to life (Mt 16¹⁴); by the initiated, it would be understood to be a covert title of the Messiah.

16. J. Drummond, 1901 (see § 24). The term is used elastically: starting from Dn 7¹³ Jesus may have regarded it as a typical expression for the ideal people of God, with which associations derived from the 'servant of God' in Is 52¹³-53¹² would readily connect themselves: conscious Himself of His Messianic calling, He would naturally regard Himself as the Head of this ideal class. The central idea of the expression would thus be that of the true servant of God,—pre-eminently Himself, but not necessarily and uniformly exclusive of others (so, e.g., in Mt 8²⁰ 12³¹, Mk 2¹⁰ 38,—in Mt 11¹⁹ the expl. 'a man' [§ 8. 4] may be adopted). The eschat. passages may be visions of the spiritual conquest of the world by a Divinely commissioned humanity, personified as 'the son of man.'

21. Most of these opinions contain elements of truth; but the divergence as regards the fundamental idea denoted by the expression is remarkable. Still those views which see in the title some relation to humanity decidedly predominate. The present writer must own that he is most attracted by the views of Westcott and Weiss (to which those of Neander, Baur, and Holtzmann in 1865 lead up). The expression, understood in the natural sense of the words, denotes one who, though a Man, holds nevertheless a unique position among men; and this, it seems to him, is the proper starting-point for investigating its meaning, and discovering the further ideas (i. any) attaching to it. He cannot think that the title was first used by Christ in the eschat. passages, or even after Peter's confession: whatever its special significance may have been, it must have been an expression heard frequently upon our Lord's lips, and the disciples must have first become familiar with it in comparatively neutral or colourless passages, not in those foretelling either His future sufferings or His future glory. The title may have been borrowed by our Lord from Dn 7¹³; but He did not, at least when first using it, intend to bring before His hearers the figure there portrayed: He adopted it as a mere shell or form, suggestive of His humanity, into which He threw a new import and content of His own: more special associations derived from Dn 7¹³—perhaps, also, in Mt 16²⁷ 19²⁸ 25³¹ from Enoch *—came first to be attached to it in the eschat. passages. Ps 8, with its strikingly-drawn contrast between the actual lowliness and the ideal dignity of man, may also well have contributed to the adoption of the title by our Lord. The title, as it seems to the present writer (though he would avoid such expressions as the 'ideal' or 'representative' man), designates Jesus as the Man in whom human nature was most fully and deeply realized, and who was the most complete exponent of its capacities, warm and broad in His sympathies, ready to minister and suffer for others, sharing to the full the needs and deprivations which are the common lot of humanity, but conscious at the same time of the dignity and greatness of human nature, and destined ultimately to exalt it to unexampled majesty and glory. He would in general endorse cordially what is written on this subject in vol. ii. p. 623^{a-b} (cf. also p. 850^b).

22. We append a few remarks on some particular passages in which the title is used.

a. Mk 8³⁰ = Lk 9³⁸ ('the foxes have holes,' etc.). As Schmiedel remarks (p. 293), Meyer's 'a man' (i.e. Jesus)† is exegetically impossible; Lietzmann's 'man' (generally)‡ is out of the question. The contrast is evidently between the external lowliness and the inherent dignity of Him who in a special sense was the 'Son of man.'

b. Mt 9⁶ = Mk 2¹⁰ = Lk 5²⁴. There is no necessity, for the purpose of understanding this passage, to suppose that the title was a Mess. one. Jesus, in order to meet the objection, 'Who can forgive sins, but God only?' heals the paralytic, thereby showing that He holds an extraordinary commission from God upon earth sufficient to satisfy the Jews that He is justified in claiming also to possess authority to forgive sins. The passage, it is true, is one in which an Aram. original 'that a man hath authority on earth to forgive sins'§ would be quite possible, and yield a suitable sense,—the word, though in form general, being meant to be limited to Jesus Himself; but, if 'the Son of man' be admitted as a title of Jesus elsewhere, there is, of course, no necessity for having recourse to the supposition here.

c. Mt 12³ = Mk 2²⁸ = Lk 6⁵. Here in Mk we read: '(v. 27) And he said unto them, The sabbath is made for man, and not man for the sabbath: (v.²⁸) so that the son of man is lord even of the sabbath,'—the statement that the son of man is lord of the sabbath being based upon the premises contained in v.²⁷. But in the premise, 'the sabbath is made for man,' 'man' is evidently meant generally, so that the only logical conclusion from it is, not that a particular man, but that man generally,—or, at least (since, from the nature of the case, the worldly, unspiritual man would not be thought of), the religious man, who weighed reasons, and could judge how to use rightly what was instituted for the benefit of man,—is 'lord of the sabbath'; Jesus, by His argument, though He would include Himself, would not exclude others. And such a conclusion would be in agreement not only with the general teaching of Christ, but with the context, which shows that Jesus is defending not His own action, but that of His disciples. Hence, as Schmiedel also allows, the supposition that 'the son of man' has arisen out of a misinterpretation, or false limitation, of the Aram. bar nāshā,* is here certainly plausible. At the same time, it is possible that the argument is, 'The sabbath was made for man: and therefore the Son of man, as holding a unique position among men, and knowing what their welfare requires, may, for a sufficient reason, dispense with the obligation to observe the sabbath' (cf. Stanton, 247 f.). It must, however, then be supposed that the action of the disciples in plucking the ears of corn had been implicitly authorized by Jesus.

* For (§ 11) it is only here (and not in Daniel) that the 'son of man' appears as judge.

† P. 96 f. (cf. above, § 8. 4).

Here Mt 12³¹.³² certainly wear the appearance of being duplicate versions of one and the same saying, v.³¹ agreeing with Mk 3²⁸, and v.³² with Lk 12¹⁰; and the contrast expressed in Mk 3²⁸. Mt 12³¹ between 'men' in general and the Holy Spirit becoming in Mt 12³² Lk 12¹⁰ one between the 'Son of man' and the Holy Spirit. It is not difficult to understand how these duplicates might have arisen out of different recensions of the original saying, of which one read בני נאש ('men'), and the other נאש ('a man,'—intended in a general sense).‡ According to Wellh. the version in Mk 3²⁸ Mt 12³¹ is the original, the contrast (as Mk 3³⁰ shows) being between blasphemy against men and blasphemy against the Holy Spirit (cf. 1 S 2³⁵ RV); Jesus, therefore, if this view be correct, never declared blasphemy against Himself to be pardonable. Schmiedel, in his acute discussion of these passages, replies that although no doubt Mark, as a rule, has the greater originality than Matthew, that is not the case universally (cf. vol. ii. p. 241*); and in the present instance the words of Jesus in Matthew 12³² = Lk 12¹⁰ (in which He distinguishes between Himself and the Holy Spirit), has, upon intrinsic grounds, a far higher claim to originality than the remark of the narrator in Mk 3³⁰ (which makes blasphemy against Jesus tantamount to blasphemy against the Holy Spirit); while the declaration that blasphemy against Himself was pardonable is one which no evangelist would have ventured to place in Jesus' mouth, had He not really uttered it. Mt 12³² is not necessarily a parallel recension of 12³¹, or superfluous beside it; it would be perfectly in place if it stated with explicit reference to the 'Son of man' what is indeed implicit in v.³¹, but is not there expressed explicitly. Mark 'may have had before him, not indeed our Matthew, but Mt 12³¹' in a similar form, and have re-cast v.³², on account of its seeming inconsistency with reference for Jesus, in a form influenced by the phraseology of v.³¹. But the correctness of the comment in Mk 3³⁰ must, upon this view, be given up; and indeed (Schmiedel) it is not certain that Mk 3²⁸. (= Mt 12³¹.) is historically connected with the preceding narrative; the parallel in Lk (12¹⁰) stands in a very different connexion. The impossibility of questioning the originality of Mt 12³² = Lk 12¹⁰ thus constitutes to Schmiedel a conclusive argument against explaining the variations between the Synoptists here by means of the Aramaic.

23. In the Fourth Gospel the title is still found only in our Lord's mouth; but it is lifted into a higher plane, and, in agreement with St. John's predominant point of view, is used commonly in more distinct connexion with His Divine nature.

It is thus applied to Him not only with reference to events in His life on earth as a man, but also with reference to His pre-existence with God.* The uniqueness of the 'Son of man' consists in His having 'come down from heaven' (3¹³), whither also He will return again (6⁶²), and in virtue of which those who 'work' that they may appropriate Him, and who further eat His flesh and drink His blood, have eternal life (6²⁷, 53, cf. vv. 50, 51, 58). While on earth, He remains in constant spiritual intercourse with His Father in Heaven, as those whose eyes are opened may see by His life and works (1³¹). He will be 'lifted up' on the cross in order that those who believe in Him may have eternal life (3¹⁵), and that men may perceive who He is (8²⁸); and His approaching death is the hour of His glorification (12³² 13³¹). The multitude understood Him to claim to be the Messiah; and ask (12³⁴) to have it explained to them how, if the Son of man is thus to be 'lifted up,' He can be the Messiah who is to 'abide for ever' (as head, viz., of an earthly kingdom). In 9³⁵, according to the reading of B¹D, the unique position occupied by the 'Son of man' is attested by the importance attached to 24. LITERATURE.—Holtzmann, NT Theol. (1897), i. 246-64, is indispensable for all further study of the subject: it is, unfortunately, not very clearly written, the writer's literary method leaving it sometimes uncertain how far he identifies himself with the alternative views stated:—Reuss, *Theol. i. NAME OF THE BOOK AND ITS PLACE IN THE CANON.—'Song of Songs,' which is the exact rendering of the Hebrew title of this little book, does not mean 'a song of the songs (sc. of Solomon),' as Ibn Ezra and Kimchi supposed, but, by a not uncommon periphrasis for the superlative, is equivalent to 'the finest song,' that which is superior to all other songs, that which unites in itself the excellences of everything that is called song. The title, which, as we shall find, did not originally stand at the head of the book but was introduced afterwards, thus contains a significant expression of opinion regarding the composition. It is explicable only on the ground of the view which a later age thought it necessary to hold as to the real sense of a work which had now gained a place in the Canon of the OT. Nay, it is only the prevalence of the same view that will explain how the Song ever found entrance at all into the circle of Sacred Writings.

This pregnant title corresponds with the high estimate of the book expressed by R. Akiba (cf. ʿAdaim, iii. 5), about the end of the 1st cent. A.D.: 'God forb. ! No one in Israel has ever doubted that the Song of Songs defiles the hands [i.e. that it is a holy canonical book !], for the whole world is not worth the day on which the Song was given to Israel. For all the Writings [i.e. the Hagiographa] are holy, but the Song of Songs is a holy of the holies.' Henceforward this idea of the incomparable value of the book continued to be the only prevailing one amongst the Jews, and thus passed over also into the Christian Church.

* In Jn 5:27 the expression is different, 'because he is a son of man' (υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου), i.e. (see Westcott, or Meyer, ad loc.; and Holtzmann, ii. 427 f.) because of His true humanity, adapting Him specially to be a judge of men. Cf. the human sympathy of the Judge in Mt 25:44.

† On 'defile the hands' see Delitzsch in Zeitch. f. luth. Th. u. K. xv. (1864) 280 ff., and W. R. Smith, OTJC 3 180, note 1.

ii. METHODS OF INTERPRETATION.—The above Talmudic citation shows, however, that this high estimate of the Song of Songs did not succeed in establishing itself without opposition. The question whether they 'defile the hands' received a vacillating answer especially in regard to the Song and Ecclesiastes. And it is easy to account for this. The plain language of the book, soberly interpreted, does not suggest that we have to do with a work of high religious value or with a sacred poem. It was necessary to wrest the language and to assume that a deeper sense underlay the literal meaning, before one could justify the presence of such a book and gain an abiding place for it amongst the Sacred Writings.* What we hear of is earthly love, that of betrothed or married persons, and nowhere does the natural eye detect a single indication that would call it away from this and compel it to see in the figures presented to it images of a higher love. But at the time the step was taken of admitting the Song into the Canon, there can be no doubt that amongst those scribes whose influence was greatest in the collecting of the Sacred Writings, it had long been the custom to find in this exquisite work an allegory, and in the bond of love there presented to see the bond of love between J" and Israel. Sufficient inducement to such an interpretation was supplied by Scripture itself, for at least since the time of the prophet Hosea the representation of the covenant between J" and His people under the figure of the relation between husband and wife had become frequent and popular. When in consequence of the allegorical interpretation the book had been received into the Canon, objections to its being allowed to remain there could, of course, arise only from the strong impression which its language makes upon the reader, and the removal of such objections was facilitated in proportion as the allegorical interpretation obtained acceptance. The latter interpretation was bound to triumph in the end, for the more the true conception of the origin and character of Scripture was lost and a false notion of its inspiration came in, the more did the need make itself felt that all writings received into the Canon, the Song included, should be viewed and interpreted in such a way as to entitle them to rank as holy writings inspired by God's Spirit.

One result of the triumph of the allegorical interpretation, and of the extravagant estimate of the book (so well illustrated by the above words of R. Akiba), was the introduction of the liturgical use of the Song into the Jewish Church. Canticles, along with Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther, made up the five Megillōth ('rolls') which were read to the congregation at certain festivals. The liturgical use of Canticles deserves all the more careful consideration, because it helps us to decide what view of its contents was entertained by the Jewish congregation in the earliest times. For undoubtedly the contents of each book were intended to be brought into close connexion with the festival at which it was read. Now, Canticles was appointed to be read on the 8th day of the Feast of the Passover.† But this feast commemorated the time when Jⁿ delivered His people from the oppression of a strange lord in order to unite them to Himself at Sinai by an everlasting covenant. Jⁿ then is the beloved, and the people of God or the congregation of Israel are His loved one.

† Ruth is read on the 2nd day of the Feast of Weeks or Pentecost, Lamentations on the 9th Ab (i.e. the anniversary of the burning of the temple by the Chaldeans), Ecclesiastes on the 3rd day of the Feast of Tabernacles, and Esther on the 13th Adar (the opening day of the Feast of Purim).

According to the paraphrase of the Targum, the poem portrays the history of Israel from the Exodus to its redemption and glorification in Messianic times, when the full and final union of Jⁿ with His people shall be realized. This is certainly a profound interpretation, and one, too, which could find its roots in the Prophetic literature (cf. Hos 1-3, Jer 21: 31, Ezk 16, Is 50: 54th etc.). But this explanation puts difficulties in the way of the plain natural understanding as soon as it is sought to apply it to individual features of the poetical representation. These everywhere indicate too strongly that what we have to do with is really earthly love and a product of erotic poetry.* The consciousness of this had certainly not been lost even by the Jews. It was felt that one required ripeness of religious and moral insight and strength in order to understand the Song not in a false and morally pernicious fashion, but according to its hidden deeper meaning. Thus we must explain the Jewish regulation, reported to us by Origen and Jerome, that no one was to read the book till he was 30 years of age (the age, according to Nu 4th, at which the Levite is ready to enter upon his sacred duties).

The allegorical interpretation, which had been adopted by the Jews, gained acceptance also in the Christian Church, chiefly through Origen's exposition of the Song, and all through the Middle Ages this continued to be the prevailing interpretation. Nay, until quite recently it has maintained its supremacy in the Roman Catholic Church, and has found defenders even in the Churches of the Reformation. The allegorical interpretation, indeed, speedily assumed here a mystical character. It was supposed that one could discover in the poem a (prophetic) description beforehand of the loving relation between Christ and His people or between Him and the individual believing soul, and of the yearning desire of the latter for loving union with the Lord. The most notable witness to this allegorico-mystical view is to be found in the 86 sermons of St. Bernard, which, however, do not extend beyond Ca 3rd. Of course there are particular features in the poem which give abundant scope for mystical fancies. It was only with the Reformation that an era dawned which created the conditions necessary for a more correct understanding of the Song. It should not, indeed, be forgotten that Theodore of Mopsuestia, who belonged to the exegetic school of Antioch, had long before sought to do justice to the literal sense of the Song, by teaching that it treats simply of earthly love. But he stood alone with his interpretation over against the prevailing allegorical view, and was anathematized for holding it at the fifth (Ecumenical) Council at Constantinople (A.D. 553). Even in the Churches of the Reformation a more natural understanding of the Song made its way at first very slowly. In general the allegorical interpretation, borrowed from the Jews, and subjected to Christian modifications, continued to reign: especially within the Reformed Church was there a tendency to adhere closely to the explanation of the synagogue, and to see in the Song a prophetic pre-description of the development of the history of the Church.†

A unique view, which deservedly gained no adherents, was put forward by Luther: 'Solomon intends by these discourses of the lover and his beloved to show that, where obedience and good government are, God dwells and kisses and embraces His bride by His word; in short, he means to sing the praises of obedience as a gift of God.'‡—It was still a dangerous thing,

* According to another interpretation, Canticles portrays Solomon's love to Wisdom. (The last representative of this view is Rosenmüller, in his Scholia in Vet. Test.; the Peshitta substitutes חֶסֶד in the title of the book). Are we to infer from Wis 8th that the author of the Wisdom of Solomon already held the same view?

† As a notable representative of this view we may specify Cocceius (†1660), whose federal theology this view of the Song suited admirably.

even in the century of the Reformation, to depart from the traditional allegorical interpretation. Seb. Castellio of Geneva learned this to his cost when, on account of having seen in the Song a 'geistlich Buhllied,' and having pronounced it unworthy to stand in the Canon, he was accused (not, it is true, simply for holding this opinion) by Calvin and banished from Geneva (1544).—A more decided movement in favour of an interpretation corresponding to the original sense of the poem, was inaugurated by Hugo Grotius († 1645). Even he, to be sure, does not yet break absolutely with the traditional view, for he does not simply reject an allegorical exegesis, but, primarily and according to the literal sense, the Song is for him concerned only with earthly love, in fact the love of Solomon for the Egyptian princess, his wife.*—The number of those who understood the subject to be earthly love and rejected the allegorical interpretation continued to grow; in particular the pioneers of the critical study of the OT, men like R. Simon, Clericus, Whiston (Cambridge), belonged to this category. The first to oppose the allegorical interpretation by weighty arguments was J. D. Michaelis (in his edition of R. Lowth's De sacra poesi Hebraeorum proleptica, Gottingen, 1758-61, Notes, p. 603 ff., he even excluded the Song from his translation of the Bible). But to J. G. Herder belongs the credit of having helped to its triumphant recognition the only true view of the fundamental character of Canticles as a product of genuine and pure erotic poetry. In his work, entitled Lieder der Liebe, die ältesten und schönsten aus dem Morgenlande; nebst 44 alten Minneliedern (1778), he contends that the book is a collection of separate love-songs of an impassioned and morally pure character, and this view of his has continued to gain adherents (Reuss, Budde, et al.; see, further, below) down to the most recent times.

But the allegorical interpretation also found champions not only among Roman Catholic, but also among Protestant theologians. In itself this is not at all surprising, for any one who took his stand upon the ground of the old orthodox doctrine of inspiration would feel compelled to do justice to the simple fact that the Song is included in the Canon. He would have to bring it into relation with the system of revealed truth, and discover revelation, that is, prophecy, in its contents as well; for in no other way could he explain its reception into the Canon. Accordingly, we find, on the one hand, a movement in the direction of the old Jewish interpretation. So, in particular, Keil (Einleitung, 1853, p. 373) holds that in Canticles 'in dramatic-lyric responsive songs, and under the allegory of the betrothed love of Solomon and the Shulammithe,' we have portrayed 'the loving intercourse between the Lord and His people in their ideal character resulting from Israel's choice to this privilege, according to which all disturbing of this intercourse by unfaithfulness on the part of Israel only leads to an establishing more firmly of the covenant of love, through return to the true covenant God and His unchangeable love.' But, as he himself expressly notes, Keil does not mean by this that we can discover in the Song a literal reflexion of the actual 'history of the covenant relation' or 'an allegorical veiling of the principal features of the theocratic history.' On the contrary, it is the loving intercourse of the Lord 'according to its Divine idea' that is portrayed. In this way Keil obtains for the Song a Messianic character in so far as it describes a relation 'which was first realized through Christ.' Accordingly, he insists also upon the inspired character of the book, which is 'no product of the soil of the natural development of the theocratic God-consciousness, but, like the prophetic Psalms, one due to the supernatural working of the Holy Spirit in the mind of Solomon, and so constructed that the mutual love of king Solomon and the ideal Shulammithe undergoes transfiguration and becomes an allegory of the marriage of the Heavenly Bridegroom with His elect bride on earth.' Of course Keil considers that this allegorico-prophetic view is amply supported by the above-mentioned Biblical description of the covenant relation between Jahweh and Israel under the figure of a marriage union.—The same principle of interpretation lay at the root of Rosenmüller's original view (cf. Keil and Tschirner's Analekten, i. [1813] p. 138 ff.; for his later view see preceding col., note*), as well as at that of Hengstenberg (Das Hohe Lied, 1853) and others.†—Another set of interpreters refer the contents of the Song (in a Messianic sense) to the mission of the kingdom of Israel to heathendom (H. A. Hahn, 1852), or of Christ to the presently divided Church, which is to be brought back to the perfection which belonged to it in the apostolic age (G. F. Goltz, 1850).

The attempts to convert the Song into a political allegory may be pronounced completely mistaken. For instance, it has been supposed by J. L. Hug (1813) to be a fancy poem in which the longing of the ten tribes for a reunion with king Hezekiah is set forth under the figure of the love relations of the Shulammithe with Solomon. According to G. P. C. Kaiser (1825) the Song of Songs is 'a collective song addressed to Zerubbabel, Ezra, and Nehemiah, as the restorers of a Jewish constitution in the province of Judah.'

* The form in which Grotius states the traditional view is worthy of note: 'Credidit autem Salomon, quo magis perennaret hoc scriptum, ea arte id composuisse, ut sine multa distortionem allegorie in eo inveniri posset, quod Dei amorem adversus populum Israelit. exprimerent. Ille amor typus cum fuerit amoris Christi erga ecclesiam, Christiani ingenia sua ad applicanda ad eam rem huius carminis verba exercebant, laudabili studio.'

† E. Rupprecht (Einleit. in d. AT, 1898, p. 353 ff.) still walks quite in the footsteps of Hengstenberg.

The allegorical interpretation has all along started with presupposing the internal unity of the poem, and has uniformly seen in Solomon its author and its hero. On this view of the Song, moreover, the dramatic element in its construction, which makes itself felt not indistinctly, is preserved, even if it is not always recognized. Over against not only the allegorical explanation but also that view of the Song which breaks it up into separate songs or fragments of songs in the fashion so brilliantly inaugurated by Herder, another manner of interpretation began to gain always wider currency and acceptance. This agreed with the second of the views just named, in holding that it is earthly love that is the subject of the Song, and with the first in maintaining the literary unity of the poem. It ceased to search in Canticles for deep secrets of revelation, prophetic-symbolical glances into the development of the kingdom of God, and preferred to take its contents realistically, as the reflexion of a historical occurrence. What the poem lost in this way of the value which the allegorical interpretation had sought to impose upon it, was richly compensated by the ethical significance which it gained upon the new theory. The man who led the way in this mode of interpretation was J. C. Jacobi (in his anonymous work, Das durch eine leichte Erklärung von seinen Vorwürfen gerettete Hohelied, 1771). He saw in the Song a panegyric on conjugal fidelity, for he considers that its subject is the steadfastness with which a wife who had been carried off from her husband maintained her fidelity to the latter, in face of the seductive attempts of Solomon. Afterwards the adherents of this system of interpretation deviated from Jacobi in one point. They saw in the heroine of the poem, not a married woman, but a virgin, who, in spite of all the insidious arts of Solomon, remained true to her lover or betrothed, and who finally received the reward of her faithfulness in her union with her beloved.

Those who, in spite of differences in detail, which it is impossible to describe more fully here, held the same general view (just described) of the Song, were not all agreed also in regarding it as a dramatic poem. Some took it to be an epic poem; others, in view of its strongly pronounced lyric character, would have it that it is a collection of ballads, or even an operetta, with choruses, duets, and solos. But the majority of the adherents of the above theory, especially amongst the most distinguished exegetes, took the view that the Song is a drama, or it might be a melodrama. We may specify such names as Ewald (1826, 1867), Umbreit (1828, 1839), Hitzig (1855), Renan (1860), even Delitzsch (see, further, below), Stickel (1888), Oettli (1889), Driver (1891, etc.), Bruston (1891). Amongst many others the present writer has given in his adhesion to this opinion (1893). But as to the internal structure of the poem there is by no means complete agreement, although the differences that exist are no evidence, as has been supposed, that there is nothing in the dramatic theory. The absence of scenic indications in the text, and the necessity of inferring simply from the contents, or the form of expression, who is the speaker in particular sentences or sections, are quite sufficient to account for the surprising differences in the dramatic arrangement of the Song proposed by different exegetes. These differences are, of course, due also in large measure to the very great difficulties that beset the exposition of the Song of Songs.

The main difference amongst the adherents of the dramatic theory is the following. Starting with the primary assumption that Canticles is a dramatic poem, exegetes, in answering the question as to the principal dramatis personæ, part company in two quite different directions. Delitzsch (1851, 1875), and, in essential agreement with him, Zöckler (in Lange's Bibelwerk, 1868), and von Orelli (in PRE 2 vi. p. 245 ff., art. 'Hohes Lied Salomos,' 1880), hold, in harmony with the traditional view, that, apart from certain subordinate figures, there are only two principal persons to be recognized, namely, Solomon and the Shulammitte, and that, where a shepherd is spoken of, Solomon is here also to be understood.

The poem is supposed to describe the bond of love between the two, from the first moment of mutual burning passion (12-27), and mutual seeking and finding (28-35), down to the realization of the desire for love in the marriage union (36-51); and then, after a passing estrangement, the mutual return (52-68), the praise of the charms and beauty of the bride now raised to be queen (610-84), and the confirming of the love covenant in the home of the Shulammitte (85-114). Delitzsch, however, finds in the whole poem a deeper idea expressed. He says (Comm. 2 p. 5): 'the Shulammitte is a historical person . . . a country maiden of lowly rank, who by her physical beauty and purity of soul awakened in Solomon a love which elevated him above the wantonness of polygamy, and gave him a personal experience of the Paradise idea of marriage as this is expressed in Gn 22nd with reference to the first created woman. It is this personal experience that he celebrates, at the same time idealizing it in the manner of poets by stripping off the husk of all that is accidental, and presenting the kernel and essence. . . . The Song is a protest against polygamy, although only to the extent that one could expect from the Mosaic standpoint.' He finds in the Song a reflexion of the μυσταγωγία of Eph 5²². But he claims for it, not only a historical and ethical but also a typico-mystical significance. Solomon is to him a type of Christ, and accordingly he sees in the love relations between Solomon and the Shulammitte 'the mysteries of the love of Christ and His people shadowed forth' (p. 5), remarking at the same time that the typical exegesis must bear in mind that type and antitype do not exactly coincide, and the mystical that 'the heavenly stamps itself, indeed, upon the earthly, and yet is poles asunder from it.'—Von Orelli differs from Delitzsch only in so far as he holds the subject of the Song to be 'not marriage as a permanent bond and condition, but betrothed love which finds simply its climax and goal in the marriage union' (l.c. p. 252). Accordingly in 36-51, upon his view, there cannot be already an allusion to the marriage union, as Delitzsch holds. In his typical view of the Song, Orelli is otherwise essentially at one with Delitzsch (l.c. p. 249).

Apart from the fact that such exegesis as the above is dominated by considerations supposed to be involved in the history of revelation, there are serious objections to the view that there are only two principal persons in the Song, and to the identifying of the shepherd with the king. Above all, it is hard to comprehend how the Shulammitte, even after her marriage has taken place, should continue to treat and to address the king as shepherd, and should even inquire (17) where he pastures his flocks. To discover 'an essential feature of the spiritual beauty' of the Song in the circumstance 'that the ideal virgin loves him, not as king, but loves in him the shepherd, and longs to share with him the innocent simplicity of her former manner of life, a desire to which he joyfully yields,' is possible, indeed, but in the highest degree unnatural, and may be regarded rather as an outcome of a mystical deepening of the sense of the Song than as the result of a sober interpretation of the actual words of the text.

Far more support has been accorded, and rightly so, we consider, to the view represented above all by Ewald. According to it, besides Solomon, the king who is courting the love of the Shulammitte, we must distinguish a shepherd who was the real object of her passion, and the beloved of her heart.

The fascinatingly beautiful Shulammitte is supposed to have been met by the king on the occasion of a tour of his in the north of his kingdom (611^{ff.}), and placed in his harem. The king seeks by enticing flattering speeches to win her love, but from the very first meeting (ch. 1) she gives him to understand to whom her heart belongs. While the king then presses her with ever renewed words of love and admiration, the emotion of love thus stirred within her pours itself forth in words addressed to her lover far away. Nay, in the intensity of her feelings, she imagines she sees him come from afar to her prison, she hears his words meant for her (20th, 47th, 52nd), and in a dream seeks for him by night in the streets (31st, 52nd). Even the prospect of becoming the favourite wife of the splendid monarch cannot shake her fidelity to her absent lover, and even when the king imagines he has gained his point she remains firm, and refuses to entertain the idea of allowing any one to enjoy her love but the object of her heart's affections (36-55). A last attempt of Solomon to win her heart fails (chs. 6, 7). Finally, the king magnanimously gives her back her liberty, and in her home in union with her beloved shepherd she finds the consummation of her happiness. On this view, the Song reaches its ideal goal in the impassioned eulogium on true, pure love in 8^{ab}.*

It is quite true that, even upon this interpretation, which at all events does fuller justice to the text than the traditional view adopted anew by Delitzsch, there are still difficulties enough in points of detail. But it is questionably whether these difficulties are sufficiently great to make this explanation inadequate alike from the formal and the material point of view, and thus to demand its rejection. The present writer does not think so.

The principal difficulty is in the so-called Third Act (8^a-5^l). The question is whether the conclusion (5^l) is intended to mark the longed-for marriage union as actually consummated. Hitzig held that this question must be answered in the affirmative, and supposed the marriage in view to have been one that Solomon contracted with a woman of Jerusalem, but not with the Shulammitte. Bruston is also of opinion that in this Third Act we have to do with the marriage of the king to another—in fact, as he thinks may be gathered from 4^b, with a Tyrian princess. This actually accomplished marriage with another woman would thus place on a still higher level the invincible fidelity of the Shulammitte. But there is really no necessity to take the Shulammitte's words in 4^{ab} as formally different from her words in ch. 1. She is thinking in both passages, not of the king, but of her true lover, and it occasions no difficulty, but only marks the climax of the conflict that the king believes, of course, that the object of his desires is now about to yield to him, whereas, as the very next scene shows, such an idea has never entered her mind. Ewald himself held that from 4^b onwards we have again words of her lover, which the Shulammitte imagined she heard, as in 2^{ab}; he even supposed that two lines have dropped out before v. 5, their contents being, 'Behold, my beloved, behold, there comes he! Hark how he speaks to me his words . . .', or the like. But it is unnecessary and hardly justifiable to suppose that a different subject speaks in 4^{ab} from the speaker in v. 1^a.†—Stückel, too, denies that 4^{ab} are words of Solomon, but he thinks to escape all difficulties by the strange assumption that in 17.8 18-24 47-51 there are three scenes that are to be separated from the rest of the poem. In these he supposes a second pair of lovers, a shepherd and a shepherdess, to be introduced, who actually arrive at a marriage union, this interlude having the effect of setting Solomon's wooing of the Shulammitte in a peculiar light.‡ Otherwise, the relation of Solomon to the Shulammitte and her relation to him remain the same as on Ewald's theory. But this view of Stückel's, which destroys the unity of the poem, presupposes far too great skill in producing stage effects ('Bühnengeschicklichkeit') on the part of the author to be well founded.

A very important turn of opinion as to the literary character of the Song of Songs has been brought about in the most recent times. J. G. Wetzstein, who was for long Prussian consul at Damascus, and who has rendered much service in the way of increasing our knowledge of Oriental life and contributing to the understanding of the OT, availed himself of his opportunities of making acquaintance with the marriage customs in modern Syria. In this way he met with some things which are certainly calculated to throw light on certain portions of the Song of Songs. He published in Bastian's Zeitschrift f. Ethnologie (1873, p. 270 ff.), an article, entitled 'Die syrische Dreschtäfel,' in which he describes the manifold uses made of the threshing-board, and amongst others its symbolical employment in the so-called 'king's week,' i.e. during the seven days' marriage festival (p. 287 ff.). It was partly from this article that the 'Bemerkungen zum Hohenliede' in Delitzsch's Commentary were taken, but the author contributed further important materials to the elucidation of the subject. To the same category belongs an earlier

† It may be noted that, in the opinion of the present writer, 4^b is not now in its original place. It is not till v. 7 that the description of the charms of the Shulammitte (vv. 1-3) closes. Perhaps v. 6 should follow v. 7, and formed originally the connecting link with v. 8^{ab}.

‡ Cf. Stückel, Das Hohelied, p. 45: 'Antithesis, that indispensable art of the drama, by presenting so vividly the undisturbed happy shepherd's love in contrast with the sorely tried heroine of the Song, awakens warm sympathy with the latter, and a feeling of suspense and compassion, etc. Further, this interlude is supposed to mark and fill up various spaces of time in the course of the main transaction.'

article by Wetzstein, entitled 'Sprachliches aus den Zeltlagern der syrischen Wüste,' in ZDMG xxii. (1868), p. 69 ff., containing valuable notes on a story written down from oral communication. The remarkable similarity between certain songs sung at modern marriage celebrations and certain portions of the Song of Songs, naturally enough forced upon him the conclusion that the latter is not 'a dramatic unity,' but rather a collection of 'beautiful nuptial songs' which were received into the Canon 'to furnish good models to the occasional poets whose productions may in Hebrew antiquity, as at the present day, have transgressed the bounds of decency and good taste.' The allegorical or mystical interpretation is held to have come in afterwards (cf. Delitzsch, Comm. p. 172, note). After Stade (Gesch. Isr. ii. [1888] 197) had referred approvingly to Wetzstein's 'most helpful contribution to the understanding of this quite unique book,' Budde, in an article on 'The Song of Solomon' in the New World (Boston, U.S.A. 1894, p. 56 ff.; cf. Preuss. Jahrbücher, 1894, p. 92 ff.), went in the fullest detail into Wetzstein's communications, and sought with their help to win its natural sense for the Song of Songs.* His arguments gained complete assent from Kautzsch ('Abriss der Gesch. d. alttest. Schrifttums' in the 'Beilagen' to his AT p. 210 f. [in the 'Sonderabdruck' of 1897, p. 134 f.]), and in specially emphatic, confident fashion from Cornill (Einleitung†, p. 256: 'In this way the enigma of our book is definitively solved').† Whether this confidence is really justified is open to doubt. With reference to Budde's claim (l.c. p. 9) that he has cut away the roots of the dramatical interpretation of the Song by his explanation of 'Solomon' and 'the Shulammitte,' which stand simply for bridegroom and bride, husband and wife, Bruston (cf. Le X^e congrès des Orientalistes et l'ancien Testament, Paris, 1895, p. 13 ff.) declares, 'I fear that this is a huge and extraordinary illusion,' a judgment with which the present writer agrees.

Budde attempts first of all to prove that by Solomon, or the king, the Song means not the real king Solomon, but that we have here only a type, a poetical designation of any and every bridegroom. In order to give a worthy title to the latter on his wedding day and in his wedding dress, the figure of Solomon is supposed to have been employed as that of the monarch whose riches and splendour had become as proverbial as his wisdom. The case is similar with the Shulammitte. 'She is, indeed, no other than Abishag the Shunammite, but only as the representative of her qualities' (p. 8). The maiden from Shunem (the modern Sholam, a pronunciation to which the Heb. Shulammit also goes back), who was brought to the aged king David, and on whose account Adonijah had to die (1 K 2^{13a}), was admittedly, according to the correct sense of 1 K 1^{3a}, the fairest virgin to be found in the whole land, and continued to enjoy this reputation in the memories of the people. Hence, argues Budde (p. 9): '... as the bridegroom is compared with king Solomon in his glory, or even named with his name, and would not exchange his fortune with Solomon, so for the beauty of the bride no less a woman could be named than the fairest of whom the ancients spoke, and one who was also a queen [Solomon may have, at least according to the legend, introduced her into his harem], which certainly was not an unwelcome fact. That she should be called the fairest of all is the right of every bride on her wedding day, however she may be outshone by hundreds at other times.'

The present writer has no difficulty in admitting that the situation may be understood in the above way, that is to say, that it is not necessary to presuppose absolutely that the Song of Songs is based upon an actual historical occurrence; but he fails to see how, on this view, the dramatisal theory of the poem in its present form is wounded unto death. If Budde is right in holding that in later times the two outstanding figures in the popular recollection were employed as above described in the poetry of marriage celebrations, this very circumstance might also lead a poet to give a dramatic fashioning to the material supplied by 1 K 1. 2, and, in so doing, to utilize the further development the story had undergone in the popular memory. Now, Budde himself (p. 8) remarks that the circumstance that Solomon had his brother put to death on Abishag's account, may have given rise to the legend that he himself loved her and made her his wife, and that the execution of his brother was thus an act of jealousy. But if we admit the possibility of this, there is another possibility we should not leave out of account. In 1 K 2 we hear nothing of Abishag having really become the wife of Solomon. Why may not this circumstance have given rise in poetical legend to the conception that the lovely virgin refused to become Solomon's wife, nay even to the conception that her refusal was based upon her unconquerable love for a youth in her native district? Moreover, when the notion was once seized that she had not chosen to be the wife of Solomon, it was no great stretch of poetic fancy to assume that her first introduction into the apartments of David by his servants was not a willing one on her part, and the presupposition that from the first she succeeded in defending her honour finds its firm basis in the express statement of 1 K 1⁴ ('and the king knew her not').

We see then that the narrative of 1 K 1. 2 supplies, especially if we take into account the influence of inventive popular reminiscence, quite sufficient material for developing the story which the dramatisal theory of the Song of Songs considers to be unfolded in it. It required at all events no very great gift of poetic construction to give a dramatisal form to this material borrowed from recollections, in which all the points necessary for a simple dramatisal development were contained and spontaneously offered themselves to the poet's notice. But, we repeat emphatically, this does not absolutely exclude the possibility that in later times it was customary in a poetical and symbolical form of address to call a bridegroom and a bride 'Solomon' or 'king,' and 'Shulamite.*' At the same time we think it only right and proper to emphasize the other possibility, that an unknown man, of a poetical turn and moved perhaps also by special circumstances, found in this very custom the motive for working up the material that lay to his hand. The one supposition does not exclude the other. The question whether we have really to do with a dramatisal poem must be settled from the book itself, and in any case the matter is not so easily settled as Budde and those who agree with him suppose.

Budde finds 'the solution of the problem of our book' (p. 10) in the customs reported by Wetzstein in connexion with weddings amongst the Syrian Bedawin, namely, in the festive proceedings of the so-called 'king's week.' The book contains, according to him, 'songs' sung at the wedding festivities, during which bridegroom and bride (or husband and wife) are honoured for seven days as king and queen, whose throne is the threshing-board, set on the threshing-floor of the place and decked out with carpets and pillows. A principal element in these songs are the wasf or lyrical descriptions of the physical charms and wedding attire of the young pair. Especially impressive, according to Wetzstein's account (cf. Delitzsch, Comm.

p. 171), is the so-called sword dance of the bride on the evening before the bridal night. In this dance, which is accompanied by the song of a double chorus of men and women in praise of her physical beauty, she seeks in the light of the high-leaping flames of a fire to display to the bridegroom the charms of her person, brandishing all the time a sharp sword in her right hand, and holding a handkerchief in her left. The whole performance is an imitation of the dance that celebrates a victory. Now, as a matter of fact, the wasf sung during the sword dance corresponds in Canticles to 7^{1*} (as far at least as v. 7). The wasf referring to the young wife (i.e. the queen) after the consummation of the marriage on the bridal night, on the first day of the 'king's week,' is found, according to Budde, in 4¹⁻⁶. It is put in the mouth of the young husband, and is partially repeated in 6⁴⁻⁷. There is also a panegyric on the physical charms of the husband or king, the wasf referring to which is put in the mouth of the wife in 5^{9*}, v. 2⁷ being supposed to be intended simply to serve as an introduction to this wasf with a pleasing dramatisal movement. Next, according to this mode of interpretation, 3⁶⁻¹¹ contains a description of the festive train of the gorgeously dressed bridegroom-king, and their joyous greeting to him on the morning after the bridal night, when the threshing-board has been placed and decked out as the throne; here the name 'Solomon' is, of course, not meant to be taken literally.* The 'sixty mighty men' are the 'companions of the bridegroom,' who, as Wetzstein with the approval of Budde suggests, were perhaps originally charged with the duty of protecting the festival against attacks, especially during the night (3⁶, cf. Delitzsch, Comm. p. 170).† The 'daughters of Jerusalem' are of course, in the same way, not ladies of the royal harem, but virgins from the same neighbourhood as the bridal pair, who take part in a variety of ways in the wedding celebration.‡ The circumstance that it is with Jerusalem in particular that they are brought into relation, proves, according to Budde, that the home of the wedding songs which are brought together in Canticles is to be sought in this city or its environs.

But now, as Budde further supposes, the passages just named have not, in their present order, the chronological succession demanded by the course of the marriage celebrations. At all events, the song that accompanied the sword dance (7^{1*}) must stand before 3^{6*}, the greeting addressed to the approaching bridegroom-king. Budde suggests, however, that perhaps its proper place is after 3⁶⁻¹¹ and before 4-6, if, as is possible, the subject of 3⁶⁻¹¹ is not the procession to the throne on the day after the marriage, but the ceremonial arrival of the bridegroom at the marriage itself on the evening of the wedding day. (If 5¹ alludes to the coming actual consummation of the marriage covenant, the latter supposition appears to the present writer to be the only suitable one). From all this it follows, according to Budde, 'that the songs are brought together irregularly, and the last trace of an orderly arrangement thus appears.' It is a question, however, whether the premises upon which this conclusion rests are in all respects correct. The present writer does not think so.

In the remaining portions of Canticles also there is of course, in Budde's opinion, no connexion to be discovered, but still less any progressive history. These passages, on the contrary, may be readily broken up into a number of songs, which, as Wetzstein's information showed, may have been used during the 'king's week' in praise of love in general, and of the love of the present pair in particular (Budde, p. 15 f.).

But, after the Song of Songs has been thus resolved into a number of separate songs, the question arises, What judgment is to be passed on the book in its present form? Was it originally nothing more than a collection of wedding songs, or was a species of editing carried out in the arrangement of them with the intention of establishing an internal connexion? Budde decides in the main in favour of the first of these alternatives, holding that we have to do, at least originally, only with a collection. Some one who felt an interest in this species of lyric poetry is supposed (like Wetzstein in our own day) to have written down these songs, and then the collection would be passed on to posterity in this form, perhaps without indication of their origin and without any exact distinction of the limits of the different songs. In this way the book would be exposed to the greatest danger of falling into disorder. Of course this is in itself a possible view. But that the question as to the origin of the book in its present form is not settled in this simple fashion, Budde is well aware. He finds here and there short pieces which possess, in his

* This approach of the bridegroom is recalled, as Budde expressly notes, by the figure in Ps 106.

† Samson had thirty such 'companions' about him (Jg 14¹), who were headed by one who had the special title of the 'friend' of the bridegroom (cf. Jg 14²⁰ and also Jn 3²⁰).

‡ Their greeting addressed to the approaching bridegroom (3¹¹) finds a parallel in the parable of Mt 25^{1*}.

* By the way, Budde's view is not at all favoured by the circumstance that in the Song of Songs the Shulamite or the bride is never called 'queen.' The 'daughter of a noble' (7¹) does not take the place of this.

opinion, small poetic value, which he holds it to be impossible to bring into any connexion with the surrounding and originally independent songs and songlets. One trace of the later origin of these he finds, above all, in the circumstance that the composer of them misunderstood the real meaning, and in particular the symbolically intended expressions, in older passages and took these in a literal sense.

The most striking instance of this is discovered by Budde in 4⁸, where the purely typical Lebanon of vv. 11. 12 is alleged to be converted into the real Lebanon and associated with other mountain heights. The author of 4⁸ is thus supposed to have been guilty of a crude misunderstanding, and it is declared that, when closely examined, the list of mountains is so little in place and yields so little sense, while the whole verse is so weak from the poetical point of view, that it is most natural to infer 'misunderstanding and insertion.' But this is a purely subjective verdict. It may reasonably be asked how any one was likely to introduce such an addition at this particular place. And what compels us to understand the names of the mountains here, 'the lions' dens' and 'the leopards' mountains,' literally and not symbolically? This symbolical sense is as suitable to them as it is to 'the clefts of the rock' and 'the covert of the steep place' in 21⁴. Other sentences which are supposed to have originated in a similar way are found by Budde in 81⁴, cf. 21⁶. He also holds, strangely enough, that 23⁴-3⁴ is an addition introduced on account of v. 10, for plainly (?), he argues, the words 'Hark, my beloved!' (v. 8⁴) should be connected immediately with the words of v. 9⁴ ('there he stands behind our wall'). But here again the question may be asked, Why should it have occurred to any one to insert the words in v. 8, which at least are so evidently poetical and out and out original?

A similar judgment is passed by Budde upon 52⁴, cf. 29⁴; 52 is due to a misunderstanding of 36. He makes a special allusion to 61-3, arguing that what was intended in 52-9 to serve simply as a transition to the wagf of the bridegroom is here transferred to the sphere of actuality, and that the figures borrowed from the plant-world (513) are likewise misunderstood and taken in their literal sense, the beloved becoming the gardener who has gone into his garden, etc. But, says Budde, if the Shulamite really knew this, why does she search so long for her lover and call for help to find him? Here, again, 'genuine phrases' like 17⁴ 21⁶ 611⁴ are supposed to have been worked up in a way opposed to their proper meaning. It is quite natural that Budde, with his view of the Song of Songs, can make nothing of these verses (61-3), which beyond a doubt are as genuine as 27-8. We must ask here once more, How can it have occurred to a later editor to introduce such sentences? What motive could have led him to do so? Even Budde feels the above difficulty, but, for all that, he is unable to give a satisfactory answer to the question. 'What reasons led him [the redactor] to whom we are supposed to owe these strange interpolations] . . . what suppositions and intentions, of course we do not know.' Of course, if an author is to be held capable of such misunderstandings, it is difficult to give any satisfactory account of the motives that actuated him. And yet Budde repeats that one can recognize 'the plain effort' of the redactor 'to introduce movement and action where none were.'

The author of these later additions is held, then, to have meant to bring movement and action into the whole work. May he then have been guided by dramatizing aims? May it be that elsewhere too he is not without responsibility for the present form of the Song of Songs, but actually brought movement and action into the material of the work, i.e. that he perhaps worked up the latter from the dramatical point of view? These questions are very readily suggested by Budde's own words. True, he does not actually raise them, although he afterwards concedes that the additions just described (with which also may have been coupled trifling alterations and corruptions of the text) have given to the dramatical view of Canticles 'a certain justification from antiquity downwards, because separated matters were thereby connected and a certain movement and development brought in.' Of course he no longer gives the dramatical view the benefit of this excuse, now that he has shown what the Song of Songs really is.

It is interesting to note the manner in which Budde supposes it possible that the book assumed its present disordered form. It was originally, as we have been told, a collection of wedding songs. This collection came, of course in manuscript form into the hands of a later writer, torn into single leaves and damaged. He supposed that he had before him not a collection of songs, but a literary unity, of whose contents and aim he had, however, 'only an obscure idea.' He attempted a restoration of the unintelligible work by putting together as he best could the separate leaves, and trying to amend the text by additions and supplements of the kind described above. But this is a very strange account of the matter, a real hypothesis of despair. There is one point, above all, to which exception must be taken. By way of supporting his general view of Canticles, Budde insists with much emphasis that the marriage customs, and of course also the peculiar character of the marriage songs, have continued essentially unaltered in Syria and Palestine from early times down to the present day. Now, how is it conceivable that an author living in Palestine (for it is there that we are supposed to look for the 'redactor') as early as the pre-Christian era should either have failed to recognize the contents and aim of songs which had been handed down for the most part without any corruption, or should have had 'only an obscure idea' of their true character? Might we not assume that this Judean redactor would have recognized the so-called wagfs as readily as Wetzstein has done? Here, then, Budde brings us face to face with a serious problem. The extremely mechanical explanation of the origin of the present Song of Songs, which he considers to be 'a satisfaction of all just demands,' appears to the present writer to condemn itself. And, as a matter of fact, Budde himself by the characteristics he assigns to the redactor points the way again past his own hypothesis to the dramatical view of the Song. His merit thus comes to be, not that of having cut the thread of life of the dramatical explanation, but—and it is a service not to be undervalued—of having laid the foundation, by the aid of Wetzstein's information, for a more correct opinion of the character, and perhaps even of the origin, of the Song of Songs.

The present writer recognizes, then, the possibility that older wedding songs (as, for instance, the wagfs) are worked up in the Song of Songs. But this does not exclude the supposition that the Song in its present form is of a dramatical nature, and that its author (not a redactor or 'reviser') introduced 'movement and action' or 'development' into the material of which it is composed. At all events, this view is not set aside by simply pointing to passages in certain parts of the book which are marked by the characteristics of customary wedding songs, and which were perhaps taken over by the author ready made. If an examination of the separate parts of the book and a study of the connexion of the whole tend to show that everywhere, and not merely in the passages attacked by Budde, there is dramatical movement and expression, however great or small this may be, then the question is decided in favour of the correctness of the dramatical view, whatever may be urged to the contrary. Of course a dramatic poet who utilizes older material in his work cannot have the full credit of originality allowed him, but a dramatic poem is the result of his work all the same. Moreover, it is by no means certain that the Song of Songs contains foreign matter which did not proceed from the pen of one and the same writer; on the contrary, there are not wanting indications, both in thought and expression, which point to an identity of authorship for the whole work.*

As to the general view of Canticles that ought to be taken, there can be no doubt, in the judgment of the present writer, that it is a poem whose subject is love, or more specifically that it is a carmen nuptiale or wedding song. The crucial question, however, is whether the poem, viewed as a whole, sets out from a marriage as an accomplished fact,—in other words, whether its subject is married love,—or whether a marriage is the goal at which it aims, in which case it is intended to glorify betrothed love and fidelity. The present writer is convinced that the second alternative is the correct one, and hopes in what follows to substantiate this.

We have already pointed out (p. 592 f.) how the story which Ewald's interpretation discovers in the Song of Songs might be readily developed in the popular memory and by a poetically inventive disposition from the history of Abishag of Shunem. Budde, citing a word of Goethe's, reminds us that if we are to understand the poem which we call the Song of Songs, we must visit the poet's own land. This is what we propose now to do. If Budde himself had continued his journey further and looked more carefully around him, he might have discovered the story of two lovers, Habbās and Hamda, which bears a very close resemblance to what we find in Canticles. The story is given by Wetzstein in the Arabic text with German translation (see ZDMG xxii. [1868] p. 74 ff.), and was taken down by him directly from oral communication. In any case, this beautiful love romance proves that under special circumstances even at the present day amongst the Bedawin the possibility of love entanglements is contemplated, such as are presupposed in ancient times in the Song of Songs, if we adopt the dramatical view of Ewald and others. Hamda is said to have loved Habbās, who lived far away and belonged to another tribe. Her heart remains true to this love, although, after long separation in time as well as place from him whom her soul truly loves, she is destined to become the wife of her cousin Ali, and the wedding day (or rather evening) with all its festal celebrations has arrived. Nay, she has not omitted even to tell her cousin, Ali's sister, how it is with her heart, and has given her such a description of her lover's stature, his physical excellencies, and his beauty that even she must have been able to pick him out of a crowd (cf. l.c. p. 103). And, in point of fact, the lover drawn from afar by his love comes, accompanied by a true friend (Husein), while there is yet time to prevent the closing of the marriage bond between Hamda and Ali, and to win his true love for himself. And he does win her and takes her home.

* A careful reading of the book itself will readily supply the necessary evidence of this.

* We shall see afterwards that, on a correct view of the Book of Canticles, these verses (61-3) show themselves to be unquestionably original.

No one who reads this story, which is given in its most general outlines, will be able to avoid the impression that here there is partially the same problem before us as is presented in the Song of Songs. Budde (p. 4) insists again with much emphasis that in neither the modern nor the ancient East has a real betrothal and an intimate intercourse between the betrothed parties been permitted or possible prior to marriage, and that there is no place for such a natural growth of affection as the dramatical view postulates. Well, of course we must be on our guard against applying rules borrowed from the West and from the condition of things amongst ourselves. But the story communicated by Wetzstein shows that such affections, even if these are surrounded a little with the halo of romance, are still possible at the present day, and evidence may be brought from the OT itself to show that even in ancient times it was not an impossible thing for two young people (especially leading a country life) to make each other's acquaintance and fall in love, and then to gratify their inclinations by personal meetings, even if these had to be stealthily contrived.* The present writer must confess, then, that in his opinion no real objection to the dramatical view of the Song of Songs can be taken on the ground of the contents which this view discovers in the Song. Moreover, the structure which is formed out of these contents presents so close a parallel to the story communicated by Wetzstein, that one can only feel thus confirmed in one's opinion that Canticles is a dramatic poem, taking for granted, of course, that in the contents of the latter there is really a dramatical progress or structure discoverable. That this last assumption is well founded is our firm conviction; and even Budde himself, as we have seen, is not so very far removed from this opinion, since he cannot deny that at least his assumed redactor (or 'reviser') sought to introduce movement and action into the older material whose peculiar character is supposed to have passed unrecognized by him. This, however, is tantamount to saying that he gave it a dramatic form, even if he did so in an imperfect fashion. Of course the objection that the Semites had no dramatic poetry at all (cf. art. POETRY, p. 9*) has no force, for it starts by assuming as an axiom the very point whose universal application is disputed on the ground of the Song of Songs. The proof that the dramatical view of Canticles is the correct one cannot be offered, of course, through general considerations; but it is offered, and that with tolerable certainty, if we succeed in formulating a theory of the contents and structure of the Song, which is natural on all sides and capable of explaining, at least in the main, all the particular phenomena exhibited by the book.

* In favour of such a possibility may be cited in the first place Jg 14^{ff}. 76, and then legal enactments like Ex 22^{15f}, Dt 22^{23ff}; cf. also Gn 34¹⁻⁵. It may be held as certain that even in ancient Israel, in spite of the strictness of morality, nay, perhaps even because of it, there was no lack of a genuine romantic side to love.

The ideal goal of the whole poem appears to the present writer to have been found, from Ewald downwards, in 8⁶. 7. The real aim of the Song of Songs is to glorify true love, and, more specifically, true betrothed love, which remains steadfast even in the most dangerous and most seductive situations. The author, as we may perhaps assume with certainty, found the material for his work in the story of Abishag of Shunem (1 K 1. 2), and that in the form which we described above (p. 562 f.). She remained true to the beloved of her heart, she steadily repelled all the advances of Solomon, into whose harem she had been brought, and finally she triumphed (8¹² and 8^{10b}), was conducted home and restored to her lover perfectly pure. The poem makes two presuppositions—one being that the Shulammitte's heart belonged to a youth in her own home, and the other that meanwhile against her will she has been brought into the royal apartments (1⁴). The dramatical exposition commences at the time when the first meeting of the king with the maiden is close at hand and actually takes place (1²). The dialogue between the Shulammitte and the 'daughters of Jerusalem' (the wives and maidens belonging to the royal harem, cf. 6^{8f}.) in 12-13* serves to pave the way, in true dramatic fashion, for that meeting, and at the same time to explain the real inward disposition of the Shulammitte towards the approaching royal suitor, which the poet henceforward makes her retain without wavering. If, now, we would understand aright the further structure of the poem, it must be observed that the scheme chosen by the author for the poetical disposition of his material is based upon the different stages in the courtship and the marriage festivities, down to that moment when alone the real victory of loyal love, the preservation of bridely honour in face of all temptations and assaults, was evidenced, and could be evidenced, namely, the morning after the bridal night passed with the real lover.†

The Song of Songs is in fact a love- or marriage-drama, but, by reason of the lyrical tone which rules in its various parts, we may more appropriately call it a melodrama.

If now, keeping in view the legend derived from the story of Abishag, and the progressive stages of the marriage proceedings, we look at the whole poem, it falls, alike in point of matter and

* The way in which the particular sentences are to be assigned to the respective speakers will be found exhibited in the present writer's work Das Hohe Lied, to which he begs to refer the reader.

† As bearing on this, the reader may be reminded of the legislative enactment of Dt 22^{15ff}. The cloth with its irrefragable proof of the virginity of a newly married woman points to a very serious transaction in the early morning after the bridal night. The practice forms even at the present day part of the proceedings in connexion with a wedding, and is described by Wetzstein ('Die syrische Dreschtäfel' in Bastian's Ztschr. f. Ethnol. 1873, p. 290).

form, into two nearly equal parts. The dividing point is reached in 51, where also the dramatic entanglement reaches its climax. Up till then the king is the suitor for the maiden's love, and in 51 the course of development leads to the point where everything appears to point to the certain consummation of the marriage bond in the coming night.* From the very first encounter (19-27) the king, as intended by the poet, goes away with the impression that the fair maiden longs with intense passion for union with him; he does not notice that the outbursts of passionate longing called forth by his words are meant not for him, but for another whom she loves. The reader or the spectator of the play can have no doubt on this point, for already in 12-8 (cf. especially v.8) it comes out clearly enough how the heart of the maiden is engaged, and the Second Act (28-39) confirms this in the strongest way by the two dream visions. The Third Act (39-51) corresponds to the first of the festal proceedings on the day (evening) before the bridal night. The king proceeds, in his wedding attire, surrounded by his trusty men, and amidst greetings from the women, to the house where the lovely maiden is detained. This answers to the joyous procession in state by the bridegroom and his friends to the place where the feast was celebrated, on the occasion of weddings amongst the common people. The equally pompous conducting of the bride in the evening to the same place and to the performance of the sword dance, which characterized popular weddings, is wanting here; nor is this surprising, since the bride is already in a place where she belongs to the king. We may probably assume also that a king's marriage was not celebrated in exactly the same way as that of one of the common people. The sword dance and other popular customs may have been wholly absent.† Of course this does not prevent the poet from introducing into his description certain features borrowed from these customs, simply because these were calculated to introduce movement into the material. Thus he makes the king draw near in all his splendour, with his sixty heroes and friends, and (51) even go in to the festive meal exactly after the fashion of popular wedding festivities.‡ On the other hand, the enticing sensually flattering words of the king in 41st convey the impression, since, as we have said, we can hardly think of the sword dance, that they are the transition link to the bridal night with its mysteries. The same inference is supported by the context, as far as the contents of 41st-51 are concerned; from the Shulamite's reply in 41st to his longing desire to enjoy the fruits of the garden that is supposed to belong to him, the king has concluded that she waits for him in order to accord him the enjoyment of her love (whereas she is thinking of her true beloved), and in this, of course, mistaken assurance he calls his friends to give themselves up to the joys of the marriage festival. At this point the king disappears. This is not specially noted, indeed, but it was unnecessary that it should be, on a correct understanding of the story of the poem, and with an actual dramatic presentation of it. As in the story of Habbas and Hamda related by Wetzstein, the fortune of the maiden turns at the last moment, just when the final consummation of the marriage union with the unloved one was imminent. The king has learned in the night shrouded with mystery that she does not belong and cannot belong to him, and he is magnanimous enough not to claim what only violence could procure. He has set her free, as Ali did with Hamda, and the next section (52-63) of the Fourth Act conducts us slowly away from the king's domain. The poet retains the scheme of the wedding celebration, but now we have to do with the celebration of the marriage of the Shulamite with the object of her heart's affections. Between 51 and 52, properly speaking, there intervenes a space of time, which, to be sure, required in the dramatic construction of the poem no further indication than the passing from one scene to another. In what will be conceded to be an extremely skilful manner the poet moves on to the goal of his task, by placing us in 52nd at the same stage in the celebration of the marriage of the Shulamite with her lover as we had reached in 39-51 in connexion with the abortive attempt of Solomon. The passage 52-63, rightly understood, forms the introduction to the principal part of this Act, which reaches its climax in 8th 7. We hear in it the outpouring of the burning longing of the Shulamite for union with him whom she loves. The women, 'the daughters of Jerusalem,' by whom she is surrounded, are called on by her to assist her search for the beloved of her soul, who is portrayed in glowing colours. In this way a perfect movement is given to the action, which is conceived of after the model of a marriage celebration.

For the correct understanding of the further context it is necessary, above all, to take 61-3 rightly. In 62 there is an allusion, expressed in a beautiful figure, to part of the festal procedure of the marriage evening having already taken place. The beloved has already gone down to enjoy the fruits of his garden (a plain allusion to 41st), i.e. he has already gone to the place of the festival, and is present there with his escort. The ceremonial procession of the bridegroom, which was expressly mentioned in the case of the king in 39th, is thus presupposed in the present instance. The search for the beloved, in which the women (61) are prepared to help the Shulamite, corresponds to the ceremonial conducting of the bride in the evening to the festal spot. 64-10 [vv. 50-7] are to be struck out as having been introduced by mistake from ch. 4) contain the songs which greet the approaching bride and describe in striking figures her unique overpowering beauty. 61-12 are words of the Shulamite. She is apparently surprised at coming upon the festive company, she still acts as if she did not notice that the object of her search is in their midst. She had gone down, she says, to the nut garden to refresh herself by the enjoyment of it, i.e. she too has gone out to find her beloved and to enjoy his love, and has all at once come upon the crowd. We are to suppose now that she makes as if she would turn back, whereupon the chorus breaks out (71 [Eng. 61st]), 'Turn round, turn round, O Shulamite,' etc. Then the short invitation and dialogue of this verse lead directly to the sword dance, in which the bride dances in a sense to her beloved and presents herself to him symbolically with all her charms, while the double chorus ranging itself behind her proclaims her physical attractions in a highly realistic uvasf. Now she is ready, as 71st show, to yield to the wishes of her beloved (78-10), and herself invites him to go with her where she will grant him her love. The last section of this Act, 85-7, shows the loving pair on their way to the house where the bridal night is to be passed; they are received by the festal chorus with the words of 85th, which find their echo in the alternating song of the lovers with its glorious panegyric on true love (vv. 6-7).

* It is impossible to understand the perfects in 51 as real preterites. They are perfects of certain expectation (perfecta confidentia, cf. Ges.-Kautzsch, Gram. § 106 n.). The misunderstanding of these perfects has been the occasion of much confusion.

† How kings married daughters of the people may be gathered from 2 S 11²⁷, while Ps 45 may give light in regard to the procedure when a foreign princess was concerned.

And now the moment had come when it must be shown whether the Shulamite had really maintained her love true and unimpaired, whether the lofty ode to love in which she had joined (38-7) was really suitable to her love. 88th † transport us to the morning after the bridal night. In the space of time between v.7 and v.8 we are therefore to place not only the bridal night with its mysteries, but also the transition to the serious transaction early in the following morning (see above, p. 593, note †). The latter is brought directly before us in vv. 8-10, which proclaim the triumph of steadfast loyal love over all the difficulties and fears that have beset it. We hear in vv. 8-9 the brothers of the Shulamite declaring what they mean to do to their sister according as she has shown herself, in face of the seductive whispers of love, firm and inaccessible as a wall, or open and easily approachable like a door (i.e. easily led into inconstancy). These, of course, are words which the brothers have spoken before the commencement of the severe period of probation and danger exhibited to us in the Song of Songs. We are thus vividly reminded of 16, and in point of fact—as is shown also by 81st, which in like manner looks back to 16—the author in his beautiful closing section, 88th, attaches his words once more to the opening of the poem, thus indicating not only that this resolute maiden has succeeded in maintaining her childhood's purity, but also that the Song of Songs is really a well-rounded whole. The brothers have a direct interest in the issue of the test of their sister's virginity, and, besides, have the duty of maintaining the honour of the family. But while they are uttering the language of anxious expectation, which is finely put into their mouth, regarding the result of the test, the actual piece of evidence is brought forward (this we must suppose to be done between v.9 and v.10), and in face of this irrefragable proof the Shulamite breaks forth in the confident triumphant words of v.10. She has been found inviolate; she has kept herself as an impregnable fortress, there being perhaps in the last words of the verse a delicate allusion to Solomon, and the fact that even he had finally to recognize that this virgin was unimpressed by himself, his splendour, his allurements, and that he must thus let her go in peace. The words in v.12 connect themselves closely with v.10; she has kept her own vineyard, i.e. herself, her honour, her love, for herself and her beloved; Solomon may rest content with the abundant resources he possesses for gratifying his love.

So ends the dramatic development of the material used in the Song of Songs. The present writer considers that in the scheme of interpretation just proposed everything proceeds in good order and exhibits a perfectly natural connexion. He thinks it well to say natural, because, as a matter of fact, the different parts of the Song

* It may be noted that 53-4 have been wrongly placed in their present position, where they do not at all suit the context. Their insertion after vv. 1-2 is readily intelligible on the ground of a certain similarity of thought in 24th; but see the next note.

† In this last section the present writer regards v.11 as an archaeological and in any case very prosaic gloss, occasioned by the 'thousand' of v.12. In like manner v.14 is a later insertion by one who misunderstood the Song of Songs in so far as he believed that the Shulamite in the end became the wife of Solomon. In no other way can the strange invitation to the beloved be understood. The same hand which added v.14 may also through a similar misunderstanding have inserted vv. 3-4. In 81st, which is unquestionably genuine, the Shulamite manifestly contrasts herself with the thousand wives of Solomon; v.13, which we also hold to be genuine (cf. 24th), closes the Song of Songs, but serves at the same time as an introduction to the merry songs, dances, and games which followed at a marriage feast, and which lasted for seven days.

correspond exactly in their progress to the various stages in a marriage celebration. Even the transition from the first to the second half of the poem is dramatically beautiful and essentially unconstrained, and, as deserves to be once more emphasized, has a remarkable resemblance to the turning-point in the narrative of the loves of Hamda and Habbās. So also in the progress from one Act to another or one Scene to another, everything has an unconstrained flow, there is nothing abrupt or unnatural. We may then be permitted to express our conviction that if the Song of Songs be taken in the sense above indicated, not only will it be found to be perfectly intelligible in every part of its contents, but it will also prove itself beyond question to be a dramatical unity and constructed with dramatical skill.—Whether this melodramatic marriage-play was ever actually performed, say at wedding celebrations, or whether it was simply the product of a poet's leisure (composed with a didactic aim), cannot of course be determined, but at all events it was capable of being so presented.

iii. AUTHORSHIP, PLACE OF COMPOSITION, AND DATE OF THE SONG OF SONGS.—The title at the head of the work means, of course, to point to Solomon himself as the author of the poem, and down to the most recent times this view has been closely bound up with the allegorical interpretation and has been widely held. But it is out of the question, alike on the theory of Herder and on that inaugurated especially by Ewald. As a matter of course, the Solomonic authorship is excluded also if Budde's view be accepted. The present writer is equally compelled, in view of all that has been said above, to regard the traditional opinion as erroneous. Solomon is indeed partly the subject of the poem, but it is quite impossible that he himself should have composed it. And it is of course beyond our power so much as to hazard a conjecture as to who the actual author was.

Nor can much be said as to the place of composition. Budde has sought to infer from the mention of the 'daughters of Jerusalem' that the poetical material contained in the Song of Songs had its birthplace in Jerusalem or the neighbourhood of it. But every hint that can be utilized for locating the poem appears to point to the north of Palestine. There and nowhere else is the stage upon which the movement takes place in most parts of the poem that contain geographical allusions. This does not, however, imply that the actual composition of the poem must have taken place in North Palestine. It was extremely natural that, even if the author lived in Judaea, the locality of the dramatic poem should be fixed in the north, if its material was supplied by the story of Abishag of Shunem in the developed form explained above. In the first part, accordingly, we should find ourselves, of course, in the royal palace at Jerusalem, and this agrees admirably with 2nd. 17^b, where it is presupposed that the place of residence of the Shulammitte is separated from that of her beloved by a number of mountain heights. While there is nothing in the contents of the Song of Songs to justify any certain inference as to the place of composition, the present writer considers it probable that it was Judaea, perhaps even Jerusalem. This conclusion is perhaps supported also by the decision, so far as any such is possible, regarding—

The date. It has been supposed that the Song of Songs originated, if not in the Solomonic era, at least at a time not far removed from it. The life-like conception of the conditions of that time, on the one hand, and the occurrence of Tirzah, the ancient capital of the Northern Kingdom, alongside of Jerusalem (6^a), on the other hand, are supposed to necessitate the fixing of the date of composition of the Song of Songs in the early decades after the reign of Solomon. Neither of these arguments, however, proves anything, for there is nothing in them but what is readily explicable even on the view of a late date, especially if we may regard it as settled that the author derived his material from the story of Abishag. Besides, it is very questionable whether the conceptions of local, personal, and other relations are so lifelike, and in general so accurate, as to permit or justify the inference that the poet lived near to the time with which he deals. Tirzah and other places that enter on occasion into his descriptions were, of course, not outside the sphere of knowledge even of a poet belonging to a later age.—The strongest objection, however, to placing the Song of Songs so early is presented by certain linguistic phenomena that characterize it. The form of the relative pronoun (ע) and other peculiarities of expression may, indeed, be explained on the view that the Song of Songs was composed in North Palestine, the language of which was doubtless dialectically different from that of Judaea, and more akin to the neighbouring Aramaic dialects. But the Persian loan-word שׁוֹרֵר (4¹³) and the word שׁוֹרֵר (3^a), which in all probability is borrowed from the Greek φορεῖον, cannot possibly be explained at so early a period, but rather compel us to come down to the Macedonian era (cf. on this point especially Driver, LOT p. 449 f.). The poet was then in all probability a member of the Jewish community in Jerusalem, and lived at a time when, through contact with the Greek world, the adoption of Greek terms had become possible not only in the language of daily life, but also in literary usage. It is of course difficult, or rather impossible, to fix the terminus ad quem for the composition, and we do not intend to propose even a tentative date. One point, however, may be noted. The general tone of the whole poem appears to imply that the time when the Song originated was a time of peaceful, we might say happy, repose for the community, when love could unhindered follow after love and finally rejoice in the full possession of its object.—And now, perhaps, at last we may hazard a conjecture. It is true that purely dramatic poetry is in general alien to the Semitic mind, and, although we felt compelled to maintain the dramatical character of the Song of Songs against all objections, yet we found it necessary also to make our recognition of the presence in it of the lyrical element, which is the fundamental characteristic of all Semitic poetry, by calling Canticles a melodrama. The question naturally arises, Whence came the author's stimulus to compose this melodramatic poem? Was it from a wide contact with the Greek world? This appears to the present writer not impossible.

SONG OF THE THREE CHILDREN.—See THREE CHILDREN (SONG OF THE).

SONS OF GOD.—This expression is used in Scripture in two distinct senses. For one of these see articles ADOPTION, and GOD (CHILDREN OF). The other is found in six passages: Gn 6², Job 1⁶ 2¹ 38⁷ (all אֱלֹהִים) אֲנִי; LXX in first three of ἀγγελοι τοῦ θεοῦ, in last ἀγγελοι μου), Ps 29¹ 89⁷ (both אֱלֹהִים אֲנִי; LXX ιωλ θεοῦ); cf. in the sing. Dn 3²⁵ מַלְאָכָיָהּ, RV 'a son of the gods.' The meaning is 'sons of the 'elohim or 'elim' in the sense of members of that class or race (cf. 'sons of the prophets' = members of the prophetic guild) of which God Himself is the pre-eminent 'Elohim (see A. B. Davidson's note on Job 1⁹). Hence the expression is practically synonymous with 'angels' (cf. LXX above). The only passage where any difficulty has been felt (and that only for dogmatic reasons) about interpreting the phrase in this way is Gn 6². Onkelos, Beresh. rab., Saadya, Ibn Ezra, et al., take it to mean there 'sons of princes', 'mighty men'; Theod., Chrys., Jerome, Aug., Luther, Calvin, Hengstenberg, et al., understand by 'the sons of God' the pious (Sethite) portion of the human race, which is opposed to the (Cainite) 'daughters of men.' Neither of these interpretations suits either the context or the usage of the Heb. phrase. The interpretation 'angels' is correctly taken in Jude⁸ and 2 P 2⁴, in the Books of Enoch and Jubilees, as well as by Philo, Jos. (Ant. i. iii. 1), and most of the older Church Fathers. J. A. SELBIE.

SOOTHSAYER, SOOTHSAYING.—

The Heb. for 'soothsaying' is סֹפֵר, סֹפֵרָה, Gr. μαντις, μαντιον, μαντιον (the last term being also used to tr. שֹׁנֵי 'augury', Nu 23²³ וְסֹפֵר). 'Soothsayer' is סֹפֵר, which in Is 34 is rendered by εὐχολογία. The Arab. ḥasama means properly 'divide or portion out.' Hence ḥasmet is a man's apportioned lot or destiny. The word סֹפֵר is another alternative expression not easy to distinguish from סֹפֵר (see below). The term 'סֹפֵר' is always closely connected in the OT passages with כֹּהֵן, and will be dealt with under 'Necromancy' in art. SOCRERY. The other terms סֹפֵרָה (see below) and the Aram. סֹפֵרָה (Dn 2²⁷ 47 57) do not possess a clear connotation.

Soothsaying, though separate from magic, is nevertheless very closely associated with it (see MAGIC). It may be defined as involving an abnormal mode of obtaining knowledge. Just as magic is the abnormal method of obtaining control over persons or events by means of some supernatural Divine or demonic agency, so soothsaying involves the corresponding abnormal method of obtaining information. The soothsayer is to be found in every primitive religion, and ancient Semitic culture formed no exception to the rule. The comparison of early Arabic religion with that of primitive Israel conducts us irresistibly to the conclusion that the Hebrew priest in early times was also a soothsayer. For the Heb. כֹּהֵן is the Arab. kāhin, 'soothsayer,' who owned the local shrine and kept watch and ward over it, and gave replies to the inquiring pilgrim. We thus observe how the priest and the prophet in primitive Semitic antiquity started from a common base and blended their functions. The priest offered sacrifices, and likewise gave answers to satisfy the worshipper who came to seek information and guidance. Both functions, that of sacrifice and that of divination, were united in one person. Indeed, as we know in the case of the soothsayer and prophet Balaam, sacrifices accompanied the declarations which he made* (Nu 22²⁹ 23¹⁻⁴ 15. 17. 20). Accordingly, the combination of the functions of divination and sacrifice may be assumed to be characteristic of primitive Israel as it was of ancient Arabia. To the priest belonged the function of giving replies by (a) URIM AND THUMMIM, (b) by TERAPHIM, and, lastly, (c) by EPHOD.

Much obscurity invests the actual nature of all these objects. The most probable view is that the teraphim were ancestral images and of human shape (to which 1 S 19¹³⁻¹⁶ irresistibly points, cf. Gn 31¹⁹⁻²⁰), and that the ephod was a plated image used as a symbol of Jehovah. This seems clear from Jg 8²⁰, in which we are told that Gideon made it of the gold rings captured from the Ishmaelites and Midianites. Both ephod and teraphim are mentioned together in Hos 3⁴; and Ezk 21²¹ and Zec 10² clearly prove that the teraphim were employed in the act of divination. Reference to the employment of the ephod is to be found in a series of ancient OT passages which describe the consultation of Jehovah in special emergencies. A series of interrogations was put to the deity, one following in logical sequence on the other, each capable of being answered in the alternative form of 'yes' or 'no.' Of this, perhaps the most instructive example is to be found in 1 S 23⁹, in which David inquires through the priest Abiathar by means of the ephod, and a series of categorical affirmative (or in other cases negative) replies are given (cf. 1 S 30⁷⁻⁸, and Benzinger, Heb. Arch. pp. 382, 408). Obviously, information could be eked out by this process only very slowly, and in one case we read that Saul was compelled by the exigencies of war (1 S 14¹⁹) to interrupt the tardy procedure of the priest as the tumult of the advancing Philistine army increased. Sometimes the omens were unfavourable for obtaining Divine answers (ib. 14³⁷). The close connexion which certainly subsisted between the ephod which was carried by the priest (1 S 23⁶) and the divination which he practised, seems to point to the conclusion that the ephod was in some way a part at least of the apparatus of inquiry.* But it is not necessary to suppose that it was more than the symbol or idol which represented the deity whose presence gave validity to the whole procedure. The actual apparatus of soothsaying probably consisted in blunted arrows or, in primitive times, small twigs; and it is to this rude mechanism of inquiry that Hosea (4¹²) refers under מִנִּי (cf. Arab. عَضُون in Wellh. Reste 2, p. 132) and קֶלֶב, while Ezk 21²¹ mentions the arrows.

Early Arabic cultus, as Wellhausen has pointed out (l.c. p. 141), bears an unmistakable family likeness to the Hebrew, and it is to ancient Arabic usage that we turn for the most instructive illustrations of our subject. Among primitive Arab warrior tribes, as in ancient Israel, campaigns were never conducted without constant resort to the kāhin or priest-soothsayer, who usually belonged to a family which owned the sanctuary and kept guard over its treasures.

Ordinarily the answer to the inquiry consists only in 'yes' or 'no,' indicated by one arrow for affirmative and another for negative. There might also be complicated alternatives. The arrows might be marked to meet every possible range of inquiry, and the arrow drawn forth or shaken out was the answer to the question. Soothsaying was constantly resorted to before a military expedition. It is said of nearly all the clan chiefs of the Kuraish that they consulted the lots before their departure to Badr, although Abu Sufyan, for whose deliverance the expedition was made, had sent them word that they were not to begin by consulting the lots. Strictly speaking, this consultation takes place in the sanctuary before the idol (Wellhausen).

Among the Arabs, money was paid for divination, and sacrifices (as of a camel) preceded or accompanied the divining ceremony. In these respects we find close parallels in the Balaam narrative, to which allusion has already been made. Accordingly, in this episode we do not fail to note that the deputations were provided with money payment for the soothsaying (called סֹפֵרָה Nu 22⁷), a feature in the story which reminds us of 2 K 5⁵.

As the ancient Hebrews in early times called the soothsayer נִיחֵם or 'seer,' so the primitive Arabs called him a 'gazer.' When 'gazing' he would veil his face. Hence the epithet, dhūl chimar, or 'the (man) with the veil,' applied to several seers.† We naturally revert to the veil of the prophet Moses (Ex 34²⁵). Under the influence of the supernatural spirit or demon a series of short sentences would be uttered, of which four to six would be united together in a strophe by rhyme. This is called in Arabic Saj'^{un}, comp. the Heb. שִׁיר applied to a prophet (2 K 9¹¹). This wild ecstatic condition often characterized the primitive Hebrew prophet in pre-exilic times (1 S 10¹⁰), and this became contagious, and affected those who witnessed it (1 S 19²⁰⁻²², cf. 18¹⁰). What the OT ascribed to possession by the spirit of God (Jehovah) the Arab in primitive times ascribed to the spirit

* In petitioning the deity a sacrifice was naturally offered. Through the sacrifice, which was rendered acceptable to the deity by the mediation of the priest, the desired answer to a question was obtained' (Morris Jastrow, Religion of Babylonia and Assyria, p. 331).

* So Moore, art. 'Ephod' in Encyc. Biblica.

† The root of the word for 'seer' in Arabic corresponds to the Heb. נִיחֵם.

or demon that dwelt in him. Among the Moslems a demon was called a shaitān (see under SATAN).

The connexion between the jinn in early Arabia (and in later times the shaitān) and serpents throws light upon the serpent of Gn 3 as well as the $\eta\eta$ of Is 6². The jinn were considered to reside in serpents, and the name shaitān is applied to a serpent.* The jinn were not necessarily evil. Some might be well disposed to truth (Koran, 46²⁸), like the great male serpent which met Moḥammed on the way to Tabuk (cf. Baudissin, Studien zur semit. Religionsgesch. i. p. 279 ff.).

These illustrations from ancient Arabic belief enable us to understand the use of the Heb. $\eta\eta$ for 'divine' (from $\eta\eta$ 'serpent') and $\eta\eta$ for 'divination' (2 K 17¹⁷ 21⁶, Dt 18¹⁰, Lv 19³, Gn 30³⁷ 44¹⁶). This association of the art of divination with the serpent arose from a variety of causes. This reptile springs mysteriously from holes in the earth with the hissing or whispering sound characteristic of incantations (see MAGIC, vol. iii. p. 210^b and footnote), and with a fascinating power of the eye which made it inevitable that a serpent should be regarded as the embodiment of a demon. Hence cunning and wisdom were ascribed to serpents (Gn 3¹, Mt 10¹⁶). Thus it was natural that the denom. Piel $\eta\eta$ came to be employed of the soothsayer, who was considered to be demon-possessed (like the sorcerer or necromancer, $\eta\eta$ and $\eta\eta$).

Both in Arabia and in ancient Assyria the desire to know the course of future events in their bearing upon the interests of the inquirer, more especially with respect to the success or non-success of some enterprise, impelled him to find clues of information in the movements of nature, more especially of animals, since these were held to be possessed by demons. The Arabs believed that the animal is na'mūr, i.e. is subject to some higher behest, and has open eyes to see (like Balaam's ass) when human eyes are without vision. The wolf, the dog, the hare, and the fox were omen-giving animals. Coming from the right hand, one of these animals would be hailed as portending good; from the left, bad (Wellh. p. 201 f.). Birds were especially considered to convey omens, viz. the raven, goose, starling, and hoopoe. The raven was the bird which heralded misfortune, especially the separation of friends from loved ones.

The cuneiform records exhibit the wide prevalence of a great mass of similar beliefs and practices in Babylonia, but with this difference, that the omen-tablets mark the distinctions in special cases with a wearisome excess of detail which we do not find in the simpler civilization of the Western Semitic lands, Palestine and Arabia. The omens may be divided into different classes: (1) those concerned with days and heavenly bodies; (2) those concerned with the features of human childbirth and also with those of birth-giving by animals; (3) omens concerned with movements of animals.—These will be found fully treated in Morris Jastrow's instructive work, Religion of Babylonia and Assyria, chs. xix. and xx. The following is a good example of (1)—

'Sun and moon are seen apart (i.e. at different times);
The king of the country will manifest wisdom.
On the fourteenth day sun and moon are seen together;
There will be loyalty in the land,
The gods of Babylonia are favourably inclined,
The soldiery will be in accord with the king's desire,
The cattle of Babylonia will pasture in safety.

On the fifteenth day the sun and moon are seen together;
A powerful enemy raises his weapons against the land,
The enemy will shatter the great gate of the city.'

Omens were likewise derived from the particular day of the month on which an eclipse takes place; from the appearances or disappearances of the planet Venus (Ishtar). In Rawl. iv. pl. 32, 33 we have a calendar of the intercalated month Elul. The deity is mentioned to which each day is sacred, and certain sacrifices are prescribed and precautions indicated. The 7th, 14th, 21st, and 28th days are called evil (limnu); see art. SABBATH, p. 319^a; and cf. Schrader, COT i. p. 19f., and Jensen in ZA iv. (1889) p. 274 ff.

* Iblis (= diabolos) is not so frequently employed in the sing. as the plur. form of shaitān, which takes the place of jinn (plur.) (Wellh. l.c. p. 157 footnote).

(2) Varied forms of abnormal birth are specified, and the events which they portend—

'If a woman gives birth to a child with the right ear missing, the days of the ruler will be long. If a woman gives birth to a child with the left ear missing, distress will enter the land and weaken it.'

The abnormal features in the birth of young lambs were carefully noted and interpreted—

'If the young one has no right ear, the rule of the king will come to an end, his palace will be uprooted, and the population of the country will be swept away. The king will lose judgment, the produce of the country will be slight, the enemy will cut off the supply of water. If the left ear of the young one is missing, the deity will hear the prayer of the king, the king will capture his enemy's land, the palace of the enemy will be destroyed.'

(3) The number and variety of cases here as in (1) and (2) are endless.

'If a dog enters the palace and crouches on the throne, that palace will suffer a disastrous fate. If a dog enters a palace and crouches on the couch, no one will enjoy that palace in peace.'

The colour of a dog that enters a palace or of the locusts that enter a house, will affect the precise form of good which is portended by the occurrence.

The gods were constantly approached with questions involving the future interests of the State or affecting the fate of a military campaign. Knudtzon in his Assyr. Gebete an den Sonnengott für Staat und königliches Haus, has devoted a careful examination to these questions addressed to Sams, the Sun-god, which are shown to follow a fixed pattern. First we have a series of questions which the god is petitioned to answer. The god is then implored not to be angry, and to protect the suppliant against errors unwittingly committed in the sacrificial rites—

'O Shamash, great lord, as I ask thee, do thou in true mercy answer me.

From this day the 3rd day of this month of Iyyar to the 11th day of the month Ab of this year, a period of one hundred days and one hundred nights, is the prescribed term for the priestly activity.'

'Will within this period Kashtariti, together with his soldiery, will the army of the Gimirri, the army of the Medes, will the army of the Manneans, or will any enemy whatsoever succeed in carrying out their plan, whether by stratagem (?) or main force, whether by the force of weapons of war and battle or by the axe, whether by a breach made with war-machinery or battering-rams or by hunger, whether by the powers residing in the name of a god or goddess . . . will these aforementioned, as many as are required to take a city, actually capture the city Kishassu, penetrate into the interior of that same city Kishassu. . . . Thy great divine power knows it. . . . Will it actually come to pass?'

We observe that all possible contingencies are specified as in a lawyer's deed, and no loophole is left by which the deity may escape the obligation of a definite answer. (See Jastrow, p. 334 ff.)

How far Israel, and more particularly Judah, at the close of the 8th cent. became influenced by Bab. or Assyr. practices, it would be very difficult to say. That the older and more highly developed civilization of the Euphrates and Tigris should have affected the Palestinian tribes at this time is surely more than possible. In the 15th and earlier centuries B.C. that influence was powerfully felt throughout the Western border (māt amurri), as the Tel el-Amarna tablets clearly testify, and it spread into Egypt itself. Moreover, we may infer from certain indications that some influences from Bab. and Assyr. divination not improbably found their way into the Southern kingdom. (1) We know that Ahaz was particularly susceptible to foreign religious influence, and did not hesitate to borrow from foreign courts (2 K 16¹⁰⁻¹⁸ 20¹¹). (2) The embassy of Merodach-baladan shows that the relations between Judah and Babylonia were intimate (2 K 20¹²). (3) The proneness of Ahaz to alliance with Assyria at an earlier period may have opened the way for the entrance of Assyro-Babylonian traditions. (4) If we combine these facts with Is 2⁹, where reference is made to the superstitious tendencies which prevailed in Israel, and where these are ascribed to the 'East,' we may find the true clue to the meaning of this term 'East.' The true reading here has been conjecturally restored by critics with some probability in the form כִּי סִלְמֵי קִסְרֵי (קִסְרֵי) 'for they are full of soothsayers from the East,' which harmonizes with the parallel clause that follows. Teman (Edom) also had its soothsayers (Jer 49⁷, Ob⁹). Was the source Arabia?

Egypt presented parallel phenomena. Divination and the practice of occult sciences prevailed in the plains of the Nile as much as in those of the Euphrates. In Egypt the division of time among the higher divine powers was carried to such an extent that even every hour of day and night was allotted to some goddess (though not to the superior deities). The character of the divinity determined the destiny of the period over which that divinity presided. By turning up the calendar of the days of the month it was thought possible to gain a glimpse into futurity, and decide whether a particular day was favourable or unfavourable; what should be done and what omitted; and what prospects awaited the child who was born upon it. We have an example of such a calendar in the papyrus Sallier iv. belonging to the 19th dyn., in which there are instructions covering several months of the year. We select the following in reference to one month—

'4th Paophi : unfavourable, favourable, favourable (i.e. of variable significance). By no means leave your house on this day. He who is born on this day, dies upon it through a contagious disease.

'5th — : unfavourable, unfavourable, unfavourable. By no means leave your house on this day. Do not approach any woman. On this day we should offer gifts to the god. The majesty of the god Month was satisfied on this day. He who is born on this day will die of love.

'9th — : favourable, favourable, favourable. The gods are in gladness, men in exultation. The foe of Râ has fallen. He who is born on this day dies of the weakness of old age.

'22nd — : unfavourable, unfavourable, unfavourable. Do not bathe in any water on this day. He who embarks on a vessel on the river on this day will be rent in pieces by the tongue of the crocodile.*

To what particular mode of divination allusion is made in Gn 44⁵, where the silver bowl with which Joseph practised the art is referred to, cannot be determined from ancient Egyptian sources. It has been supposed that some form of κυλικομαντεία or ὀδρομαντεία was in the writer's mind. The goblet was filled with water and the sun's rays were admitted, and, as the goblet was moved, the circles of light that were formed were closely observed (Iamblichus, de mysteriis, iii. 14), or the cup was marked with letters and a divining-ring touched them here or there, and conclusions were deduced therefrom (Amm. Marcellinus, 29); cf. Dillm. ad loc. These are, however, conjectures only.

The word employed in the passages dealing with the story of Israel in Egypt for 'soothsayer' or 'magician' (for the word expressed both) was חֹרֵם, plur. חֹרְמִים, Gn 41^{8, 24} (E), Ex 7¹¹ 8^{7, 18} etc. 9¹¹ (P), Dn 1²⁰ 2², variously rendered in LXX ἐπαυδοί, φάρμακοί ἐξηγηταί [in Dn 1²⁰ σοφισταί, Theodotion ἐπαυδοί]. The Heb. word is probably derived from חָרַף, stylus for graving words, since the arts of the magician or soothsayer were based, in the more elaborate systems of Babylonia and Egypt, upon carefully written rituals.

Dreams.—In ancient Arabic belief sleep was considered in a mysterious sense to be sacred, and subject to the control of demons.* 'All Arabs reverence a man sleeping; he is, as it were, in trance with God: in their households they piously withdraw, nor will they lightly molest him.† It is not surprising, therefore, that the significance attached to dreams is a universal feature of antiquity. The ancient Egyptians believed in the significance of the dream as the state of mind through which deities entered into personal relationship with men and gave them guidance. Thus Râ Harmachis appeared to king Thothmes IV., when he rested in the chase near the Great Sphinx, and commanded him to have the statue dug out of the sand. A sure means of obtaining a prophetic dream was to betake oneself to one of the temples that were sacred to divinities who vouchsafed oracles, and there sleep. The temple of Serapis was one of the most celebrated of these shrines, like the temple of Æsculapius at Epidaurus, where dreams were bestowed in which remedies were communicated against disease. Sometimes as a last resort magic was appealed to in order to extort the dream from the reluctant deity. Wiedemann (Religion der alten Aegypter, p. 144) cites one of the magical texts from a Gnostic papyrus of comparatively late date preserved in the Leyden Museum, entitled 'Agathocles' Recipe for sending a Dream,' which runs thus—

'Take a slaughtered cat, quite black, prepare a tablet, and write the following with a solution of myrrh and the dream which you wish to send, and put it into the cat's mouth: Keimi, Keimi, I am the great one who rests in the mouth Mommon, Thoth, Nanumbe, Kariobe, Kenyro, Paarmathon, the holy lau leé ieu aëoi who is above the heaven [other names follow] put thyself in connexion with N.N. about this [i.e. the said dream]. If necessary, secure for me N.N. through thy power. Lord of the whole world, fiery god, put thyself in connexion with N.N. Tharthar, thanara thahha mommon thanabotha [other names follow]. Hear me, for I will pronounce the great name Thoth, whom every god reverences and every demon fears. My name corresponds to the seven (vowels) a e é i o y ô iauééao ouéé ôia. I named thy glorious name, the name for all needs. Put thyself in connexion with N.N. . . .

Here we find soothsaying passing over into magic, to which it stands, as we have already explained, so closely related. The apparently meaningless combination of syllables which the magician employs contains the names of deities. Compare the name Sabaith, borrowed from the Jewish Holy Scriptures, to which a mysterious potency was ascribed. These must be reproduced in their exact original form. No translation was tolerated: not only did it render the charm inoperative, but brought down evils upon the magician (cf. art. MAGIC, ad fin.).

The Assyrians, like the Egyptians, attached great importance to dreams. Of this we have two interesting examples in the Rassam-cylinder of Ašurbanipal. In col. ii. 95 we are told that to Gyges, king of Lydia, Ašur revealed Ašurbanipal's name in a dream, saying: 'Embrace the feet of Ašurbanipal, king of Assyria, and thou shalt conquer thy enemies by his name.' On the same day on which he had seen this dream, Gyges despatched his horsemen to greet Ašurbanipal and narrate it to him. The inscription goes on to state that from that day forth he conquered the Kimmerians, who had attacked the people of his land (lines 95-105).—The other passage occurs in col. v. 95 ff. Ašurbanipal's troops feared to cross the Iddî, but Istar of Arbela appeared to them in a dream, and said: 'I go before Ašurbanipal, the king whom my hands have made.' Confiding in this dream, his troops crossed the Iddî safely.

† Doughty, Arabia Deserta, vol. I. p. 249 ff.

* Wiedemann, Die Religion der alten Aegypter, p. 141.

It should be noted that one special branch of the art of the priest-soothsayer in Babylonia consisted in the interpretation of the manifold appearances in dreams. A considerable portion of the omen-documents in cuneiform consists of the rules laid down as to what the different features in a dream may portend.

If a lion appears to a man, it means that a man will carry out his purpose. If a jackal, that he will secure favour in the eyes of the gods. A dog portends sorrow; a mountain goat, that the man's son will die of some disease; a stag, that his daughter will die, etc. (Bezold's Catalogue, pp. 1437, 1438, cited by Jastrow).

To this special function of the Babylonian temple officials we have reference in Dn 2^d, where they are summoned by Nebuchadnezzar to discharge the perplexing task of not only interpreting but also of first recalling a dream which the monarch had forgotten (cf. Gn 41st). חֹזֵן is the proper word in Heb. for interpreter of dreams.

Divine revelation through dreams constantly meets us in the OT (Gn 20th, 31st, 37th, 40th, 41st, 42nd, 1 K 3^d, 13, Dn 2^d, 7th, Nu 12th, Job 33rd, Jg 7th, and in NT Mt 1st, 2nd, Ac 23rd, 27th). Dreams were a legitimate mode of Divine manifestation, though we find warnings against the dreams of false prophets, as against magic and soothsaying (Jer 23rd, 32nd, 28th, Zec 10th, Sir 34th, 2, 5, 7). It is worthy of note that among the Hebrews, as among the Egyptians, importance was attached to the dreams which came to a man who slept in a sanctuary or sacred spot. The dream of Jacob might be included among such visions (Gn 28th), since the scene was at Bethel, the renowned sanctuary. The dream recorded in 1 K 3^d was vouchsafed to Solomon at the high place of Gibeon, where he had offered sacrifices.

Just as among the Arabs the art of soothsaying began to decline after the advent of Mohammed and the monotheism which he taught,* so among the ancient Hebrews the prophetic teaching from the 8th cent. onwards constantly declaimed against the arts of the soothsayer, and the burden of this prophetic Tōrah became embodied in legislation (Dt 18th, cf. Lv 20th, 27). In Is 2^d we find mention of חֹזֵן among the other modes of foreign Eastern superstition with which Judah by the time of Isaiah had become familiar. But in this special case the original source probably lay at Israel's doors, and the tradition was borrowed from the Canaanites. Of this we have clear evidence in Dt 18th, and in the 'terebinth (oak) of diviners' (טְרֵבִינִי MEONENIM) mentioned as a well-known sacred spot with a sacred tree (Jg 9th). There is a similar 'soothsayer's tree'† (see MOREH) mentioned in Gn 12th (אֵלֶּךָ טֵרֵם). To this we may find a parallel in the oaks of Dodona, sacred to Zeus, whose rustling branches were supposed to utter oracles (Odys. xiv. 328); cf. 2 S 5th. In Dt 18th the חֹזֵן stands in close conjunction with the 'diviner of divinations' (חֹזֵן חֲזָיוֹן) and the חֹזֵן. The Greek equivalent of חֹזֵן is καληδονισμενος, meaning one who judges from omens (καληδων); cf. Is 2^d. The etymology of the Hebrew Poel form חֹזֵן is not easy to determine. To connect it with חֹזֵן 'cloud' has no foundation in the known practices of the ancient Israelites. More probable is the etymology which connects it with the root which is in Arabic حَنَن

* For demonology and soothsaying were closely interwoven (as in the case of magic). Now, according to Mohammedan ideas, the devils after Mohammed's advent were prevented from mingling with the sons of God and learning the secrets of heaven (cf. SATAN and ref. to Book of Enoch). When so detected, the angels pelt them with meteorites and drive them away: see Sur. 3rd ad An., 37th; and cf. Wellhausen, Reste 2, p. 138.

† It is by no means certain that the Heb. חֹזֵן may not be used generally for 'tree,' like Syr. ܐܝܬܐ.

'to snuffle' (cf. the use of the Heb. חֹזֵן Is 8th 29th); scarcely probable is the suggestion of Wellhausen to regard this Poel form as a denominative from the subst. חֹזֵן 'eye.' Cf. Nowack, Heb. Arch. ii. 274 footnote. The form of soothsaying which the word חֹזֵן represents may have been akin to that which was practised by the Roman augurs or haruspices. In fact it is difficult to say how far the חֹזֵן differed from the חֹזֵן or primitive Hebrew 'seer,' or from the חֹזֵן. As to the first, we do not know what was his mode of procedure, whether it consisted in the examination of the entrails or general appearance of the victim in the sacrifices, as was done by the Assyrian priests (Jastrow, l.c. p. 337) and the Roman haruspices or extispices. Or it may have taken the form of observing closely the movements of animals, as was done by the Philistine diviners (חֹזֵן) in the case of the two cows yoked to the cart on which the ark of God was placed (1 S 6th); or it may have consisted in observing the sounds produced by wind (as the sound among the tops of the balsam trees in 2 S 5th) or the special action of rain or dew upon objects (cf. Jg 6th).

The 8th cent., as well as the 7th, witnessed the wide prevalence of these arts as well as that of necromancy (Is 8th). Probably the Assyrian invasions and the disasters which they entailed drove the panic-stricken people to resort to abnormal practices of magic and soothsaying.* From Is 3^d we learn that the soothsayer held an important place in national life, and was regarded as one of the props of the social fabric. He takes his place by the side of the judge, prophet, and elder. The attitude of prophecy towards soothsaying was uniformly uncompromising and hostile (Mic 5th, cf. Jer 27th and Is 57th, this last passage being descriptive of the degenerate practices that still went on in Palestine after the return from the Exile). In Ezk 21st we have a vivid description of the king of Babylon standing at the crossways, shaking the arrows (שֶׁלֹחַ אֵרֶבֶלָה). We may assume that there were two arrows in the quiver, one bearing the name Jerusalem and the other Rabbah, and the result was determined by the particular arrow that was drawn out by the right hand or shaken out. He also inquires of the teraphim and looks into the liver. The reference to the teraphim is a Palestinian trait (the LXX λατρίαι suggests חֹזֵן rather than חֹזֵן). When we compare this with Is 47th with its closing references to the soothsaying, we can clearly see that the latter writer had become yet more familiar with the practices in divination carried on in Babylonia, and portrays them with remarkable vividness:—'Thou art wearied with thy counsels; yes, let them stand by and save you, they who divide the heavens, who gaze at the stars, announcing month by month whence they (i.e. the events) are to come upon you.' The account given in the earlier portion of this article of the omen-tablets of Babylonia and the calendars of the days of the month, with its lucky and unlucky days, clearly illustrates the accurate delineation given us in Deutero-Isaiah. The phrase 'dividers of the heavens' (חֹזֵן הַשָּׁמַיִם Khōrē) contains a reference to the custom of the Babylonian astrologers of dividing the heavens into districts to take a horoscope (cf. Jastrow, Religion of Babylonia, p. 369 ff.). See also art. DIVINATION.

LITERATURE.—This has been indicated in the course of the article. The reader should consult art. 'Wahrsageri' in Richm's HWB 2; Nowack's and Benzinger's Heb. Arch.; art. 'Divination' in *Encyc. SOP.—A sop (Anglo-Sax. [soppa], from supan, to sup) is a morsel of food soaked in liquid. Cf. Chaucer, Marchantes Tale, 599—

'And then he taketh a sop in fyn clarrée.'

The word was used by Tindale to translate ψωλον (from ψωμ-ίζω, to feed) in Jn 13²⁶ vs. 27, 30, the only occurrences of the Gr. word. (Wyclif had already used it in 13²⁶, 27, giving 'bread' and 'morsel' in the other places. The Vulg. has buccella in 13²⁷, 30, but simply panis in 30 vs. 31, and the Rheims follows with 'bread' in 30 vs. 31, and 'morsel' in 27, 30). The mod. meaning, 'something given to keep quiet,' is also found in early writers, as Howard, Committee, iv. 1, 'Why, you unconscionable Rascal, are you angry that I am unlucky, or do you want some fees? I'll perish in a Dungeon before I'll consume with throwing Sops to such Cura.'

SOPATER (Σώπατρος, Sopater).—A man of Berea who in St. Paul's third missionary journey accompanied him from Philippi (Ac 20⁴). He is called in the older MSS son of Pyrrhus. He was commemorated June 25 and July 12. See also SOSIPATER.

SOPE.—See the modern spelling SOAP.

SOPHERETH (סֹפֶרֶת; BA Σαφάραθ, & Σαφαραθ, Luc. 'Ασφάρεθ).—A family of Nethinim that returned with Zerubbabel, Neh 7²⁷. In the parallel passage, Ezr 2⁵⁵, the name appears as HASSOPHERETH (חֲסֹפֶרֶת; B 'Ασφάραθ, A 'Ασφάραθ, Luc. 'Ασφάρεθ), and in 1 Es 5³⁵ as ASSAPHION.

SOPHONIAS.—The form in which the name of the prophet ZEPHANIAH occurs in 2 Es 1⁴⁰.

SORCERY.—The subject of sorcery has already been treated in most of its aspects under MAGIC. There remain, however, certain features in this extensive department which are reserved for treatment in the present article.

The wide prevalence of sorcery in pre-exilian Israelite life is only partially revealed in the OT. That the underlying motive of the Brazen Serpent in Nu 21⁴⁻⁹ was the same as that of the winged colossal and human-headed bulls or genii (lamassu or lamassu, cf. the cherubim in Gn 3²⁴, and Schrader, COT, ad loc.) which were set up at the doors of the Assyrian palaces to prevent the access of demons, of disease, or other calamity, seems to be fairly probable. In this connexion we must bear in mind the undoubted fact that the serpent was associated not only with demons to whom a destructive power belonged (cf. Gn 3 and Is 14²⁹ 27¹ and Am 9³),* but also with those endowed with beneficent powers. Mohammed held that serpents might be inhabited by good as well as by evil jinn, and among the ancient Greeks the serpent was held to be sacred to the healing god Æsculapius. Also, as Robertson Smith reminds us, the South Arabs regard medicinal waters as inhabited by jinn, usually of serpent form (*RS*² p. 163, cf. 172). On this subject interesting facts have been collected by Baudissin, in his Essay on the Symbolism of the Serpent, in Studien zur sem. Religionsgesch. i. p. 257 ff. The brazen image of the serpent (נִשְׁכָּן), worshipped in the reign of Hezekiah, and the occurrence of the name Nahash among Canaanite peoples, point to the prevalence of the serpent-cult. See NEHUSHTAN.

Again, the law, to which the modern Jew pays so much deference, contained in Dt 6⁸, involves an ancient belief in the magic potency of written words and names, of which Lane (Modern Egyptians, 1871, i. pp. 7 ff., 319 ff.) gives valuable illustrations. The Shema, as well as the following precept, 'And thou shalt love Jehovah thy God with all thy soul . . .', were to be bound as a sign upon the hand, and for frontlets between the eyes. They were also to be written upon the doorposts of the house and on the gates. The Jews in the present day use the name mēzūzah, which in the original Deuteronomic sense meant 'doorpost,' for the small metal case which contained a piece of folded parchment, upon which the words aforesaid were written, viz. Dt 6⁴⁻⁹ as well as Dt 11¹³⁻²¹, in twenty-two lines. This would be placed at the right of the entrance, on the upper part of the doorpost. Like an amulet inscribed with words or names of mysterious potency, this piece of parchment was held to possess a magic and protective efficacy. See Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, i. p. 76. The tēphillin or phylacteries, on the left arm and forehead, are of like character (see art. PHYLACTERIES).

Again we have an instructive example of the all-prevailing faith in magic in the case of the afflicted woman who came to Jesus in the midst of the crowd, believing that His garments were possessed of mysterious healing virtue (Lk 8⁴⁴, see Plummer, ad loc.). The same idea underlies the narrative of Ac 19¹², where we read that handkerchiefs and aprons were conveyed from St. Paul's person to the diseased, who were thereby cured, and the demons expelled. A man's clothing was supposed to convey with it some charm or efficacy from the owner. Mohammed was besought to give his shirt that a dead man might be buried in it. The character of the wearer and his clothing were identified in some mysterious way. Probably in this way we are to interpret the reference to the mantle of Elijah (2 K 2¹²⁻¹⁵, cf. 8), and such expressions as 'robe of righteousness,' 'garments of salvation' (Is 61¹⁰), 'of vengeance' (59¹⁷), etc. See Wellhausen, *Reste*², p. 196.

In Arabia sorcery was even employed in digging for treasure. Doughty relates a story that a Moor, who was regarded as specially proficient in magical arts, 'sacrificed to the jān in the night a black cock, and read his spells, and a great black fowl alighted beside him. . . The earth rumbled, and rose as it were in billows, gaping and shutting, and in that earthy womb appeared an infinite treasure' (Arabia Deserta, ii. p. 103). But we hear even more frequently of counter-spells, whereby the demons were coerced or terrified into impotence. And this specially applies to the various diseases which the jān were supposed to inflict. The remedies are in almost every case magical in character, and were carried out by the physician called ṭabīb or wise man, who was, in fact, a magician. The methods of the magic-healing art were the same as those of the sorcerer who worked the evil. There was stroking and rubbing of the part affected; most frequently we have the tying of knots, spitting, and breathing.

'A young mother, yet a slender girl, brought her wretched babe, and bade me spit upon the child's sore eyes. This ancient Semitic opinion and custom I have afterwards found wherever I came to Arabia [cf. Jn 9⁶]. Meteyr nomads in El Kasim have brought me bread and salt that I should spit in it for their sick friends.—Also the Arabians will spit upon a lock which cannot easily be opened' (Doughty, Arab. Des. i. p. 627). 'Another time I saw Salih busy to cure a mangy thelāl (riding-camel). He sat with a bowl of water before him, and, mumbling there-over, he spat in it and mumbled solemnly, and spat many times, and, after a half hour of this work, the water was taken to the sick beast to drink' (ib. ii. p. 164).

This strange custom may be combined with the prevalent notion that the more repulsive and disgusting the remedies, the more efficacious they were.

They will take of the unclean and even abominable, and say, dawit, "it is medicine." These Bedouin give the sick to eat of the rakham or small white carrion eagle. Upon a day I found a poor woman of our menzil seething asses' dung in the pot. She would give the water to drink with milk to her sick brother' (Doughty, i. p. 255).

Magic devises strange remedies. The person of the king has a supernatural character (Frazer, *Golden Bough*², i. p. 8 ff.), and it is owing to this belief that we constantly find the royal personality or his family invested with a priestly function. Thus in Arabia it was believed that hydrophobia was to be cured by royal blood, i.e. not merely the blood of the reigning monarch, but also that of the royal family. Even sorrow for the dead had its magic remedy. Dust from the grave of the deceased beloved one was to be drunk, mingled with water; and the same remedy was employed as an antidote to love-sickness, for a man who was in love was held to be possessed or bewitched. By the spells of a sorcerer, too, lovers may be parted.

It may here be remarked that the introduction of Islam did even less to destroy belief in magic than the growth of Jewish monotheism. We can only say in both cases (that of the Arab and of the Jew) that the belief in spirits entered, as Wellhausen says of the Arab (ib. p. 157), 'upon another stage.' 'The old gods are deposed and degraded into the position of demons. The latter thereby change their character and become hellish creatures, bitterly hostile to Allah and his heavenly surrounding.' They became Satans (Shaitāns), with Iblis at their head, opposed to prayer and the cry of the muezzin, loving uncleanness and dirt, and therefore debarred by washings and the burning of incense.

Consequently sorcery was just as prevalent after Islam as before it. Mohammed placed the interior bark of the Samara tree on the arm of Dhul Bigadain to render him invulnerable. Gum resin from t^l is tree was constantly carried as an amulet. The ankle-bones of a hare are effective to ward off the jinn of the camp, the ghoul of the desert, and Satan himself. They are also effective in quelling fever. Similar efficacy belonged to the teeth of a cat or a fox. The magic of the knot-tying was encountered by the protective spell of the amulet. One species of amulet was called tangis (defiling), and contained dirt, bones of the dead, and other repulsive objects. Many amulets, however, consisted of ornaments, often precious stones, deemed on this account sacred. Their object seems to be to divert the attention of the demons from the wearer. Thus a mark on the face of a woman, or even tattooing, served this purpose; also the fragrant berries carried by children, the silver and gold plates worn by horses, and the bells carried by camels (cf. Zec 14⁹), which diverted or scared away the demons by their sound. Cf. Wellhausen, *Reste*², p. 164 ff.

Ancient Jewish magic, to which Blau has devoted a special treatise, presents many features which are analogous to those of early Arabia just described. Indeed it is by no means an easy problem to determine how much of the latter came from Jewish, Babylonian, and Aramaic sources, and how far the Jewish in turn became affected in very early times by Arabia.* There can be little doubt that the main source of Jewish tradition in magic and demonology, in and after the Exile, was Babylonia, and that Babylonia also influenced Arabia.

has referred (in the passages cited), was also an element in Jewish superstition. But what is most significant in Jewish sorcery is the belief in the magic power of words and names which was held almost universally, in the time of Christ, by the Jews in common with other contemporary nations. Passages from Scripture were considered to be especially effectual. These were constantly employed in bringing about cures. Thus the words in Lv 13¹ מִן הַמָּוֶת and also Lv 1¹ were considered efficacious, though forbidden by Rab and Rabbi Chanina (Sanhedrin 101a). Ex 15⁸ was employed in healing wounds; but when, in addition to this, spitting was resorted to, this was regarded as a forbidden form of magic, and whosoever attempts it has no part or lot in the future life (Mishna Sanhed. xi. 1; Tosefta xii. 10). Of course special force belonged to the words, 'For I, Jehovah, am thy healer.' Unclean water has a magical influence, which can be increased or arrested by some incantation. Magic influence of a deterrent character was also attributed to iron. Iron has the power to ward off evil spirits and to break spells. Spirits stand in fear of iron (cf. Blau, p. 159; and Berakhûth 6a, cf. Tosefta vi. 13). The iron is cast between the graves, and the word huda is pronounced; for the graveyard has always been the place where sorcery is practised, since the spirits of the departed dwell there. Thither Canidia and Sagana, the sorceresses of Horace's muse, repair in the moonlight (Sat. i. viii.); and Wellhausen (*Reste*², p. 157) considers that close relations subsisted between jinn and spirits of dead men, the spirits of the departed becoming jinn.

The Talmud gives special recipes for turning a bad dream into one of good omen. One of these consists in repeating 9 verses (3×3) of the Bible. If a man sees a river in a dream, let him recite Is 66¹² (in which peace is compared to a flowing stream) before he thinks of Is 59⁹ 'When the enemy comes like a river.' It is dangerous to drink water on Wednesday or Friday night. If, however, one is compelled to drink it, it is recommended that Ps 29³⁻¹⁰ should be recited, where the voice of Jehovah is mentioned seven times and also the waters, and it is said that Jehovah is enthroned above the flood.

Incantations were constantly employed in the art of healing. Most of these spells are derived from the teachers of the Talmud, who also practised the medical art. As the remedy was applied, the incantation was whispered in the ear of the patient. The head of the operating physician was anointed with oil, and, if any unbidden or uninitiated person heard the spell, its magical power was lost. Two examples of these magical remedies may be found in art. MAGIC, vol. iii. p. 211, and further illustrations will be found in Blau's monograph, pp. 72-77, 156 ff., and Brecher's Das Transcendentale, Magie u. magische Heilarten im Talmud, p. 198 ff.

Sorcery, in the narrower sense of magic employed with malignant or evil intent, would seek to accomplish such ends as causing one's neighbour's house to catch fire, bringing a hailstorm on his field, depriving his cows of milk, making his child die of illness, causing domestic brawls, or visiting himself with sudden death. In fact the ancients were accustomed to attribute all such disasters to a malignant demon, sorcerer, or witch; and the possession of any unusual physical or mental quality, especially an uncanny look about the eyes, would expose the male or female possessor of these characteristics to the unenviable reputation of being a sorcerer or sorceress. Especially old women of unusual ugliness were credited with dealings with the dark supernatural world. Even men distinguished by brilliant acquirements

* According to the Talmud (Sanhedrin 67b, 91a) the Arabs were regarded as endowed with magical powers. In the first passage it is related that an Arab sorcerer cut his camel in pieces and then restored it to life. In the latter passage it is stated that Abraham communicated to the sons of his concubines the unclean name, i.e. the names of deities potent in magic; cf. Blau, p. 48, and footnote 2.

or clever play would be liable to the suspicion of sorcery.

The chief motives to sorcery were love and hatred, and the result was frequently death or unfaithfulness to the marriage vow. Magic was employed to win forbidden love. The chief means to compass this end was mandragora, which was universally regarded as an erotic plant (hence the Heb. name קדקדא Gn 30¹⁴). It was customary to recite verses from the Bible over this—a practice which the Talmud forbids (Shabbath 86, 19). Tying of knots was sometimes resorted to in order to prevent childbirth. Cf. Koran 113 (blowing on knots).

Simon ben Jochai had the reputation of being a magician, and tradition relates that when he withdrew from his cave, after residing there for thirteen years, he transformed every one upon whom he gazed into a heap of bones; and it is reported that he destroyed a heretic in this way (Pesikta 90b, 137a).

Amulets were employed as prophylactics, i.e. as a means of counterworking the ill influences of witchcraft and demons. The עֲטָרֹת, to which Is 3³⁶ alludes as one among the articles of feminine attire, may be considered to be this simply and solely. These were not forbidden, though they partook of a magical character. It is only in cases where the amulets were heathen in origin that they were strictly forbidden. Thus in 2 Mac 12³⁰ the amulets discovered on the slain came from the idol temple at Jannia, and were on this account objectionable. The name by which the amulet was called in later Jewish literature is kēmā'a (קֶמְעָא). The kēmā'a is mentioned with the tēphillin or phylacteries. Both were covered with leather. Similarly, the amulets of the Greeks and Romans were contained in capsules (bulbæ). The Jewish amulet consisted either of some inscribed object or of certain roots of plants, or, in some cases, of grains of corn bound up in leather.* It may here be remarked, in passing, that every vegetable was supposed to have a subtle connexion with a planet in heaven (see Blau, p. 160f.). Anything offered with incense to the gods, or shavings from the Asherah tree, were considered to have a special healing virtue. Metal plates consisting of an upper and lower plate were constantly employed as amulets. A pearl wrapped up in leather was regarded as a healing remedy for cattle.

In all spells, charms, incantations, amulets, and other prophylactics, stress is always laid on the mysterious potency and significance of the name. Nomen involves omen. Name to the ancient Semite involves reality and personal power. And the superstitious dread of the ancient Greek who cried εὐφημείτε at solemn crises or functions, and of the Roman who under like circumstances said favete linguis, was founded on this same belief in the underlying dread potency of words or names to summon forth catastrophes. To this tendency the etymologizing efforts and plays on words in the OT are probably due, viz. to the endeavour to discover in the name a clue to the underlying power that shapes individual destiny. 'As his name, so is he,' says Abigail of her wrong-headed husband Nabal. 'Fool is his name, and folly is with him' (1 S 25²⁸). The combination of the name of deity with a newborn child was therefore quite explicable. Even the names of angels in later Judaism, like those of individuals, contained the name of deity (שם), e.g. Michael, Raphael, etc. Heaven and earth are perishable, but 'Thy great name liveth and abideth for ever' (Berakhôth 32a). Hence those names (especially of angels) which contain the name of deity possess a special potency.

* On this subject of amulets consult Winer, RWB i. p. 56; Com. on Gn 35⁴ and Is 31³⁶; Hamburger, RE, Suppl.-Band, li. pp. 8-11.

Particular power was assigned to the mysterious tetragrammaton, which could be pronounced only on the Great Day of Atonement in the temple by the high priest. Hence it is called in the Talmud שם הקדש (in Aramaic שם קדש), the name pronounced (cf. Pael שם) then, and then only. This name later Judaism believed to have been inscribed on the wonder-working staff of Moses. The tēthim no longer overflows when a potsherd engraved with the tetragrammaton is thrown into it. Ashmodai (cf. APOLLYON), the prince of demons, was bound by a chain and a seal ring, on which was inscribed the Divine name (Giṭṭin 68, bottom). By marking this name on the mouth of the idol calf of Jeroboam it was made to speak.

This mysterious and potent name was designated in Hebrew as שם, by the Greeks τὸ ἄρρητον, also called ἄρρητον—on magic papyri (see Wessely) ἄρρητον κρυπτόν καὶ ἄρρητον, or, as in the inscription of Hadrumetum (see art. MAGIC, and Deissmann, Bible Studies, 146 ff., 196 ff.), τὸ ἄρρητον ἄρρητον δὲ λέγεται (line 20), also τὸ κρυπτόν ὄνομα καὶ ἄρρητον ἐν ἀνθρώποις (Dietrich, Abstraxas, 195, line 7), or it is called τὸ τετραγράμμιον ἄρρητον τὸ μυστικόν. The Hebrew שם, שם, is reproduced in a variety of forms in Greek (see Deissmann, ib. p. 4). The manifold employment of the letters of the tetragrammaton, as well as of the seven vowels α ε η ι ο υ ω, played a considerable part in magic papyri; and it is impossible within the space at our disposal to enter into the maze of details on this subject, which may be found in Blau's treatise, pp. 141-146.

The belief in the power of words, especially those of Scripture, is exhibited by the custom of repeating a phrase, as, for example, the Shema', or sometimes in inverting the order of letters, as in the Gnostic gem referred to by Schwab (Vocabulaire de l'Angelologie, p. 303), in which is inserted Ουκαλαξ, which is the expression אבא לאבא inverted. The belief underlying these inversions is that the reversal of the order effects the retreat or overthrow of the demons and of the sorcery they employ. According to Rabbi Akiba, special potency belongs to the letters of the alphabet to which special meanings by acrostics were assigned. Thus אליא = אם לא פיר.

Belief in the power of the evil eye was just as prevalent in Semitic lands as in those of classical antiquity. Especially were women with an ugly squint or strange look or contracted heavy eyebrows considered to possess powers of the evil eye (see art. MAGIC, vol. iii. p. 208*).

Tradition ascribed the belief in the power of the evil eye to Babylonia. Rab lived in Babylonia, where the evil eye is often found (Jerus. Shabbath 14c²; cf. Baba mezia 107b, above). It is said of Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, that after they were delivered from the fiery furnace they fell victims to the many eyes which were fixed on them. According to Baba bathra i. 18, Joshua commanded the sons of Joseph to conceal themselves in the wood in order that they might not be overpowered by the evil eye (Jos 17¹⁶). Men of distinction were specially exposed to this evil. But the tradition prevailed that descendants of Joseph were exempt. Thus when the distinguished and handsome Rabbi Jochanan was asked whether he did not fear the evil eye, he replied, 'I am of the seed of Joseph, who are not injured by the evil eye' (Berakhôth 20a, below). It was recommended as a precaution, if one is about to enter a town and is afraid of the evil eye, to place the right thumb in the left hand and the left thumb in the right hand and say, 'I am N. son of N., and am descended from the seed of Joseph.' Another preservative was to look on the left side of the nose.

Horses were preserved from the power of the evil eye by hanging a fox's tail or a scarlet thread between the eyes. Children were more frequently provided with amulets than adults, and those they held in their hand (Shabbath 16b, 61b). Children have naturally a weaker power of resistance to evil influence or fascination than adults. Hence an inscribed card or leaf (πικτάκιον) or other kind of amulet was hung around the neck. A Jewish amulet would contain the letters of the name of Deity and various extracts from the Torah. It would also contain the name of the person to be protected.

Even articles of furniture or vessels were protected in this manner. Handles and pedestals were inscribed with the Divine name. Especially the bedstead was guarded in this way against enchantment. The blessing in Nu 6²⁴⁻²⁶ was intended to protect Israel against the evil eye. Indeed the Torah itself was designed by God as a defence against evil (Wayyikra rabba, c. 25, ad init.).

The magic of the evil eye is a topic avoided in the Mishna, and the attitude of orthodox Judaism towards the entire subject of sorcery was hostile, and in this respect coincided with the spirit and teaching of St. Paul, who regarded sorcery as belonging to the sphere of the ἐνέργεια τοῦ Σατανᾶ and φάρμακα as one of the products (ἔργα) of the flesh (Gal 5²⁰). This attitude of Judaism rested on the ancient precepts of the Torah, even the most primitive code (Ex 22¹⁸, cf. Dt 18¹⁰) containing prohibitions and death penalties directed against sorcerer and sorceress.

The causes of this ancient antagonism between religion and magic, which certainly existed, though far from universal, evidently lie in some fundamental distinction between the two, which we have already endeavoured to elucidate in the opening pages of the art. MAGIC. The subject has been ably discussed in Frazer's Golden Bough (i. p. 61 ff.), but not with complete success, since the writer refuses to admit what the researches of Tylor and others have made clear, viz. that ancient culture in all its manifold forms rests upon a primitive basis of animism, an interpretation of life whereby man surrounded himself with a cosmic society of personal agencies. Frazer considers that the few cases cited, 'in which the operation of spirits is assumed, and an attempt made to win their favour by prayer and sacrifice,' are exceptional. 'Wherever sympathetic magic occurs in its pure unadulterated form, it assumes that in nature one event follows another necessarily and invariably without the intervention of any spiritual or personal agency.' The final negative clause of this sentence, which we have italicized, lacks historic proof. The most ancient inscribed documents of human life, discovered in Babylonia and Egypt, point to the opposite conclusion, that in man's primitive condition magic was closely interwoven with a belief in gods and demons. That in some more recent examples of sympathetic magic the primitive elements of spiritual belief have disappeared, and nothing apparently* remains but the assumption that 'in nature one event follows another necessarily and invariably,' we may with certain limitations admit to be true. In some exponents of 'modern science' we observe a similar process of the attrition of a belief in or recognition of an ultimate Personal Cause which sustains 'nature's unchanging harmony.' But without the assumption of a primitive belief in personal agencies, how can we explain the constant employment of incantations and of formulae, spoken or written, as well as the close relations which in ancient culture undoubtedly subsisted between magic and religion, the priest combining in his own person the normal functions of worship with those of soothsaying and magic? But our criticism does not in reality obscure the illuminating value of Frazer's statements, which we now cite.

* We say 'apparently,' because missionaries from Central Africa, where magic abounds (we refer particularly to the Rev. Harry Johnson), have informed the present writer that natives are very reticent with regard to their beliefs as to what underlies their practice. Moreover, belief in spirits they certainly possess.

'Its fundamental conception is identical with that of modern science. Underlying the whole system is a faith, implicit but real and firm, in the order and uniformity of nature. The magician does not doubt that the same causes will always produce the same effects, that the performance of the proper ceremony accompanied by the appropriate spell will inevitably be attended by the desired results, unless, indeed, his incantations should chance to be thwarted and spoiled by the more potent charms of another sorcerer. . . . The fatal flaw of magic lies not in its general assumption of a succession of events* . . . but in its total misconceptions of the nature of . . . that succession . . . In ancient Egypt the magicians claimed the power of compelling even the highest gods to do their bidding.'

Hence arose a radical conflict between magic and religion. 'The haughty self-sufficiency of the magician . . . and his unabashed claim to exercise sway could not but revolt the priest. Sometimes, we may suspect, lower motives concurred to whet the edge of the priest's hostility. He professed to be the proper medium, the true intercessor between God and man, and no doubt his interests as well as his feelings were often injured by a rival practitioner.'

We may here briefly advert to the prevalence of magic and sorcery in ancient Greece and in ancient Greek settlements. Aristotle (Probl. xx. 34) refers to the superstition of the evil eye (βασκαίνω and βάσκαρος, βασκαρία through the δύσβαλος κακίς). This particularly affected children and cattle (Verg. Ecl. iii. 103). Theocritus (Idyll. ii. throughout, and vi. 39) clearly proves how prevalent sorcery was in the beginning of the 3rd cent. B.C. A century earlier Plato (Rep. ii. 364 B) describes the wandering beggars and soothsayers who go about to rich men's doors persuading them that they have power from the gods to avenge any man on his enemies, and can induce the gods to do their bidding by certain enchantments and magic knots (ἐπαγωγὰς καὶ καταδέσμοις). Herodotus (in the 5th cent.), ii. 181, tells the story of Amasis, king of Egypt, who believed he had been spell-bound by his wife Iadica. The Greeks believed in and practised the magic καταδέσμοι (καταδέσεις) or knots as much as the Hebrews their קָנָן (cf. Euripid. Medea, 1136-1239).

These καταδέσμοι (Lat. diræ) were inscribed on their leaden tablets or on strips of papyrus or talc (Tacitus, Annals, ii. 69). The first actually known were discovered at Athens in 1811 by M. Fauvel, and two years later, in the public cemetery of the Piræus, by Mr. Dodwell. Recently they were found among the tombs in Cyprus (of the 1st cent. A.D.). The character of the inscription or incantation which is scratched, is mainly as follows: 'I bind with this spell (καταδῶ) So-and-so, his shop and all his property.' In the formula employed on one of the two Athenian leaden tablets the writer binds over his enemies by name to Hermes Cthonius, Ἡ κείροχος, and Persephone. In the other we read: 'I bind over such-and-such persons to thee, Onesime.' Onesime may perhaps have been the occupant of the tomb where the tablet was discovered.

In addition to this method of writing the name of the enemy on a tablet and marking it with magical signs or characters, we have another,

* We prefer to omit here all reference to 'law.' The belief of ancient magic in the uniformity of nature can only have been of a very partial and rudimentary kind, viz. in the limited sphere of magical practice.

† Another contributing cause to the hostility of religion and of the priesthood towards magic was morally justifiable. Magic and the popular faith in it armed the sorcerer with awful powers over his fellow-men, which he often used for unscrupulous ends. Thus in early Rome we find a law in the Twelve Tables which forbids charming away a neighbour's crops by incantations (excantare).

which at once reminds us of Babylonia (cf. MAGIC). A waxen image of the obnoxious person was made and caused to melt away in order that that person might melt away likewise (sympathetic magic). Cf. Verg. Ecl. viii. 80; Horace, Sat. I. viii. 32; Theoc. Idyll. ii.

There is good reason to suppose that these magic practices were introduced from Babylonia into Greece through Persia. Aeschylus and Sophocles show no trace of them, but Euripides alludes to the γῆρας and ἐπιδός. In Antiphon (end of 5th cent.) we read of a love-potion or φίλτρον, while Plato speaks of magicians (Symp. 203 D) and of the Thessalian women who are said to draw down the moon (Gorg. 513 A).

Necromancy, or the special mode of obtaining aid or knowledge by the conjuration of the dead, was a form of divination and magic which may be appropriately treated under the head of sorcery, since the sorcerer or sorceress would likewise become the medium of communication with the departed spirit. Necromancy is a practice which is linked to the belief in the continued existence of spirits in the dark underworld or Sheol. Hence among the ancient Greeks νεκρά, or the summoning of the dead for interrogation about the future, became locally associated with caves and volcanic regions, where communication, it was supposed, would be easily established with the lower regions. Such a spot, called νεκρομαρτεῖον or ψυχομαρτεῖον, was the lake Aornos in Thesprotian Epirus (Herod. v. 52), Lake Avernus in Campania, and Tænarus in Laconia. There is, however, no clear proof that conjuration of the dead in Canaan was associated with any special spot. It seems rather to have been associated with the personality of the conjurer than with special places. Nevertheless we might expect that caves or dark spots, and more especially sepulchres, would be selected by the Canaanite necromancers for the practice of their rites.

The Heb. name for the spirit to whom the summons was given was אַי, a word which is probably no other than that which is used in Job 32¹⁰ for a skin-bag for holding water. The term would be applied to the spirit on account of the mysterious hollow sound which he was supposed to make, as though speaking from some hollow cavity.* This אַי or spirit was considered to reside in the necromancer, who was for the time identified with it. The term properly used to describe the necromancer was כַּוֵּן אַי, or for the female sorceress אַי כַּוֵּן. We might compare the כַּוֵּן אַי of Nah 3⁴. אַי כַּוֵּן is the term applied to the witch of Endor (1 S 28⁷), who summons Samuel from his grave at the request of Saul (vv. 12-14) and plays the part of clairvoyante as well.

Another obscure term frequently combined with אַי is דִּבְנֵי, and it is exceedingly difficult to say whether any actual distinction of meaning properly belonged to the use of either. The etymology of the latter word, corresponding to our English word wizard, suggests the divining function of the spirit inhabiting the necromancer, whereas אַי was rather a term which indicated the ventriloquizing and hollow tones of his utterance. The LXX usually render אַי or אַי כַּוֵּן by ἐγγαστριμύθος, once (Is 19³) by ἐκ γῆς φωνῶν; whereas דִּבְנֵי, which they hardly

* This derivation is, however, disputed by Nowack and others. Hitzig, in his Commentary (on Is 8¹⁹), connects it with the Arabic آب (أ.أ. أَب, reversus fuit), and thus regards it as meaning 'returning one.' Cf. Baudissin, Stud. zur semit. Religionsgesch. I. p. 143 footnote. On the whole, we agree with Dillin. on Lv 19³¹ that the connexion with אַי, 'bag,' is the most probable. The interpretation of the word as connected with דִּבְנֵי, and as signifying 'enemy (of God),' is the least probable.

understood, is variously rendered by παρασκόπος, ἐρασιδός, and γνωστής (γνωστὴς), and apparently in one instance (Is 19³) by ἐγγαστριμύθος. In Dt 18¹¹ there is a curiously amplified phraseology which ought not to be pressed, viz. 'interrogator (אֲדָר) of the אַי,' אֲדָר, and the 'inquirer of the dead' (אֲדָר אַי דִּבְנֵי). In this as in the preceding verse (v. 10) we have a fairly exhaustive phraseology, but each term employed does not cover an altogether distinct conception, but is more or less a synonym.

During the closing decades of the 8th cent., amid the dangers, apprehensions, and calamities occasioned by the Assyrian invasions, the people resorted in large numbers to these occult modes of inquiry. To this Isaiah refers in scathing terms of rebuke (8^{19ff.}). Instead of turning their faces heavenwards to Jehovah and to the words of the Torah committed to faithful prophets, many were saying in these degenerate days, 'Consult the conjurers of the dead and the necromancers, who chirp and whisper, Shall not a people inquire of their manes,* on behalf of the living, of the dead?† To this pitiful and degrading appeal to popular superstition the prophet replies in tones of thunder: 'To the instruction and testimony!' The wide prevalence of necromantic practice is illustrated by a vivid simile employed by the same prophet. In a beautiful and graphic oracle (ch. 29) Jerusalem is threatened with all the horrors soon to impend over the city in the siege of Sennacherib: 'And thou shalt lie prostrate, speaking from the earth, and from the dust shall thy speech sound low, and thy voice shall be like a ghost (אֵי) from the earth, and from the dust shall thy speech twitter' (v. 4).

Thus the higher prophetic teaching was as hostile in its attitude towards necromancy as it was towards magic and soothsaying; and this tone of reprobation is echoed in the stern penalties of death denounced against it in the legislation, Dt 18¹¹ (cf. 1 S 28⁹), Lv 19³¹ 20^{6, 7}. The attitude of the teachers in the Talmud is not so uncompromising. Though they regarded it as the work of the devil, they believed in the validity of the art of necromancy (Berakhith 59^{r13}, Shabb. 152b). The dead can only be conjured in the first year after burial. It is said of Rab that he even himself inquired of the dead (Baba mezia 107b).

LITERATURE.—This has been indicated throughout this article. On Jewish magic Blau's work is the main authority. On Greek magic consult Warre-Cornish's Concise Dict. of Greek and Roman Antiq., 'Superstition'; and Miss Macdonald in PSBA, vol. xiii. (Feb. 3, 1891), art. 'Inscriptions relating to Sorcery in Cyprus.' In this instructive art. there are useful citations from Wessely's Griechische Zauberpapyri. A good illustration is given of a recipe for a μαγία taken from his edition of Papyrus Anastasi in the British Museum. On the subject of magic in general Frazer's *Golden Bough*² should be consulted, and A. Lang in Fortnightly Rev. Feb. and April 1901. The literature has been indicated already in art. SORE.—This word is used freely in AV as adj., subst., or adverb.

The Anglo-Saxon adj. sār, meaning 'painful,' develops a subst. sār, meaning 'a sore,' as that which caused the pain; from this subst. another adj. was formed, sārig, in the sense of 'sād.' Sār became in later Eng. 'sore,' as win became 'bone,' hām 'home,' etc. Sārig became 'sorry,' the double r being a mistake, due to a fancied connexion with the subst. 'sorrow.' Between 'sorry' and 'sorrow' (Anglo-Sax. sorg) there is no etymological connexion.

Thus the adj. comes first, and its primary meaning is painful, which is the only sense it now retains. Job 5¹⁸. 'For he maketh sore, and bindeth up' (אֲדָר, LXX ἀλγεῖν ποιεῖ). But this literal meaning is rare, the word having early adopted

* Comp. the similar use of אֵי in 1 S 28¹².

† These verses (i.e. 18. 20) are without adequate reason declared by Duham and Cheyne to be non-Isaianic.

the fig. sense of severe, grievous. The transition may be illustrated from Shaks. Tempest, v. i. 288—

'Steph.—O touch me not; I am not Stephano, but a cramp.

Pros.—You'd be king of the isle, sirrah?

Steph.—I should have been a sore one, then—where there is a play on the word.

Is 27¹ 'In that day the Lord with his sore and great and strong sword shall punish leviathan' (פֶּשֶׁת לְוִיָּאֵן, LXX τὴν μάχαιραν τὴν ἀγίαν); Ezk 14²¹ 'when I send my four sore judgments upon Jerusalem' (פֶּשֶׁת, LXX τὰς πονηρίας); Wis 10¹⁴ 'In a sore conflict she gave him the victory' (ἀγῶνα ἰσχυρῶς); He 10²⁰ 'Of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy?' (πῶς ὡ χειρότερος). Even when the reference is to suffering or disease, 'sore' almost always means severe rather than literally painful, as Dt 28³³ 'With a sore botch' (פֶּשֶׁת פֶּשֶׁת). Cf. Udall, Erasmus, i. 20, 'Making the law more heavy and sore'; Taverner's Bible, 3 Mac 3 heading 'The kyng maketh a sore decree'; Lk 15¹⁴ Rhem. 'And after he had spent al, there fel a sore famine in that countrie' (λιμὸς ἰσχυρῶς). In the passage just quoted Tindale and others have merely 'great' (AV and RV 'mighty'), and it is probable that the word 'sore' itself often means no more than that. Cf. Is 24¹⁹ Cov. 'The earth shal geve a greate crack, it shal have a sore ruynne, and take an horrible fall.' But this is most frequently seen in the adverb.

The adv. 'sore' ('sorely' occurs twice) never means in AV lit. 'painfully,' often, however, severely, grievously,* as 1 S 1⁹ 'And her adversary also provoked her sore' (עָרַבָהּ אֶת־הָאֹיִבָּהּ); Mt 17¹⁵ 'He is lunatick, and sore vexed' (κακῶς πιάσκει, RV 'suffereth grievously'). But the usual meaning is greatly, exceedingly (Germ. sehr), as Is 38² = 2 K 20⁸ 'Hezekiah wept sore' (בָּכָה עֲזָרָהּ מְאֹדָה, LXX ἐκλαύσεν Ἐζεκιῆς κλαυθμῷ μεγάλῳ). The adv. כאֲדָר in Heb. is often tr¹ 'sore,' and σφόδρα occasionally (1 Mac 2¹⁴ 6⁸ 9⁶³ 16²², Mt 17⁶) in Greek. Cf. Chaucer, Prologue, 148—

'Of smale houndes had she, that she fedde
With roasted flesh, or milk and wastel-breed.
But sore weep she if oon of hem were deed,
Or if men smoot it with a yerde smerte.'

The phrase 'lie sore on' occurs in Jg 14¹⁷. See LIE in vol. ii. p. 113.

The subst. occurs rarely: Lv 13⁴² α, Ps 38¹¹ (נֶגַע אֶבְרַתָּהּ, RV 'my hand was stretched out'); Is 1⁶ 'wounds and bruises and putrifying sores' (פְּצָעִים וְכִשְׂמִים וְשִׁמְרִים, RV 'festerings sores,' RVm 'fresh stripes'); Lk 16²⁰ 'full of sores' (ἐλκλωμένος); 16²¹, Rev 16².¹¹ (ἐλκος).

SOREK, THE VALLEY OF (סֹרֵק; נָחַל ב' אלסוֹרֵחַ, † A Χειμάρρου Σωρίχ; vallis Sorec).—The valley or wady (Heb. nahal) in which Delilah lived (Jg 16⁴). Eusebius and Jerome (Onom.) connect the valley with Capharsorec, a village to the north of Eleutheropolis and near Saraa (Σαρά), that is, Zorah (Sur'ah), the home of Samson's father. Capharsorec is now Khurbet Surik, to the north of Wady Sur'ar, which is identified with 'the valley of Sorek,' and not far from Sur'ah.

The Wady Sur'ar is one of the great features of Southern Palestine. It rises to the N. of Jerus., near Birch (Beeroth), and, running between Nebv Samicil and Jerus., passes Kul'nieh and Ain Kārim. It now becomes deep and narrow, and below Ak'ar is joined by Wady es-Sikkeh, which rises in the valley of Rephaim, close to Jerusalem, and passes Bittir. North of Khurbet Erma (one of the sites proposed for Kiriath-jeirim) it becomes a narrow gorge with precipices on its northern side, and, a little lower, it emerges from the hill-country of Judah and enters the Shephelah, or lowland. Here, in a fertile well-watered basin, it is joined by Wady Ghurab, which, after passing Kuryet el-Enab (another proposed site for Kiriath-jeirim), runs in from the N.W., and by Wady en-Najil, which comes from the south. On the northern slopes of the basin are Zorah and Eshtaol, and between them 'the camp of Dan' (Mahaneh-dan), the early home and burial-place of Samson (Jg 13²² 16²¹). On the southern slope is Beth-shemesh (Ain Shems), prettily situated above the rich cornfields, and commanding a fine view down the broad fertile valley which runs past the vineyards of Tinnath, Makkedah, and Jabneel to the sea.

The 'valley of Sorek' offers an easy and natural line of approach to Jerus. and the highlands of Judah. The Philistines followed it in the days of the Judges and of David; up it the kine, lowing as they went, dragged the cart with the ark to Beth-shemesh; and, at the present day, it is followed by the railway from Jaffa to Jerusalem. In or near the basin, according to several authorities, were fought the battles in which the ark was taken by the Philistines, and in which the Philistines were defeated by Samuel (1 S 7).

In Hebrew the word sōrek means a particular kind of vine, which produced a purple grape, and 'the valley of Sorek' may have derived its name from the growth of this vine in the vineyards that covered its slopes (PEF Mem. iii. 53; G. A. Smith, HGH 218 ff.; Conder, Tent-Work, i. 172).

SOSIPATER (Σωσίπατρος, Sosipater).—In Ro 16²¹ called a kinsman of St. Paul, i.e. a Jew, and joined with him in greetings at the close of the Epistle. The name is the same as SOPATER (Ac 20⁴), and the two may be identical, as Jason, another of those mentioned in Ro 16²¹, may be identical with the JASON of Thessalonica (Ac 17⁹); two Macedonian Christians might naturally be with St. Paul at Corinth. The name Sosipater occurs in the well-known inscription of Thessalonica (CIG ii. 1967) giving a list of Politarchs, as also does that of SECUNDUS (Ac 20⁴). For later traditions see Acta Sanctorum, June vol. v., June 25, p. 4.

A. C. HEADLAM.

SOSTHENES (Σωσθένης).—A name occurring twice in the NT, but under circumstances which leave it doubtful whether it denotes one or two persons. 1. In Ac 18¹⁷, when the Jews at Corinth rose against St. Paul and brought him to the tribunal of Gallio, the proconsul of Achaia, and the latter, refusing to be a judge in questions of their law, dismissed them from his bar, we learn that 'they all,' i.e. the bystanders or assembled crowd, 'laid hold on Sosthenes, the ruler of the synagogue, and beat him before the judgment-seat,' without interference on the part of Gallio, who, in his indifference to Jewish disputes, gave himself no concern. In the best critical texts the word 'all' (πάντες) stands without any defining noun, which has accordingly been supplied by the insertion, in some MSS, of an explanatory gloss, either αἱ Ἰουδαῖοι, as though the assailants were the Jews, visiting the failure of their complaint on the head of their own leader, or oftener and more feasibly αἱ Ἕλληνες, the (predominantly) Greek on-lookers. Sosthenes, described as 'ruler of the synagogue' (which see), was doubtless the chief representative and mouthpiece of the complainants. He was probably the successor in office of Crispus, who had become a convert to Christianity (Ac 18⁶). The theory of Chrysostom, which identifies him with Crispus, and ascribes his maltreatment to his being a Christian, is wholly arbitrary; and hardly less so are the conjectures that he had been a colleague in 'rule' with Crispus (see 'rulers' in the plural, Ac 13¹⁵), or had presided over another synagogue.

2. In 1 Co 1¹ Sosthenes stands alongside of St. Paul in the inscription of the Epistle. He is simply designated as 'the brother,' which would seem to imply that his person and Christian standing were well known to the readers of the letter. He has been often identified with the synagogal ruler of Ac 18, who is assumed to have become a convert in the interval; but such an assumption is arbitrary, when the name was, confessedly, a common one; and St. Paul's associate was now at Ephesus, not at Corinth. Many have assumed him to be the apostle's amanuensis in the Epistle, to which he appends an autograph salutation (16²¹); but he must have been something more than a mere amanuensis to be thus honourably co-ordinated in the superscription. Later tradition represented him as having been one of the seventy disciples, and as having become subsequently bishop of Colophon.

WILLIAM P. DICKSON.

SOSTRATUS (Α Σώστρατος, V Σώστρατος).—The governor of the citadel (ὁ τῆς ἀκροπόλεως ἑταρχος) at Jerusalem, who in vain demanded, on behalf of Antiochus Epiphanes, the money which Menelaus had promised to pay on being raised to the high priesthood in place of Jason, 2 Mac 4²⁷ (28), 29.

SOTAI (סוֹטַי and סוֹבֵי).—The eponym of a family of 'Solomon's servants,' who returned with Zerubabel, Ezr 2⁵² (B Sarel, A and Luc. Soral) = Neh 7²⁷ (BA Sorel, Luc. Soral).

SOUL is throughout a great part of the Bible simply the equivalent of 'life' embodied in living creatures. In the earlier usage of the OT it has no reference to the later philosophical meaning—the animating principle, still less to the idea of an 'immaterial nature' which will survive the body. 'A living soul' in Genesis and other records is simply an 'animated being,' and the word is applied equally to the lower animals and to man. When the life is emphasized as human, it signifies life in the individual. This meaning it takes especially when שָׁרֵי, ψυχή, is put in contrast with רִיחַ, πνεῦμα, 'spirit,' which then comes to signify the principle of life. In this way 'soul' acquires more precisely the idea of the individual life in man, the Self, the Ego, although it may denote other aspects of man than the intellectual, and, in fact, is sometimes equivalent to 'heart' as well as to 'mind' (see analysis below). In the NT the emphasis on the personality becomes most marked in such sayings of our Lord as Mt 16²³, 28, Mk 8³³.

The following is an analysis (abridged from Oxf. Heb. Lex.) of the usage of the Heb. terms for 'soul':—

1. שָׁרֵי, nephesh, lit. 'that which breathes,' 'the breathing substance or being' = ψυχή, anima (opp. bāsar, 'flesh' [Dt 12²⁴, Is 10¹⁸], or beten, 'body' [Ps 31¹⁰]); its source of life is the nishmath hayyim breathed into the nostrils of its bāsar by God (Gn 2⁷), in virtue of which man (ib.) becomes a nephesh hayyah [this expression elsewhere always of animals, Gn 1²⁰, 24, 30, 12, 15, 16 (all P), Ezk 47⁹; cf. nephesh hayyah in Gn 12¹, 9¹⁰ (both P), Lv 11¹⁰, 46 (H)]. The life of the nephesh resides in the blood (Gn 9⁴, 5, Dt 12²³, 24, Lv 17¹⁰, 11, 12, 14). Nephesh is used for life itself, 171 t., either (a) of animals Pr 12¹⁰, or (b) of man Gn 44¹⁰, Ex 21²⁴, Lv 24¹⁷ et al.; hence שָׁרֵי, נֶפֶשׁ = 'smite mortally' Gn 37²¹, Dt 19¹⁶, 11, Jer 40¹⁴, 18 f.; שָׁרֵי, נֶפֶשׁ = 'take away life' 1 K 19⁴, Jon 4⁹, Ps 31¹⁴, Pr 19¹; שָׁרֵי, נֶפֶשׁ = 'deliver life from death' Jos 2¹³, Ps 33¹⁸, 56¹⁴ f.; שָׁרֵי, נֶפֶשׁ 1 S 18¹¹, 2 S 19⁶ quater, 1 K 11³ bis, Jer 48⁶, 51⁶, 48, Ezk 33⁶, Am 21⁴, 15, Ps 89⁴⁸, 116⁴ f.; שָׁרֵי, נֶפֶשׁ = 'redeem life' 2 S 4⁹, 1 K 12³⁰, Ps 34²³, 49¹⁶, 55¹⁹, 71²³ f.; שָׁרֵי, נֶפֶשׁ = 'keep life' Ps 25²⁰, 97¹⁰, Job 26, Pr 13¹, 16¹⁷, 19¹⁶, 22⁵ f. Nephesh, as the essential of man, stands for the man himself, and may thus paraphrase the personal pronouns, esp. in poetry and ornate discourse: e.g. 'I' = 'me' (Gn 40⁹, Nu 23¹⁰, Jg 16³⁰, La 3²⁴), 'they' = 'thee' (Is 43⁴, 51²⁰), etc.; or it may represent the reflexive 'self': e.g. 'myself' (Job 9²¹), 'thyself' (Dt 4⁹, 'himself' [1 S 18¹, 3 20¹⁷]; or it stands for 'person,' 'individual' (cf. Eng. 'souls,' esp. in enumerations or collective expressions), Lv 24¹⁷, Nu 31³⁵, Dt 10²¹, 24⁷; and is used even of deceased persons, with (Nu 6⁶, Lv 21¹¹), or (more usually) without (Nu 5², 6¹¹, 9⁶, 7 19¹¹, 13, Lv 19²⁸, 21¹, 22⁴, Hag 2¹⁹), נֶפֶשׁ. Nephesh is largely used for the seat of the appetites: e.g. 'hungry soul' Ps 107⁹, Pr 27¹; in Is 51⁴ it is said that 'Sheol enlarged her appetite' (שְׁאוֹל רָחַב אֶת צָרְקָהּ); similarly it is the seat of emotions and passions: e.g. 'soul desires' (Dt 12²⁰, 14²⁶, 1 S 21⁶, 2 S 32¹, 1 K 11³⁷, Job 23¹², Pr 13⁴, 21¹⁰, Mic 7¹); 'soul abhorreth' (Lv 26¹¹, 18, 30, 43, Jer 14¹⁹); 'bitter of soul' (Jg 18²³, 2 S 17⁸, Job 3²⁰, Pr 31⁶). When used with lehabbāh, 'heart' (in 1), nephesh is assimilated in meaning to it, so as to include intellect and will as well as feeling (e.g. Dt 4²⁹, 26¹⁶, 1 K 8⁴⁶, 2 K 23²⁸). See HEART.

2. שָׁרֵי, tr. in AV of Job 30¹⁵ 'soul,' means 'nobility' (RVm), i.e. 'honour' (RV). 3. שָׁרֵי, lit. 'breath,' is once in EV (Is 57¹⁶) tr. 'soul.' It is used in the same absolute way in Jos 10⁴⁰ and Ps 150⁶ (both שָׁרֵי, 'every breathing being').

The LXX and NT ψυχή follows very closely the above usages of nephesh (see Cremer or Grimm, s.v.).

The development of a double expression for man's inner life (ψυχή, πνεῦμα) gives throughout the whole Bible a usage which is often not much more than a vague parallelism, as, e.g., in Is 26⁹, Lk 14⁶, 7, Ph 1²⁷ (RV). It undoubtedly, however, contains a hint everywhere of the antithesis between the life-principle and the individual life. Where the two are set side by side, as in He 4¹², the actual relation subsisting between the 'soul' and its life-principle ('spirit') is brought into view. While in the older language of the Gospels σῶμα and ψυχή appear as the two constituent parts of human nature (Mt 10²⁸), there is in the Pauline usage a threefoldness: τὸ πνεῦμα the Divine life-principle, ἡ ψυχή the individual life in which the πνεῦμα is manifested, τὸ σῶμα the material organism vivified by the ψυχή (1 Th 5²³).

Where the most distinct antithesis occurs is in the use of the adjective psychic or soulish (ψυχικός). In the only places in which ψυχικός occurs in OT (Greek) (2 Mac 4⁵⁷, 14²⁴) it means 'hearty.' [In 4 Mac 1³² something more purely psychological is meant, but this is hardly biblical Greek]. In the NT another interest comes in. In the six instances where ψυχικός occurs (not wholly Pauline), an altogether new antithesis is introduced. What is natural or human in the ψυχή is contrasted with what is Divine and divinely given in the πνεῦμα θεοῦ. So that ψυχικός has acquired a meaning almost equivalent to 'carnal' or 'sensual,' by which latter word it is twice rendered in AV. But since the πνεῦμα and πνευματικός, with which it is contrasted, is the Divine spirit in regeneration, it seems fair to render ψυχικός 'natural' as AV does in four of these places, and RVm in the other two (see 1 Co 2¹⁴, 15⁴⁴ bis, 46, Ja 3¹⁵, Jude 19). Thus Christianity has enriched this word ψυχικός, adding to its psychological sense an ethical or even a theological significance.

Additional NT instances of the use of ψυχή in composition are ἀψυχοι 'soulless,' or 'lifeless,' 1 Co 14⁷; σύμψυχοι 'of one accord,' Ph 2²; ὁμόψυχοι 'like-minded,' Ph 2²⁰; διψυχοι 'double-minded,' Ja 1⁸, 4⁸. See also art. PSYCHOLOGY.

SPAIN (Σπαρία).—The S.W. peninsula of Europe was known to the Greeks as Ἑσπερία or Ἰβηρία, the latter name being derived from the river Ἰβήρ (the modern Ebro). The Roman name was Hispania. The information of the Greeks about the country was somewhat vague. Gibraltar was one of the Pillars of Hercules, and Herodotus (iv. 8) speaks of Gades (Γάδερα) as lying beyond these. Spain had been colonized in very early times by the Phœnicians. Strabo (I. iii. 2) refers to settlements beyond the Pillars of Hercules soon after the Trojan war. The country first comes into the clear light of history in connexion with its conquest by the Carthaginians, a Phœnician people, between B.C. 237 and 218. In the second Punic war (B.C. 218-205) the Romans conquered that portion of Spain which had been subdued by Carthage, and divided it into Hispania citerior and Hispania ulterior, the Ebro being the boundary between the two. The northern and western parts of the peninsula remained unsubdued, and the conquest of them proceeded only gradually. It was greatly advanced by the operations of Pompey and Caesar, and was finally completed under Augustus, who divided the country into three provinces, Betica in the south, Tarracensis in the north, and Lusitania (the modern Portugal) in the west. The first-named province was senatorial, and the other two were imperial.

The mineral wealth of Spain is greater and more varied than that of any other country in Europe. Copper, lead, and quicksilver are abundant, and silver and gold are also found. It was the mines of Spain which gave the country its chief value for its ancient colonists and conquerors.

The river Bætis (Guadalquivir), and also the surrounding country, had the name Ταρτησός, which was derived from that of the inhabitants (Turti) (Herod. iv. 152; Strabo, III. ii. 11 ff.). With this locality the טַרְשִׁישׁ of the Hebrews is generally identified (but see TARSHISH).

The other Scripture references to Spain are few, and in all of them Σπάρια, a form of the Roman name, takes the place of the older Greek ones. 1 Mac 8² refers to the Roman conquest, and to the acquisition of the gold and silver mines. On his third Missionary Journey the Apostle Paul formed the purpose of extending his evangelistic labours into the lands west of Greece. In writing to the Corinthians from Macedonia he indicated his intention of preaching the gospel in 'the parts beyond' them (2 Co 10¹⁶); and in writing a little later from Corinth to Rome he explained his purpose as specially including Italy and Spain (Ro 15^{24, 28}). Whether he ever carried out this intention as regards Spain is a matter of much dispute, and the question is important only from its connexion with that of the authenticity of the Pastoral Epistles. St. Paul certainly did not visit Spain before his first Roman imprisonment. On the hypothesis of his liberation and second imprisonment he may have done so at a later time. The Pastoral Epistles themselves only refer to his journeyings in the eastern part of the Mediterranean; but if the fact of his liberation be admitted, credence may be given to the statement of Clement of Rome (1st Ep. i. 4), that the apostle, before his martyrdom, preached the gospel 'to the extremity of the west' (ἐπὶ τὸ ἔσχατος τῆς οὐρα). Clement's expression naturally suggests Spain, and the Muratorian Canon shows that the apostle's visit to Spain was an accepted tradition of the Church before the end of the 2nd cent. It says that Luke in the narrative of the Acts omits 'profectionem Pauli ab urbe ad Spaniam proficiscentis' (see PAUL, vol. iii. p. 714^a). See, further, Lightfoot, Clement, I.c., and Biblical Essays, 423 ff., where the whole of the evidence is collected.

SPAN.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

SPARROW (זִפְפֹּר zippôr).—There is only one passage where the context makes it reasonably certain that the house sparrow is intended by zippôr (Ps 84⁴ [LXX σπομβιον], where AV and RV both tr. 'sparrow.') The 'zippôr alone upon a housetop' (Ps 102⁷ [LXX νυκτικόραξ]) may also be this bird. It is true that this is one of the most gregarious of birds, and that it is usually seen in large flocks, flitting from branch to branch, and from the ground to the roofs of houses and stables. But it happens sometimes that a single bird perches alone on a branch or on the roof. The fact of its generally sociable habits would make this the more phenomenal and illustrative of the loneliness of the psalmist. The attempt to identify it with the blue thrush Petrocossyphus cyaneus, Boie, is strained. If it does not refer to a solitary house sparrow, it is probably intended to indicate any small solitary bird. In addition to the above two passages, RV tr. zippôr 'sparrow,' in 1r 26² [LXX εἶπεα], unhappily, for the sparrow never wanders. Elsewhere in the 40 or more passages where it occurs, both Eng. VSS render it by 'bird' or 'fowl.' In some of these passages it is doubtless generic for small birds, corresponding to the Arab. usfâr (Job 41⁵ [LXX ὄρνειον], Ps 11¹ [LXX σπομβιον], etc.). It is also used for such birds as are caught by fowlers (Pr 6⁵ 7²³, Am 3⁵ [LXX in all three ὄρνειον]), which would exclude the house sparrow, as it is notoriously far too cunning to be so taken. The Arabs have a proverb, 'the dûri (house sparrow) cannot be taken with bird-lime,' applying it to persons who are too shrewd to be entrapped by guile. Zippôr is also used generically for birds, and even for birds of prey (Ezk 39¹⁷, see FOWL). The meaning of the Heb. root to twitter or chirp, which caused its original application to the passerines, has been overlooked in this broader application. The considerable number of LXX renderings shows this. The NT σπομβιον (Mt 10²⁹, Lk 12⁶ 7) refers to the sparrow Passer domesticus, L., or two closely allied species, P. Italica, Vieill., the Italian sparrow, and P. hispaniolensis, Temm., the Spanish sparrow. The latter is found in great abundance in the Jordan Valley, where it breeds in Zizyphus bushes. The house sparrow is so familiar that any allusion to its habits would be superfluous. G. E. POST.

SPARTA.—See LACEDÆMONIANS.

SPEAR.—The spear of antiquity was a near relation of the sword. The primitive knife might be fitted with a short handle and become a sword proper, or be mounted on a pole and become a spear; hence possibly the doubt whether the βουφαλα (see SWORD) was a sword or a spear.

BRONZE SPEAR-HEAD FROM TELL EL-HESI (LACHISH).

The spear-head was of flint or bronze (see the illustrations in Bliss, Mound of many Cities, pp. 36, 37) or of iron (1 S 17⁷; Bliss, pp. 106, 107). Egyptian spears (perhaps only for hunting and fishing) have been found made of wood throughout.

Different kinds of spears were:—1. The javelin (קִידֹן kidôn): RV of Jos 8^{18, 26} (AV 'spear'); 1 S 17⁶ (AV 'target'); v. 40 (AV 'shield'); Jer 6²³ (EV 'spear'); 50⁴² (AV 'lance'); Job 39²³ (AV 'shield'); 41^{19, 21} (RV 'the rushing of the javelin'; AV 'the shaking of a spear'). This weapon was for casting. In the Heb. Sirach (46²) kidôn preserves the reference to Jos 8¹⁸, which is lost in the Gr. βουφαλα (EV 'sword').

2. The lance (רֹמַח rōmah, cf. Arab. rumh), perhaps a lighter weapon than the spear proper. In 1 K 18²⁸ rōmah is tr^d in AV 'lancers' ('lancers' in the earlier editions). See, further, Driver's note on J1 31¹⁰.

3. The spear (proper)—once a fr. of קֶיֶץ kayin (2 S 21¹⁶, where H. P. Smith accepts the emendation קֶיֶץ kōbhā 'helmet'); generally, however, the rendering of הַנִּיחַ hānith. This (heavy) spear was used probably in close array, when an army was drawn up shield touching shield, and with spears at the charge to repel a threatened attack. From this array champions advanced to issue their challenges (1 S 17²¹⁻²³), and back to it upon occasion they retreated. In Ps 35²⁻³ the Psalmist seems to think of himself as such a champion defeated and retreating. The hānith was used by Saul (1 S 22⁶) as a 'sceptre' (עֶזְרָא shēbhet, the shepherd's staff).^{*} The cutting up of the spear (Ps 46⁷) is a sign of the end of war. The two parts of the spear were the 'staff' or butt (עֵץ 'ēz 'wood,' 1 S 17⁷ Kērē; 2 S 21¹⁹; or קֶיֶץ kayin 'arrow' or 'shaft,' 1 S 17⁷ Kēthibh) and the 'head' (רֹמַח lāhebbeth or עֶזְרָא lahabbh 'flame,' Job 39³).

In NT 'spear' represents λόγχη (Jn 19³⁴ [the only occurrence], Vulg. lancea). In Jn 19³⁴ F. Field (Notes on the Translation of the NT, pp. 106-108) points out that ὑσσώπω περιθέντες corresponds with the περιθεὶς καλάμῳ of Mt 27⁴⁸; accordingly, reviving an old conjecture, he suggests ὑσσώπω περιθέντες, 'putting [a sponge] upon a spear' (ὑσσώπος = pilum); certainly 'a sponge upon hyssop' is a difficult phrase to explain.

SPEARMEN.—1. Incorrectly for קָנָה kāneh, 'reeds,' in the phrase קָנָה הַיַּיִת hayyath kāneh, 'the company of spearmen,' Ps 68³⁰ [67³¹] AV (similarly Pr. Bk.); RV 'the wild beast of the reeds' [LXX τοῖς θηρίοις τοῦ καλάμου], i.e. probably the crocodile or the hippopotamus (cf. Job 40²¹) as the symbol of Egypt. 2. For δεισιλάβους (Ac 23²³ EV; Vulg. lancearii), Lachmann, following cod. A and the Peshitta (ܕܝܣܝܠܐܒܝܘܬܝܢ), reads here δεισιβόλους, 'right-handed slingers.' E. Egli (ZWT xlvii. pp. 20, 21) proposes to take the word in a passive sense (δεισιλάβος, sic proparoxytone, 'rectā captus'), 'left-handed slingers' (cf. Jg 20¹⁶). See Blass, in loc.

SPECKLED BIRD.—Jer 12⁹ (only). If the MT of this passage (הֲיֵשׁוּעַ בִּיבִי הַיָּמִים לִי הֲיֵשׁוּעַ בִּיבִי הַיָּמִים לִי) is correct, the tr. can hardly be other than 'Is mine heritage unto me (i.e. to my sorrow, a dativus ethicus [Cheyne, ad loc.]) (as) a speckled bird of prey? Are (the) birds of prey against her round about?' (so, substantially, RV). The people of Israel is compared to a bird of prey, just as, on account of its hostility to Jehovah, it is compared in v. 8 to a lion. But as a speckled (צִנְצִיף, cf. Jg 5³⁰) bird attracts the hostile attention of other birds (Tac. Ann. vi. 28; Suet. Cæsar, 81; Pliny, HN x. 19), Israel becomes a prey to the heathen (so Cheyne, Reuss, et al.). Cornill (in SBOT) alters the text slightly, changing לִי into אֵל (originally proposed by Graf) and pointing the א of the second צִנְצִיף as the art. instead of the interrogative particle. This does not seriously affect the tr., which would now be 'Is my heritage a speckled bird of prey, that the birds of prey are against her round about?' It need scarcely be said that the rendering 'mine heritage is unto me the ravenous hyæna' (see art. HYÆNA) cannot be obtained from the present text. It is a fair question, however, whether the MT is correct. The LXX has, Β σπήλαιον υἱάνης ('hyæna's den,' = צִנְצִיף הַיָּמִים), Α σπήλαιον ληστῶν ('robber's den'). Siegfried-Stade suggest צִנְצִיף הַיָּמִים 'torn (prey) of the hyæna.'

SPELT.—See RYE.

SPICE, SPICES.—Three Heb. words are so translated in OT. 1. סָמִימ sammim. This is a generic word (perh. loan-word from Arabic) for odoriferous substances. It is used alone in Ex 30³¹ (LXX ἡδύσματα), and with סָמִימ ketōreth = 'incense' in Ex 30⁷ (σύνθετος) 40²⁷, Lv 4⁷ 16¹², Nu 4¹⁶ etc. (σύνθετος = 'composition'). In the first passage cited is a list of three of the substances included under this heading. Of these, two are known, galbanum, a gum resin, and onycha, the operculum of a Strombus: for the third see STACTE.

2. עֵצַי bāsām (Ca 5¹ RVm 'balsam,' LXX ἀρωμάτα), עֵצַי bōsem, עֵצַי bāsem, pl. עֵצֵימ bēsāmim. A list of some of the aromatics included under this generic name is given in Ex 30³¹ (LXX ἡδύσματα): myrrh, cinnamon, calamus, and cassia, and with two of them, cinnamon and calamus, bōsem and bāsem are construed as adjectives, to denote sweetness. Such are spoken of as a sign of wealth (2 K 20¹³, 2 Ch 32²⁷), and were given as tokens of royal favour (1 K 10² etc.). They were objects of commerce (Ezk 27²²). Asa was laid in a bed of spices (2 Ch 16¹⁴ AV; RV 'sweet odours'). Some have supposed that the expression 'and they made a very great burning for him' indicates that Asa was cremated. As the previous part of the verse says, however, that they buried him in the sepulchre, and laid him in a bed of spices, the better explanation of the burning is that it was a bonfire in his honour. Such fires are favourite expressions of popular enthusiasm on feast days in Bible lands. Spices were stored in the temple (1 Ch 9³), and used for the purifying of women (Est 2¹², Ca 4¹⁰ etc.). 'Mountains of spices' (Ca 8¹⁴) may refer to the hillsides around Jerusalem, where were Solomon's Botanical Gardens, containing beds of spices (5¹³ 6²). Bōsem and bāsem may have signified originally the same as their Arab. cognate bashām = the Balsam of Mecca tree, Balsamodendron Opobalsamum, Kth., which is defined in the Arab. lexicons as 'a certain kind of odoriferous tree, of sweet taste, the leaves of which, pounded and mixed with henna, blacken the hair.' This confines it to a single tree or group of trees (see BALM). But the analysis of the use of bōsem and bāsem given above, with the fact that a special word zōri is used for Mecca Balsam, makes it evident that these two words are not to be taken in any such restricted sense, but to be understood generally of aromatics, which would be a better translation than that of our Eng. VSS 'spices.'

3. נֶקֶדֶת nekēth. This was a substance or substances carried by the Ishmaelite traders from Gilead to Egypt (Gn 37²⁵), and of which Jacob sent some as a present to Joseph (43¹¹). It is associated in both passages with balm and ladanum (see artt. on these words), and, in the latter, with honey, pistachio nuts, and almonds, which were products of Gilead proper. Some have supposed nekēth to be the same as the Arab. nak'ath or naka'ath. This is defined as a plant similar to the turthith. The latter is defined by Avicenna as—'Pieces of rotten wood, with an astringent taste . . . it is said that they are brought from the desert. Its medicinal properties are astringent' (ii. 183). The plant is defined in the dictionaries as 'a slender, oblong plant, inclining to redness, serving as a stomachic, included among medicines . . . a plant of the sands, similar to a fungus . . . having no leaves.' This corresponds, with considerable accuracy, to the characteristics of Cynomorium coccineum, L., a parasitic, leathery plant, of the order Balanophoraceæ, with a crimson, club-shaped spadix, 3-4 in. long, and $\frac{1}{2}$ in. thick, borne on a cylindrical stalk. It grows in and on the coast, and in the salt marshes of the interior. We have been unable to find in the Arab. dictionaries sufficient authority for the tr. 'gum tragacanth' (RVm Gn 37²⁸) for naka'ath and naka'ath. Moreover, the tragacanth bears no resemblance to the above description of the turthith. It has also a special name kethirā, which is defined as 'a liquid exuding from a tree in the mountains of Beirāt and Lebanon.' This is undoubtedly the gum tragacanth, which exudes from a number of the mountain species of Astragalus in Syria and other parts of the Orient as A. gummifer, Lab., A. echinus, DC, etc. The genus Astragalus is represented by over 120 species in Palestine and Syria. We are inclined to reject the idea of any connexion between naka'ath, naki'ath, and nek'ith. If by the former two were meant the Cynomorium coccineum, it would not have been an article of commerce important in the Egyptian trade. Could it be proved, which we believe impossible, that they meant tragacanth, the same remark would apply. The quantity exuded from all the Astragali of Lebanon and Hermion would not load a dozen camels. We have no reason to believe that it was ever more abundant. We incline, on the authority of the LXX in both the above passages (θυμίαμα), to render the word nek'ith 'perfumes' or 'aromatics,' which better expresses the Gr. than 'spices,' and corresponds to the grouping of articles enumerated. See, further, Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v., and Literature there cited.

As to nek'ith (2 K 20¹³ = Is 39²), the meaning is uncertain, although the context demands something like 'treasure.' Possibly the word is of Assyrian origin (see Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.): read then נִקְיָה.

Spices (ἀρώματα) are mentioned in NT in connexion with the burial of our Lord ('Mk' 16¹, Lk 23⁵⁵ 24¹, Jn 19⁴⁰). In Rev 18¹³ AV tr. ἀρωματων by 'odours,' RV 'spice,' m. 'Gr. amomum.'

SPIDER.—Two words are tr. 'spider' in AV. 1. אַרְבַּעִי 'akkābīsh (Arab. 'ankabūt), ἀράχνη, aranea. In both the passages in which this word occurs (Job 8¹⁴, Is 59⁵⁻⁶) the allusion is to the gossamer web of the spider, as an emblem of frailty and speedy destruction, Bildad declaring that the hope of the wicked is as the spider's web (m. 'house'; cf. beit ankabūt in Arab.), and Isaiah saying that the tenuous web cannot be wrought into a garment. The number of species of spiders in Palestine and Syria is very large.

2. סָמָמִית sēmāmīth (Pr 30²⁸). This word, from an obsolete root סָמָם sāmam, 'to poison,' refers to some noxious, reputedly poisonous creature, which is probably some species of lizard (so RV; see, further, Toy, Proverbs, ad loc.). The LXX καλαβώτης signifies a newt, gecko, or spotted lizard. The latter may be the abu burcis of the Arabs. Stellio in the Vulg. signifies the newt or gecko. Several species of lizards frequent houses, as the gecko, wall lizard, green lizard, etc. See CHAMELEON, GECKO, LIZARD.

SPIKENARD (נֵרְד nērd, νάρδος, nardus).—A fragrant, essential oil, from Nardostachys Jata-mansi, DC, a plant of the order Valerianaceae, growing in India. The shaggy stems, branching from their base, resemble the tail of an ermine. The perfume is procured from this part of the plant. It is called by the Arabs Sunbul Hindi, the Indian Spike. It is mentioned 3 times in the OT (Ca 1¹² 4¹³, [pl. nērādīm]¹⁴), and once in the NT (Mk 14³ || Jn 12³), where it is called νάρδος πιστικῆς. The root meaning of pistic is fluid. AVm gives 'pure' or 'liquid nard,' and RVm 'genuine' or 'liquid nard,' or considers that pistic may be a 'local name.' As the perfume is an oil, the etymological signification is eminently appropriate, and should be retained. The Romans used it in this state for anointing the head. It was exceedingly valuable (Jn l.c.), that used to anoint Jesus' feet being worth about £12. Pliny gives 100 denarii as the value of a pound of it. That used for our Saviour must have been of a very superior grade. The tests of genuineness given by Pliny are lightness, red colour, sweet smell, taste which leaves a dry sensation but pleasant flavour in the mouth (HN xii. 26).

SPINNING.—The notices of spinning in the Bible are very meagre, being found only in Ex 35²⁵⁻²⁶ P (מָנָה 'spin,' and מַנְיָה 'yarn') and Mt 6²³, Lk 12²⁷ (σπῆναι); but the art is implied in many other passages, such as where the curtains and hangings of the tabernacle are mentioned; and the various garments, the materials for which must have been spun. The description of the virtuous woman in Pr 31¹⁰⁻³¹ includes it as one of her chief accomplishments (vv. 13, 19); and the Heb. women were certainly skilled in working the spindle, as is evident from the articles which, acc. to P, they prepared for the tabernacle (Ex 35²⁴⁻²⁵). They used a hand-spindle, such as was in use in Egypt, and such as the women of Syria and Palestine still employ. This consisted of a whorl or hemispherical disc of wood, amber, or other material, for steadying the motion of the pin which passed through the centre (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt i. 317, ed. 1878). The Egypt. spindle was over a foot long (ib. ii. 171, 172), and, though generally of wood, was also made of rushes and palm-leaves. The distaff was no doubt employed, but the word so tr. in Pr 31¹⁹ means more properly the whorl, or the spindle itself. (See DISTAFF).

In Egypt men as well as women engaged in spinning, but among the Hebrews women only are mentioned in this connexion. The materials they used were wool and flax (Pr 31¹³), goats' hair (Ex 35²⁶), and possibly cotton, which was known in Egypt (Wilkinson, ii. 159). Even silk may have been used (cf. Ezk 16^{10, 13} and Pr 31²²), as Kenrick (Phoen. p. 246) says that raw silk was brought to Berytus and Tyre by the Persian merchants, but it was too rare to have been much employed. Raw silk is spun quite extensively at present by the Syrian women, and they use the spindle to fill up leisure hours much as Western women do the knitting-needle.

H. PORTER.

SPIRIT.—Besides its use for the Supreme Spirit, —the Spirit of God, the Spirit of the Lord, the Spirit of Jesus Christ, the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of truth, etc.,—this word is occasionally used for the extreme opposite, as πνεῦμα δαιμονίων ἀκαθάρτων (Lk 4³³). Then there is its secondary use for an influence, or power, as 'spirit of error' (1 Jn 4⁶), 'spirit of the world' (Eph 2²), 'of bondage' and 'of sonship' (Ro 8¹³), etc., yet often with a reference to the spiritual personality controlling these influences. But the main use of it is psychological, where it is immensely indebted to the Bible and to Christianity. Indeed it may be said to be an expression created by Christianity.

Two Heb. terms are tr. in EV 'spirit.' 1. רוּחַ, lit. 'wind' (so often in OT); used of the breath of life (רוּחַ חַיִּים) which animates God's creatures, Gn 6¹⁷ 7¹⁵ (both P; cf. nish-math hayyim in 27 [J]); the medium of consciousness, 1 S 30¹², Jg 15¹⁰, Job 9¹⁸; the seat of emotions, 1 K 21⁵, Is 63², Pr 15¹³, Ezk 31⁴, Jos 21¹ (courage); and so 51, Pr 19¹⁴, Is 57¹⁵; and of intelligence and will, Ezk 20¹², Pr 16³² 21² 24¹², Dt 23⁰, Job 20⁸; of an inexplicable or uncontrollable impulse, Nu 51⁴ 30, Is 19¹⁴ 23⁸ 29¹⁰ 37⁷, Hos 4¹² 5⁴. When used with reference to God, רוּחַ is used of the brooding (מְרַחֵם) and creative activity of His spirit (Gn 12, Ps 104³⁰), which imparts itself to men with the result of capacitating them for the performance of extraordinary deeds, Jg 6³⁴ (Gideon) 14⁶ 19 (Samson), and is specially noted as fitting the prophets for their work, Is 48¹⁶ 50²¹, Hos 97 (the prophet is 'the man of the spirit'), Exk 37¹ (and often). See, more fully, vol. ii. p. 402 ff.; and add Schultz, ii. 242 ff. (249 on distinction of מִן and שֶׁן); Wendt, Notiones carnis et spiritus quomodo in VT adhibeantur; Briggs, 'The uses of מִן in OT' in JBL, 1901, p. 133 ff. (synopsis of passages arranged and translated).

2. רוּחַ; is twice in EV (Job 26⁴, Pr 20²⁷) tr. 'spirit.' Its lit. meaning is 'breath.' See, also, under SOUL.

The LXX and NT πνεῦμα follows the usage of רוּחַ. In the two passages (Mt 14²⁶, Mk 6⁴⁹) where φαντασμα occurs, the AV tr. 'spirit' is replaced in RV by 'apparition.'

So far as it depends on physiological suggestion, in all the languages 'spirit' is the same,—the inhaling of the 'breath,' and so 'wind,' and more remotely 'life,' and so is closely allied to 'soul' (ψυχή), which depends upon a similar physiological derivation. In one respect the two words soul and spirit differ widely. πνεῦμα is far less than ψυχή connected with the life of man in the Greek classics. πνεῦμα is never used in classical psychology for one of the elements of man's inner life, whereas ψυχή is invariably so used. Indeed it is one of the chief distinctions of biblical from all other psychology to give πνεῦμα the supreme place as an element in the life of man. Only in the LXX and in the NT has πνεῦμα the sense of a spiritual being, or refers to man in his higher inward aspects. Thus it is a good example of the language-building and enriching power of the Bible religion. The suggestion depends mainly upon two biblical ideas, viz. the attribution of spirit in man to Divine gift or creation (Ec 12⁷), and the parallel or analogy between 'spirit' in man, and the Divine Spirit (1 Co 2¹, Ro 8¹⁰).

Sufficient attention has already been called to the frequent and intimate association of the two terms 'Soul' and 'Spirit' (see art. SOUL) occurring so often in the Bible as nearly parallel psychological expressions; yet each implying all through the characteristic distinction: 'soul,' the individual and personal life; 'spirit,' the principle of life.

There is another antithesis, more peculiarly Pauline, of the 'spirit' over against the 'flesh.' The more obvious antithesis of 'body' and 'spirit' (1a 2⁶) is upon purely natural ground. But the Pauline is a moral distinction, and belongs to specially Christian doctrine. It occurs chiefly in those passages where St. Paul is describing the conflict of the old nature, or the 'old man' as he calls it, with the new nature or the new man. Human nature, as it comes to any one through the σάρξ, manifests itself in the σάρξ, is determined by it, and called after it, comes to stand in contrast with 'spirit' (πνεῦμα), the Divine nature, or the divinely originated and sustained new nature. Thus σάρξ came at length, in distinct and pre-supposed antithesis to πνεῦμα, to signify the sinful condition of human nature, and in such a manner that this same σάρξ mediates or effectuates that sinful condition—the σάρξ ἀμαρτίας, 'the flesh determined by sin' (Ro 8³). In this antithesis there is progress or intensification in the meaning of πνεῦμα as well as of σάρξ. The πνεῦμα in man, which is the element originally created by God, and which ought to rule or govern his whole nature, is used by St. Paul for the new nature divinely originated in the Christian, so that a direct antithesis is brought out between 'flesh' and 'spirit,' and everything πνευματικόν, spiritual, is a Divine product or creation, according to that new nature.

This use of πνευματικόν for everything determined or influenced by the Divine πνεῦμα extends beyond St. Paul's writings, and is quite general in the Epistles of the NT. There is the 'spiritual house' (οἶκος πνευματικός, 1 P 2⁵) because 'built up of living stones'; 'spiritual sacrifices,' i.e. offerings fixed or determined by the Spirit (ib.); 'spiritual understanding' (Col 1⁹); 'spiritual songs' (ὧδαι πνευματικαί, Col 3¹⁶); 'spiritual food, drink, rock' (βρῶμα, πόμα, πέτρα, 1 Co 10²⁻⁴). In two sets of passages St. Paul contrasts it with ψυχικόν (1 Co 2¹ 15⁴⁴⁻⁴⁶). There is one curious exception from this Pauline use of it for divine, viz. Eph 6¹² τὰ πνευματικὰ τῆς πονηρίας = 'wicked spirits,' or something equivalent.

There is another antithesis in which St. Paul places it as contrasted with νοῦς or σύνεσις, where the intention plainly is to contrast the action of the 'understanding' in man with that of spiritual or ecstatic impulse even in a Christian (1 Co 14¹⁴⁻¹⁵). It is also once or twice opposed to γράμμα, where inwardness or reality is the thing to be brought out (Ro 2²⁹ 7⁶, 2 Co 3⁶).

There are two things mainly noticeable and distinctive in this biblical use of 'spirit.' The first is the habit of biblical writers to explain the 'spirit' in the natural man as the product or creation directly of God, and as accounted for only by the direct contact of man with the Almighty in his origin. This is peculiarly prevalent in the OT (Gn 2⁷, Is 42⁵). Then there is the assertion of a parallelism and communication between the self-conscious, inner life of man—his spirit—with the Spirit of God (1 Co 2¹¹⁻¹², Ro 8¹⁻¹⁷, Philem 2⁵). There is a foundation laid in this way for the whole spiritual life of man, and especially for the renewed and redeemed life of which, according to Christianity, he is made a partaker.

SPITE.—Like DESPITE (which see), 'spite' means in AV 'injury' (rather out of contempt than malice). It occurs only Ps 10¹⁴ 'Thou beholdest mischief and spite' (צָרָה, properly 'vexation'). Cf. Child's Ballads, v. 299—

'Day and night he'll work my spite,
And hanged I shall be.'

The adv. 'spitefully' is used in the same sense; the phrase is 'entreat spitefully,' Mt 22⁶, Lk 18²¹ (ὀβριζῶ, RV 'entreat shamefully').

SPONGE (AV sponge, σπγγος, spongia).—The medium by which vinegar or sour wine was carried to the mouth of Jesus on the cross (Mt 27⁴⁸, Mk 15³⁶, Jn 19²⁹). This well-known substance is a porous, fibrous framework, composed of a material called keratode, invested by a fleshy covering and lining of amœboid bodies. Sponges grow only in sea water, near the coast, and mostly in the warmer seas of the globe, although some kinds are found even in the polar regions. Sponge fishing is a considerable industry along the coasts of Syria, Asia Minor, and the Ægean Sea. The divers go out in row-boats or sail-boats, a short distance from the shore; they then strip, and holding in their hands, high above their heads, a heavy stone attached to a rope, fill their chests with air, and then plunge, stone downmost, and so rapidly reach the bottom. They often dive to a depth of 60 ft. or more. They then walk or creep quickly along the bottom, holding the stone to steady themselves, and tear the sponges off the stones to which they are attached, and put them into a netted bag hung around their neck. When they are exhausted they jerk the rope, and their companions quickly haul them to the surface. Few can stay under water more than 60 seconds, none as long as 100. Their occupation usually develops emphysema, and other diseases of the lungs, from which they are apt to die early.

STACHYS (Στάχυς).—The name of a Christian greeted by St. Paul in Ro 16⁹, and described as 'my beloved.' The name is rare, but found among members of the Imperial household (CIL vi. 8607). He is commemorated Oct. 31, and later legends will be found in Acta Sanct., Oct., vol. xiii. p. 687.

A. C. HEADLAM.

STACTE (στακτή nātāph).—The Heb. word occurs twice: Ex 30³⁴ (cf. Sir 24¹⁸), LXX στακτή, Vulg. stacte, RVM opobalsamum; Job 36²⁷ (LXX σταγῶνες, Vulg. stillæ, both of which signify 'drops,' and refer to water). The Heb. נָטָף nātāph (= Arab. natāf) signifies to drop or distil. As the exudation of all gums is in drops, the etymology does not help us. But it is evident from the context in Exodus that a fragrant gum is intended. Many identify the στακτή here mentioned with the gum from the libneh (= storax, see POPLAR). But στακτή means primarily myrrh. Myrrh, however, is mentioned by its proper name מֵר (v. 23), coupled with דֶּרֹר dērōr, which AV tr. 'pure,' and RV 'flowing.' The LXX tr. this expression by ἀνθος σμύρνης ἐκλεκτός; Vulg. primæ myrrhæ et electæ. Dioscorides describes two kinds of stacte, one of which is pure myrrh, and the other made from storax and fat. It is unlikely that any such inferior compound as the latter would be used in making the sacred incense. It is most likely then that nātāph, and its LXX and Vulg. equivalent stacte, refer to myrrh in drops or tears, which is the purest form.

STAFF.—See ROD and SCEPTRE.

STAGGER.—In Ro 4²⁰ 'stagger' has the meaning of 'stumble,' and so literally 'waver' (as RV), 'He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief' (οὐ διεκρίθη). Tindale uses the stronger form of the same word, 'He staggered not'; Rhem. is the first to use 'stagger.' The word is of Icel. origin, stakra, freq. of staka, to push. Cf. Mt 21²¹ Rhem. 'Amen, I say to you, if you shall have faith, and stagger not, not only that of the figtree shall you do.' J. HASTINGS.

STALLION (ἵππος εἰς ὄχειαν, only in Sir 33⁶).—Most of the horses used for riding and driving, and many of those employed as pack animals, in the East, are entire. Geldings are made only of the inferior breeds.

STANDARD.—See BANNER and POLE.

STAR.—The Bible treats the stars as the noblest work of the Creator (Ps 8³ 19⁴, Job 25⁵, Wis 7²⁹), insisting on their brightness (Dn 12³), their height above the earth (Is 14¹³, Ob 4, Job 22¹²), and especially their number (Gn 15⁵ 22¹⁷ 26⁴, Ex 32¹³, Dt 10¹⁰ 10²² 28⁶², Jer 33²², Neh 9²², He 11¹² etc.). They are sometimes poetically represented as living beings ('sang together,' Job 38⁷; 'fought against Sisera,' Jg 5²⁰), and the darkening of the stars is treated as a sign of coming distress (Jl 2¹⁰ 3¹⁶, Am 8⁹, Is 13¹⁰ 34⁴, Ezk 32⁷, Mt 24²⁹, Mk 13²⁵, Lk 21²⁶, Rev pass.). But they were created by God (Gn 1¹⁴, Am 5⁸, Ps 74¹⁶ 136⁷, Job 9⁷, Sir 43³) to give light (Gn 1¹⁶, Jer 31²⁶); He gave them their paths according to fixed laws (Jer 33²², Job 38³¹), and they are subject to Him (Job 9⁷, Is 45¹², Ps 147⁴, Bar 3³⁴, Ep. Jer 6⁹), who calls them by their names (Is 40²⁶). It follows that star-worship is rigorously forbidden (Dt 4¹⁹ 17^{2,3}); though introduced by Manasseh (2 K 21³, cf. 23^{4,5,11}; Am 5²⁶ does not necessarily imply its existence at an earlier date, cf. Driver in Smith, DB, art. 'Amos'), and several times mentioned at a later date (Zeph 1⁵, Jer 7¹⁸ 19¹³ 44¹⁷, Wis 13⁷), it is always spoken of with reprobation (cf. also 2 K 17¹⁶, Jer 44²⁵⁻²⁷). On the sources of this star-worship among the Jews see W. Lotz in Herzog, RE xiv. 694. For the stars known to the Israelites and for astrological views see ASTRONOMY AND ASTROLOGY; for the star of the Magi see MAGI.

STATER.—See MONEY, vol. iii. p. 428^b.

STEALING.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, vol. i. p. 522^b, s. 'Theft,' and MAN-STEALING.

STEEL is a form of iron intermediate in composition between cast iron and wrought iron, and combining the most useful properties of both (see IRON). The word occurs thrice in AV for נְהָרָה (2 S 22³⁵, Job 20²⁴, Ps 18²⁴), and once for נְהָרָה (Jer 15¹²). In these cases the reference is not to steel but to brass (so RV) or bronze (see BRASS).

'Steel' appears in RV only in Nah 2³, where it is the translation of נְהָרָה (AV 'torches'). The word נְהָרָה occurs nowhere else, but its Arabic and Syriac cognates have the meaning of steel, or iron of fine quality. The 'fire' or 'flashing' of steel in this passage may be understood either of the appearance of the metal-plated chariots themselves or of the glitter of the 'scythes' attached to their wheels. Against this latter supposition is the fact that such scythes are never represented on Assyrian chariots, but appear to have been introduced for the first time by the Persians (see CHARIOT).

JAMES PATRICK.

STEPHANAS (Στεφανᾶς, Stephanas; the name occurs CIG ii. 3378).—A Christian of Corinth, 1 Co 1¹⁶ 16^{16,17}. St. Paul mentions the household of Stephanas as one of the few exceptions to the practice which he had followed of not personally baptizing his converts. At the end of the Epistle the same household are spoken of as the first-fruits of Achaia. They are said to have given themselves to the ministry of the saints, and the Corinthians are exhorted to obey such persons and all who work and labour with them. From the next verse we gather that Stephanas himself was with St. Paul at Ephesus at the time when the Epistle was written. In Clement of Rome's Epistle, ch. xlii., we are told that the apostles, preaching from city to city and country to country, appointed their first-fruits, having tested them by the spirit, to be bishops and deacons of those that should believe (καθίστανον τὰς ἀρχαὶς αὐτῶν . . . εἰς ἐπισκόπους καὶ διακόνους τῶν μελλόντων πιστεύειν, Clem. Rom. i. 42). It would be beside our purpose to discuss the exact meaning of this passage, but it may reasonably be held that Stephanas, and perhaps some members of his household, had been appointed to a position in the nascent church at Corinth, which implied on the one side ministry (διακονία), on the other side some recognition of their authority. If this was not a local ministry, in the later sense of the term, there were here the germs out of which it grew.

A. C. HEADLAM.

STEPHEN (Στέφανος, Ac 6-8).—Some dissatisfaction having been expressed by the Grecian Jews or Hellenists in the infant Church at Jerusalem regarding the distribution of alms among their widows, seven brethren were chosen, and solemnly set apart by the apostles, to undertake the administration of the poor-table. Of the seven (see DEACON), Stephen is the first named (Ac 6³), and the most distinguished, though in a sphere, strictly speaking, beyond his office, viz., as a preacher and a worker of miracles—characteristically apostolic functions. Nothing is known of his conversion to Christianity, though Epiphanius (Hær. xx. 4) records that he was one of the Seventy. It is not certain that he was a Hellenist, though his Greek name, the fact that a committee largely Hellenistic would probably be chosen to deal with the grievances of the party, and to some extent his opinions, make the supposition very probable. His character and abilities as given in Ac 6 are of the highest: 'a man full of faith and of the Holy Spirit' (v.⁵, cf. 7³⁵), 'full of grace (AV faith) and power' (v.⁸), 'the wisdom and the Spirit by which he spake' (v.¹⁰); cf. also the qualifications necessary for the office (v.³), and St. Paul's words, 'Stephen thy witness' (22²⁰). Stephen seems to have aroused the hostile notice of the Hellenistic synagogues (see below) by the wonders and signs which he wrought among the people (6⁸), but probably also by the substance and manner of his preaching; in any case they challenged him to disputation. But his skill in maintaining his opinions was so irresistible, that his adversaries, discomfited in argument, raised the charge of blasphemy, procured witnesses to testify to it, and thus succeeded in having him arrested and brought before the Sanhedrin. Here he was formally accused of speaking blasphemous words against the Temple and the Law, having said, as the false witnesses maintained, that Jesus of Nazareth would destroy 'this place,' and change the customs delivered by Moses. Stephen was unperturbed by these accusations; his face appeared to those present 'as the face of an angel' (6¹⁰⁻¹²). Being asked by the high priest to answer to the charges, Stephen made a long speech, traversing the greater part of the history of the chosen people, from the call of Abraham, through Joseph and Moses, to David, and the building of the Temple by Solomon. Towards the close he fearlessly turned to his judges, rebuked them as 'stiffnecked and uncircumcised in heart and ears,' and as those who, carrying on the unholy work of the persecutors of the prophets, had become the betrayers and murderers of Him whom the prophets had foretold (7¹⁻⁵³). These words were the occasion of a furious outburst of wrath on the part of the assembly; and when Stephen, undismayed, looked upwards, and declared that he saw the heavens opened and the Son of Man standing on the right hand of God, the exasperated hearers violently rushed upon him, dragged him forth by one of the gates of the city, and stoned him to death. The witnesses (who according to Dt 17⁷ had to take the lead in casting the stones) placed their garments in the keeping of a young man named Saul (cf. 22²⁰)—the first historical mention of a great name. Among the last words of Stephen were, 'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit,' and 'Lord, lay not this sin to their charge,' which are very similar to two of our Lord's sayings on the cross, Lk 23^{36, 34}. In fact, the bearing of Stephen throughout—his courage, his calm, his patience, his gentleness—accords remarkably with the demeanour of his Master in like circumstances. The mutilated body was reverently interred by 'devout men' (7⁵⁴⁻⁸²).

The vividness of the narrative hardly leaves room for the supposition that the stoning of Stephen was a legal execution, i.e. one carried out with the sanction of the Roman authorities, or, indeed, that it was other than a murder. But the Sanhedrin may have been able to represent the whole incident as a mere tumultuous outbreak, for which they could not officially be called to account.

A few other minor points require notice: (1) As to the number of synagogues implied in 6⁹, whether five, or three, or two, or only one (each number has had its advocate among expositors), the Greek seems to support the view of Wendt, viz. that two synagogues are meant: (a) of the Libertines (Cyrenians and Alexandrians), and (b) of those from Asia and Cilicia. See LIBERTINES: Sanday, Expositor, viii. p. 327 (third series); also Winer-Moulton, Grammar, p. 160 note. (2) The date of the martyrdom of Stephen can be determined only approximately: Bengel gives A.D. 30, Ewald A.D. 38, and every intervening year has had its supporter. Acts seems to place the event shortly before St. Paul's conversion; certainly nearer to that event than to the terminus a quo, the Crucifixion (say 29-30). Recent chronologists have somewhat narrowed the termini of St. Paul's conversion: von Soden 31-35, Harnack 30, Ramsay 33; see CHRONOLOGY OF NT, vol. i. p. 424 (C) and Table. (3) Who are the persons covered by the term 'devout men,' ἀγαθοὶ ἄνθρωποι (82)? Hardly proselytes (Renan, Apostles, viii.) of either class, as St. Luke regularly uses προσέλυτοι and φασαριμαῖοι (or εἰσβασιμαῖοι) τῶν θύων for proselytes of the higher and the lower rank respectively, and elsewhere applies εὐλαβέως to Jews (Lk 23, Ac 25 2212 RV). It is also unlikely that they were Christians, else we should have expected the designation to be μαθηταὶ or ἐδιδάκται. Most probably they were Jews who took a sympathetic interest in the fortunes of the Church, and who may have known and respected Stephen. Cf. Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus (Jn 19^{38, 39}), and see Knowling in Expositor's Greek Testament, ii., ad loc. (4) Traditions about Stephen. According to an early tradition, the scene of the martyrdom was the open ground outside the Damascus Gate on the north; but about the 15th cent. this gave place to the popular belief that it was on the east, where, accordingly, St. Stephen's Gate is now located (see Conybeare and Howson, St. Paul, small ed. p. 61). Another legend relates that, through the friendliness of Gamaliel, the body of Stephen was buried at Kafir Gamala, a day's journey from Jerusalem, all the apostles being present. This story probably originated after the so-called 'Invention and Translation of the Relics of St. Stephen,' the chief details of which are that in the year 415 Gamaliel appeared in vision to Lucian, parish priest of Kafir Gamala, and indicated the resting-place of the remains of Stephen, which were then disinterred, carried to Jerusalem, and buried in the church of Mount Zion; it was also said that the exhumation disclosed a tablet bearing the Aramaic name of Stephen, Kellu (Syr. kelila, 'crown' = εὐκαλῶς).

The Speech of Stephen.—The historical narrative given by Stephen shows a considerable number of divergences from the OT account; e.g. according to Ac 7²⁻⁴ Abraham receives his call before his migration to Haran, in Gn 12¹ while in Haran; the giving of the Law is connected with angels in Ac 7⁵³, while Ex 19 has no mention of angels. 'Remphan' in 7⁵³ shows that Stephen was quoting from the LXX; the Hebrew has 'Chiun' (Am 5²⁶); see CHIUN. A full list of these variations is given by Farrar, St. Paul, small ed. p. 92 note.

The authenticity of the speech has been much canvassed; e.g. Weizsäcker (and he is representative of many more) regards the speech as a 'doctrinal exposition,' i.e. a later composition; but see ACTS, vol. i. p. 33 f. There has been an almost equal diversity of opinion regarding the purpose of the address. Now, this very diversity seems a remarkably convincing proof of its substantial historicity; a mere fabricator would surely have taken care to leave his readers in little doubt as to his 'tendency.' Was the speech completed? Was it intended as an answer to the charges made by the false witnesses? Or was it meant as a vindication, in whole or in part, of the opinions by which Stephen had originally provoked opposition? As to the first of these questions, it may be said that the speech has all the appearance of being complete; the fact that Stephen did not proceed to recount the nation's story beyond the building of Solomon's temple is sufficiently explained if we remember that the legal and institutional status quo was traditionally held to have been but little altered subsequent to that event. As to the second, it is certainly difficult to maintain that the address is a counter-plea to the very definite charges of 6¹³⁻¹⁴. It remains, then, to seek an answer to the question whether the speech was, so to speak, a plea of veritas, i.e. a re-declaration of what Stephen had said against the Temple and the Law. If we answer affirmatively, the climax will be found in vv. 46-53, where it seems to be suggested that the building of the Temple was an act contrary to God's will, a continuation of the contumacy that had fashioned the golden calf, and taken up the tabernacle of Molech (vv. 41, 43); while, if we answer negatively, the essential point will lie in vv. 51-53, where Stephen declares that (not he and his brethren, but) his hearers and judges were the real violators of God's commands. The former view is usually adopted by those who regard Stephen as the first to discern that the gospel could not be confined within the bonds of Judaism, as, in fact, the forerunner of St. Paul. But it should be observed that if Stephen had spoken (as the false witnesses said) against the Temple, and had affirmed that Jesus would change the customs of Moses, his adversaries would have been his own Christian brethren, whereas he was held in the highest repute by them. Further, such words as 'the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands' can hardly be taken as implying any disparagement of the Temple, since similar language was used by Solomon himself (1 K 8²⁷, 2 Ch 6¹⁸). Finally, Stephen speaks of the Law in terms of the highest respect (7^{33, 35}); and his references to the call of Abraham in Mesopotamia (v.²), to the Divine favour vouchsafed to Joseph and Moses in Egypt, and to the subsequent revelation accorded to the latter in Midian (v.^{20ff.}), while they might be interpreted as signifying that the Divine purpose and blessing were not limited to the Holy Land, are rather to be understood in the light of the fact that Stephen represents Canaan as the destination of the Chosen People from the first; the patriarchs are buried there (v.¹⁶) as in a country really their own; and the sojourn in Egypt (still more the deportation to Babylon) is plainly regarded as a misfortune. On the other hand, if Stephen was at one with his opponents (as with his brethren) in their high appreciation of the Holy Land, the Law, and the Temple, how could the charge of blasphemy arise? The witnesses might be false, but there must have been some colourable reason for an accusation so definite. But it seems a quite satisfactory answer to this to say that Stephen had attacked the traditional Law (as did Jesus Himself, Mt 15¹⁻²⁰ = Mk 7¹⁻²³), which was freely held to have authority equal with the Mosaic, and that he may have urged, in the manner of Isaiah, that 'temple-treading' and external observances did not ensure acceptance with God. It is quite conceivable that such teaching would be misunderstood, and even misrepresented as blasphemy against 'the law and this holy place,' or even against God (6¹¹). On this view, then, the speech was not so much the advancing of a new theological position against an older; its purpose was rather ethical and personal. God had vouchsafed great privileges to the nation,—the land, an ordained leader (Moses), the Law, the Tabernacle, and the Temple,—but they had been rendered of none effect by the people's contumacy and disobedience. Doubtless, as Spitta makes out, there is an unmistakable intention to draw or suggest a parallel between Moses and Jesus, 'the prophet whom the Lord will raise up unto you . . . like unto me' (7³⁷), and the treatment accorded to each; but this is meant to give point to the general theme of the speech, viz. that the members of the council, and all in league with them, had proved themselves to be only too truly the children of ungrateful and unworthy forefathers. It is thus questionable how far we are entitled to speak of Stephen as the forerunner of St. Paul. Even if we accept Spitta's view that the erection of the Temple is represented by Stephen as an unauthorized and presumptuous act, this is something very different from St. Paul's conception of the national institutions as having had validity for their own time. Certainly Stephen never asserts the secondary and provisional character of the Law, nor does he suggest the call of the Gentiles—two of St. Paul's most characteristic tenets. In short, Stephen seems to regard Christianity (as did the apostles generally) as the continuation and development of the Divine purpose in the history of Israel; St. Paul sees in it the beginning of a new order of things—another dispensation.

STEWARD occurs six times in AV of OT. It is used in Gn 15¹ of Eliezer, where for 'steward of my house' RV rightly substitutes 'he that shall be possessor of my house' (Heb. בְּרִיתִי מִן־בְּתוּרִי). For the correct text and meaning of this verse see Kautzsch-Socin's Genesis, Comm. of Del. and Dillm. ad loc., and above all Ball's note in Haupt's OT. In Gn 43¹⁹ 44¹ 'steward' is tr^a (both AV and RV) of מִן־עַל־בֵּיתוֹ 'he who was over his (Joseph's) house.' The same tr^a is given by RV in 43¹⁶, where the Heb. is the same, but AV arbitrarily and inconsistently gives 'ruler.' See art. JOSEPH, vol. ii. p. 772^a. In 1 K 16⁹ for AV 'steward of his (Elah's) house' RV substitutes 'who was over the household' (מִן־עַל־בֵּיתוֹ). See art. KING, vol. ii. p. 843^b. The only remaining instance in AV is 1 Ch 28¹. The Heb. is מִן־עַל־בֵּיתוֹ, which RV tr. 'rulers.' In Dn 1¹¹, where AV gives MELZAR as a prop. name, RV is perh. correct in translating 'the steward' (מִן־עַל־בֵּיתוֹ) with the article shows at least that we have here some title, although its meaning is not certain).

In NT 'steward' is tr^a of ἐπίτροπος in Mt 20⁸ (the steward of the lord of the vineyard), Lk 8² (Herod's steward). This word occurs also in Gal 4² (AV 'tutors,' RV 'guardians') and twice in Apocr., 2 Mac 11¹ 13² (AV 'protector,' RV 'guardian'). Elsewhere in NT it is the tr^a of οἰκονόμος, which is used both literally and metaphorically, Lk 12⁴² 16¹⁻² (the cogn. vb. οἰκονομῶ occurs v.², cf. 2 Mac 3⁴), 1 Co 4¹⁻², Tit 1⁷, 1 P 4¹⁰. In Gal 4² οἰκονόμοι is coupled with ἐπίτροποι (see above), and is tr^a in AV 'governors,' RV 'stewards.' The former of these Gr. terms occurs also in Ro 16²⁷, where RV has 'treasurer' (cf. 1 Es 4⁴⁰), AV 'chamberlain.'

Stewardship (οἰκονομία) in lit. sense occurs in Lk 16²⁻³ (AV and RV), and in metaphorical sense is substituted by RV for AV 'dispensation' in 1 Co 9¹⁷. So RVm gives 'stewardship' in Eph 3², Col 1², 1 Ti 1⁴ where 'dispensation' stands in the text.

STILL.—1. As adj.: the general meaning is silent, as Ps 46¹⁰ 'Be still' (שָׁקֵט, RVm 'Let be,' LXX σιχαλάσατε); Ps 83¹ 'Be not still, O God'; Is 42¹⁴ 'I have been still, and refrained myself; now will I cry'; Mk 4³⁰ 'Peace, be still' (ἡσυχία, lit. 'be muzzled'). Cf. Ac 18⁹ Wyc. 'Speke and be not stille' (μὴ σιωπήσῃς). Or it means a low sound, as 1 K 19¹² 'A still small voice' (ἡσυχία, lit. as RVm 'a sound of gentle stillness,' LXX φωνὴ ἄσπας λεπτῆς); Ps 23² 'He leade me beside the still waters' (שְׁכֵן־מַנְתִּי־עַל־מַיִם, RVm 'waters of rest,' LXX ἐπὶ ὕδατος ἀναπαύσεως: the idea is 'waters that refresh,' or 'waters that are resting-places' [Del., Cheyne], not 'softly flowing waters' as in Is 8⁶).

From meaning 'silent' the word passes naturally to mean inactive, as Jg 18⁹ 'Are ye still? be not slothful to go'; 1 K 22³ 'Know ye not that Ramoth in Gilead is ours, and we be still, and take it not out of the hand of the king of Syria?'

2. As adv.: the idea of persistence is more prominent than in modern usage. Cf. Hall, Works, ii. 14, 'God uses still to goe a way by himselfe'; Adams, 2 Peter, p. 46, 'If the hand be still striking and stabbing, there is a bloody heart'; Shaks. Hamlet, II. ii. 42—

'Thou still hast been the author of good tidings.'

So 1 S 26²⁸ 'Thou shalt both do great things, and also shalt still prevail'; 2 S 16⁹ 'He came forth, and cursed still as he came'; Ps 84⁴ 'They will be still praising thee'; and Jer 23¹⁷ 'They say still unto them that despise me' (RV 'They say continually').

STOICS (Στωϊκοί).—When St. Paul at Athens encountered the Stoics (Ac 17¹⁸), they regarded his teaching as an interesting novelty: and so in some respects it was. Jesus and the Resurrection were indeed 'strange gods,' but, for all that, there was more in common between St. Paul and his hearers than either party was perhaps aware of. To begin with, the Jews had a natural affinity with Stoicism. What nation indeed could stand more in need of the philosophy of endurance than that whose whole history was one long record of persecution? The 'courage never to submit or yield,' which animated Stoicism, was the moral also of the story of the 'seven brethren with their mother' (2 Mac 7). The Jews claimed kindred with the Spartans, who were the ideal of Stoicism, and admired the Romans, of whom Stoicism was the ideal (1 Mac 12). But, in the next place, Stoicism, as has been shown by Sir Alexander Grant, was not a genuine product of Hellenic thought, but an importation from the East. 'Its essence,' he says, 'consists in the introduction of the Semitic temperament and a Semitic spirit into Gr. philosophy' (Ethics of Arist. vi.). Not one of the famous Stoic teachers was a native of Greece proper. Zeno, the founder of the school, who flourished about B.C. 278, was a native of Citium in Cyprus, a Greek town in which there was a large infusion of Phœnician settlers (Diog. Laert. vii. § 1). Hence Zeno is sometimes called 'the Phœnician' (ib. ii. § 114), and his master Crates, the Cynic, used jocularly to address him as Φοινικίδιον. His successor, Cleanthes (about B.C. 263), was a native of Assos. The third head of the school, Chrysippus (B.C. 280-207; ib. vii. § 184), whose intellectual ability caused him to be regarded as its second founder, came from Cilicia, either from Soli or from St. Paul's native city, Tarsus. Tarsus, indeed, was a very stronghold of Stoicism. To it belonged Zeno, a disciple of Chrysippus, who seems himself at one time to have been head of the school (ib. vii. §§ 35, 41, 84). Though Strabo in his account of Tarsus (xiv. p. 674) says nothing of this person, he mentions among the Stoic teachers who had adorned that city, 'Antipater, Archedemus, and Nestor, and further, the two Athenodori.' Of these Antipater was a disciple of Diogenes of Babylon (Cic. de Off. iii. § 51), one of the three philosophers who were sent on the famous embassy to Rome in B.C. 155 (Aul. Gell. Noct. Att. vi. xiv. 9). He was himself the instructor of Panatius of Rhodes (Cic. de Div. i. § 6), who was the friend of the younger Africanus, and the teacher of Posidonius (of Apamea in Syria), who in his turn numbered Cicero among his hearers. Archedemus is mentioned by Diogenes Laertius (vii. §§ 40, 68, 84) in a way that would lead us to think that he followed Chrysippus. Of Nestor the Stoic nothing more is known. Of the two Athenodori, the earlier, known as Cordylion, died in the house of Cato Uticensis; the later, who was also known as 'the Kananite,' from a village (Kanna) in Cilicia, was the friend and adviser of Augustus. In his old age he was given power to restore civil order in his native city.

St. Paul then, coming from Tarsus, the home of so many of the Stoics, was not likely to have been a stranger to their way of thinking. In his speech on the Areopagus he seems to have addressed himself more directly to the Stoic part of his audience. He deftly quoted part of a line with which they were familiar, 'His offspring, too, are we,' probably thinking of the Hymn of Cleanthes, though the precise form in which he quotes it comes from the contemporary poet Aratus.* Another point in which the apostle's language is coloured by the presence of Stoic auditors, is in the appeal he makes to their sentiment of cosmopolitanism—'and he made of one every nation of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth,' while the words which follow, 'having determined their appointed seasons, and the bounds of their habitation,' express a conception of fate and providence, which was common ground to the apostle and his hearers.

* It may be remarked that the language of He 4¹² is strongly suggestive of the Hymn of Cleanthes (lines 9-13), which might

The constructive era of Greek thought had already passed away before the Stoics appeared upon the scene. Neither they nor the Epicureans extended the bounds of thought, but only emphasized certain aspects in the philosophy of their predecessors. Both schools were intensely practical, and endeavoured to make philosophy a 'life,' as Christianity afterwards announced itself to be. Both also were systems of materialism, and agreed in discarding the abstractions of earlier thought. The Stoics adopted the physical theory of Heraclitus, the Epicureans that of Democritus. With both, however, physics were a mere scaffolding for ethics; but the Stoics paid great attention to logic, while the Epicureans neglected this department of philosophy. What was special to the Stoics was the exalted tone of their morality, their grim earnestness, and their devout submission to the Divine will. Of the Stoic physics we seem to have a trace in the doctrine of the destruction of the world by fire (2 P 3⁷⁻¹⁰⁻¹³). The idea of the soul going up to heaven at death is not alien to their philosophy. For death with them was the resolution of man's compound nature into its elements, and the soul, whose nature was fire (cf. Verg. Æn. vi. 730, 'igneus est ollis vigor et cælestis origo'), struggled upward to its native home in the empyrean. Without dogmatizing on disputed ground, it is at least interesting to compare Ec 12⁷ 'And the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit return unto God who gave it,' with what Velleius Paterculus (ii. 123), echoing the Stoic doctrine, says of the death of Augustus: 'in sua resolutus initia . . . animam cælestem cælo reddidit.'

The doctrine of the Logos may not have come exclusively from Greek sources; but at all events Lactantius (Div. Inst. iv. 9) admits that Zeno had anticipated the Christian teaching: 'Hunc sermonem divinum ne philosophi quidem ignoraverunt: siquidem Zenon rerum naturæ dispositorem atque opificem universitatis λόγον prædicat, quem et fatum et necessitatem rerum et deum et animum Jovis nuncupat.' The words δὲ ὃν τὰ πάντα, applied to God in He 2¹⁰, are suggestive of the Stoic explanation of the name of the Supreme Being: 'Δία μὲν γὰρ φασί, δὲ ὃν τὰ πάντα,' while the words in St. Paul's sermon, 'in him we live,' recall the explanation offered of the other form of the name: 'Ζῆνα δὲ καλοῦσι, παρ' ὃσον τοῦ ζῆν αὐτῷ ἐστιν.'

The problem of fate and freewill, which was hardly raised by the Socratic philosophers, was much discussed by the Stoics. In this also they display an affinity with Semitic speculation. For this was the philosophical problem which divided the Jewish schools, as it has since divided the Christian Churches. The Pharisees leaned strongly to predestination, as we can see from the sentiments of Gamaliel (Ac 5²⁹) and from those of St. Paul himself. Josephus, himself a Pharisee, says that that sect was very like the sect of the Stoics among the Greeks (Vita, ch. ii.).

Another point of resemblance, which justifies this remark of Josephus, is the Stoic belief in a future life. It is true they did not regard the souls even of good men as being absolutely immortal. But they held that these were destined to be used as an argument, so far as it goes, in favour of the Pauline authorship of that Epistle.

to last until the next re-absorption of all things into the Divine nature. God was defined by the Stoics as 'an individual made up of all being, incorruptible and ungenerated, the fashioner of the ordered frame of the universe, who at certain periods of time absorbs all being into himself, and again generates it from himself' (Diog. Laert. vii. § 137).

Instead of drawing out further, as might be done, the parallelism between Stoicism and Christianity, we will here close with a caution. It does not follow that, because we find a Stoic notion in the Bible, it has got into it from the Stoics. It may originally have come to the Stoics from the Jews, or both may have borrowed from the same source.

LITERATURE.—The chief ancient authorities for a knowledge of the Stoics are Cicero's philosophical works, especially de Finitibus, Book iii.; Diogenes Laertius, Book vii.; Stobaeus, Ecl. Eth. pp. 186-184; Plutarch, de Repuantia Stoica, and de Placitis Stoicorum; Sextus Empiricus, adversus Mathematicos. Among modern works may be mentioned Zeller, Stoics and Epicureans; Sir Alexander Grant, The Ethics of Aristotle, Essay vi.; Lightfoot, Philippians, Excursus on 'St. Paul and Seneca.' ST. STOMACH.—In modern Eng. 'stomach' is confined to its literal meaning of the receptacle for food in the body. In this sense it occurs in 1 Ti 5:3 'Use a little wine for thy stomach's sake' (δια τὸν στομάχον). But in older Eng. the word was used figuratively, as we use 'heart' or 'spirit,' and expressed either courage or pride.

The transition from the literal to the fig. sense was the easier that 'stomach' was freely used for appetite. Thus Fuller, Holy State, 185, 'A rich man told a poore man that he walked to get a stomach for his meat: And I, said the poore man, walk to get meat for my stomach.' The sense of courage ('heart') is seen in Ridley, Works, 359, 'Blessed be God, which was and is the giver of that and all godly strength and stomach in the time of adversity'; and in Coverdale's tr. of Jos 2:11 'And sence we herde therof, oure hert hath failed us, nether is there a good stomacke more in eny man, by the reason of youre commynge.' Cov. even applies the word to Jehovah in Is 42:13 'The Lord shal come forth as a gyaunte, and take a stomacke to him like a fresh man of warre.' The sense of pride is seen in Knox, Works, iii. 187, 'And ye half a Quene, a woman of a stout somak, more styffe in opinoun nor flexibill to the veritie'; Golding, Cæsar's Job, 574, 'Therefore when wee come to heare a sermon, let us not carie such a loftie stomacke with us, as to chercke agaynst God when we be reproved for our sinnes'; and Fuller, Holy Warre, 99, 'A man whose stomach was as high as his birth.' This is the meaning of the word in Ps 10:7, Pr. Bk. 'a proud look and high stomach,' where Earle quotes in illustration Katharine's character of Wolsey from Henry VIII. iv. ii. 33—

'He was a man
Of an unbounded stomach, ever ranking Himself with princes.'

The word occurs figuratively in the sense of courage in 2 Mac 7:21 'Stirring up her womanish thoughts with a manly stomach' (ἀρσενι θυμῷ, RV 'with manly passion'). J. HASTINGS.

STOMACHER is the EV tr. of לְחָיִים, Is 3:24 (only). The derivation of the Hebrew term is very uncertain. There is no probability in the supposition that it represents two words, לָחַץ 'width' and לַי 'mantle,' although the sense thus obtained would yield an effective contrast with the following קִטְלֵךְ קִטְלֵךְ: 'instead of a flowing mantle, a girding of sackcloth' (Cheyne, PB, cf. Dillm.-Kittel, Jes. ad loc.). Others think that the antithesis suggests that לְחָיִים is a kind of ornamental girdle (see art. DRESS, vol. i. p. 628^a). The LXX tr. by χιτὼν μεσπορφύρεα, Aq. ζώνη ἀγαλλιάσεως, Symm. στηθοδεσμός, Vulg. facia pectoralis.

The Eng. word 'stomacher' was applied to that part of a woman's dress which covered the breast and the pit of the stomach. It was usually much ornamented, and looked upon as an evidence of wealth. Coverdale translates Is 47:2 (of the degraded daughter of Babylon), 'Thou shalt bringe forth the querne, and gryned meel, put downe thy stomacher, make bare thy knees, and shalt wado thorow the water ryvers.' J. A. SELBIE.

STONE.—1. A fragment of rock of any size from a pebble up to the most massive block. In AV 'stone' usually stands for אֶבֶן or λίθος; but it also occurs as the tr. of כֶּלֶב (Ps 137:141^a, RV 'rock'), of נֶזֶר (Ex 4:25, AV 'sharp stone,' RV 'flint,' Job 22:24), of נֶזֶר (Job 41:20, RV 'potsherd'), of נֶזֶר (2 S 17:13, Am 9:2, AVm), of πέτρος (2 Mac 1:16 4:41, Jn 1:42), and of ψῆφος (Rev 2:17). 'Gravel stones' is for נֶזֶר (La 3:16); 'corner stones' for אֲבִנֵּי (Ps 144:12); 'chief corner stone' for ἀκρογωνιαίος (Eph 2:20, 1 P 2:6); 'a heap of stones' for קִבְרֵיהֶם (Pr 26:8 RV); and 'hewn stone' for נֶזֶר (Ex 20:25, 1 K 5:17 6:36 7:9, 11, 12, 1s 9:10, La 3:9, Ezk 40:42, Am 5:11). Conversely אֶבֶן appears in EV as 'weight' (Lv 19:36, Dt 25:13, 2 S 14:25, Pr 11:16 20:10, 25, Mic 6:11, Zec 5:8) and as 'plummet' (Is 34:11 RV).

The stones referred to in Scripture may be classified according to their size and the uses to which they were put. Among the smaller stones mentioned are 'gravel stones' (La 3:16) and 'stones of the brook' (1 S 17:20, Job 22:24). The smoothness of the latter is noted in 1 S 17:40, and the effect of water in wearing them is alluded to in Job 14:19. Stones in the soil interfered with its fertility, and it was part of the husbandman's work to gather them out. On the other hand, to scatter stones over the fields was one way of devastating an enemy's country (2 K 3:19, 25). These are probably the opposite circumstances referred to in Ec 3:3. The 'stony ground' (τὰ πετρώδη, τὸ πετρώδες) of Mt 13:3, 20 is not soil full of stones, but shallow soil with rock near the surface (RV 'rocky'). Stones were convenient missiles for the hand (Ex 21:15, 2 S 16:6, 13, Sir 22:20 27:25, 2 Mac 1:16 4:41, Mk 12:4), for the sling (Jg 20:16, 1 S 17:40, 48, 50, 1 Ch 12:2, 2 Ch 26:14, Pr 26:8, Jth 6:12, Sir 47:4), or for larger military engines (2 Ch 26:15, 1 Mac 6:31). Josephus (BJ iii. vii. 23, v. vi. 3) gives an account of these engines as used in the sieges of Jotapata and Jerusalem. Stone projectiles roughly spherical, and 13 or 14 in. in diameter, have been found at Baniās (Merrill, E. of Jordan, p. 524). A stonecast was a rough measure of distance (Lk 22:41). Stone-throwing might prove fatal (Nu 35:17, 23), and was a common method by which death-sentences were executed, and in which popular violence found vent. The verbs לָקַח, צִיָּר, לִיבֹאֵז, קַטְלֵיבֹאֵז, לִיבֹאֵז, are used to denote this practice. A heap of stones was sometimes raised over the bodies of those who were thus put to death (Jos 7:25, 26), or who were otherwise executed (Jos 8:29) or slain (2 S 18:17). This is perhaps the fate referred to in Is 14:19, La 3:63. Such heaps were also placed over ordinary tombs for protection or to mark the spot (see BURIAL, vol. i. p. 333^a). The density of stones (Pr 27:3) made them convenient for use as weights (see list of passages above) and plummets (Is 34:11), and also for attaching to anything to be sunk in water, like Jeremiah's book of prophecy (Jer 51:63), or the body of a criminal to be executed by drowning (Mt 18:6). Sharp stones were used as knives (Ex 4:25, Mk 5:4). In the former case the reference is probably to artificially fashioned knives of flint such as have been recently found among the prehistoric remains of Egypt (see FLINT, vol. ii. p. 15; KNIFE, vol. iii. p. 8; and Petrie and Quibell, Naquada and Ballas, pp. 55-59). Vessels of stone are mentioned in Ex 7:19, Jn 2:6. In connexion with the former passage, see Wilkinson, Ancient Egypt, ii. 8; Petrie and Quibell, Naquada and Ballas, p. 10. Small stones or pebbles were originally used in voting, and the counters of metal, etc., afterwards employed were still called ψῆφοι (4 Mac 15:28, Ac 26:10).

Among larger stones, besides mill-stones (for which see MILL, vol. iii. p. 369), may be noticed those which covered wells (Gn 29^{2, 3, 8, 10}) and deposits of treasure (Sir 29¹⁰), and those which closed the mouths of caves (Jos 10^{18, 27}), pits used as dens (Dn 6¹⁷), and rock-hewn tombs (Mt 27⁶⁰). The entrances of tombs were closed sometimes by stone doors hung on stone pivots, and sometimes by circular slabs like millstones set on edge, which rolled in grooves athwart the openings, the grooves being sloped so as to make the stone easy to roll to the door and difficult to roll away again. The entrance to the Tombs of the Kings at Jerusalem has both kinds of stone doors (see Tristram, Land of Israel, pp. 406-7, and SWP Special Papers, p. 280ff.). Og's 'bedstead of iron' (Dt 3¹¹) was probably a sarcophagus of basalt, such as have been found in abundance E. of the Jordan (see Driver, Deut. in loc.).

Certain large stones served as landmarks, such as the great stone in Gibeon (2 S 20⁸), the stone of Bohan the son of Reuben (Jos 15⁶ 18¹⁷), the stone of Zoheleth (1 K 1⁹), the stone Ezel (1 S 20¹⁹ MT). Other large stones had a more or less sacred character. Rude stone monuments of religious origin are still plentiful E. of the Jordan, though they are not found W. of it except in Galilee. They have been divided into four classes, menhirs or pillars, dolmens or stone tables, cairns or stone heaps, and cromlechs or stone circles. Examples of the first class are the 'pillar' which Jacob set up at Bethel and anointed (Gn 28¹⁸ 35¹⁴), and that which he erected at Mizpah (Gn 31⁴⁶). In early Semitic religion these pillars were associated with the presence of a deity, and were smeared with blood or oil as an act of worship (see PILLAR, vol. iii. pp. 879-81). In some cases a rude stone pillar seems to have served simply as a memorial (Jos 24^{26, 27}, 1 S 7¹²) or as a monument to the dead (cf. 1 Mac 13²⁷, 2 K 23¹⁷ RV, Ezk 39¹⁵). While at first the sacred stone representing the deity served also as an altar, the latter came to be distinct at a very early period. It might be a natural rock (Jg 6²⁰ 13¹⁹, 1 S 6¹⁴ 14³¹) or artificially built of stone. In the latter case the stones were unhewn (Ex 20³, Dt 27^{3, 6}, Jos 8³¹). Elijah's altar on Carmel was, no doubt, of this kind (1 K 18^{31ff.}). Under the Maccabees the stones of the altar of burnt-offering in the temple were laid aside as defiled and a new altar was built (1 Mac 4^{46, 47}). Ezekiel's ideal temple was to be provided with hewn stone tables for slaying the sacrifices (Ezk 40⁴³) (see ALTAR, vol. i. pp. 75, 76, and Robertson Smith, RS 184 ff., 214). The narrative in Gn 31 mentions a cairn (זֶבֶד) as well as a pillar at Mizpah. The stones set up by Joshua at Gilgal (Jo 4) were an example of a circle with a memorial significance (Conder, Syrian Stone-lore, 220; Benzinger, Heb. Arch. 56 ff., 379, 380). Inscriptions might be placed upon monumental stones (Dt 27⁴⁻⁸), on altars (Jos 8³²), or on stone tablets such as those on which the Law was engraved. Stone, like wood, was among the commonest materials out of which idolatrous images were made (Jer 2²⁷, Hab 2¹⁹ etc.). Such images, as well as sacred pillars, were forbidden in Lv 26¹.

The most important use of stone was, of course, for building. For this purpose it was regarded as superior to brick (Is 9¹⁰), which was substituted for it in Babylonia (Gn 11³). The chief references to stone as a building material are in connexion with the temple. Stone was among the preparatory stores collected by David (1 Ch 22^{14, 15} 29²). The foundation of the temple consisted of great costly hewn stones (1 K 5^{17, 18} 7¹⁰), and the superstructure was also of stone, though covered with wood (1 K 6¹⁸ 7^{9, 11, 12}). The stones were brought to the site in a prepared state (1 K 6⁷). Hewn stone is mentioned in connexion with the repairs executed by Josiah (2 K 12¹²) and Josiah (2 K 22⁶, 2 Ch 34¹¹), and stone was among the materials of the second temple (Hag 2¹⁵, Ezr 5⁸ 6⁴, 1 Es 6^{9, 28}). The size and splendour of the stones of Herod's temple are referred to in Mt 24^{1, 2}. Contrasted with the process of building is that of demolishing (Mic 1⁶, La 4¹). The stones in the ruins of Jerusalem were dear to the exiles (Ps 102¹⁴). The opponents of Nehemiah laughed at the idea of rebuilding the city walls with stones from among the rubbish (Neh 4^{2, 3}).

Some of the great stones in the foundation wall of the temple are visible in the Jews' Wailing Place. Other parts of the wall have been reached by recent excavation, notably at the S.E. corner. The lowest stone at this point is 14 ft. long and 3 ft. 8 in. high, 'squared and polished, with a finely dressed face.' If the present foundation, which rests on the solid rock, be really that of Solomon's temple, then this stone is the 'foundation' or 'chief corner stone' so often referred to in Scripture (Is 28¹⁶, Ps 118²², Mt 21⁴², Ac 4¹¹, 1 P 2⁶). While the 'head of the corner' is a foundation stone, the 'head stone' (רֹאשׁ אֶבֶן Zec 4⁷) is the highest and the last to be placed. Large as the temple stones are, they are small compared with some found in the ruins of Baalbek. Three of these, forming one course, are the largest hewn stones in the world. They are all 13 ft. high and as many thick, and their respective lengths are 64, 63½, and 63 ft. A still larger stone, 70 ft. long, 14 ft. thick, and 14 ft. high, lies in the adjacent quarry. For methods of transporting such stones, see Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. ii. 302-10. The remains of quarries are visible in many places in Palestine, and their extent affords a measure of the antiquity of the building sites near them. The greatest quarries at Jerusalem are the caverns under Bezetha, from which a great part of the stone work of the city has been excavated. Traces of the process of working the quarry still remain. The blocks were separated from the rock by cuttings from 3 to 6 in. wide made all round them with some instrument like a pick. The margins of the stones were dressed with toothed chisels (Benzinger, Heb. Arch. 238). In the basaltic rocks of Bashan there are many circular holes 4 or 5 ft. deep, and as great in diameter, from which millstones have been quarried (Merrill, E. of Jordan, p. 25).

A few references to stone are of a symbolic character. Jeremiah was directed to hide some great stones in the clay of a brick-kiln at the entrance to Pharaoh's house at Tahpanhes, to be a foundation for the throne of Nebuchadnezzar, which would be set up in that place (Jer 43^{9, 10}). In Zec 3⁹ a stone with seven eyes (or facets) is set before Joshua the high priest, and an inscription is to be placed upon it. This stone has been variously understood as referring to the foundation stone of the temple, the 'head stone' of Zec 4⁷, a jewel in the high priest's breastplate, or in Zerubabel's crown, or the finished temple as a whole (see G. A. Smith, Twelve Prophets, ii. 206). The white stone with a new name written on it (Rev 2¹⁷) is likewise an obscure symbol. From the reference in the same verse to the 'hidden manna' the 'white stone' has been connected with the Roman tessera hospitalis—the token divided between two friends who had entered into hospitium, and handed down to their descendants, so as to secure perpetual mutual hospitality; or with the tessera frumentaria—the token in exchange for which a free grant of corn was given to the poorer citizens of Rome. Putting aside the reference to the manna, a possible explanation may be found in the tessera gladiatoria, an oblong token of ivory given to a gladiator when he had passed successfully through a certain number of contests. It had inscribed on it the name of the combatant and that of his trainer, the date of his first victory and the letters SP (spectatus). In Rev 18²¹ the destruction of 'Babylon' is symbolized by an angel casting a great stone into the sea.

The various properties of stone give rise to numerous comparisons. The Egyptians sank in the sea like a stone (Ex 15⁸, Neh 9¹¹). Fear made the enemies of Israel still as a stone (Ex 15¹⁶). Nabal became as a stone before his death (1 S 25²⁷). The heart of leviathan is firm as a stone (Job 41²⁴). The strength of stone is also alluded to in Job 6¹². Ice is compared to stone (Job 38³²). Other figurative usages are frequent. The deadness and sterility of stone gives point to the Baptist's saying in Mt 3⁹ ||; so with its dumbness (Hab 2¹¹, Lk 19⁴⁰), and inedibility (Mt 4⁹ 7⁹ ||). Its weight suggests what Jerusalem will be to the nations (Zec 12³), and what wisdom is to the unlearned (Sir 6²¹). Its hardness supplies a metaphor for hardness of heart (Ezk 11¹⁹ 36²⁹). As a contrast to this, Ezekiel's figure is combined with an allusion to the inscribed tables of the Law in 2 Co 3³. The new name Ilérops given to Simon (Jn 1⁴²) denoted the firmness of his character in the future. A slothful man is compared to a 'defiled stone' (Sir 22¹). God is called 'the stone of Israel' (Gn 49²⁴). The Messiah's kingdom is represented in Dn 2³⁴ as a stone cut out of the mountain without hands, which breaks in pieces the composite image symbolizing the kingdoms of this world. Christ uses a similar figure regarding Himself (Mt 21⁴⁴ TR, Lk 20¹⁸). Isaiah describes the Deliverer of Judah as a 'foundation' and a 'corner stone.' Christ applies Ps 118²² to Himself (Mt 21⁴² ||), and similar applications are found in Ac 4¹¹, 1 P 2⁷. In the latter passage Christ is called a 'living stone,' and Christians are also called 'living stones.' The same ideas of Christ as the corner stone and Christians as forming a building along with Him, appear in Eph 2²⁰⁻²².

JAMES PATRICK.

STONES, PRECIOUS.—This subject is both obscure and complex, and one on which no help is to be gained by relying on modern traditional results. The only satisfactory way to treat it is as a series of quite independent stages of research:—i. The actual stones known to (a) the ancient Egyptians, (b) the early Greeks, (c) the Roman writers. ii. The equivalence of Hebrew and Greek names. iii. The substances designated by the Greek names. iv. The side-lights on the subject from (a) the Arabic or other versions, (b) the colour arrangement, (c) beliefs about stones, etc.

i. It is obviously useless to attempt to identify gems which were unknown before the Roman age with any of the earlier names, and hence the diamond and the sapphire are outside of the question. It is also quite useless to expect the same distinctions between stones that we now make by chemical and crystallographic classification. Different materials, if of the same appearance, were doubtless classed under the same name, such as beryl and green felspar, or carnelian and fleshy felspar. On the other hand, the same material, under different appearances, would have different names, such as the many different aspects of quartz, in rock-crystal, amethyst, chalcedony, carnelian, red jasper, green jasper, and yellow jasper.

The stones commonly known to the Egyptians for jewellery and engraving are as follows, those not known as engraved being in brackets. These are arranged according to the colours, which would be natural classification, and which shows what is liable to be confounded under a single name. The transparent stones are in italics, according to the varieties actually found. BLACK: [hæmatite], obsidian. BLUE: amethyst, lazuli. GREEN: serpentine, felspar, [beryl], jasper, turquoise. YELLOW: agatz, jasper. BROWN: sard, [corundum]. RED: red sard, [garnet], felspar, carnelian, jasper. WHITE: quartz, milky quartz, chalcedony. Two stones that might reasonably be expected in early use, but have never yet been found in Egypt before Greek times, are the onyx or nicolo (known to the Romans as Ægyptilla), and the olivine = peridot (modern chrysolite), from the Red Sea. And the beryl is rare before Græco-Roman times.

The early Greeks, down to Theophrastus, appear to have had much the same series as the Egyptians; but in Roman times, with extended commerce, more of the stones became known which we now class as gems. With these, however, we are not here concerned in OT usage.

ii. The second consideration is the equivalence of the Hebrew and Greek names. For, as we have only a few vague indications of the meanings of the Hebrew names, or connexions of those with other languages, it is really the tradition of the times of the LXX that has to be almost entirely trusted. Of lists of stones there are five to be considered, — The list of the breastplate (Ex 28¹⁷⁻²⁰), that of the king of Tyre (Ezk 28¹³), the translation of these two lists in the LXX, and the foundations in Rev 21¹⁹⁻²⁰. All these lists are certainly connected, as we shall see by the statement of them.

Several problems meet us here. The LXX must either have found the lists of Ex. and Ezek. alike, or else have altered one into conformity with the other. There is one sign of confusion in the LXX, where silver and gold are interpolated in the midst of the series (marked S and G here); whereas the Heb. in Ezek. has gold at the end (marked G here); so far the Hebrew is the more consistent. On the other hand, it is evident that the list in Ezek. has been written with the list in Ex. in view: the first two names being the same, the 2nd line being the 4th line in Ex., and the 3rd line being 5, 4, 3 of Ex. in inverted order, all show that Ezek. is apparently a corrupted copy of Ex., perhaps changed by the prophet quoting from memory.

But here another difficulty arises: the yāšēphēh 12 in Ex. cannot but be intended by iaspis 6, while the yāšēphēh is 6 in Ezekiel. Here LXX agrees with Ezek.; while, in sappir 5 in Ex. and 7 in Ezek., the LXX agrees with Ex. in 5 sappheiros. In another point probably Ex. agrees with LXX; bāreketh, the 'flashing' or 'lightning' stone, is probably quartz crystal; and samaragdos, which it parallels in Ex., is also probably quartz, as we shall see further on. On the whole, it seems safest to take Ex. and LXX as equivalent lists; granting a transposition of 12 and 6, probably in the Hebrew.

iii. Next we come to the third section—the meaning of the Greek names; and for this we must remember that the series should correspond to the stones actually in use in early times, and not to those which may have had those names in Græco-Roman writings. (1) Sardios = 'odem, is the 'blood'-coloured stone (Heb.); and as none of the early ones except red jasper can be so described, it seems that this must be intended.

(2) Topazion = piddah, is reputed to be the peridot, because of its being described as imported from the Red Sea, as of a greenish-yellow colour, and as the softest of precious stones. The difficulty in this is that no instance is known of peridot in Egyptian work; and this would lead us to look for some similar stone as the earlier representative of piddah. The transparent precious serpentine was in use in Egypt, and is of closely the same colour; in fact, of the same composition, but hydrated. This, then, has the best claim to be the original stone, for which the harder olivine, peridot, was later substituted. The Arabic has asfar, 'yellow,' which corresponds with peridot.

(3) Smaragdus = bärekeeth. This is commonly supposed to be emerald; but, as there is beryl also in the list, it is unlikely that a slight variety of purer and less pure colour should give occasion to repeat the same stone. There are two indications that in smaragdus is included rock-crystal. Pliny mentions the shortsighted Nero using an eye-glass of smaragdus; the difficulty of getting emerald free from flaws and large enough for an eye-glass, the depth of colour (for this was not the lighter beryl), and the greater hardness of emerald, all make that stone very unlikely. The colourless rock-crystal is far more probably the material used. And in Rev 4³ there is described—a rainbow like a smaragdus: now a colourless stone is the only one that can show a rainbow of prismatic colours; and the hexagonal prism of rock-crystal, if one face is not developed (as is often the case), gives a prism of 60°, suitable to show a spectrum. The confusion with emerald seems to have arisen from both stones crystallizing in hexagonal prisms; and, as the emerald varies through the aquamarine to a colourless state, there is no obvious separation between it and quartz crystal. The meaning of bärekeeth, the 'flashing' or 'lightning' stone, agrees with the brilliancy of rock-crystal. The Arabic has samurod = smaragdus.

(4) Anthrax = nöphekkh. The former name is generally agreed to be the carbuncle, which is the dark clear red garnet. Garnet was a favourite stone in Egypt for beads, but is not found engraved, at least not till late times.

(5) Sappheiros = sappir. There can be no doubt of the equivalence of these names; yet they do not mean our sapphire or corundum, as that was quite unknown in early times, and probably too hard to be engraved. Pliny's description of it as opaque and speckled with gold, shows it to have been our lapis-lazuli, which was used and greatly valued in early times.

(6) As we cannot sever the iaspis from the yāshēpheh, we must assume a corruption in either the Heb. or Greek. The Greek is more probably correct, as the iaspis was certainly opaque, and would well consort with the opaque lazuli. We must restore, then, (6) iaspis = yāshēpheh. The earliest jaspers mentioned by Greek writers appear to have been green; and a dark green jasper was a favourite stone among early Greek engravers, and used also by Egyptians. This is probably, then, the iaspis.

(7) Ligurion = leshem. The ligurion is a corruption of lyncurion, described as brilliant yellow, and in Greek times apparently identified with the jacinth = zircon. As this is unknown in Egyptian work, probably yellow quartz or agate (R.) was intended by leshem.

(8) Achatēs = shēbō. This is agreed to be connected with some varieties of modern agates. The black and white banded is said to be probably the variety earliest known as achates to the Greeks; but this is little, if at all, known in Egypt until Greek times. From the contrasts of colour in the series a red agate would be the more likely here; but a grey and white is the only closely-banded agate that occurs in Egyptian work. If possible we should expect the carnelian here, as it is a usual stone, and yet does not appear elsewhere in the list.

(9) Amethystos = ahlāmāh. There is no question as to this being the modern amethyst, which was frequently used in Egypt at an early date, and well engraved.

(10) Chrysolithos = tarshish. This stone among later Greeks is probably the topaz; but, as that was quite unknown in earlier times, some other golden-coloured stone must be intended. As clear yellow quartz is already fixed to the ligurion, that is not in question; nor would a transparent yellow stone be so appropriately termed 'golden' as an opaque one. The bright yellow jasper was finely engraved by the Egyptians of the 18th dynasty and onward, and that may well be the 'golden stone' or chrysolithos.

(11) Beryllion = shōham.—It is generally agreed that this is the modern beryl, the opaque green variety of the emerald; and with this was doubtless confused the green felspar, which is only distinguished in appearance by its brighter cleavage and lustre. As the felspar was far more usual for jewellery than the beryl in early times, it is pretty certain that it was the shōham, afterwards confused with the beryl.

(12) As we have already noticed, the yāshēpheh has probably changed places in the Hebrew with yahālōm, and therefore (12) onychion = yahālōm seems to be the probable equivalence. This is usually accepted as being the modern onyx; but such a stone in layers was apparently not known to early engravers, the first dated example being of the 26th dynasty. There is, however, no other stone which seems more probable for this name.

It may be as well now to state what stones that were used for early engraving stand outside of the identifications we have arrived at, and appear not to have been used in the breastplate. The following were all wrought in Egypt: obsidian, black jasper, hæmatite, fawn-coloured chert, milky quartz, chalcedony, and turquoise. Thus no striking or important stone is omitted from the list of Ex. except turquoise, which was mainly used before 4000 B.C., and in late times. But we have in several cases put down two stones to one name, where they were such as were likely to have been confounded in one class together.

iv. We now turn to the question of colour. The breastplate would apparently have stood thus—

|-------------------------|---------------------|------------------|
| 3 White quartz | 2 Yellow serpentine | 1 Red jasper |
| 6 Green jasper | 5 Blue lazuli | 4 Red garnet |
| 9 Purple amethyst | 8 Red carnelian | 7 Yellow agate |
| 12 White and black onyx | 11 Green felspar | 10 Yellow jasper |

Here there is good contrast maintained except in the right column, where there are two reds together and two yellows; but none of these are in serious doubt, and if any change is suggested it would be by transposing two of these. The first entry seems well fixed in the lists; and the fourth cannot change with the seventh without bringing red garnet and carnelian together. If, however, the fourth and tenth interchanged, then the opaque yellow jasper would be next to the opaque lazuli and in line with opaque green jasper, which would be harmonious. Should this be accepted, then the red garnet, anthrax, would be tarshish (R.); and the yellow jasper, chrysolithos, would be nōphekh.

There now remains the question of the relation of the stones in Rev. to those in the OT. They have evidently some connexion; but sometimes in the object order, sometimes in the verbal order, the Heb. reckoning running contrary to Greek. Thus there is—

|---------|-----------------|---------------|---------------|
| Ex. LXX | 6 Iaspis | 5 Sappheiros | |
| Rev. | 1 Iaspis | 2 Sappheiros | |
| Ex. | 3 Smaragdos | 2 Topazion | 1 Sardion |
| Rev. | 4 Smaragdos | 5 Sardonyx | 6 Sardion |
| Ex. | 10 Chrysolithos | 11 Beryllion | 12 Onychion |
| Rev. | 7 Chrysolithos | 8 Beryllion | 9 Topazion |
| Ex. | 7 Ligurion | 8 Achates | 9 Amethystos |
| Rev. | 10 Chrysoprasos | 11 Hyakinthos | 12 Amethystos |

Here topazion and sardonyx appear to have changed places; as, if so, the topazion would agree in both, and the onychion compare with the sardonyx. The chrysoprasos may well be a later name of the ligurion. There is, in any case, a strong influence of the LXX lists on the Rev. list; but yet it seems much like the apparent relation by memory of the Ezek. list with the Ex. list in the Hebrew.

A few stones occur in Rev. that are not in LXX. (3) Chalkodon was a green stone according to Pliny, from the copper mines near Chalcedon. As it was only found in very small pieces, the suggestion that it was diopase (silicate of copper) seems not unlikely, as that is in small crystals. (5) Sardonyx is doubtless the red and white onyx. (7) Chrysolithos in the Roman age was the present topaz; while (9) topazion was the present chrysolite=peridot. (10) Chrysoprasos was probably the green chalcodony, or the plasma. (11) Hyakinthos was the present sapphire, according to the account of it by Solinus. Of these stones in Rev. there is far less doubt than of those in OT, as the writers on gems are nearly contemporary with Rev., and describe the gems in detail.

The shāmīr of Ezk 3⁹ 'harder than flint' is evidently connected with the Egyptian asmer and the Greek smiris, both of which mean corundum or emery. The hardness of that stone agreeing with the description in Ezek., leaves no doubt that it is the shāmīr.

Finally, we may here summarize the results—

| Heb. | Greek (LXX). | Early. | Late. |

The lists of stones anciently used in pre-Greek times are from the writer's own observation. For the greater part of the information on Greek names and gems, King's Antique Gems has been the source here used. But for corroborations and modifications of the general views, the results of Prof. Ridgeway's private studies have been most generously communicated, especially in points marked (R.); and it must be remembered that the details of the reasons for some of the identifications cannot be fully stated or discussed in a brief outline like the present.

See, further, the separate artt. on the EV names of the precious stones mentioned in the Bible.

STONY.—1. In the Preface to AV the word 'stony' is used with the meaning 'made of stone': 'Although they build, yet if a fox go up, he shall even break down their stony wall.'* Cf. Shaks. Jul. Caesar, i. iii. 93, 'Nor stony tower, nor walls of beaten brass.' 2. In Mt 13³⁰, Mk 4^{3, 16} 'stony' means 'rocky' (τὰ πετρώδη, AV 'stony places', RV 'rocky places'). This is the meaning also in Ps 141⁶ 'When their judges are overthrown in stony places' (בְּיַד סִלְעִים, RV 'by the sides of the rock'). Cf. Raleigh, Guiana, 69, 'The maine banks being for the most part stonie and high.' So 'stone' is used for 'rock' in Peres the Ploughmans Crede, 806—

'And sythen his blissed body was in a ston byried, And descended a-doune to the dark helle'; and by Coverdale in Is 51¹ 'Take hede unto the stone, wherout ye are hewen, and to the grave wherout ye are digged.' 3. In Ezk 11¹⁹ 36^{2d} and Sir 17¹⁶ 'stony' means 'hard as stone,' as in Shaks. Merch. of Venice, iv. i. 4—

'Thou art come to answer
A stony adversary.'

J. HASTINGS.

STOOL.—1. A chair of honour for a guest, 2 K 4¹⁰ 'Let us set for him there a bed, and a table, and a stool.' (So RV, though the Heb. is מִסְבָּה, which elsewhere means a royal throne or other seat of state: the LXX gives θρόνος, which is τῆς 'stool' in AV of 2 Mac 14²¹, but in RV 'chair of state').

In older English 'stool' was used freely for any kind of seat, as in Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Prolog, 287, 'Spoues and stoles, and al swich housbondrye'; Mk 11¹⁵ Tind. 'the stoles of them that sold doves' (μαθήματα, AV 'seats'); 1 S 19¹⁹ Cov. 'Eli the priest sat upon a stole by the poste of the temple of the Lorde' (AV 'upon a seat'); Job 26⁹ Cov. 'He holdeth back his stole, that it cannot be seen' (מִסְבָּתוֹ, AV and RV 'the face of his throne'); Jer 17²⁵ Cov. 'Then shal there go thorow the gates of this cite, kinges and princyes, that shall syt upon the stole of David' (מִסְבָּת, AV and RV 'throne'); 29¹⁶ Cov.; 33¹⁷ Cov. 'David shal never want one, to syt upon the stole of the house of Israel' (מִסְבָּת, AV and RV 'upon the throne,' which is Coverdale's own tr. of the same Heb. in v. 21).

2. Mother's bearing stool (but see Holzinger in loc., and Expos. Times, xii. 165), Ex 1¹⁶ 'upon the stools,' RV 'upon the birthstool' (Heb. מִסְבָּתוֹת, found only in dual, its only other occurrence being Jer 18³, where it describes the potter's wheel, 'two discs revolving one above the other'; cf. vol. iii. p. 367^a).

STORK (רִבְיָה hāsīdāh).—Although one of the commonest and the largest birds of Bible lands, the LXX translators do not seem to have known its name, as they render hāsīdāh in the six passages where it occurs by four different words (Lv 11¹⁹, Ps 104¹⁷ ἐρωδιός, Dt 14¹⁸ πελεκάν, Jer 8⁷, Job 39¹³ ἀσιδὰ [transliterated], Zec 5⁹ תְּרוֹף). There is, however, no doubt as to its identity. Two species are found in the Holy Land—the black stork, Ciconia nigra, L., and the white stork, C. alba, L. The former is a little smaller than the latter, and less common in the southern and western districts. It is more common towards the north-east. Its colour is black, and it is a shy bird, frequenting the desert, where it lives in flocks. The white stork is 44 in. long and has black wings, but the coverts and rest of its plumage are white. The beak, legs, and skin about the eyes are red; the iris is dark brown.

Few as are the passages in which the stork is mentioned, we can gather from them some of its chief traits: (1) It was an unclean bird (Lv. and Dt. Lc.); this corresponds to its food, which consists of reptiles, amphibians, and garbage. (2) In the obscure passage (Job 39¹²) there may be a reference to the contrast between the supposed indifference of the ostrich to its young and the proverbial affection of the stork. This, however, is uncertain; see the Comm. ad loc. (3) The stork nests in fir trees (Ps 104¹⁷). Most storks in Palestine now nest in the tops of ruins. In many places in other countries they build on chimney tops. But there is abundant evidence that they even now sometimes nest in trees in the Holy Land, as well as in other countries. It has been well observed by Tristram that, in ancient times, when there were fewer ruins and more trees, storks must perforce have resorted to the trees and rocks. He says that the black storks still always prefer trees. (4) The migrations of the stork at definite times (Jer 8⁷) did not escape notice. At such times it flies high 'in the heaven.' There are abundant illustrations of the regularity with which these birds return to their old haunts year after year, and repair the very nests which they had before occupied both as offspring and parents. (5) Their power of wing and the sound as of wind made by their flight are alluded to (Zec 5⁹). The spread of their wings is nearly 7 feet.

STORY.—In older Eng. 'story' and 'history' (of which 'story' is an aphetic form) were used interchangeably. We accordingly find 'history' applied to romance, and 'story' to continued historical narrative. In Pref. to AV the translators even use the word 'story' of history in general, 'This will easily be granted by as many as know storie, or have any experience.' The word 'story' occurs in AV (outside the Apoc.) only in 2 Ch 13²² 24²⁷, for which see art. COMMENTARY in vol. i. p. 459^b. In the Apoc. it is used as the tr. of ιστορία in 2 Mac 22⁴ 30³², of διήγησις in 2³², and of σύνταξις in 15³⁸ 39³⁹, and in 1 Es 1³³ ἡ βιβλος τῶν ιστορουμένων περὶ τῶν βασιλέων τῆς Ἰουδαίας is tr^d 'the book of the stories of the kings of Judah.' Cf. Rhemish NT, note on Jn 5² 'The force of divers waters in the world is justly attributed by our forefathers and good stories to the prayers and presence of Saints, which profane incredulous men referre onely to nature.' Tindale says (Expos. 201) 'We believe not only with story faith, as men believe old chronicles.'

Storywriter, for 'historian' (i.e. chronicler), occurs in 1 Es 21⁷ (ὁ γραμματεὺς; RVm 'recorder'), and 2²⁵ (ὁ γράφων τὰ προσπίπτοντα); in the latter verse γραμματεὺς is tr^d 'scribe.' J. HASTINGS.

STOUT, STOUTNESS.—The modern meaning of the Eng. word 'stout,' viz. solid, substantial (and then corpulent), suggests a connexion with Lat. stolidus and the root sto, to stand; but the word is of Low Germ. origin (coming to us through the French), and in its earliest use signified 'brave,' 'bold,' 'impetuous.'

In AV the meaning is bold in Job 4¹¹, Dn 7²⁰, and presumptuous in Is 10¹², Mal 3¹³. Stouthearted occurs in Ps 76⁹, Is 46¹² with the former meaning (Heb. זָבַר זָבַר). The subst. stoutness is found in

Is 9⁹, also with the meaning of boldness, as in Golding, Calvin's Job, 570, 'For what is the cause that oftentimes wee dare not undertake a good quarell, but for that we have not the stoutnesse and skill too resist so stedfastly as were requisite.'

J. HASTINGS.

STRAIT.—The Eng. words 'strait' and 'strict' are doublets, the latter coming directly from Lat. strictus,* ptp. of stringere, to draw tight; the former through the Old Fr. estreit or estrait (mod. étroit).† 'Strait' is an adj., an adv., a subst., and a verb.

As an adj. 'strait' means in AV either lit. narrow, confined, or fig. strict, rigorous.

1. Narrow, confined: e.g. 2 K 6¹ 'The place where we dwell with thee is too strait for us' (עָנָה נָחַשׁ, LXX ἐνὶς ἀφ' ἡμῶν); Mt 7¹³ 14 'Enter ye in at the strait gate . . . because strait is the gate' (εὐρεῖς).

2. Strict, rigorous.—The transition from the lit. to the fig. sense is seen in 2 Es 7¹⁴ 18 bis, thus 7¹⁸ 'The righteous shall suffer strait things, and hope for wide (ferent angustia sperantes spatiosa); for they that have done wickedly have suffered the strait things, and yet shall not see the wide.' Then the fig. sense appears in 7²¹ 'God hath given strait commandment' (mandans mandavit; RV 'straitly commanded').

As an adv. 'strait' means closely, narrowly. It occurs in 1 Es 5² 'The heathen . . . holding them strait' (πολιορκούντες, RVm 'besieging them'); and 1 Mac 13⁴⁰.

As a subst.: e.g. La 1³ 'All her persecutors overtook her between the straits' (מִן הַתְּקָוָה, RV 'within the straits').

As a verb 'strait' occurs only in Sus 22 'I am straited on every side,' where mod. editions give 'straitened' (στενά μὲν πάντοθεν).

The verb straiten is used both literally and figuratively.

1. Literally it means (1) to shorten or narrow, e.g. Job 37¹⁰ 'The breadth of the waters is straitened' (צָרַק, lit. 'in narrowness,' i.e. 'in a narrow channel,' RVm 'congealed').

2. Figuratively, 'straiten' means narrow (opp. 'enlarge') or confine, and so hampers: Job 12²⁴ 'He enlargeth the nations and straiteneth them again' (Heb. as RV 'bringeth them in,' RVm 'leadeth them away'), 187, Pr 4¹² (both of the straitening of steps.—Widening of the steps is a usual Oriental figure for the bold and free movements of one in prosperity, as straitening of them is for the constrained and timid action of one in adversity'—Davidson on Job 18⁵).

The adv. straitly means either (1) closely, Jos 6¹ 'Jericho was straitly shut up' (מִן הַתְּקָוָה, RV 'shut the gates, and was shut in'); Wis 17¹⁸ 'was straitly kept' (ἐφουρεῖτο, RV 'was kept in ward'); Sir 23¹⁰ 'keep her in straitly' (στερέωσον φυλακήν, RV 'keep strict watch'); or (2) strictly, as Ac 4¹⁷ 'Let us straitly threaten them' (ΤΡ ἀπειλῇ ἀπειλησάμεθα; edd. omit ἀπειλῇ, whence RV 'let us threaten them').

Straitness.—Dt 28³³ 'In the siege and in the straitness, wherewith thine enemies shall distress thee' (RV 'shall straiten thee'), so vv. 55, 57, Jer 19⁹. The word also occurs in Job 36¹⁸ opposed to 'a broad place,' and 2 Mac 12²¹ (στενότης). Cf. Is 58³ Cov. 'Wherefore fast we (sayo they) and thou seist it not? we put our lives to straitnesse, and thou regardest it not?' J. HASTINGS.

STRANGE, STRANGER.—Both these words have shades of meaning in AV which are now almost obsolete, and they are also used to represent various Heb. terms, whose significations are materially distinct. On the other hand, the word 'strange' has a connotation in modern English which it never possesses in the OT, and very rarely in the NT. Hence in many passages considerable confusion, which might have been obviated by a

* Chaucer uses the ptp. in its lit. sense, 'drawn,' applying it to a sword: Nonne Preestes Tale, 537—

'Pirrus with his streite sword
When he hadde hent king Priam by the berd,
And slayn him.'

† 'Straight' is a distinct word, from Anglo-Sax. streht, ptp. of strecan, to stretch.

change of rendering in the RV, is produced in the mind of the English reader.

'Strange' (Old Fr. estränge, Lat. extraneus) and 'stranger' mean in a great many instances simply 'foreign' * [a word unknown to AV except in 1 Mac 15², 2 Mac 10²⁴; but introduced by RV in Zeph 1⁸, Ac 26¹¹ in place of AV 'strange'] and 'foreigner' (AV only Ex 12⁴⁵ [wrongly for 'sojourner', וְגֵר, Dt 15³, Ob 11, Eph 2¹⁹ [wrongly for 'sojourner', παροικος]; but introduced by RV in Lv 22²⁵, Dt 17¹⁵ 23²⁰ 29²², by Amer. RV in Ru 2¹⁰ and 2 S 15¹⁹ for AV 'stranger', and by RV in Dt 14²¹ for AV 'alien']). It would conduce to clearness if, in the great majority of instances where (as in all the above OT passages except Ex 12⁴⁵ as noted) derivatives of the root נכר are employed, the renderings 'foreign' and 'foreigner' were adopted. Thus we should have 'foreigner(s)' for בְּנֵי הַנֶּכֶר (lit. 'son of foreignness') or בְּנֵי הַנָּחַל in Gn 17¹² (defined by the || 'not of thy seed')²⁷, Ex 12⁴⁵ [all P], Lv 22²⁵ [H], 2 S 22¹⁵ 46 = Ps 18⁴⁵ 46, Ezk 44⁷ 9 bis, Neh 9², Is 56³ 60¹⁰ 61⁶ 62², Ps 144⁷ 11; and 'foreign (not 'strange') god(s)' for אֱלֹהֵי נֶכֶר Dt 32¹⁷, Mal 2¹¹, Ps 81¹⁰; אֱלֹהֵי נֶכֶר Dn 11³²; אֱלֹהֵי נֶכֶר Gn 35², Jos 24²³ [all E], Jg 10¹⁶, 1 S 7³, Jer 5¹⁹, 2 Ch 33⁷; אֱלֹהֵי נֶכֶר Dt 31¹⁶; 'foreign vanities', i.e. idolatries ('Jer 8¹⁹); 'foreign altars' ('2 Ch 14²); 'foreign soil' ('Ps 137⁴); 'everything foreign' ('Jer 13²⁰).

The same rendering would reproduce נָכַר in Gn 31¹³ [but here, perhaps, in narrower sense of 'not of one's father's family'], Dt 14¹¹ [|| וְגֵר] 15³ (cf. 'v. 17¹³) 23¹¹ [opp. 'thy brother'] 29²¹ [+ 'who cometh from a far distant land'], Jg 17¹² (defined by 'who is not of the children of Israel'), Ru 2¹⁰, 2 S 15¹⁹ [|| וְגֵר 'exile'], 1 K 8¹¹ [+ 'who is not of thy people'] = 2 Ch 6², v. 43 = 2 Ch 6², Is 2², La 5², Ob 11 [both || וְגֵר]. So we should have a 'foreign (not 'strange') people' (Ex 21⁸ [E]), 'foreign apparel' ('Zeph 1⁸), 'foreign land' (Ex 22⁴ [J] 18³ [E]); note esp. וְגֵרִים of 'strange (i.e. foreign (non-Isr.)) wives' (1 K 11⁸, Ezr 10² 10. 11. 14. 17. 18. 44, Neh 13²¹ 27). A 'strange woman' (נָכַרָה) is a techn. term in Proverbs for a harlot (perhaps because in Israel harlots were originally chiefly foreigners): Pr 21⁶ 5³⁰ [all || וְגֵרָה] 6²⁴ [|| וְגֵרָה רָעָה] 23²⁷ [|| וְגֵרָה].

The word נָכַר, which is also frequently rendered 'stranger' in AV, can in some of its usages hardly be distinguished in sense from נָכַר (see art. FOREIGNER), but, if a distinctive Eng. term be desired, we would suggest 'alien' (used in AV in Ex 18³ [wrongly for 'sojourner', gēr], Dt 14²¹, Job 19¹⁵, Ps 69¹⁰, La 5² [all || נָכַר], Is 61³ [|| נָכַר], He 11³⁴ [ἀλλοτρίος], Eph 2¹⁹ [ἀπηλλοτριωμένοι || ξένοι]; and introduced by RV in Pr 5¹⁰ [|| נָכַר], Ezk 44⁷ [|| נָכַר], and by Amer. RV in Ps 144⁷ 11 [|| נָכַר]).

Zār may denote 'alien' or 'strange' in a narrower or a wider sense; (a) strange to a person: Job 15²⁷ 'and mine eyes shall behold, and not another' (m. 'as a stranger'), a passage of doubtful meaning; Pr 14¹⁰ 'The heart knoweth its own bitterness, and a stranger doth not intermeddle with its joy'; 27² 'Let another man praise thee . . . a stranger . . .'; cf. the 'alien woman' (אֵרָה) of Pr 21⁶ 5³⁰ 22¹⁴ 23³³ [several times || נָכַרָה, see above]. (b) Strange to a family, i.e. belonging to another household: Dt 25², 1 K 3¹⁸, Job 19¹⁵, Ps 109¹¹, Pr 5¹⁰ 17⁶¹ 11¹³ 20¹⁵ 27¹³; fig. of another household than God's, Hos 5⁷; esp. of another family than the priests (Ex 29³² 33, Nu 3¹⁰ 38 17³ [Eng. 16⁴⁰] 18⁷ [all P], Lv 22¹⁰ 12. 13 [all H]), or of another tribe than Levi (Nu 1³¹ 18⁴ [both P]). (c) Strange to a land, i.e. foreign; so freq. plur. נָכָרִים 'foreigners,'

'aliens' (often with the implication of hostility): Hos 7⁸ 8⁷, Is 17¹³ 25² 29² 61³, Jer 5¹⁹ 30⁸ 51² 51, La 5², Ezk 7²¹ 11¹⁶ 16³² 28⁷ 30¹² 31¹², Jl 4 (3) 17, Ob 11, Job 15¹⁹, Ps 54³ 13; note esp. the phrases a 'strange god' (אֱלֹהֵי נֶכֶר Ps 44²¹ 20) 81¹⁰ 10, Is 43¹² [|| alone, cf. נָכָר 'strange ones' in Dt 32¹⁶ and in Jer 22³ 31²¹], 'strange (i.e. foreign) waters' (2 K 19²⁴, Jer 18¹⁴), 'strange slips' (נֶכֶרֶת נֶכֶר, lit. 'vine-slip of an alien', Is 17¹⁰); God's tōrah is counted as alien (נֶכֶרֶת תּוֹרָה Hos 8¹²); 'his work is alien' (Is 23²¹, see below). (d) Strange to the Law: 'strange incense' (קֶסֶף נֶכֶר Ex 30¹ [P]); 'strange fire' (אֵשׁ נֶכֶר Lv 10¹, Nu 3⁴ 26⁶¹ [all P]). See NADAB.

The LXX and NT equivalents of 'strange' and 'stranger' in the senses discussed above will be found under art. FOREIGNER.

The idea of foreign naturally leads to that of unfamiliar or unknown: Job 19¹⁵ 'I am become a foreigner (נָכָר) in their eyes'; Ps 69¹⁰ 'I am become estranged (נָכַר) unto my brethren, and a foreigner (נָכָר) to my mother's children'; Ec 6³ 'a stranger (נָכָר) eateth it'; Is 28²¹ 'foreign (נָכָרָה) is his task, alien (נָכָר) his act' [cf. the common expression 'this is foreign to one's nature'; or is the meaning here that he acts as if dealing with (foreign) enemies?]; Jer 2²¹ 'a foreign vine' (נֶכֶרֶת זֵיתֹן fig. of degenerate Israel); Pr 20¹⁶ 27¹³, where נָכָר and נָכַר are both used of persons unknown to one.

This last usage approaches, but does not reach, the modern sense of 'strange', namely peculiar or wonderful, a sense which is pretty near to that represented by ξενίζουσα τινα ('certain strange things') of Ac 17²⁰ (cf. ξενίζουσα συμφορα, 'strange sufferings' of 2 Mac 9⁶), ξενίζουσαι ('they think it strange') of 1 P 4⁴, and μὴ ξενίζεσθε ('think it not strange') of v. 12. Once only is this sense unmistakably conveyed by 'strange' in canonical Scripture, namely in Lk 5²⁸ 'We have seen strange things to-day.' The Gr. is παράδοξος, which occurs in the same sense in the Apocrypha in Jth 13¹³, Wis 5¹⁹ (cf. v. 8 θαυμαστός), Sir 43²⁶, 2 Mac 9²⁴ [EV in last 'contrary to expectation'].

It is most unfortunate and confusing that AV uses 'stranger' also to represent נָכַר or (thrice, Lv 25⁶ 45. 47) the allied term וְגֵר, words which would be much more happily rendered 'sojourner.' 'Stranger' might suitably be retained as trs of both נָכַר and נָכַר in the few instances where their specific renderings 'foreign(er)' and 'alien' hardly suit the idiom or the context. The standing and privileges of the gēr (the familiar 'stranger within thy gates') are described fully in art. GER.

STRAW (תֵּבֶן teben, in Is 25¹⁰ מַתְבֵּן mathbēn; ἀχυρον, palea). — The Hebrew teben is the same as the Arabic tibn, which is the straw of wheat and barley cut by the threshing machine into pieces from $\frac{1}{2}$ to 2 in. long, and more or less split and torn, and mixed with chaff. It is the universal accompaniment to the provender of the domestic herbivorous animals. It is usually mixed with barley, and takes the place of hay. It was mixed with clay in the manufacture of unbaked bricks (see Dillm.-Ryssel on Ex 5⁷). In one passage (Jer 23³⁰) AV tr. it 'chaff', RV 'straw' (see CHAFF). In one (Job 21¹⁸) AV and RV tr. it 'stubble.' In all the rest (Gn 24²⁵ 22, Ex 5⁷ 10. 11. 12. 13. 16. 18, Jg 19¹⁹, 1 K 4²⁸, Job 41²⁷, Is 11⁷ 65²²) both VSS tr. it 'straw.' As 'straw' in Western languages refers to whole stalks of the cereals, it might be better to adopt the Arab. tibn, a word now well understood, and which is better than 'cut straw,' as it includes the chaff. There is no reason for the rendering 'stubble' or 'chaff.' Whole straw is seldom used for any purpose in the East.

'I am a most poor woman, and a stranger,
Born out of your dominions.'

* The denom. verb נָכַר occurs in Hithp. in sense of 'make oneself strange,' 'act as a stranger' in Gn 42⁷ (of Joseph's attitude to his brothers) and 1 K 14³ 6 (of Jeroboam's wife feigning herself to be a stranger). In Dt 32⁷ the words נֶכֶרֶת יָצְרִיבֵנִי (AV 'lest their adversaries should behave themselves strangely') appear to mean 'lest . . . should mislead' (RV), i.e. fail to recognize the truth [lit. 'treat as foreign', cf. Jer 19⁴].

STREET.—In Oriental towns the streets seem to owe their form and direction more to accident than design. The houses are built with a view to seclusion and comfort within, and with little care as to what is without. Space is precious, so the streets are narrow; and as no order is enforced in building, they twist and turn among the houses with bewildering effect. They are usually unpaved, and go swiftly to mud in rainy weather. Often, in spite of the industry of innumerable dogs, the refuse cast out is at once offensive and dangerous to health. The upper storeys frequently project over the street, leaving only a narrow opening overhead. This utilizes space, and forms a shelter from heat. In unwallied towns and villages, in obedience to the instinct of defence, the houses are crushed closely together: the openings between them are rather alleys than streets. Schick gives the average width of the streets in Jerusalem as 2.75 m. (ZDPV, 1884, iv. 217); the στενωπόδι of Josephus (BJ v. viii. 1) would still accurately describe most of them. Where a town is built on a steep slope, as, e.g., in Safed, the roofs of the lower houses sometimes form the street in front of the higher.

Tobit (13¹⁷) sees the streets of the future Jerusalem 'paved with beryl, and carbuncle, and stones of Ophir' (cf. Rev 21²¹). Herod the Great laid a main street in Antioch with 'polished stone' (Jos. Ant. xvi. v. 3). This is the first mention of actual pavement. Agrippa II. consented to the paving of Jerusalem with white stone (ib. xx. ix. 7). The two spacious thoroughfares characteristic of Syro-Greek and Syro-Roman cities, which cut through the city at right angles, were commonly paved with stone. Their remains can be traced in Bozrah, Damascus, etc.; but by far the finest example is found at Shuhba, on the north-western shoulder of Jebel Haurân. In some cases the central roadway was separated from the passage for foot passengers on either side by a stately colonnade. The imposing effect of this arrangement may still be seen among the ruins of Jerash.

Men of the same trade are usually found in one street. In Jer 37²¹ we read of the 'bakers' street.' Josephus (BJ v. viii. 1) says Titus entered through the second wall 'at the place where are the merchants of wool, the braziers and the market for cloth.' So in Cairo and Damascus, for instance, we have the bazaars of the braziers, the silversmiths, the saddlers, etc. The goods are exposed for sale in little shops whose fronts are entirely open. The bazaars are frequently roofed with glass. As strictly business streets, they are shut at sunset, and closely guarded.

רח, 'what is without,' is the Heb. word which properly corresponds to street: רח is unhappily often so rendered, esp. in AV (less often in RV), but it really means broad or open place (cf. Driver on Am 5¹⁶ or Dn 9²⁵). For רח LXX gives ὁδός (Is 5²⁰ etc.), ἐξόδος (2 S 1²⁰ etc.), διόδος (7³⁴), πλατεία (Ps 18⁴² etc.); for רח-על (Job 18¹⁷), ἐπὶ πρόσωπον ἐξωτέρω, where the sense is obviously 'on the face of the earth' (Davidson, Job, ad loc.). In each case AV and RV render 'street.' This is right when the reference is to the outside of the house. The context determines the meaning. In Ps 144¹³ RV gives correctly 'in our fields.' רח is represented in LXX by ὁδός (Is 59¹⁴), διόδος (Dt 13¹⁶), ἐπαυλὶς (Ps 144¹⁴); but the usual equivalent is πλατεία, in which the root idea is the same. It applies to the open space at the gate (see OPEN PLACE) where assemblies met, cases were tried, and business done; also to any square or open space in the city, as, e.g., before the house of God (Ezk 10¹⁹). רח occurs in Pr 7³, Ec 12³, Ca 3². In the first LXX renders διόδος, 'thoroughfare'; in the others ἀγορά. This corresponds with Arab. suk = 'market,' or 'place of concourse': zuhak is used for the common passages between the houses.

In NT πλατεία and ῥύμη are practically synonymous. Although in Lk 14²¹ we read πλατειάς καὶ ῥύμας, possibly here implying distinction in breadth, and rendered 'streets and lanes,' yet the street called Straight in Damascus is called ῥύμη (Ac 9¹¹), and it was one of the finest streets in Syria. For ἀγορά (Mk 6²⁶) RV gives correctly 'market place.'

W. EWING.

STRENGTH OF ISRAEL.—The EV tr. of the Divine title הַיְיָ שֶׁנֶּחֱמָה in 1 S 15²⁴. The word נחמ occurs parallel with הָיָה, הָקָם, הָנִיחַ, הָיָה, in a list of Divine attributes in 1 Ch 29¹¹, where it is tr. in EV 'victory' (so LXX νίκη). Driver (Heb. Text of Samuel, p. 98) points out that the proper meaning of the root נחמ is splenduit, and argues that the sense of victory is a special and derived one. He adopts for הַיְיָ שֶׁנֶּחֱמָה the tr. 'the Glory of Israel' (similarly, Löhr). H. P. Smith (following the Vulg. triumphator) renders 'the Victor'; Wellh. 'the Faithful one.' The LXX in 1 S 15²⁴ has καὶ διαβεβήσεται Ἰσραὴλ εἰς δόξα, which implies that the Gr. translator read or misread נחמ for נחמ.

STRIKE, STROKE.—The verb 'to strike' is of Anglo-Sax. origin, coming from strican 'to advance swiftly and smoothly' (Middle Eng. stricken),* though it is allied to Lat. stringere 'to touch swiftly and lightly, graze.' It is thus properly an intrans. verb, its trans. form being 'stroke' (from Anglo-Sax. stracian, causal of strican). But 'strike' early adopted a transitive sense, and the two verbs were not kept distinct.

1. In AV 'strike' occurs transitively in the phrase 'strike through.'

For example: Jg 5²³ 'When she had pierced and stricken through his temples' (חָרַף וְרָחַף, RV 'she struck through his temples'; Moore 'she . . . demolishes his temple, lit. makes it vanish,' with a long note justifying the tr.; the Oxf. Heb. Lex. gives 'pierce'; the Heb. vb. is usually intrans. 'pass on or away,' but here and in Job 20²⁴ it is trans. 'pass through'; Job 20²⁴ 'The bow of steel shall strike him through,' Ps 110⁹, Pr 7³², La 4⁹, Hab 3¹⁴ (RV 'pierce'). It is a strong phrase meaning to crush, and the verb 'strike' has its original meaning of swift motion. Cf. Milton, Reform. in Eng. i. 'The bright and blissful Reformation (by Divine Power) strook through the black and settled Night of Ignorance and Anti-Christian Tyranny.'

2. Through the confusion between 'strike' and 'stroke,' the former came to mean rub smoothly. There are some examples in AV.

Ex 12⁷ 'They shall take of the blood and strike it on the two side-posts' (חָרַף, LXX ἑλκεύουσιν, RV 'put it'); so 12²²; also 2 K 5¹¹ 'He will surely come out to me, and stand, and call on the name of the Lord his God, and strike his hand over the place, and recover the leper' (חָרַף וְרָחַף, LXX ἱεθεύουσιν τὸν χερσὶ αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ τὰς τεύχεα, RV 'wave his hand over the place'—because it is the same Heb. verb that is used for 'waving' the 'wave-offering' [Ex 29^{24, 26} etc.], for waving the hand as a signal [Is 13²¹], and the like—see Oxf. Heb. Lex. s. 70); To 11¹¹ 'He stroke of the gall on his father's eyes' (σπασίμας τὸν χολὴν ἐπὶ τοῖς ὀφθαλμοῖς). Cf. Holland, Pliny, ii. 313, 'If the side-posts or doore-checks of any house be stricken with the said bloud, where-soever magicians are busie with their feats and juggling casts, they shall take no effect.'

* This early meaning is most nearly seen in the phrase stricken in age or in years: Gn 18¹¹ 'Now Abraham and Sarah were old and well stricken in age' (עָרִיצָה בְּאֵם, which is always the Heb. whether the Eng. be 'age' (Gn 18¹¹ 24), Jos 23¹²) or 'years' (Jos 13¹ bio); Lk 17 'They both were now well stricken in years' (παραβήκοντες ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις αὐτῶν), 118. Cf. Robinson's Morre's Utopia, 29, 'I chanced to espye this fore-sayde Peter talkyng with a certayne Straunger, a man well stricken in age.'

3. To 'strike sail' is simply to haul it down in order to ease the ship: Ac 27¹⁷ 'strake sail,' Gr. χαλάσαντες τὸ σκεῦος, RV 'they lowered the gear'—see Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck, p. 105 ff.; Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 329 f.; and the notes by Page and by Knowling.

4. To 'strike hands' is to become security, as Pr 17¹⁸ 'A man void of understanding striketh hands, and becometh surety in the presence of his friend,' so 6¹ 11^{18m}. 22²⁸, Job 17³, Ad. Est 14⁸. The expression is Heb. and arises from the action.

5. In the Pref. to AV occurs the rare but intelligible phrase 'strike the stroke'; 'The vintage of Abiezer, that strake the stroke; yet the glean- ing of grapes of Ephraim was not to be despised.'

6. The verb 'to strike' is used for the action of God's hand in disease or death, and the result is a 'stroke.'

Strike: 2 S 12¹⁸ 'The Lord struck the child that Uriah's wife bare unto David, and it was very sick'; 2 Ch 13²⁰ 'The Lord struck him, and he died'; Is 1⁸ 'Why should ye be stricken any more?'; 16⁷ 'Surely they are stricken' (סִכְּרָם), RV 'utterly stricken'; 53⁴ 'We did esteem him stricken'; 53⁸ 'For the transgressions of my people was he stricken' (סִכְּרָם), RVm 'to whom the stroke was due'—see Cheyne's and Skinner's notes. Cf. Knox, Works, iii. 231, 'I can not but feel lyke plagues to stryke the realm of England'; Bunyan, Holy War, 27, 'My brave Lord Innocent fell down dead (with grief, some say; with being poisoned with the striking breath of one Ill-Pause, as say others).'

Stroke: Job 23² 'My stroke is heavier than my groaning' (so RV; Heb. lit. as Avm 'my hand': but it is scarcely possible, says Davidson, that 'my hand' should mean 'the hand of God upon me,' i.e. 'my stroke'; see his note); 36¹⁸ 'Beware lest he take thee away with his stroke' (סִכְּרָם), RV 'lest thou be led away by thy sufficiency,' RVm 'lest wrath lead thee away into mockery'; Ps 39¹⁰ 'Remove thy stroke away from me'; Is 14⁸ 'He who smote the people in wrath with a continual stroke'; Ezk 24¹⁶ 'I take from thee the desire of thine eyes with a stroke.' The 'stroke' of OT, as of Is 53⁸, was probably leprosy; in modern language a 'stroke' is paralysis. See art. PLAGUE in vol. iii. p. 587⁵. Cf. Shaks. Rich. II. iii. i. 31—

'More welcome is the stroke of death to me
Than Bolingbroke to England.'

Timon of Athens, iv. i. 29—

'Plagues, incident to men,
Your potent and infectious fevers heap
On Athens, ripe for stroke.'

STUBBLE.—In one place (Job 21¹⁸) this is the unfortunate tr² (AV and RV) of teben (see STRAW). In all other places it is the equivalent, in both Eng. VSS, of שֵׁבֶכֶת kash. The LXX tr. this word in two places (Job 13²⁸ 41²⁸) χόρτος; in eight καλήμη (= 'stubble' or 'straw'), and in four φρύγανα ('dry sticks' and 'stems,' including stubble, such as are gathered for fuel). This is the current (not classical) meaning of the Arab. cognate kash. Once (Is 33¹¹) the expression 'ye shall bring forth stubble' is tr. by LXX αἰσθηθήσεσθε (B), 'ye shall perceive,' or αἰσχυθήσεσθε (K²), 'ye shall be ashamed,' evidently a different reading. Grain in Bible lands is not cut by the sickle, but pulled up by the roots, or the straw broken off short near them. Consequently there is little stubble in the harvest field, in our sense of the term. When teben was withheld from them, the Israelites had to utilize kash for the manufacture of their bricks. Kash refers to such remnants of grain stalks, with sticks and stumps of small plants, as are expressed by φρύγανα. Such furnish the pasturage of countless herds of cattle and flocks of sheep. They are liable to catch fire and burn. Most of the allusions to stubble are with reference to such conflagrations (Ex 15⁷, Is 5²⁴, Jl 2⁵ etc.). It is finally rooted up and carried away by the wind (Job 13²⁸, Is 40²⁴, Jer 13²⁴ etc.). One of the most characteristic spectacles witnessed in passing over the breezy plains of Syria, after the harvest is over, is that of the uprooted plants of the large Umbelliferae, Compositae, and others, often with a spherical contour, dried to excessive lightness by the hot winds and whirled across the fields, leaping madly over stones and inequalities in the surface, and sometimes taking long flights in the air, then pausing a moment, only to bound off again, until they are caught in some thorn bush, or lost to view beyond the distant horizon. G. E. POST.

* In the same way the subst. 'blow' is used in Ps 39¹⁰ and Jer 14¹⁷. In the former passage RV retains, the Heb. being found only there; in the latter it changes into 'wound.'

STUFF (Lat. stupa, stuppa, the coarse part of flax, tow, Old Fr. estoffe) is used in AV in the sense of goods, esp. household furniture. The Heb. is כֶּלִי keli, except in Ex 36⁷ (קֶרֶן, lit. 'work,' of the furniture of the tabernacle). The Gr. is τὰ σκεύηματα, Jth 15¹¹; or τὰ σκεῦη, Jth 16¹⁹, Lk 17³¹. Cf. Udall, Erasmus' Par. i. 7, 'All that ever they had about them of stuffe or furniture, shewed and testified povertie and simplicitie'; North, Plutarch, 871, 'This man after he had spent the most part of his father's goods, was so sore in debt, that he was driven to sell his household stuffe, by billes set up on every post.'

In 2 Ch 2 heading 'stuff' means 'materials' for building. Cf. Erasmus, Crede, 39, 'Certayne men . . . have taught that he doth create which doth brynge forth and make somewhat of nothyng, which belongeth onely to God, and that he doth make which frameth or shapeth any thing of some matere or stuffe'; Ex 39² Tind. 'And the brodyng of the girdel that was upon it was of the same stuffe and after the same worke of gold.'

STUMBLING BLOCK.—The word 'block' was formerly used of a lump of wood, stone, or the like, in one's way, and was then applied fig. to any obstruction. Thus Payne, Royal Exch. 38, 'At which common block many weaklings do stumble.' The expression exists now only in the compound 'stumbling-block,' and only the compound is found in AV.

The words so tr^d are in Heb.: (1) מִכְשֹׁל (Lv 19¹⁴, Is 57¹⁴, Jer 6²¹, Ezk 32⁷ 14⁴ 4⁷); and (2) מַכְשֵׁיחַ (Zeph 1³). The Gr. words are: (1) πρίσχυμα (Sir 39²⁴, Ro 14¹³, 1 Co 5⁹); (2) ἑλκὺς προσκλύματος (Sir 31⁷); and (3) σκάνδαλον (Wis 14¹¹, Sir 7⁸, Ro 11⁹, 1 Co 12², Rev 2¹⁴). See ORIGEN, vol. iii. p. 586².

In the same way stumblingstone is used in Ro 9³². 33 (λίθος προσκλύματος), for which RV gives 'stone of stumbling,' the AV expression for the same Gr. in 1 P 2⁸. 'Stone of stumbling' occurs also in Is 8¹⁴ for 'eben negeph,' the latter word meaning lit. 'plague,' 'stroke' (see STRIKE, STROKE).

SUCCEED, SUCCESS.—To succeed (Lat. suc. cedere, from sub, next, and cedere, to go; Fr. suc.

cider) is simply to follow; and success (Lat. successus, Old Fr. success) is that which follows. Thus, Shaks. II Henry VI. II. iv. 2—

'After summer evermore succeeds
Barren winter';

Tymme, Calvin's Genesis, 785, 'This verily was rare honour, to be tolde of the event, and successe to come of fourteene yeares'—in reference to the interpretation of Pharaoh's dreams. In modern Eng. when the reference is to the result of an enterprise, 'succeed' and 'success' denote prosperity, but in older Eng. the nature of the result was not contained in the words themselves, but had to be indicated by an adv. or adjective.

Succeed: In Sir 48⁶ the verb occurs in its simple sense, and the prep. is expressed, 'Who anointedst kings to take revenge, and prophets to succeed after him' (ἐκδοξας μετ' αὐτοῖς). We still say 'follow after,' but not 'succeed after.' The nature of the result is expressed by an adv. in To 46 'If thou deal truly, thy doings shall prosperously succeed to thee' (ἐκδοξας ἐπὶ τῇ ἀληθείᾳ σου). Cf. Shaks. Lear, I. ii. 157, 'The effects he wites of succeed unhappily.'

Success: It was possible in 1611 to use 'success' in a good sense; * it occurs so once in AV, 2 Mac 10²⁸ 'For a pledge of their success and victory' (ὑποσημασίαν καὶ νίκης). So Fuller, Holy State, 258, 'God causeth sometimes the sunne of successe to shine as well on bad as good projects.' But elsewhere in AV an adj. is used, either 'good' (Jos 18, 18 18 heading, To 712, Wis 1319, Sir 20⁹ 3313, 1 Mac 4⁴⁸ 523, 2 Mac 10²⁸ 1316) or 'prosperous' (Sir 43²⁸). Cf. Fuller, Holy State, 109, 'God mouldeth some for a schoolmaster's life, undertaking it with desire and delight and discharging it with dexterity and happy successe.' On the other hand, Holy State, 79, 'Sorrow-struck with some sad signe of ill-successe'; and Milton, PR iv. 1—

'Perplexed and troubled at his bad success,
The tempter stood.'

SUCCOTH.—1. (מִצֵּד) A place so called according to Gn 33¹⁷ because of the booths (Heb. sukkōth) which Jacob made there for his cattle. In the Heb. text of this verse sukkōth occurs three times and is rendered 'Succoth'—'booths'—'Succoth' in AV and RV. The LXX by using σκηναι three times makes clear the identity of Succoth with booths, which has to be explained in the margin of AV and RV, but conveys the impression that the name of Succoth was then Σκηναι. Josephus (Ant. I. xxi. 1) states that the place was so called in his time; but this name would not have been given before the period of Greek supremacy. The Targ. and Syr. preserve the proper name Succoth, but in place of the second sukkōth (tr. 'booths' in EV) use סכנין, סכנין, words which in a modified form are employed as equivalents for 'tabernacles' and 'booths' in Lv 23^{34, 42} and other places where reference is made to the Feast of Tabernacles. The Vulgate explains 'Socoth, id est tabernacula,' though 'tentorii' corresponds to 'booths' in the earlier part of the verse.

The passages where the name occurs are: Gn 33¹⁷ Σκηναι; Jos 13²⁷ Β Σακχά, Α Σαχά, Luc. Σαχά; Jg 8⁵⁻¹⁶ Β Σαχά, in v. 16 τῆς σκηνῆς, Α Σαχά; 1 K 7⁴⁶ (v. 38 in LXX) Σαχά; 2 Ch 41⁷ Β Σαχά (C), Α Σαχά; Ps 60⁶ Β τῶν σκηνῶν, Αq. σκηνισμῶν; Ps 108⁶ Κ τῶν σκηνισμῶν, ART σκηνῶν.

The passages in Joshua, Judges, Kings, and Chron. refer to a place E. of Jordan. Jos 13²⁷ mentions Succoth as in the territory of Sihon, king of Heshbon. In Gideon's pursuit of the Midianites as related in Jg 8, he comes to Succoth after crossing the Jordan. From the references in Ps 60⁶ [Heb. 5] 108⁶ [Heb. 5] to the 'valley of Succoth' nothing definite as to geographical position can be inferred, but a locality east of the Jordan is suitable (note that the LXX in these two passages does not treat Succoth as a proper name). Jerome on Gn 33¹⁷ (Quæst. Heb. in lib. Gen.) observes with reference to Succoth: 'Est autem usque hodie civitas trans Jordanem hoc vocabulo inter partes Scythopoleos.' Jerome testifies to the survival of the Heb. name, while Josephus (as already remarked) testifies to the existence of its Gr. equivalent. The Talm. Jerus. (Shebiith, ix. 2) gives סכנין (in some edd. סכנין) as yet another name for Succoth, and Merrill (East of the Jordan, p. 386), followed by Conder (Heth and Moab, p. 183) and G. A. Smith (HGHL, 585), proposes Tell Deir Alla, a mound about 1 mile N. of the Jabbok, as the site of the ancient Succoth, and the present equivalent of סכנין. A place Sakūt, about 10 miles south of Beisan, on the west of the Jordan, has also been proposed as the site; but, though this may meet the requirements of the narrative in Gn 33, a place E. of the Jordan seems necessary for some of the other places where the name is mentioned. Tristram (Bible Places, p. 345) failed to find any trace of the name Succoth east of Jordan.

* On the other hand, it is found in the Rhemish NT in a bad sense: 'As God hath shewed by the successe of all Heretical Colloquies, Synodes, and Assemblies in Germanie, France, Poole, and other places in our daies' (note on Ac 15²⁰).

2. (Σοκχάδ, Ex 12²⁷ 13²⁰, Nu 33⁶) The first encampment of the children of Israel on leaving Egypt. The word is a pure Heb. one, signifying 'booths' or 'tents' (see above), but Egyptologists regard it as the equivalent of an Egyptian word Thuku or Thuket, the name of a region of which the capital was Pithom. Brugsch and Naville are agreed on this point, but not as to the situation of Pithom. Ebers proposes a different Egyptian word as the equivalent of Succoth, but agrees with Naville as to the position of the region so designated. Referring to art. EXODUS, vol. i. p. 812, it will be seen that the neighbourhood of the station Ranises, on the railway from Zagazig to Ismailia, corresponds to the ancient Succoth. The children of Israel must have remained here a short time to arrange themselves in order for their future march; and whether the name was used by them in imitation of a similarly sounding Egyptian word, or because they then began to dwell in booths, may be left an open question.

SUCCOTH-BENOTH (מִצֵּד בְּנוֹת; Β' Ποχχάδβανθελ, Α Σοκχάδβανθελ; Sochoth-benoth).—In 2 K 17³⁰ it is said that the colonists from Babylon at Samaria 'made Succoth-benoth,' just as the colonists from Cuth 'made Nergal.' The parallelism between Nergal and Succoth-benoth shows that the latter must be the name of a deity. As Nergal was the patron-god of Cuth, it is reasonable to infer that in Succoth-benoth we have a corrupted form either of Bel-Merodach, the patron-god of Babylon, or of his wife Zarpanit. There is consequently a good deal of probability in the conjecture of Rawlinson (Herodotus, i. p. 654) that we have in it a corruption of the Babylonian Zarpanit, 'the silvery one,' which, in accordance with a popular etymology, is generally written Zer-banit, 'the seed-creatress,' in the cuneiform texts. The spelling of the name in the LXX lends support to this view; and it is just possible that Rawlinson may be right in suggesting that the biblical Succoth is due to a confusion between zerit, which seems to be a derivative form from zeru (see Haupt, Nimrod-Epos, 8, 35), and zardt, 'tents' or 'booths.' In Am 5²⁶ the name of the Babylonian god Sakkut has been transformed into מצד, if we accept Schrader's explanation of the passage (SK, 1874, pp. 324-332). Perhaps the fact that the images of the Babylonian divinities were carried in procession in 'ships' or arks, assisted in the change of the name. It is even possible that by Succoth the Hebrew writer intended to denote these processional shrines, Benoth (from Benith) being corrupted from Belith or Belit, the classical Beltis, a common title and synonym of Zer-banit.

SUD (Σοδ, Sodī).—The 'river' of Babylon, on which dwelt 'Jechonias, the son of Joakim, king of Judah,' and his fellow-exiles (Bar 1⁵). The canal on which Babylon was situated before its destruction by Sennacherib was called the Arakhtu; but the whole of Babylonia was intersected by small canals, each of which had a name, and it is therefore quite possible that in the time of Nebuchadnezzar one of those in the neighbourhood of the capital bore a name which resembled Sud. As, however, the Greek sibilant can represent more than one Semitic letter, it is useless to speculate about the Babylonian form of the name until we know how it was written in Hebrew or Aramaic.

A. H. SAYCE.

SUDDENLY.—The adj. 'sudden' and the adv. 'suddenly' were often used formerly without the element of surprise which belongs to their root (Lat. subitaneus, from subire, 'to come stealthily'), and is always associated with their use in mod. English. Thus Shaks. uses 'sudden' in the sense of soon (Meas. for Meas. II. ii. 83, 'To-morrow! O, that's sudden'); and of hasty (As You Like It, V. ii. 8, 'My sudden wooing, nor her sudden consenting') and of impetuous (Rich. II. ii. i. 35, 'Small showers last long, but sudden storms are short'). So also he uses 'suddenly' in the sense of quickly (Tam. Shrew. ii. 327, 'Was ever match clapped up so suddenly?') or presently (1 Henry IV. i. iii. 294, 'When time is ripe, which will be suddenly'). In AV 'suddenly' means speedily in Ps 61¹⁰ 'Let them return and be ashamed suddenly' (פִּרְץ, LXX διὰ ταχύ); and in Jer 49¹⁵ 50⁴⁴. In 1 Ti 5²² 'Lay hands suddenly on no man,' the meaning is hastily (Gr. ταχέως). J. HASTINGS.

SUDIAS (BA Σουδίας, Luc. Ὀσουδία).—A Levitical family that returned with Zerubbabel, 1 Es 5³³, called in Ezr 2⁴⁰ HODAVIAH and in Neh 7⁴³ HODEVAH.

SUICIDE.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, vol. i. p. 522^a.

SUKKIIM (סֻכִּיִּם; B Τρωγοδύται, A Τρωγλοδύται, Luc. Σουκκίμ).—The name of a tribe mentioned together with Libyans and Cushites as led by Shishak against Judæa (2 Ch 12⁸). The passage is not found in the corresponding text of Kings. The LXX rendering 'Trogloodytes' was probably suggested by the fact of a place called Suche (Pliny, HN vi. 172) being mentioned among Trogloodyte possessions; the same is called by Strabo (iii. 8) 'the fortress of Suchus,' and Suchus, he tells us, is a name for a sacred crocodile (ib. xvii. 1). Several geographers identify this place with the modern Suakin, which, however, may well be an Arabic word (sawākin). The identification of the Sukkiim with the inhabitants of Suakin (though accepted by Forbiger and Dillmann) is therefore very uncertain; nor is the view of Gesenius, that the word should be treated as a Hebrew adjective, 'dwellers in tents,' much more probable.

* SUN.—The usual word in the OT for the first of the great lights of heaven is שֶׁשֶׁשׁ, Phœn. שֶׁשֶׁשׁ, Aram. שֶׁשֶׁשׁ (Dn 6¹⁴) and shemsha, Arab. shamsu, Assy. šamšu (samsu in the name Samsu-iluna, c. 2200 B.C., evidently a west Semitic form). There is considerable uncertainty as to the etymology (for conjectures see Levy, Wörterb. über die Targg. ii. 578 f.). Other words for sun are שֶׁשֶׁשׁ, lit. 'heat,' or, adj. [?], 'hot' (Job 30²⁸, Ca 6¹¹, Is 24²³⁻³⁰), and שֶׁשֶׁשׁ (Jg 8¹⁴⁻¹⁵, Job 9⁷), of doubtful derivation. Both these terms are used poetically, and the latter occurs in the place-name Ir-ha-Heres, 'city of the sun' (Heliopolis), RV 'city of destruction' (see IR-HA-HERES). In Job 31²⁶ the word used is מֵאָרָא, marg. 'light.'

The earliest mention of the sun in the Bible is in Gn 1⁴⁻¹⁵ [P], in which, however, none of the above words are used, the luminary being referred to as the greater of the two 'great lights' (mē'ôrôth), created to rule the day, the lesser light being to rule the night, and to divide the light from the darkness (v. 15). Both of them were placed in the firmament for signs and for seasons, and for days and years (v. 16). As the lesser light, the moon was the measurer of time, by her constant and clearly-marked phases; the sun was, by the constancy and regularity of his apparent motion, the real indicator. With those of the lesser light, his eclipses were regarded as signs foretelling events. He indicated the beginning and the end of each day; seasons, both religious and agricultural; regulated the festivals; and determined the commencement and termination of every year, his movements forming, at the same time, the basis of all chronological data.

Naturally, the ideas of the ancient Hebrews concerning the movements of the sun, when tested by modern science, were erroneous. As we, in the language of everyday life, speak of the sun as 'rising' and 'setting,' so they spoke of him as 'going forth' (yāzā, Gn 19²³ etc.; zārah, Jg 9², 2 S 23⁴ etc.) and 'entering' (bō, Gn 15¹²⁻¹⁷ etc.). From zārah and bō came the expressions, mizrah (shemesh), 'the rising (of the sun),' also 'east'; and mōbō (shemesh), 'the setting (of the sun);' also 'west.' The equivalent Assyrian expressions are similar, being zīt (for āzīt, from āzū = yāzā) šamši and ērīb šamši, the 'coming forth' and the 'entering of the sun' (cf. for the latter, the Heb. עָרַב, 'to become evening'). Poetically, this idea of going forth and entering was extended, and the sun, as well as the moon, was regarded as possessing a habitation (Hab 3¹¹) and a tent or tabernacle (Ps 19⁴⁻⁵), set for him by God, from which he came forth as a bridegroom from his chamber, rejoicing as a strong man to run his course. This idea seems to be illustrated by the designs on certain of the cylinder-seals of Babylonia, on which a deity, evidently the sun-god, is represented coming forth through the open doors, which the attendants hold back for him, at the same time turning their faces away, in order not to be blinded by his brightness. In connexion with this, it is also worthy of note that the Babylonians speak of the bolts of the high heavens greeting the sun at his setting, and his beloved wife going to meet him. There is hardly any doubt that these poetical similes are based upon the unvarying regularity of the sun's daily course, which, in more southern latitudes, varies less than with us, marking the two cardinal points, and also the division of day and night, with less variation. Such expressions as 'the time when the sun is hot' (1 S 11⁹, Neh 7³) were therefore more precise than they would be in our latitudes. Having risen, and run his fixed path in his might (Jg 5³¹) until the time of his greatest heat, the sun went down at the hour which, like a living thing, he was supposed to know (Ps 104¹⁹).

Like all God's creatures, the sun was altogether dependent on His will, and at His command would cease to shine (Job 9⁷); and, this being the case, the sun could also undergo a change of his course. Of this there are two examples: Joshua's order to the sun to stand still (Jos. 10¹²⁻¹⁴, Sir 46³), and the going back of the shadow on the dial of Ahaz (2 K 20⁸⁻¹¹, Is 38⁷). The former has given rise to a considerable amount of discussion, the improbability of such a change as the stoppage of the earth's rotation implied thereby being generally recognized, notwithstanding that God's power to do so without harm to the world and its inhabitants cannot admit of doubt. The probability, however, is that this passage, being a poetical extract from another work, 'the Book of Jashar,' is not to be understood literally, the statement being made by poetic licence for some such expression as 'the sun did not set until the enemies of Israel were completely defeated,' i.e. the operations were carried out so rapidly, that as much was done as if the day had been twice as long (cf. v. 14). On the other hand, the explanation that the lengthening of the day, and the continued appearance of the sun above the horizon, may have been due to a considerable increase of the refractive properties of the atmosphere, is also possible. The return of the shadow on the dial has also been referred to various causes, and may, according to some, have been due to an eclipse (see Bosanquet in G. Smith's Assurbanipal, p. 346, and TSBA iii. 31 ff., v. 261). In 2 K 20⁸⁻¹¹ it is the shadow only that is spoken of; but the parallel passage in Is 38⁷ mentions also the sun, and on account of this it has been contended that the movement recorded must have been purely optical. The phenomenon referred to in Mk 15³³, Lk 23^{44, 45}, where it is stated that the sun was darkened, cannot refer to an eclipse, as it was the time of the full moon. The sun is in these passages, to all appearance, represented as hiding himself in order to cast a veil of darkness over the death of the Son of God. Whatever be the explanation of these three apparent departures from the sun's daily routine, there is no doubt that they are intended to emphasize the power of God, and His active interest in the affairs of man. The same ideas were, to all appearance, generally current with regard to eclipses in general, these being looked upon in like manner as extraordinary manifestations of the power of God over nature, or as foreshadowing the terrible tokens of the day of judgment (Is 13¹⁰, Jl 2¹⁰ 31⁶ = Ac 2²⁰, Mt 24²⁹, Mk 13²⁴, Lk 21²⁵, Rev 6¹² 8¹²).^{*} The setting of the sun at bright noonday is figurative of loss of happiness, prosperity, or success (Is 60²⁰, Jer 15⁹, Am 8⁹, Mic 3⁷), whilst the reverse of this is indicated by the rising of the 'sun of Righteousness' of Mal 4² (see also vol. i. p. 193^b).

Like the moon, the sun was also regarded as an emblem of constancy, on account of the unerring daily repetition of his course (Ps 72^{5, 17} 89³⁶). The man who loves God (Jg 5⁸¹) and the just ruler (2 S 23⁴) are both compared with him as the thing of all God's creation shining with the greatest brilliance, whilst, for the same reason, he became the image of God Himself (Ps 84¹¹). His pure, unflinching light became also an emblem of beauty (Ca 6¹¹), and his force increasing daily, or at certain seasons, typified the progress of a good man towards perfection (Pr 4¹⁸). The great luminary (Sir 17⁸¹) and adornment of the heavens (Sir 26⁶), his light shone on all things; and is surpassed in brilliance only by the heavenly world to come, of which God Himself is to be the light and the glory (Is 60¹⁹, Ac 26¹³).

It is to the penetrating heat of the sun that the poetical expression חַמָּה, hammāh, is applied (cf. Ps 106⁶); and by means of this, as well as by his light, he exercises his beneficent power, bringing forth the fruits of the earth (Dt 33¹⁴), grass with the help of the rain (2 S 23⁴), and giving man the desire of life (Ec 1⁷). But the sun has also the power of injuring, smiting, and scorching men and the fruits of the earth by his heat (Ps 121⁶, Is 49¹⁰, Jon 4⁸, Rev 7¹⁶ 18⁸ etc.).

Observation of the movements of the sun, and his influence upon the earth and upon all nature, caused all the ancient world, with but few exceptions, to regard him as a living thing; and from this view, dwelling, as they did, in the midst of heathendom, the ancient Hebrews were not wholly free, especially during the time of the kings. Except, however, where a direct reference to idolatry is made, the sun is spoken of as a personal living being only in the domain of poetry, though, as will be seen further on, the writers of the Hebrew poetical books had been apparently influenced by the heathen teaching concerning the luminary of day. He ruled over the day, not as a god but as the source of light, heat, and the divisions of time, and came forth from his chamber to run his fixed course as one of the great creations of God, not as being himself a deity whom men should worship.

Nevertheless, the Hebrews were attracted by the worship of the sun, under the influence of the heathen nations by whom they were surrounded. A common act of worship is that mentioned in Job 31^{26, 27}, in which the hand was kissed, and which is described as an iniquity to be punished by the judges. The law against idolatrous worship of the sun and heavenly bodies is given in Dt 4¹⁹, and from 17²⁻⁵ we learn that the penalty was death by stoning at the gate of the city. The open idolatry which took place in the time of the kings, however, shows clearly that the laws recorded in the passages quoted were not generally observed.

On the entrance of the Israelites into the Holy Land, they found there the worship of the sun under the name of Baal-hammon, the last component part of this appellation being the singular of the word hammānim, meaning 'sun-images,' and connected with the word hammāh, 'heat or hot,' one of the words used in the OT for the sun (Job 30²⁸ etc.). As pointed out in the article BAAL, however, it is not certain that Baal was regarded as the sun, but the sun was a baal, or 'lord,' just as the Babylonian sun-god, Samaš, bore the title of bēlu, 'lord,' in common with the other deities of the Assyro-Babylonian pantheon. In all probability, therefore, the worship of the sun, properly so called, came from Babylonia, in which country there were at least two shrines to this god—one at Sippar (Abu-habbah), and the other at Larsa, which is identified with the Ellasar of Gn 14¹. He was also worshipped, however, at many other places in Babylonia and Assyria.

Noteworthy in connexion with the worship of the sun by the Jews, and its origin, is the reference to the chariots of the sun in 2 K 23¹¹. To all appearance the chariot, as well as the horses, had been dedicated by various idolatrous kings of Judah, and they were stationed at the western entrance to the temple, 'by the chamber of Nathan-melech the chamberlain, which was in the precincts.' At the temple of the sun at Sippar in Babylonia there was also a chariot, and presumably horses, dedicated to that deity; and it is worthy of note that, as one of the sacred objects belonging to the temple of the god, it was the custom to make sacrifices to it.* In the 19th year of Nabopolassar this was transferred from the keeping of the men who had care of the horses (? of the sun at Sippar) to a man named Bēl-āhē-iddina, and a list of the furniture (ūdē) of the chariot was drawn up, enumerating about 140 objects belonging to it, many of them of silver, though some were of gold and of bronze. It is doubtful whether the Babylonians ever thought of the sun-god coursing through the heavens in a chariot drawn by swift steeds of fiery breed typifying his brilliant daily journey through the heavens, as the inscriptions, as far as they are known, do not refer to this, and the representation of the sun-god on the stone found by Mr. Rassam at Abu-labbah shows the deity seated in his shrine, with the representation of his disc before him, and two small figures coming out of the top of the shrine, seemingly guiding the disc by means of the cords attached to it, which they hold in their hands. The sacrificial instruments which formed part of the furniture of the chariot suggest that it was used in connexion with the worship of the sun; and as, in its equipment, swords or daggers of gold (3 in number) and of some other material (2 in number) are referred to, the suggestion that it may have accompanied the army on certain occasions would not be without probability. The ceremonies in connexion with the chariot of the sun at Sippar, in all probability, had their reflexion at Jerusalem. It is hardly likely, however, that the chariot of the sun at Jerusalem, which Josiah burned with fire, was so splendid as that at Sippar in Babylonia.*

* Mahler, in JRAS, 1901, p. 42, explains the plague of darkness referred to in Ex 10^{21ff} as an eclipse of the sun, which took place in B.C. 1835 (Sitzungsber. der k. Akad. der Wiss., Vienna, 1885).

* One of the tablets referring to this states that on the 18th of Iyyar, in the 14th year of Nabopolassar, a full-grown white sheep was offered before it.

The worship of the sun at Jerusalem is described by Ezekiel, who speaks of the five and twenty men (? priests) with their backs towards the temple of the Lord, and their faces towards the east, worshipping the sun (Ezk 8¹⁶). During this ceremony it is said (v. 17) that 'they put the branch to their nose,' a doubtful phrase which has been the subject of much discussion. The general opinion, however, is, that this is a reflexion of a Persian custom in which, when repeating the liturgy, the priests held from time to time in the left hand a bunch of twigs called baregman, and wore, at the offering of the daily sacrifice, a kind of veil. It may be noted in connexion with this, that, in the list of things belonging to the chariot of the sun at Sippar, 2 nurmû are mentioned. Now the word nurmû, as is suggested by Frd. Delitzsch (Assyr. HWB), possibly means 'fig,' 'fig-tree,' and two models of a tree of this kind, or of branches, probably belonged to the chariot as ornaments, and may have been carried 'before the face' when worshipping the sun, as his emblems. Whether this practice originated in Persia or in Babylonia is doubtful.

These idolatrous Jews of old are represented as worshipping the sun towards the east, i.e. at his rising. This was a custom with the Persians, and also, in all probability, with all the nations which adored that luminary. At the temple of Borsippa, which is generally regarded as the Tower of Babel, the worship of the sun was possibly an institution of long standing, and at the beginning of a new day, that is, at sunset, the following hymn was sung:—

'Sun-god in the midst of heaven, at thy setting,
May the bolt of heaven lofty speak thee peace—
May the door of heaven bless thee.
Mîsarû, the messenger, thy beloved, let him direct thee.
At Ê-babarra, the seat of thy dominion, thy supremacy shines forth.
May Aa, thy beloved wife, gladly come to meet thee;
May thy heart take rest;
May thy divine refreshment be prepared for thee.
Warrior, hero, sun-god, may they glorify thee.
Lord of Ê-babarra, may the course of thy road prosper.
Sun-god, direct thy path, make firm the road, go to thine abode.
Sun-god, thou art judge of the land, (and) director of its decisions.'

In this hymn the sun is not only represented in a manner similar to that of the psalmist, as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber (Ps 19⁵), but his bride is conceived as going to meet him,

* Among the Babylonians, the important thing in connexion with the ceremonies seems to have been the chariot, and this was probably the case at Jerusalem. With the Persians, on the other hand, the horses seem to have been at least as important, and sometimes the one, sometimes the other, followed in the processions. The colour of these sacred horses was white, and they were on certain occasions sacrificed to the sun (Herod. i. 189, vii. 40, 65; Xen. Cyr. viii. 8).

and he takes rest and refreshment after his wearying course. The last line of the inscription shows him also in the character which he commonly had with the Babylonians, namely, that of judge, which he apparently possessed as witness of everything that passes on the earth ('under the sun,' as so often occurs in Ecclesiastes, e. g. 1^{3.9} etc.). The tablet which followed the above was a hymn to the rising sun, beginning (the Akkadian version only is preserved), Utu ana-azaga-ta êa, 'Sun-god in the glorious heaven rising,' and may have resembled that with which the heathen Jews greeted the luminary, when performing the ceremony referred to by Ezekiel.*

The judgment pronounced against the sun and moon (Is 24²³), in which the former was to be ashamed, is regarded by some as resting upon the fact that the idolatrous worship which was paid to it was accounted as a sin, the consequences of which rested upon the object causing it, and would be visited upon it by God at the last day. This is probable; but the end of the verse ought to be taken into account, for when the Lord reigns in Zion gloriously the sun may well be put to shame on account of his inferior lustre.

SUPH.—One of the expressions used in Dt 1¹ to define the locality of Moses' address to Israel [?; on the difficulty of this interpretation see Driver] is 'in the Arabah, over against Suph' (יַם סוּף [i.e. by dissimil., for יַם-], AV 'over against the Red Sea'). If the MT be correct, Suph is a place-name, possibly identical with SUPHAH of Nu 21¹⁴, but, upon the whole, it appears more probable that יַם סוּף is a textual error for יַם סוּר (cf. LXX ἡ θάλασσα ἡ ἐρυθρὰ [θαλάσσης], Vulg. contra mare rubrum). Yam sūph † means probably 'sea of reeds,' and appears to have been originally a title given to the upper end of the Gulf of Suez, which would be shallow and marshy, and abounding in reeds (W. M. Müller, As. u. Europ. 42f.). In the OT this designation is usually confined to the W. (Suez) arm of the Red Sea: Ex 10¹⁹ (J) 13¹⁸ 15^{4.22} 23⁴¹ (all four E), Nu 33^{10.11} (P), Dt 11⁴, Jos 21⁰ (J) 4²⁸ (D), Neh 9⁹, Ps 106^{7.9.22} 136^{13.15}. It stands, however, for the Gulf of 'Akabah not only in Dt 1¹ (if the above suggestion is correct), but in Nu 21⁴ (E) and I K 9²¹; prob. also in Nu 14²⁶ (E), Dt 1⁴⁰ 2¹; and perhaps Jg 11¹⁶, Jer 49²¹.

SUPHAH (סוּפָה).—The name of an unknown locality E. of Jordan, found only in an obscure fragment of ancient poetry preserved in Nu 21¹⁴ ('Vaheb in Suphah'). The suggestion of Tristram (Land of Moab, 50 f.), that it may be the modern Safieh, is exposed to the objection of which he himself is aware, that the initial ṣ of the Heb. word could hardly represent an Arabic ص. The same difficulty attaches to Knobel's identification with Nakh es-Safā, some 25 miles W.S.W. of the Dead Sea. See, further, the Comm. ad loc.

the seacoast of Palestine upon whose people the fear and dread of Holofernes fell when they heard that he had reached Damascus (Jth 2³). The towns are mentioned in order from north to south; and Sur comes between Tyre and Ocina—the next place to the south being Jemnaan (Jamnia). The site, if a different place from Tyre (Heb. Zōr, Arab. Šūr), is unknown. C. W. WILSON.

SURE, SURELY, SURETY.—The adjectives 'secure', 'sicker' (or 'siker'), and 'sure' all come from the Lat. securus; the first being taken directly, the second through the influence of the Teut. siker, sicher: the last through the Old Fr. seür (mod. sûr). 'Secure' retained the meaning of the Lat. (se 'without', cura 'care'; see SECURE); between 'sicker' and 'sure' the difference was mainly one of dialect, till 'sicker' dropped out of literary English. Thus Chaucer, Tale of Melibæus, 2042, 'Whan thow trowest to be most seur or siker of hir [fortune's] help, she wol faille thee and deceyve thee.' Both had a wider use than 'sure' has now.

'Sure' was often used where we should now use 'secure.' Thus Udall, Erasmus Par. i. 13, 'Solitarines doeth quicken and make lusty the mind of a Christian souldier, and some time it is more sure for a man to count himself to the wild beastes, than to men. Baptisme taketh away al sinnes of the former life, but for al that, no man is sure from the assaults of Satan which liveth sluggishly.' So Pr. Bk. Pref. (1552), 'There never was any thing by the wit of man so well devised, or so sure established, which (in continuance of time) hath not been corrupted.' And in AV 1 S 23³ 'I will build him a sure house'; 1 S 22⁴ 'I will fasten him as a nail in a sure place'; 32¹⁸ 'My people shall dwell . . . in sure dwellings.'

The adverb surely, in like manner, means sometimes securely: Pr 10⁹ 'He that walketh uprightly walketh surely.' Cf. Robinson, More's Utopia, 141, 'They fence and fortifie their campe sewerlye with a deape and a brode trenche.' Jer 35¹⁴ Cov. 'The wordes which Ionadab the sonne off Rechab commaunded his sonnes, that they shulde drynke no wyne, are fast and surely kepte'; Elyot, Gouernour, ii. 237, 'David . . . came to the pavilion of king Saul, where he found hym suerly slepyng, havinge by him his speare and a cuppe with water.'

But it is of more importance to observe that in its ordinary meaning 'surely' has now lost so much of its force that its use in AV sometimes suggests to the reader the opposite of that which is intended. Thus in Gn 21⁷, the first instance of its use, 'In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die,' the assertion is the strongest possible. The Hebrew is the idiomatic phrase, 'dying thou shalt die.' But the English suggests a slight doubt. So in Gn 3⁴ 'And the serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die,' i.e. Ye shall certainly not die.

This Heb. idiom, an account of which will be found in Davidson's Hebrew Syntax, § 86, or in Gesenius-Kautzsch, § 113, is variously rendered in AV. Sometimes the idiom is preserved, as Gn 22¹⁷ 'in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed.' More frequently an adverb or adverbial phrase is inserted, such as 'exceedingly' Gn 16¹⁰, 'certainly' Gn 18¹⁰ 437, 'doubtless' 2 S 5¹⁹, 'utterly' Dt 12², Jg 12¹⁵ 153, Zec 11⁷; 'clean' Zec 11⁷; 'solemnly' Gn 43²; 'earnestly' 1 S 20³; 'altogether' Nu 16¹³, Jer 30¹¹; 'needs' Gn 24³; 'indeed' Gn 37³; 'ever' Jg 11²⁰; 'plainly' 1 S 27¹⁰ 101⁶; 'at all' 2 K 18³⁵, Jer 26¹⁹; 'straitly' Gn 43⁷, 1 S 14²⁴; 'freely' Gn 21⁶. But by far the most frequently used adverb is 'surely'; and in every instance it has the force of 'assuredly' or 'certainly.' Thus Gn 28²² 'I will surely give the tenth unto thee'; Jg 13²² 'We shall surely die, because we have seen God'; Hab 2³ 'It will surely come, it will not tarry.' Cf. Sir 48¹¹ 'We shall surely live' (σὺν ὑποστάσει).

'Surely' is also the translation of certain Hebrew and Greek adverbs and other expressions, some of which are very forcible. Thus (1) ākēn, Gn 28¹⁶ 'surely the Lord is in this place'; Ex 24⁴ 'surely this thing is known'; 1 S 15³² 'surely the bitterness of death is past'; Is 40⁷ 'surely the people is grass'; Jer 4¹⁰ 'Ah, Lord God! surely thou hast greatly deceived this people.' The same word is tr. 'verily' in Is 45¹⁵, 'truly' in Jer 32³⁴, 'certainly' in Jer 8². (2) Im (an emphatic negative), as Nu 14²² 'surely they shall not see the land which I swear unto their fathers'; or im-lo (an emphatic affirmative), as Ezk 36⁵ 'Surely in the fire of my jealousy have I spoken against the residue of the heathen.' (3) Omnām (a strong asseverative from āman, 'to confirm'), as Job 34¹² 'Yea, surely God will not do wickedly' (RV 'of a surety'). (4) 2 S 12⁹ 'The man that hath done this thing shall surely die' (Heb. 'is a son of death'; cf. 1 S 20³¹ 26¹³). (5) ἀληθῶς, as Mt 26⁷² 'surely thou also art one of them?' (RV 'of a truth'); Jn 17⁹ 'They have known surely that I came out from thee' (RV 'of a truth'). (6) πάτως, Lk 4²² 'Ye will surely say unto me this proverb' (RV 'doubtless ye will say'). (7) ἤ [εἰ] μὴν, He 6¹⁴ 'Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee' (ἤ [edd. εἰ] μὴν εὐλογῶν εὐλογῶ σε, καὶ πληθύνων πληθύνω σε). (8) ναί, Rev 22²⁰ 'Surely I come quickly' (RV 'yea').

Examples of 'surely' are Knox, Hist. 315, 'I thinke and am surely perswaded.' Rhemish NT, Proface, 'Vulpilas surely gave the Scriptures to the Gotes in their own tongue, and that before he was an Arrian.' Generydes (E.E.T.S.), 1317—

'They were fully accordid all in one
That Aferius suerly shuld be their kyng.'

Surety occurs in the phrase 'of a surety,' Gn 15¹³ 18¹³ 26⁹, Ac 12¹¹ (ἀληθῶς, RV 'of a truth'). Cf. 1 S 26⁴ Cov. 'David . . . sent out spies, and knewe of a suertie, that he was come in deede.' Elsewhere the word means 'security' in the legal sense; cf. Paraph. in Verss. 58²—

'He who for men their surety stood.'

Suretyship occurs only in Pr 11¹⁵ 'He that hateth suretyship is sure' (Heb. as AVm and RVm 'those that strike hands'; see STRIKE). See DEBT, PLEDGE. J. HASTINGS.

SUSANNA (Σουσαννά).—I. TEXT AND VERSIONS. —The history of Susanna forms a part of the Bk. of Daniel in the Greek Bible and in those versions which are taken from the Greek. In Gr. MSS, and also in the Old Latin and Arabic, it stands before Dn 1; but in the Latin Vulgate it stands as Dn 13. Swete prints it as a separate work after Daniel. The LXX is the oldest extant text, but there may have been a Semitic original. If so, it is antecedently probable that it would be in Aramaic, not Hebrew. Hebrew was the language of legal discussions, hymns, and prayers. Aramaic was the language of such anecdotes and histories as circulated freely among the people. The LXX of the History of Susanna, as indeed of the whole of the Gr. Daniel, was lost for many centuries, because of the preference of the Church for the text of Theodotion. The LXX of Susanna is, even now, extant only in Cod. Chisianus, otherwise known as 87, a cursive of the 9th cent. Theod. for the most part transcribed the LXX literally, but in several instances he made additions and alterations meant to relieve improbabilities, or to supply details which seemed to make the narrative more smooth and intelligible. The Latin Vulg. is an accurate rendering of Theodotion. In Syriac Versions, our 'History' is exceptionally rich. We have (1) the Syro-Hexaplar, which is a close translation of the LXX; (2) the Peshitta, which is given in Walton's Polyglott, Ceriani's Codex Ambrosianus, and in Lagarde's Libri VI' Apocr. Syriace, and designated W_1 ; (3) and (4) from v.⁴² onwards Lagarde gives two other Syriac recensions, both differing in many respects from each other and from W_1 , and known as L_1 and L_2 ; (5) there is a remarkable VS given by Walton, the so-called Harklensian VS, known as W_2 .

ii. THE STORY.—We intend first to give the story in those features which are common to all our sources, and then to specify the important additions or alterations made in each. In the early days of the captivity in Babylon, there was a woman named Susanna, very beautiful, very pious, the daughter of a priest. Her husband Joakim was very wealthy and honourable. He had a park adjoining his mansion, and his fellow-exiles were always welcome to both (vv. 1-4). There were two elders in Babylon, who were also judges, and were held in high repute; but both so far forgot God and the judgments He has pronounced against adultery (v. 5) as to foster impure desires towards Susanna. Neither dared divulge his secret to the other; but one day they met in the park unexpectedly and agreed to coerce her; but she strenuously refused to listen to them, saying that she would rather die than sin against God (vv. 10-24). Shortly afterwards, the elders summoned Susanna before the assembly of the Jews, and laid against her the false charge that they both saw her lying with a young man in the park, who, however, fled when they came near. Susanna protested her innocence, but the people felt obliged to believe two such honourable witnesses, and condemned her to death (vv. 28-44). As they were leaving the judgment-hall, Daniel, then a very young man, met them, and undertook to prove Susanna's innocence. He insisted on cross-questioning the witnesses apart, and put the same question to each: Under what kind of tree did the adultery occur? Each gave the name of a different tree (vv. 45-59). The people being thus convinced of the falsity of the charge, praised God, applauded Daniel, and put to death the false accusers (v. 60a).

This is, in the main, the story as it appears in the LXX. Theod. adds many details. It is probable that vv. 1-4 originated in Theod. and were transferred from him verbatim to our solitary codex of the LXX; because LXX in v. 7 introduces Susanna, as though she had not been mentioned before. LXX simply states that the elders saw her walking in the park one evening, and they both came thither early next morning; but Theod. adds that the house of Joakim was used every morning as a court of justice, and, after the people had been dismissed, Susanna walked daily in the park, and both the elders became enamoured of her. One day they both lingered when the court closed; and after they had separated, saying it was dinner hour, they both came back, and confessed their lust. Theod. and the VSs taken from it then insert a part altogether lacking in LXX, how the elders watched her go into the park and concealed themselves among the trees, surmising that she was going to bathe. When Susanna sent her maids for oil and cosmetics (W_2 'soap') the elders rushed on her, tempted her to adultery, and threatened to testify that she had sent her maids away, so as to have intercourse with a young man. When the maids came back and heard this accusation from the elders, they were utterly ashamed. Further, while LXX states that the trial was held in the synagogue, Theod. says it was held in the house and presence of Joakim. He omits from LXX that 500 of Susanna's relatives and friends came to the trial; and he puts Susanna's protestations before the charge; LXX after. Theod. says the young man escaped because he was stronger than the elders. In LXX the elders did not recognize him because he was masked. LXX introduces an angel as inspiring Daniel with wisdom at the moment when Susanna was being led to death. This Theod. omits; but he adds to the LXX that Daniel said aloud, 'Turn back to the tribunal'; and that Daniel was invited to an elder's chair. Theod. omits most of v. 51 in LXX where Daniel says, 'Do not suppose elders cannot lie.' LXX puts two questions to the wicked elders: 'Under what tree?' and 'In what part of the garden?' The punishment in LXX is: 'they threw them down the precipice'; in Theod. 'they slew them.' LXX only says: 'And the angel of the Lord cast fire through the midst of them,' and it alone adds a eulogy on young men meant to secure for them larger influence in public affairs.

The Vulgate translates Theod. very accurately; the chief deviation being the addition of one verse at the end: 'And king Astyages was gathered to his fathers, and Cyrus the Persian took the kingdom.' This contradicts Dn 1, where Daniel is 'a young man' in 597, whereas Cyrus began to reign in 538.

The Peshitta is given, as we have said, by Ceriani, Lagarde, and W_1 . Pesh. agrees in the main with Theodotion. The chief exceptions are that in v. 24 Pesh. lengthens Susanna's soliloquy and consequent repudiation of their overtures; and between vv. 26 and 27 Pesh. inserts a verse which may well have dropped out from Theod., giving the testimony of the elders to the household which gathered when Susanna cried aloud. It is almost verbatim with 37-39. After v. 41, W_1 presents a recension of Pesh., different from L_1 . L_1 inserts, after the sentence on Susanna, these words: 'That all women may fear and not do again according to this shame.' This W_1 omits. L_1 adds after v. 43 'concerning this which I have not done I am willing that they should ask me anything.' L_1 calls the first tree 'a pistia tree'; W_1 'a terebinth.' The second tree, in L_1 , L_2 is 'a pomegranate'; in W_1 'a chestnut.' At the end of v. 64 L_1 , L_2 , and W_2 give a eulogy on Daniel, which W_1 omits.

Lagarde gives, as we have said, a second Syriac recension, from v. 42 and onwards (L_2), which has several interesting readings. Two are unique. After v. 43 Susanna's prayer continues: 'Appeal for me and send a Redeemer from before thee, that thy truth may be believed by those that fear thee.' In v. 53 Daniel says to the first elder: 'These things thou hast done and thou saidst: God is righteous, and the righteous He will not destroy; and thou hast not obeyed what thou hast taught to others.'

Much more important are the variations in Walton's second Syriac Version (W_2). It almost amounts to a distinct tradition. W_2 states that Daniel was 12 years old at the time: that the synagogue was held in the house of Joakim: that Susan was a widow, having lost her husband after a married life of a few days, and devoted herself to the Lord: that the names of the elders were Amid and Abid, and they were chiefs of the synagogue: that before the trial Susan was in chains in prison three days: that the two elders were not witnesses, but judges of Susan: that it was decided that at the 9th hour Susan should be cast down a precipice: that a throne was brought from the treasury for Daniel to sit upon, but that he refused to sit upon it.

iii. ITS ORIGIN.—There are several indications that the story before us cannot be regarded as historical. (1) The discrepancies in the several accounts, e.g. those just given from W_2 . (2) The improbability that in the first days of the Captivity, when Daniel was 'a young youth' (v. 42), any Jew in Babylon could be so affluent as Joakim, or that so soon after the deportation of Jehoiachin the Jews should, in exile, possess the jus necis. (3) The reasons for Susanna's condemnation are very flimsy, and the behaviour of the very youthful Daniel is, at least, arbitrary. He loudly condemns both culprits before he adduces any proof of their guilt.

Assuming that we have here an ethical mythus, can we find its origin and motif? Ball (Speaker's Apocr. ii. 325 f.) has a probable theory, borrowed in the main from Rabbi Brüll (Das apokr. Susanna-Buch). He adduces evidence from several sources of a tradition of two elders, who, in the Captivity, led astray silly women, by the persuasion, that, through them, they would become the mother of a great prophet, or of the Messiah. These stories are an amplification or embellishment of Jer 29²¹⁻²³, where we read of two prophets, Ahab and Zedekiah, whom 'Nebuchadnezzar roasted in the fire because they committed folly in Israel, and committed adultery with their neighbours' wives.' Origen and Jerome both knew of the elaborated form of this incident, and it occurs with sundry variations in Midrash Tanhuma on Leviticus; Bab. Talm. Sanhedrin 93a; Boraitha of R. Eliezer, c. 33, and in Pesikta, No. 25. Here we have materials for the former half of the story: but not for the trial. The reasons for the rehabilitation of the tradition, with the trial attached, are ingeniously supposed to have arisen about B.C. 100, when Simon ben Shetach was president of the Sanhedrin. Simon was extremely anxious to introduce reforms into criminal procedure. It is said that his son was falsely accused of a capital offence. On the way to his execution the false witnesses confessed the crime, but the son said to his father, 'If the salvation of Israel can be wrought through you, consider me the threshold over which you may pass.' Simon, the Judæan Brutus, let the law take its course, that by the death of one he might save the innocent lives of many. He advocated a more careful examination of the witnesses—his favourite dictum being: 'Examine the witnesses abundantly' (Pirke Aboth i. 9). He sought also to suppress perjury by insisting that he who swore falsely should, if detected, be punished with the same penalty as he sought to inflict on another. (N.B.—The elders were put to death for seeking to cause Susanna's death). The Sadducees, against Simon, interpreted the law, 'an eye for an eye,' etc., to mean that the false witness should be punished, if his crime were detected after the penalty had been inflicted on the innocent one. We must confess that the appearance of our 'History' at such a juncture would be most opportune for Simon. There is, it seems to us, a further coincidence. The moral of the narrative is, in LXX, summed up thus: 'Because of this, young men are beloved in Jacob, by-virtue-of (ἐν) their ingenuousness (ἀνλόγησι): and as for us, let us take heed that our youths be powerful; for young men will be pious, and there will be in them a spirit of knowledge and understanding for ever and ever.' Clearly, this is a eulogy on youth; and may well have been meant as a compliment to Alexander Jannæus, whose adviser Simon was, and who ascended the throne at the age of twenty-three.

This assumes that the 'History' is of Palestinian origin: and there is nothing against this. If it cannot be proved to have been originally written in Aramaic, it cannot be proved that it was not.

An argument, as old as the time of Origen, which has been adduced in favour of a Greek original, seems to the present writer untenable. In vv. 24f. and 26f. there occur two paranomasias. Daniel asks the first elder: 'Under what tree didst thou see them?' and the reply is: 'Under a mastic tree' (Gr. ξύου); and Daniel says: 'The angel of God shall cleave (ἐκτεῖν) thy soul to-day.' The second elder replies: 'Under a holm-tree' (ξύου); and Daniel says: 'The angel of God has a sword to cut thee in two' (ἐπιτεῖν). These verbal plays are so ingenious that they have been held by many to prove, beyond all controversy, a Greek original. There is no more cogency in this, it seems to us, than if, supposing all early VSS to be lost, we should read in English: 'Under a close tree' . . . 'the Lord shall cleave thee,' 'Under a yew tree' . . . 'the Lord shall hew thee,' and should therefrom infer English authorship. Origen says that he asked many Jews to furnish him with Heb. words that would produce a similar assonance: but always in vain (Migne, xi. 61-65). If Heb. fails, Aramaic is equal to the demand. The 'mastic' is in Syriac VSS ܡܫܬܝܬܐ (using Heb. letters); and the verb 'to cut in two' is ܦܬܝܬ: the word which occurs in Pal Syr of Mk 6:16 'I beheaded John.' In the second case L₂ and W₂ have ܡܫܬܝܬܐ 'a pomegranate'; opposite which, we surmise that there originally stood the words: 'The angel of God shall precipitate thee' (ܦܬܝܬ). This is the punishment stated in LXX to have been inflicted: 'They muzzled them and threw them down into the ravine.' The verb ܦܬܝܬ is used in this same sense in the Aram. of Dn 3:20 6:16, and in the Targ. of Jon 1:16, Ezk 1:6.

iv. CANONICITY.—The History of Susanna was included in the Canon by the Greek, Syrian, and Latin Churches. The first to dispute its claim was Julius Africanus. In his Letter to Origen he powerfully questions its historicity (Bissell, 446), and calls it a συγγραμματα νεωτερικὸν καὶ πεπλασμένον. Origen makes a rejoinder to each of his objections, but the replies are far from satisfactory. Irenæus cites vv. 22, 23 and 26 as 'voices from Daniel the prophet' (adv. Hæc. iv. 26. 3), and Tertullian refers to our history (de Corona, iv.). Hippolytus treats it exegetically at the commencement of his Comm. on Daniel; and fragments are extant of a Comm. by Origen in Book x. of his Stromata, from which Jerome makes extracts in his Comm. on Daniel, c. xiii. Schürer (HJP II. iii. 186) collects Origen's citations from Susanna.

SWADDLE, SWADDLING-BANDS (חֲבִילֵי הָחֵלּוּק hāth-ullah; 'to swaddle' [חָלַל hāthal, σπαργανώω].—The wrapping in swaddling-clothes is at the present day, as it was in ancient times, one of the first services rendered to the newborn infant in the East. The child is laid across the diagonal of a square of cloth of which the corners are folded over the body and feet and under the head. The bandages, which are of plain cotton among the poor and of silk and embroidered work in the case of the rich, are then wrapped round the cloth which encases the child. The custom seems to point back to the early nomadic life, as the bandaging not only affords protection against cold and support to the spine, but also by the confinement of the limbs enables the mother more easily to carry the child on the day's journey. During the first week salt water (Ezk 16⁴) is applied daily to the lips and flexures of the body wherever the tender skin might become inflamed. This hardening process as a protection against chafing is further assisted by dusting the joints with a powder of pounded myrtle leaves, and any tender or irritated parts of the skin are rubbed with olive oil. The absence of these attentions at the birth of Israel (Ezk 16⁴) indicated the outcast insignificance of the nation at the beginning. Amid the privations of the manger at Bethlehem this maternal duty was carefully attended to (Lk 27¹²). The swaddling-bands are daily unfastened in attending to the child, but the practice is kept up for about a year until the child is strong enough to use his limbs. The Oriental cradle has not the high sides of the Western cradle or infant's crib, and the infant is firmly tied down by long straps resembling the swaddling-bands round the body. This idea of restraint appears in the majestic figure of the clouds as the swaddling-bands of the sea (Job 38⁹). In La 2²⁴ the AV 'swaddled' (חֲבִילֵי tippahti) is in RV tr. 'dandled.' The word is a denominative from חָבַל 'span' or 'palm of the hand.'

The English words 'swaddle' and 'swathe' are merely different spellings of Anglo-Sax. swæthel or swæthil, a strip of cloth for wrapping a child, or for bandaging in any way. Cf. Purchas, Pilgrimage, 446, 'Their feet to this end so straitly swaddled in their infancy that they grow but little.'

SWALLOW.—Two words are tr^d 'swallow' in AV, and a third in RV. 1. חֲרִיר ḥārîr (Ps 84³ LXX τρυγών; Pr 26² LXX στρομβίς = 'sparrow' or other small bird). The allusion to the nesting of this bird in the sanctuary and its swift (unalighting) flight fit the swallow. 2. אָגוּר 'agur (Is 38¹⁴ LXX πεπορεπὸς = 'pigeon'; Jer 8⁷ LXX σπομβίον = 'sparrow' or other small bird). 'Agur (see CRANE) seems to be an adjective, and perhaps signifies 'twitterer' instead of 'crane' (RV), and is explanatory of שִׁשׁ or שִׁשׁ; see, further, Dillm.-Kittel on Is 38¹⁴. 3. סוּס sūs, סִס sīs, should be tr^d as in RV (Is 38¹⁴, Jer 8⁷), 'swallow' instead of 'crane' (AV; see CRANE). If sūs or sīs be the swallow, or better, the swift or martin, the twittering could only refer to its note in its nest. The allusion to the migratory habits of the bird would suit the swallow. The following swallows and swifts or martins are common in the Holy Land:—Hirundo Savignii, Steph., the Oriental swallow; H. rustica, L., the common swallow (Arab. sūnūnū, or sūs or sīs); H. rufula, Temm., the red-rumped swallow; Chelidon urbica, L., the martin; Cotyle riparia, L., the sand martin; C. rupestris, Scop., the crag martin; C. obsoleta, Cab., the pale crag martin; Cypselus apus, L., the black martin or swift; C. melba, L., and C. Galileensis, would be included under the popular conception of the swallow or swift. Any or all of them would sometimes be called sūs or sīs. G. E. POST.

SWAN.—The AV tr^a (twice) of נְשֵׁפִים tinshemeth, a word which occurs thrice in the list of unclean creatures, once at the end of a list of lizards (see MOLE, 1 (b)), and twice among the birds (Lv 11¹⁸ LXX πορφυρίων = 'water-hen,' Vulg. porphyrio, RV 'horned owl,' m. 'swan'; Dt 14¹⁸ LXX ἰβίς, Vulg. ibis, RV 'horned owl'). The arguments against the swan are—(1) There is no reason why the swan should have been held unclean. (2) The swan is very rare in the Holy Land and Egypt, and therefore would have been little recognized. (3) The ancient VSS are against it. The gallinule or water-hen (Porphyrio) and the ibis are, however, birds which would have been held unclean, which are quite common, and each of which has the support of one passage in the VSS. Porphyrio caerules, Vandelli, the Purple Gallinule, and Ibis religiosa, L., or I. falcinella, L., the Glossy Ibis, would suit the requirements of the passages. SWINE (חֵזִיר hāzīr).—This word is cognate to the Arab. khinzīr. The LXX tr. hāzīr in Ps 80¹³ סוּס (AV and RV 'boar'), Lv 11⁷, Dt 14⁸, Pr 11²² זָכָר (AV and RV 'swine') There is no question as to the identity of the animal intended. The NT word for it is χοῖρος. The eating of swine's flesh is forbidden in Israel (Lv 11⁷, Dt 14⁸), hence the infringement of this rule was one of the practices to which the Hellenizing party sought to compel the faithful (2 Mac 6¹⁸). The flesh (Is 65⁶ 66¹⁷) and blood (66³) of swine are described as characteristically heathen and repulsive offerings (cf. 1 Mac 1⁴⁷). A jewel of gold in a swine's snout is used as a simile of a fair woman of doubtful character (Pr 11²²). A wild boar appears as fig. of the foes of Israel (Ps 80¹³). The ancient Egyptians and Phoenicians, as well as the Jews, regarded swine as unclean. Mohammedans are, if possible, more intense than the Jews in their disgust for them. To call a man a hog is worse than to call him a dog. This feeling is shared by most of the Christians in Palestine. But a considerable number of them breed swine and eat their flesh. Swine's flesh is sold in a number of shops in Beirut. The writer has seen native Christians in Amanus hunting wild swine, which are very abundant in that range, as also in the Jordan Valley, and in the higher regions of Lebanon and Antilebanon. It would appear that, in the time of Christ, Jews had come to raising swine in large herds (Mt 8³⁰ etc., Lk 15¹⁵). G. E. POST.

SWORD in OT is the rendering of several Hebrew words:—1. מִקְרָה mikhrāh, Gn 49⁶ RV 'weapons of violence are their swords' (better RVm 'compacts'). The word is of very doubtful meaning, the VSS being at fault; cf. Dillmann, Genesis, ad loc. 2. שֶׁלֶחַ shelah, Jl 2⁸ AV (better RV 'weapons'). 3. קִידוֹן kidōn, Sir 46², through the πομφαλὸς of LXX (better 'spear' as Jos 8^{18.20} or 'javelin'). 4. חֶרֶב herebh (the usual word, occurring with great frequency in OT), which can nearly always be tr^d 'sword' or 'dagger' (Jg 3¹⁶), but once had a more general meaning; cf. the Arab. harb 'war.' Thus herebh is 'tool' Ex 20²⁵, 'axes' Ezk 26⁹, and 'mattocks' 2 Ch 34⁴ AV (RVm 'axes'; RV, following a different reading, 'in their ruins'; the text is quite dubious), and in Jos 5² חֶרֶבוֹת זָרִים harbhōth zūrim is 'knives of flint.' Probably therefore herebh denoted originally the primitive flint implement, which, according to its varying shape and size, might serve the purpose of spear-head, arrow-head, axe, hammer, or knife. Such implements have been found during the excavation of Tell el-Hesi (Lachish). The 'blade' of a sword and the 'head' of a spear are alike called לֶחֶב lahabh.

STONE KNIFE FROM TELL EL-HESI (LACHISH).

In size the herebh was probably quite short. Ehud's 'sword' (Jg 3¹⁶ RV) was a cubit (about 17 inches) long, and Goliath's (1 S 21⁹) was a possible weapon for David. The material of all weapons of offence was sometimes iron and sometimes bronze (cf. Gn 4²¹, Jos 8²¹, 1 S 17⁷, Jg 1¹⁹, Is 10³⁴); at the excavations at Tell el-Hesi (Lachish) spear-heads and a battle-axe of bronze were found as well as arrow-heads and a curved dagger (khanjar) of iron (F. J. Bliss, PEFSt, 1892, pp. 101-113, with illustrations; for mines in Palestine cf. Driver on Dt 8⁹). Roughly speaking, the difference of metal marks a difference of time, bronze weapons being earlier than those of iron or steel. In shape the herebh was sometimes curved with a sharp inner edge like the Egyptian sword, sometimes straight like the weapon worn by the Assyrians; for illustrations see R. F. Burton, Book of the Sword, pp. 156, 205. The 'double-edged' herebh (Jg 3¹⁶, Ps 149⁶, Pr 5⁴, Sir 21²) might be either curved or straight; cf. Burton, as above.

The use of the sword was twofold: in war to despatch the flying or fallen enemy after the bow and the spear had done their work, in peace to execute malefactors; cf. 1 K 2^{34.46}. The sword was carried in a sheath (טָאָר tā'ar, Jer 47⁶, or נָדָן nādān, 1 Ch 21⁷) 'probably of leather' (Nowack, Heb. Archäologie, i. 363), but ancient sheaths were made also of metal (Burton, p. 222, with note 11), of wood (Schliemann, Mycenae, p. 281; cf. p. 303), of ivory (Odyssey, viii. 404), and perhaps even of linen (Schliemann, p. 283). When not worn a sword might be wrapped in a cloth (1 S 21⁹), just as blades are bandaged with greased rags by the natives of India (Burton, p. 232). The sheathed sword was worn hanging from a girdle (חָגוֹר hagōr, 2 S 20⁶; cf. Ps 45²⁽⁴⁾).

Among the many interesting sword-passages of the OT are:—Gn 3²⁴ RV (the two guardians are the cherubim and the darting flame, i.e. probably the lightning; cf. Burton, p. 183, who suggests the disc-like sword of Merodach; Gn 4²³ (the Song of the Discovery of the Sword, according to some); Dt 33²⁹ (the LORD Israel's sword, so EV rightly); Jg 7¹⁸.²⁰ (the war-cry 'a sword for the LORD and for Gideon'); Is 27¹ (the LORD's sword of chastisement); Is 24=Mic 4³ ('swords into plowshares' a symbol of peace); Jl 3¹⁰ [4¹⁰] ('plowshares into swords' a symbol of war); 2 Mac 15¹⁵ (the prophet Jeremiah delivers a golden sword to Judas Maccabaeus in a vision).

In LXX and NT 'sword' is represented by three words:—1. ξίφος, a long straight sword, only in LXX. 2. μάχαира, a word used to describe a mere knife (Gn 22¹⁰, Jg 19²⁹ LXX (A) for μα'akheleth; cf. Lk 22³⁸ in F. Field, Notes on the Translation of NT, pp. 76, 77), as well as the legionary's sword (Eph 6¹⁷), and the executioner's weapon (Ac 12²). Μάχαира is used in Mt 26⁵², a verse sometimes supposed to refer to war, but really referring to ordinary violence; in Eph 6¹⁷ of the 'sword of the Spirit, the word of God (ῥῆμα θεοῦ)' received (not 'taken') by the Christian warrior; and in He 4¹² of the two-edged sword with which 'the word (ὁ λόγος) of God' is compared.* 3. ρομφαία, a word of somewhat doubtful meaning, but used in several interesting passages. It is found in Latin in the forms romfea (Sir 46²) and rumpia (Livy, xxxi. 39). It is certain that it was a Thracian weapon of large size (Livy, loc. cit.), but whether it was a sword or a spear is not quite certain. In Plutarch (Æmil. 18) the Thracians are spoken of as ὀρθὰς ρομφαίας βαρυστόχους ἀπὸ τῶν δεξιῶν ὤμων ἐπισείοντες ('having straight rumpie of heavy iron swaying from their right shoulders'). Suidas (ed. Bernhardy, 1853) gives τὸ μακρὸν ἀκόντιον ἢ μάχαира, and Hesychius (Leyden, 1766) μάχαира, ξίφος, ἢ ἀκόντιον μακρὸν. In the 'Vulgate' Psalter (taken from the LXX) ρομφαία is rendered franca (i.e. large spears such as were used by the Germans) in Ps 97, where Jerome's 'Hebrew' Psalter gives solitudines (חרבות). The usual Syr. rendering is 'sword,' but in Lk 2³⁵ both Pesh. and Syr.^{sin} give rumha 'lance,' and in Rev 1¹⁶ the Philoxenian (ed. Gwynn, 1897) gives ruha (apparently a mistake for rumha). General Pitt-Rivers, quoted by Burton (p. 183), speaks of a 'leaf-shaped sword-blade attached to the end of the spear like the Thracian romphea,' but Burton himself (p. 237) says that in modern Romance it denotes the flamberge, the wavy blade carried by angels in art (ib. pp. 136, 138). That ρομφαία may possibly mean 'spear' is disputed by W. Wayte (Smith's *Dict. Antiq.*³ 1890), but acknowledged by Plummer on Lk 2³⁵.

Instances of the use of ρομφαία are—Gn 3²⁴ (τὴν φλογίνην ῥ., see above); 1 Ch 21^{12, 27} (the sword of pestilence); Sir 46² (Heb. כִּידֹן kidōn 'javelin'); 2 Mac 15¹⁵ ('the sword seen in vision'); Lk 2³⁵ (the sword of anguish), Rev 1¹⁶ 19¹⁵ (the sword of judgment proceeding out of the mouth of the glorified Christ; cf. Is 11⁴ 49²). This last image is not so strange as appears at first sight, for the short Roman sword was tongue-like in shape, as the annexed illustration (taken from Lindenschmit, Tracht u. Bewaffnung. Tab. xi. fig. 11) shows.

LITERATURE.—Sir Richard Burton's Book of the Sword (London, 1884) is a work of great but unequal merit, with many helpful illustrations; pp. 183-186 are on The Jewish Sword. SYCAMINE (συκάμινος, Lk 17⁶).—As St. Luke alludes by name to the sycomore (συκομορέα), it is prob. [but see Plummer, ad loc.] that he discriminates between it and the sycomine. By consent of scholars, συκάμινος is the Black Mulberry, Morus nigra, L., the strict signification of the word. Yet συκάμινος undoubtedly signifies also the sycomore. In all the passages in the OT where שִׁיטִּים and שִׁיטִּים occur (1 K 10²⁷, 1 Ch 27²⁸, 2 Ch 1¹⁵ 9²⁷, Ps 78⁴², Is 9¹⁰, Am 7¹⁴), the LXX tr. it by συκάμινος (or -ov). As it is undoubted that shikmim and shikmōth refer to the sycomore, we conclude that the LXX so understood συκάμινος. The true sycomine is therefore mentioned but once in the canonical books of the Bible and once in Apocr. (1 Mac 6²⁴ μύρος, AV and RV 'mulberry'). It is a fine tree of the order Urticaceæ, with a hemispherical comus, 20-30 ft. high. Its leaves are cordate-ovate, undivided or more or less lobed and toothed. They are too tough to be suitable food for the silkworm, like those of the White Mulberry, Morus alba, L. The fruit resembles in size and shape the larger varieties of blackberries. It really consists of an aggregation of flowers, in an oblong spike, the succulent part of the fruit being the fleshy sepals. It has a pleasant acid taste, and is sold in all Oriental fruit markets. It is so abundant in Damascus as to be known as tūt-shāmi=Damascus Mulberry. Neither it nor the white mulberry is to be confounded with the 'mulberry trees' of 2 S 5^{23, 24}, 1 Ch 14¹⁴ 15; see MULBERRY.

G. E. POST.

SYCAMORE, SYCOMORE.—As pointed out under SYCAMINE, the Heb. שִׁיטִּים and שִׁיטִּים refer to the sycomore, which must not be confused with the tree known by that name in England and America—Acer pseudo-platanus, L., the false plane tree. The reference is to a tree of the same order, Urticaceæ, as the sycomine. It is of the same genus as the fig, and known in botany as Ficus Sycomorus, L., Arab. jummeiz. It has a flattened spherical comus, from 15-50 ft. high, often one-sided, as in the illustration, and sometimes shading an area 60-80 ft. in diameter. As it is very frequently planted by roadsides, its long, nearly horizontal branches project over the road. It was therefore eminently a suitable tree for Zaccheus to climb (Lk 19⁴) in order to see Jesus passing. Seated on its lowest branch, he would be within easy speaking distance of the Saviour. The foliage also is not usually dense, esp. in the old trees by waysides. The trunks often attain a very large size, sometimes 30–40 ft. in circumference. The leaves are ovate-subcordate. The fruit is a small, not very palatable fig, about 1 in. long, growing thick together on curious little leafless twigs on the trunk or large branches. Whatever may have been the custom in ancient times in regard to puncturing the figs of the sycomore to cause them to ripen, or to improve their flavour, this is no longer done in Palestine. The fruit is either shaken down or plucked as it ripens, and eaten without any preparation. It ripens in successive instalments almost throughout the year. The wood of the sycomore, although light and porous, is durable. It was used in Egypt for mummy cases. It is not now so common in the Holy Land as to furnish much available timber, but it was formerly very plentiful, esp. in the low lands (1 K 10²⁷, 1 Ch 27²³). It occurred, however, in the hill-country also. Amos, a Judean shepherd, collected (?) its fruit (7¹⁴). The destroying of sycomore trees by frost (Ps 78⁷) was phenomenal, as frost is exceedingly rare in Egypt. At the same time it was a great disaster, as the sycomore was much cultivated there for the industrial uses of its wood. Sycaminopolis (Haifa) derived its name from this tree. G. E. POST.

SYCOMORE TREE OVERHANGING A ROADWAY.

SYCHAR (AB⁸ Συχαρ; Vulg. Sichar).—Jesus passing through Samaria, on His way from Judæa to Galilee, came 'to a city of Samaria called Sychar,' which was 'near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph' (Jn 4⁶); and Jacob's well was there (v. 6). The identification of Sychar has been the subject of much discussion. All commentators now agree that 'Sychar' is the correct reading, and not a copyist's error for 'Shechem' as Jerome and Epiphanius held. But the question remains whether Sychar was Shechem or another place in the vicinity of Shechem.

It has been urged that, in consequence of the hatred which existed between the Jews and the Samaritans, the Jewish common people ironically called Shechem Shikkor, 'drunken,' or Sheker, 'falsehood.' But there is no evidence either in Josephus, the Targum, or the Talmud of their ever having done so; and the only support of the theory seems to be that Isaiah (28^{1,3}), referring, apparently, to the city of Samaria, denounces the 'drunkards' (shikkōrim) of Ephraim; and that the expression in Hab 2¹⁸, a 'teacher of lies' (mōreh sheker), which refers to idolatry, contains an allusion to Moreh and Shechem. These interpretations are too forced, and the suggestion of Trench (Studies in the Gospels, p. 86), that St. John 'was himself the author of the nickname,' is too far-fetched. Another view is that m and r are often confounded in pronunciation (Olshausen and Lücke, Com. z. Ev. Joh. i. 512), and that Sychar comes from Sychem as pronounced by the Greek residents (cf. Beliar for Belial, 2 Co 6¹⁵, Eph 2²). The change from e to a is not, however, explained. Jerome (Ep. Paul. and Quæst. Gen.) says that Sychar and Sychem are the same place, but he gives no evidence, and attributes the altered form to a copyist's error. This view has been adopted by Epiphanius and the pilgrims Arculf (A.D. 670), Theoderich (A.D. 1172), Maundeville (A.D. 1312), etc.; and in modern times by Robinson, Stanley, Guérin, and Riehm (HWB).

It is more logical to take Sychar to be another place in the vicinity of Shechem. The writer of the Fourth Gospel was well acquainted with the OT, which sufficiently indicates the position of Shechem; and it is inconceivable that he should have described a well-known town with such a history and with so many sacred associations as 'a city of Samaria near the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph.' It is also highly improbable that St. John, in this particular narrative, would have referred to Shechem by a nickname. St. Stephen (Ac 7¹⁶) uses the LXX form, Sychem (Συχεμ), and this would probably have been employed by the evangelist if he had not intended to indicate another place. Sychar and Sychem are, in fact, distinguished in ancient documents. Eusebius (Onom.) says that Sychar was 'before,' that is 'east' of Neapolis (Nāblus), which he distinguishes from Sychem—a place in its suburbs, near Joseph's tomb. Jerome (Onom.) translates this description without remark. The Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333) makes a distinction between Neapolis, Sicheim, and Sichear, and places the last one Roman mile from Sicheim. Sychar is also mentioned as a distinct place from Neapolis and Shechem by Abbot Daniel (A.D. 1106), Petellus (A.D. 1130), and John of Würzburg (A.D. 1160). All these pilgrims apparently refer to el-Askar,—a village on the lower slopes of Mt. Ebal, which has a fine spring,—Ain el-Askar, and gives its name, Sahel Askar, to the northern portion of the plain of el-Mukhna. This village answers much better than such a well-known place as Shechem to the casual notice of St. John. Robinson (Later Researches, p. 133) held that 'the fact that Askar begins with the letter 'Ain excludes all idea of affinity with the name Sychar.' But there are cases, such as Ascalon (Askulān), in which the Aleph of the Hebrew has changed to an 'Ain. In the Samaritan Chronicle, which cannot be later than the 14th cent. A.D., mention is made of a town, apparently near Shechem, that is called Ischar,—merely a vulgar pronunciation of Sychar,—and the Samaritans, in translating their Chronicle into Arabic, call this place Askar. Thus the transition is traceable from the Hebrew form, through the Samaritan Ischar, to the Arabic Askar (Conder, Tent-Work, i. 75). The Mishna mentions a place called 'the plain of En-Sokher,' which is perhaps Sychar (Neubauer, Géog. du Talmud, p. 169). Schwarz (HL p. 127) correctly identifies En-Sokher with Ain el-Askar, and the plain with the Sahel Askar. There is thus a strong case for the identification of Sychar with el-Askar. This view is supported by Thomson (L. and B. ch. 31), Williams (Smith's D. of G. ii. 412b), Raumer (Pal. p. 163), Ewald (Gesch. iv. 284, v. 348, 3rd ed.), Derenbourg (Géog. du Talmud, p. 169), Caspari, Neubauer, Conder, Smith (HGHL p. 367 ff.—a good summary of the question), Tristram, and others. SYCHEM (Συχεμ; Sichem).—The Greek (LXX Gn 12⁶ etc.) form of Shechem. It occurs only in the speech of St. Stephen (Ac 7¹⁶), according to which the twelve sons of Jacob were buried in Sychem, in the tomb that Abraham bought of Hamor (Emmor) in Sychem. See SHECHEM.

Although in the above-named passage in Acts the strictly accurate reproduction of the original demands Sychem (so AV), RV, consistently with its practice of following the Hebrew in the case of OT names, gives Shechem. C. W. WILSON.

i. THE NAME.—Synagogue is the name applied to the place of assembly used by Jewish communities primarily for the purpose of public worship. The Gr. συναγωγή stands for the assembly itself, and represents in the LXX in most instances the Heb. קהל. So also in the Heb. Sirach (e.g. 47 41¹⁶) קהל answers to the συναγωγή of the Gr. text. The Aramaic versions of the Bible reproduce קהל by כְּתָרָא (Syr. כְּתָרָא). The verb קהל, from which this Aram. substantive is derived, has its representative in Hebrew in the rare verb קהל, which is used in Est 4¹⁶ of the assembling of the Jews of Susa for a religious fast. The common Heb. verb קהל is translated in Aramaic by קהל, in Greek by συναγωή (cf. e.g. J1 21⁶). From קהל (of which the verbal noun is קהל in the special sense of assembling for worship, Megilla, i. 1, Gen. rab. ch. 49, on Gn 18²²) was formed, as the equivalent of the Aram. כְּתָרָא, the subst. קהל, which may indeed stand for any gathering, but which appears at a very early date to have acquired the special sense of an assemblage for worship. It was perhaps originally this special sense that was attached to the word when the gathering of which we read in Neh 9¹-10⁴⁰ was called קהל הגדול 'the great assembly' (כְּתָרָא of Neh 9¹ is translated in Pesh. by כְּתָרָא, in LXX by συναχθῆσαν); for this epoch-making assembly had the marks of a worshipping body (fasting, reading of the Torah, confession of sin, prayer). See art. SYNAGOGUE (THE GREAT). The house, in which the meeting for worship was held, was called בית הקהל (Aram. כְּתָרָא, but the words קהל and כְּתָרָא standing alone may also be used for the place of meeting. It is noteworthy that in the Pal. Talmud the use of כְּתָרָא predominates, in the Bab. Talmud כְּתָרָא. The plural of קהל is קהלות (from a supposed *קהל; cf. קהלות, plur. of קהל), hence כְּתָרָא 'synagogues.' To this plural goes back the sing. form קהל, of which there is only an isolated occurrence (Aboth, iv. 11; the reading קהל, cited by Taylor, is not sufficiently authenticated), which is not the equivalent in meaning of קהל, but stands for an association or society in general. In this more general sense of קהל we should also understand the plural found in Aboth, iii. 10, and Echa rabbathi, Proem., No. 10.—The shorter expression קהל or כְּתָרָא (without בית or קהל) finds its representative in the Gr. συναγωγή, which in the NT and Josephus stands for the place of worship, the synagogue. Cf. Philo, Quod omnis probus liber, § 12 (of the Essenes): eis iepous ἀφικνούμενοι τόπους οἱ καλοῦνται συναγωγὰι.

Another Gr. name for the synagogue is προσευχή, which occurs especially in Philo (in Flaccum, § 6, 7, 14, Leg. ad Gaium, § 20, 23, 43, 46), but is found also elsewhere (3 Mac 7²⁰, Ac 18¹³; Jos. Vita, 54; inscriptions ap. Schürer, GJV ii. 443). It appears in Latin (proseucha) in Juv. Sat. iii. 296. As συναγωγή is shortened from οἶκος συναγωγῆς, so is προσευχή from οἶκος προσευχῆς. The corresponding Heb. expression is found in Deutero-Isaiah, not only in 56⁷ (בית תפלה), but also in 60⁷, where תפלה בית is rendered in the LXX by ὁ οἶκος τῆς προσευχῆς μου, so that the original reading must have been תפלה בית. The Jewish tradition-literature offers only once, in an anecdote of the Bab. Talmud (Gittin, 39b), the half-Aramaic half-Heb. תפלה בית. Once (Midrash Tehillim on Ps 4) the synagogue is called קהל תפלה, 'his (God's) place of prayer.' Philo has also προσευκτήριον, 'place of prayer' (Vita Mosis, iii. 27).

In an edict of the emperor Augustus the synagogue is called σαββατεῖον, 'house of Sabbath-keeping' (Jos. Ant. xvi. vi. 2), to which corresponds in later times the Syr. בית שבת, plur. בית שבת (see Payne-Smith, col. 497).

One other term may be mentioned, קהל, used by the Agada as a personification of the whole body of Israel, the Jewish people. In the Tannaite literature the expression is still rare (see Bacher, Die älteste Terminologie der jüdischen Schriftauslegung, p. 85), but it is very frequent in the post-Tannaite Agada (from the 3rd cent. onwards; see the passages cited under 'Gemeinde Israels' in the Index to Bacher's Agada der pal. Amoräer, vols. i. ii. iii.). It is the same kind of personification as took place when the analogous term ἐκκλησία was adopted as a designation for the whole body of adherents of the Christian faith. For the use of the term by the Church Fathers see Schürer³, ii. 432.

ii. ORIGIN AND HISTORY OF THE SYNAGOGUE.

—1. The first beginnings of the synagogue as an institution of Judaism are involved in complete obscurity. The later Tradition represents it, like other more recent institutions, as in existence from the earliest times. According to the Pal. Targ. on Ex 18²⁰, this verse already contains an allusion to the prayers to be repeated in the synagogues; the Targ. on 1 Ch 16⁴⁰ states that the great place of offering at Gibeon was a synagogue. An anonymous Midrash (Pesikta, ed. Buber, 129b) makes three contemporary prophets proclaim the word of God in three different places: Jeremiah in the public squares, Zephaniah in the synagogues, Huldah among the women. The 'house of the people' (Jer 39⁷) was, according to a Midrash cited by D. Kimchi, the synagogue (see also Rashi's Com. ad loc.; L. Löw, Gesam. Schriften, iv. 8, wrongly cites here the Targum). Although a tradition of the 2nd cent. tells us that uneducated people were accustomed to call the synagogue בית קהל (Simon b. Eleazar, Shabbath, 32a), this explanation of the expression בית קהל in Jeremiah cannot be taken seriously. Philo and Josephus (see Schürer³, ii. 429) both believed that the institution of the synagogue goes back to Moses, and the same notion perhaps finds expression in the words of the Apostle James in Ac 15²¹ 'For Moses from generations of old (ἐκ γενεῶν ἀρχαίων) hath in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every Sabbath.'

In all probability, the germs of the future institution of the synagogue should be sought during the Babylonian exile. Thus the historical reality is not so very far removed from the view which the Targ. on Ezk 11¹⁶ attaches to the words לֹא יִהְיֶה עַם שְׂרָפָה, namely, that when Israel was scattered among the nations, God gave them the synagogue as a compensation for the loss of the sanctuary. Amongst the exiles torn from their homes, but brought nearer to God and His teaching, the need must have made itself felt of a medium for cultivating, in common, religious emotions and for receiving religious instruction. The absence of the sacrificial cultus during the Exile, the higher significance to which Sabbath observance attained, the regular fast-days (cf. Zec 7⁶, Is 58) augmented this sense of need, which would find satisfaction in gatherings at fixed places and times. All these considerations, which were at work in Babylon, made their influence felt also in Palestine, when Israel after the Return struck new roots in the old home, and the religious life, in spite of the fact that the newly-built temple at Jerusalem was its central point, gained a basis independent of the sacrificial cultus. In particular, the activity of Ezra and his successors the scribes guided the development of the religious life in a direction which was bound to lead to the rise of synagogues all over the country. Hence we may confidently place the origin of the synagogue in Palestine at the period of the Persian domination. There is indeed no express and unmistakable mention of the synagogue either in the Persian or in the first two centuries of the Greek era. Even the narratives about the religious persecutions under Antiochus Epiphanes are silent as to synagogues. At most, the 74th Psalm, if it really belongs to the Maccabean age, may be cited as the earliest source where the synagogue is named; for מִקְדָּשׁוֹ (v. 8) may very well be interpreted, with Aquila and the Midrash on Psalms, as a name for the places of assembly throughout the land consecrated to God, מִקְדָּשׁ being thus a poetical equivalent of בֵּית הַכְּנֶסֶת (Löw cites, in illustration of the expression, בֵּית מִקְדָּשׁ of Job 30²²; cf., also, מִקְדָּשׁ, Aboth, i. 4).—Express notices of the synagogue, so far as these are found in the literature, belong for the most part to the last century of the Second Temple. But in all cases where it is mentioned the synagogue appears as an institution that has long existed, and as the central point of the organized social life of the Jews.

2. In Jerusalem itself, immediately before the destruction of the city by Titus, there were 394 (Bab. Kethub. 105a), or, according to another version (Jerus. Megilla, 73d and oft.), 480 synagogues. Even if these figures are exaggerated, the number of synagogues in Jerusalem must be thought of as very large. Apart from the synagogues belonging to the inhabitants proper of the capital, there were others for the various communities of foreign Jews settled in Jerusalem. A Tannaite tradition mentions the synagogue of the Alexandrians at Jerusalem (Tos. Megilla, ii. 224^a, Jerus. Megilla, 73d^a; otherwise Bab. Megilla, 28a). The Acts of the Apostles (6⁹) also names the synagogue of the Alexandrians, along with the synagogues of the Cyrenians, Cilicians, and Asians; the Hellenistic members of these synagogues dispute with Stephen (ib. cf. 9²). In the temple itself there was a synagogue, which Joshua b. Chanania mentions from recollections of his own (Tos. Sukka, iv. 198^b), and of whose functionaries we hear also from other quarters (Yoma, vii. 1; Sota, vii. 7, 8). On the synagogues of Jerusalem cf. also Jerus. Sukka, 54a^b.

Of the synagogues of Palestine the Gospels name Nazareth (Mt 13³⁴, Mk 6², Lk 4¹⁶) and Capernaum (Mk 1², Lk 7², Jn 6⁵⁹) as those in which Jesus taught. The synagogue of Dora was built by Agrippa I. (Jos. Ant. XIX. vi. 3); the synagogue of Caesarea became a moving cause of the rising against Rome (BJ II. xiv. 4-5), and in memory of this continued to be called in the 4th cent. 'the revolution synagogue' (בְּיָמֵינוּ מִרְדָּה, Jerus. Bikkurim, 65d¹⁷ et al.; see Graetz, *Gesch. d. Juden*², iv. 313). The great synagogue of Tiberias is mentioned by Josephus (Vita, 54). During the three centuries that followed the destruction of Jerusalem, the Talmudical literature names various Pal. synagogues: for instance, those that were the centres of scribal activity: Sepphoris (the 'great synagogue', Pesikta, 136b; the 'synagogue of the Babylonians', Jerus. Berakhoth, 9a³², Shabb. 8a^a; the 'synagogue of the vine' [בְּיָמֵינוּ], Jerus. Berakhoth, 6a, et al.); Tiberias (Erubin, x. 10; 'the 13 synagogues of Tiberias', Berakhoth, 8a, 30b; the 'synagogue of the senate-house' [בְּיָמֵינוּ], Jerus. Taan. 64a²¹, see Die Agada der pal. Amor. iii. 100); Caesarea (see above); Lydda (Jerus. Shekalim, v., end). There is mention, further, of the synagogues of Beth-shean [Scythopolis] (Jerus. Meg. 74a²⁷); Kiphra or Kuphra (Jerus. Taan. 68b²⁴, Meg. 70a⁴⁰; in Pesikta rabb., ed. Friedmann, p. 196^b כְּנֶסֶת טַבְרִיָּא 'village of Tiberias'); Maon (Shabb. 139a, Zebach. 118b); Sichnin (Jerus. Meg. 75b⁴¹); Tibein (Tos. Meg. 223¹³).

In Babylonia the oldest synagogues were counted to be that of Shaph-Jethib at Nahardea (Megilla, 20b, Rosh hash. 24b, Aboda zara, 43b, Nidda, 13a), and that of Huzal (Megilla, 29b). The founding of the former was ascribed to king Jehoiachin. From the 3rd cent. there is witness for a 'synagogue of Daniel' (Erubin, 21a). In Machuza there was in the 4th cent. a 'synagogue of the Romans' (כְּנֶסֶת רֹמַי, Meg. 26b).

In Syria specially famous was the great synagogue of Antioch, to which the successors of Antiochus Epiphanes presented the brazen vessels which had been carried off from the temple at Jerusalem (Jos. BJ VII. iii. 3). On this synagogue, on whose site arose in the 4th cent. the Christian basilica dedicated to the Maccabean martyrs, see Cardinal Rampolla in Revue de l'Art Chrétien, 1899, p. 390.—The Apostle Paul preached in various synagogues at Damascus (Ac 9²⁰, cf. v. 2). The narrative of the journeys of the same apostle makes mention of synagogues in Asia Minor, Macedonia, Greece: for instance, those of Pisidian Antioch (Ac 13⁴), Iconium (14¹), Ephesus (18¹⁹), Philippi (16¹³), Thessalonica (17¹), Berea (17¹⁰), Athens (17¹⁷), Corinth (18⁴). There were several synagogues at Salamis in Cyprus (13¹).

The numerous Jewish population of Alexandria had, according to the testimony of Philo (Leg. ad Gaium, § 20), many synagogues in the different quarters of the city. The largest of these was the famous basilica, of which the Tannaite tradition of the 2nd cent. gives a hyperbolic but yet very graphic description (Tos. Sukka, iv. 198^b; Jerus. Sukka, 55a, bottom; Bab. Sukka, 51a). The founding of the synagogue of Ptolemais is related in 3 Mac 7²⁰.

We learn from Philo (Leg. ad Gaium, § 23) that as early as the time of Augustus there were a number of synagogues in Rome. The names of several of these have been preserved in the inscriptions (see Schürer², iii. 44 ff.). An ancient literary tradition names the 'synagogue of Severus' at Rome (see Epstein in Monatsschrift für Gesch. u. Wiss. des Judenthums, 1885, p. 338).

The memory of many synagogues of the Diaspora is preserved in early Greek inscriptions. Specially noteworthy are the ruins of ancient synagogues at several spots in northern Galilee, 'of which the oldest date from the second or even the first cent. A.D.' (Schürer², ii. 445).

3. At the time of the rise of Christianity every Jewish community, whether in Palestine or in the Diaspora, certainly had its synagogue. The words of St. James quoted above are in harmony with the testimony of Philo, who speaks of the places of prayer that existed in every city as so many places of instruction in virtue and piety (Vita Mos. iii. 27: τὰ κατὰ πόλεις προσευκτήρια τί ἐστὶν ἔστιν ἡ διδασκαλεῖα κ.τ.λ.). Hence there is a reflexion of the real condition of things when in a Tannaite saying of the 1st or 2nd cent. (R. Akiba already glosses it) the synagogue is named as one of the qualifications of a city in which a scribe may settle down (Sanhedrin, 17b, bottom). When in the Tannaite halachā the synagogue is looked upon as the property of the city (Nedarim, v. 5), the places in view are such as are inhabited wholly or for the most part by Jews, for in these the political and the religious body are one and the same. Where there is no synagogue, the citizens (בְּנֵי הָעִיר 'sons of the city') have the right to demand that one be built and 'to compel one another to do this' (Tos. Baba mezia, xi. 396²⁰). The same rule applies to the procuring of the necessary copy of the Pentateuch and the Prophets for the synagogue (ib.).—The members of the community belonging to the same synagogue are called בני הכנסת ('sons of the synagogue'), a designation which has a special significance when there are a number of synagogues in the same place. See the use of the expression in Tos. Megilla, ii. 223²⁰; Bar. Moed kaṭon, 22b, bottom; Bekhoroth, v. 5; Zabim, iii. 2. In Tos. Megilla, iii. ad init. (224¹⁰) the members of the synagogal community are opposed to the rulers of the city (סני'י הירי).—With reference to the right to alienate a synagogue to another use, the casuistry of the Pal. Amoras draws a distinction between private synagogues (ב' ה' הכנסת של פרט) and public synagogues (ב' ה' הכנסת של רבים); see Jerus. Megilla, 73d³⁶ and 74a⁵⁷. The corresponding passage of the Bab. Talmud (Meg. 26r) distinguishes village from city synagogues (ב' ה' של כפרים, ב' ה' של ערים).—The possibility of a private house being converted into a synagogue is considered in the Tannaite halāchā (Nedarim, ix. 2, cf. Jerus. Meg. 73d⁴⁰). As a rule, the synagogues were buildings specially erected for the purpose. In spite of the public character of the synagogal buildings they were subjected to certain ceremonial regulations applicable to dwelling-houses (Tos. Negaim, vi. 625¹⁷, Bar. Yoma, 11b). A varying tradition (Yoma, ib.) distinguishes between synagogues which contain a dwelling for the synagogue attendant (רבי'י לוח הכנסת) and those that do not.—The Tannaite halāchā deals with the contingency of a non-Jew supplying the building material for a synagogue (Tos. Meg. iii. 224²⁰). This recalls the case of the Roman centurion at Capernaum, who had built a synagogue for the Jews (Lk 7⁵).—The consecration attaching to the synagogal building in virtue of its sacred destination does not cease entirely even when the building is no longer used for its original purpose. A synagogue may be sold only on condition that it is not used for dishonourable purposes (Meg. ii. 2). It is even considered a profanation of its sacred character to enter a synagogue for shelter from the burning sun or from frost or rain (Tos. Meg. iii. 224²⁷; Bab. Meg. 28a b). Citing the circumstance that even the ruined holy places are called sanctuaries (Lv 26¹¹), Jehuda b. Ilai (2nd cent.) teaches that even the ruins of synagogues are not to be used for profane purposes (Meg. iii. 3). The Bab. Amora Chisda (3rd cent.) prohibits the pulling down of a synagogue until another has been built (Meg. 26b, Baba bathra, 3b).—In Babylonia there appear to have been two kinds of synagogues—winter and summer synagogues (Baba bathra, 3b; see Löw, Gesam. Schriften, iv. 97).

iii. SITUATION OF THE BUILDING, STYLE OF ARCHITECTURE, ETC.—1. A Tannaite tradition, appealing to Pr 12¹, lays down the rule that the synagogue should be built 'on the height of the city,' i.e. upon a commanding point (Tos. Meg. iii. 227¹⁰). With reference to this, a later Midrash (Tanchuma, 4, ed. Buber, iii. 10) declares: 'In early times the synagogue was built on the height of the city.' So also Rab in Babylon (3rd cent.) taught: 'A city whose roofs overtop the synagogue is given over to destruction' (Shabb. 11a). Of course these words can apply only to synagogues built within the city, and there can be no doubt that this was the case with the synagogues in Palestine. On the other hand, there is evidence that in Babylonia the synagogues were frequently outside the city. The Bab. Talmud speaks of synagogues which are 'in the neighbourhood of the city,' and presupposes others which are at a greater distance from it (Kiddush. 73b. cf. Shabb. 24b, and also the Comm. of Rashi, s. נכנס).

Allusion is made to such extra-mural synagogues in a Midrash on Ec 12⁵, where the old man, to whom the walk to the synagogue is a hard task, is addressed in the words ב'י' תצא אל הכנסת ('come let us go to the synagogue,' Tanahuma, ed. Buber, ח"י שנה, 7). On the other hand, we are not to follow L. Löw (Gesam. Schriften, iv. 15) in seeing in the interpretation of the 'well in the field' (Gn 29²) as an allegory of the synagogue (Gen. rabba, ch. 70) an allusion to the situation of synagogues outside the city; for the expression 'in the field' is as indifferent for the purpose of the allegory as it is in the immediately preceding interpretation of the well as an allegory of the Sanhedrin. Nor does the passage Peṣikta, 158a (ed. Buber), refer to synagogues in the country (Löw, ib. note 2), but the contrast there is between prayer in the open country and prayer in the synagogue inside the city (cf. Midrash Tehillim on Ps 3, ed. Buber, p. 46).

The fact that the synagogues in Babylonia were—partly at least—outside the cities was perhaps connected with the circumstance that at the beginning of the Sassanide rule the synagogues were destroyed by the Persians (Yoma, 10a), and the rebuilding of them within the cities was not allowed.

To another category belong the statements from which it has been inferred that it was customary to build the synagogues by a running stream or by the sea. None of these statements, moreover, refer to either Palestine or Babylonia. During St. Paul's stay at Philippi it is said (Ac 16¹³): 'And on the sabbath day we went forth without the gate, by a river side, where we supposed there was a place of prayer.' The synagogue of Philippi was thus situated by a river outside the city. The assumption that it would be found there shows that this must have been the case elsewhere also. The municipality of Halicarnassus expressly granted permission to the Jews to perform their devotions, according to their ancestral habit, by the seashore (Jos. Ant. xiv. x. 23). But here there is no mention of a synagogue, but simply of prayer in the open air. We may recall in this connexion the religious fasts that were held in Palestine in the open market-place of the town (Taanith, ii. 1). It is the same allusion to the fasts of the Jews that underlies the similar statements of Tertullian (de Jejunio, 16; ad Nationes, i. 13; see Schürer², ii. 447). In like manner the Jews of Alexandria betook themselves, in their time of straits, to the seashore, to pray there 'in the purest place' (ἐν καθαρώτατῳ; Philo, in Flaccum, § 14). This remark of Philo throws light upon the custom of the Jews living among the heathen of praying by the seashore, and perhaps also upon the building of the synagogue by a river, which is witnessed for Philippi. The motive would be to avoid the interior of the city polluted by idolatry, and to seek the 'purest' places for prayer, namely, the banks of rivers and the seashore. The same notion finds expression also in the ancient Midrash on Ex 12¹ (Mechilta, ad init.): Moses prays outside the city (Ex 9²⁵), because it was full of abominations and idolatry (see Kohler, Monatsschrift, xxxvii. 442; Blau, Magyar-Zsidó Szemle, x. 494). Once more, it may be noted that at Corinth the synagogue was inside the city; for the house of Titius Justus, where St. Paul lived, 'joined hard to the synagogue' (Ac 18⁷).

2. The style of building adopted in the ancient synagogues of Palestine is illustrated by the above-mentioned ruins in N. Galilee. 'Almost all these synagogues lie north and south, so that the entrance is at the south. As a rule they appear to have had three doors in front—one principal entrance and two smaller side doors. In some instances it can still be seen that the building was divided by two rows of pillars into three aisles. Some had a portico in front. In general the style was influenced by the Græco-Roman, although it shows very characteristic differences from it. In particular it was marked by a wealth of overlaid ornamentation' (Schürer², ii. 446). This orientation of the synagogue from north to south contradicts a prescription of the Tannaite hālāchā (Tos. Megilla, iv. 227¹³), according to which the synagogue entrance, like that of the sanctuary (Nu 3³⁸), is to be at the east. One is tempted to assume that this rule, found only in the Tosephta, has in view Babylonia and other lands to the east of Palestine; for in these the orientation from east to west corresponds with the direction prescribed to the congregation at prayer in the synagogue. In the Tosephta there are other traces of Babylonian redaction. As far as the synagogues of Galilee are concerned, their orientation, as the ruins show, was the opposite of the direction prescribed for prayer. In an early halachic tradition (Siphre on Deut. § 29, 70b; Bab. Berakh. 30a) it is said, upon the ground of 1 K 8², that during prayer the worshipper must face towards Jerusalem and the sanctuary: those dwelling in the north stand with their face to the south, those in the south face the north, those in the west the east, those in the east the west. From this it follows that the worshippers in the synagogues of N. Galilee would turn in prayer towards the entrance. The direction towards the sanctuary, i.e. towards that part of the synagogue which is turned towards the sanctuary, is dealt with in the following rules, which are likewise found only in the Tosephta (Megilla, iv. 227¹¹):—

'The elders (זקנים) take their places facing the people, and with their back to the sanctuary (קדש). The book-press in the synagogue is so placed that its front is towards the people, its back to the sanctuary. When the priests lift up their hands to bless, they stand with their face to the people, their back to the sanctuary. The synagogue attendant (hazzan) stands with his face turned towards the sanctuary, which is also the direction in which all the people face.'

In the above quotation קדש may be a designation of the particular side of the synagogue itself. In any case, we may assume that this part of the building was not always opposite the entrance.

In the case of two considerable synagogues, we know that they had the form of a basilica with a double row of pillars. The expression διπλὴ σόα is used of both of them. One is the famous great synagogue of Alexandria mentioned above; the other is that of Tiberias, to which an author of the 4th cent. (see Agada der pal. Amor. iii. 672, from Midr. Tehillim on Ps 93, end) applies that designation.

According to Philo (in Flaccum, § 7) there were exhibited in the συναγωγὴ of the synagogue of Alexandria dedicated gifts and inscriptions set up in honour of the emperors (Schürer², ii. 446, iii. 52).

3. Of the furnishings of the synagogue the most important was the press (חֶבֶה) in which the sacred writings were kept. The complete expression is חֶבֶה שֶׁל סְפָרִים (Tos. Yadayim, ii. 683²); rarely do we find the Aram. term אֲרָנָא (= Heb. אָרֶן), Jerus. Meg. 73d^{61, 62}. The same 2nd cent. tradition which censures the use of בֵּית עֵסֶב by uneducated persons as a term for the synagogue (see p. 636^b), condemns in the same way the employing of the term אֲרָנָא for the book-press (Shabbath, 32a). It appears that in popular speech אָרֶן or אֲרָנָא meant either a coffin or a press for keeping victuals (see Kelim, xii. 3), and hence the word חֶבֶה established itself for the press of the synagogue which served a sacred purpose. It appears in Aram. as חֶבֶה (Jerus. Berakh. 9c^{23, 24}; Bab. Meg. 26b), and is reproduced by the Gr. κιβωτός (Chrys. Orat. adv. Jud. vi. 4).

The press was furnished with a species of canopy called בֵּילָה (Jerus. Meg. 73d⁶¹; see Levy, ii. 318^b), which was spread over it before the commencement of the Sabbath (Jerus. Shabb. 17c⁴²). In Babylonia its name was פֶּרֶסֶת (Meg. 26b). As long as the congregation remained in the synagogue the press was not to be denuded of this adornment (Bab. Sota, 39b, לֹא יִפְסֹד הַחֶבֶה).

The press appears to have been placed in a shut-off part of the synagogue, with a curtain in front of it which, like the curtain in the sanctuary, bore the name פֶּרֶסֶת (Aram. פֶּרֶסֶת). Behind this curtain took place the rolling up of the Torah after the reading of the Scripture lesson (Jerus. Sota, 22a²²; Jerus. Meg. 75b⁶⁰; Soph. xi. 3).

The cloths in which the copies of the sacred writings kept in the press were wrapped were called סִטְרוֹת, or, in full, סִטְרוֹת שֶׁל סְפָרִים or סִטְרוֹת סְפָרִים (see Kelim, ix. 3, xxiv. 14; Negaim, xi. 6; Tos. Kilayim, v. 80¹⁸; Tos. Yadayim, ii. 683²). Such cloths were used elsewhere also to wrap up the books of Scripture: thus in Sanhed. 100a we read of the cloths in which, in the house of the Bab. Amora Jehuda (3rd cent.), the books were wrapped (סִטְרוֹת רַבִּי יְהוּדָה). By חֶבֶה (Tos. Kilayim, v. 80¹⁸) appear to be meant the cloths used to wrap up the books that lay in the synagogue press. From a controversy between the schools of Hillel and Shammai (Kelim, xxviii. 4) we learn that these cloths used to be adorned with embroideries (צִיּוּרִים). Little bells were also attached to them (סִטְרוֹת סְפָרִים, Tos. Kelim, i. 1, 579²; Bab. Shabb. 58b).

In the graduated scale of consecration attaching to the synagogue and its furnishings, the press is holier than the building, the cloths for the Scriptures are holier than the press (Meg. iii. 1). In the hālāchā in question there is no mention of the chest (חֶבֶה); hence it is probable that the חֶבֶה of Shabb. xvi. 1 and the חֶבֶה of Tos. Yadayim, ii. 683², do not refer to the chest in which the synagogue Scriptures were kept.

Amongst the fittings of the synagogue was the tribune (בֵּיתָה, i.e. Bēthā). There was a tribune of wood (בֵּיתָה שֶׁל עֵץ, cf. בֵּיתָה שֶׁל עֵץ of Neh 8²; see art. PULPIT) also in the temple at Jerusalem, upon which king Agrippa I. stood—instead of sitting—and read the Torah at the Feast of Booths (Sota, vii. 7; Tos. Sota, vii. 307²⁰). There was a similar structure in the centre of the great synagogue of Alexandria, from which the signal to utter the Amen was given to the congregation (Tos. Sukka, iv. 198²³). In small synagogues the tribune appears to have been in close proximity to the press; hence the pronouncement of the Bab. Amora Samuel (3rd cent.), preserved in the Pal. Talmud (Meg. 73d⁶⁰), that the tribune and the tablets (בֵּיתָה וְחִטּוֹת) possess the degree of sacredness of the building but not of the press. The Bab. Talmud (Meg. 32a) speaks in like manner of the tablets and the tribunes (בֵּיתָה וְחִטּוֹת). In the Midrash (Pesikta, ed. Buber, 84a) there is a story of how some one had מִכְלָא בֵּיתָה וְחִטּוֹת made of a cedar tree (where מִכְלָא is the same as לִיחָה). But there is nowhere sufficient evidence what is to be understood by these 'tablets' which belonged to the furnishings of a synagogue. They may have been tablets inscribed with Bible texts (cf. Is 30⁸), such as were used in connexion with elementary Scripture lessons (see Jelamdenu, cited in Friedmann's introduction to his edition of the Mechilta, p. xxxiv).

The above-mentioned סִטְרוֹת (i.e. subsellia), seats for the congregation, are named in Jerus. Meg. 73d⁶¹ as among the furnishings of a synagogue; they have the same degree of sacredness as the building. Along with the seats are named also קְלִפִּיָּה; but this word should be emended to קִפְדָּה, which stands for the usual קִפְדָּה (or קִפְדָּה), i.e. cathedra (cf. Jerus. Shabb. 6a² וְקִפְדָּה וְחִטּוֹת). Chairs were, no doubt, provided for the elders and scribes, who sat in a prominent place (see above, ii. § 5, and cf. the καθροικαδελφία of Mt 23², Mk 12²⁹, Lk 11²). So also in the great synagogue of Alexandria there were 71 chairs of gold (כסאות זהב) for the members of the great council there (Tos. Sukka, l.c.). On the 'chair of Moses,' which the Chinese Jews had in their synagogue instead of the bimā (Almemor), see REJ xxxv. 110, and on the Μωσῶς καθέδρα spoken of by Jesus in Mt 23² see ib. xxxiv. 300.

At the reading of the Scriptures a reading desk (אנילין של ספר, or, shortly, אנילין [analeion]) was used (Kelim, xvi. 17), which, as a piece of the synagogue furniture, had the same degree of sacredness as the building itself (Jerus. Meg. 73d⁶⁴).

We hear also of candelabra and lamps (נר, נרות) being provided for the synagogue (Tos. Meg. iii. 224¹⁵). The Pal. Talmud tells of a candelabrum which Antonine, to the great joy of the patriarch Jehuda, presented to a synagogue (Meg. 74a²⁰); the Bab. Talmud (Arakhin, 16b) relates how an Arab, named עירק, presented a lamp to the synagogue of Jehuda, the head of the school of Tumbetha (3rd cent.). The Mishna (Terumoth, xi. 10) speaks of the oil which was burned in the synagogue, and also of the custom of keeping lamps burning in the synagogues on the Day of Atonement (Pesachim, iv. 4).

iv. SYNAGOGUE WORSHIP, OFFICIALS, ETC.—For the holding of public worship in the synagogue the presence of at least ten adult male persons is required. These constitute the minimum of a congregation (קָוָה = קְבוּצָה). (See Sanhed. ii. 3, Meg. iv. 3). It once happened that Eliezer b. Hyrcanus (1st cent.), accompanied by his slave, came into the synagogue, and, finding that the requisite ten were not present, he gave the slave his freedom in order to make up the proper number (Pesach. 47b; Gittin, 38b). With this story may be compared the testimony of the inscription of Pantikapeum, according to which a manumitted slave was bound to attend the synagogue regularly (Schürer³, iii. 53). That was considered a great city in which there were at least ten synagogue members unencumbered by business (בְּכִלְיִים), and who thus made it possible to hold a daily service (Meg. i. 3; Baba kamma, 82a; Sanhed. 17b; Jerus. Meg. 70b⁶⁵), whereas the great mass of the congregation could attend only on the Sabbath and on the festival days. At a later period the 'ten men of leisure' became a kind of institution in the congregation.

Women were not counted as members of the synagogue congregation. Yet even a woman could take part in the reading of the Sabbath lesson as one of the seven persons required on such an occasion; but it was considered objectionable, on grounds of decency (בְּעֵינֵי הַצִּבּוּר), for a woman to read in public from the Torah (Tos. Meg. iv. 22b⁴; Bab. Meg. 23a). Women were zealous attenders of the synagogue. A Tannaite halāchā (Aboda zara, 38a^b) names as the two places for which a woman is wont to leave her house, the baths and the synagogue (cf. also Yoma, 15b).

Characteristic is the anecdote of the woman who had become very old and longed to leave this world. When she went to Jose b. Chalapha (2nd cent.) with her complaint, he asked her: 'What duty art thou accustomed daily to perform?' She replied: 'It is my custom to neglect even what is dearest to me, in order that I may visit the synagogue daily.' Then he advised her to leave off for three successive days attending the synagogue. She followed his counsel and died on the third day (Yalkut Shimoni, i. 871, from Jelamdeni).

In the Diaspora, women played an important rôle in synagogue life. St. Paul found in the synagogue of Philippi (see above) a gathering of women (Ac 16¹²). On the inscriptions of S. Italy mater synagoga appears side by side with pater synagoga as a title of honour (Schürer³, iii. 50). From Babylonia we have the information (Kiddushin, 81a) that two school heads of the 4th cent., Abaji and Raba, arranged that men and women should sit apart from each other in the synagogue. The members of the synagogue congregation were called בני הכנסת (see above); at their head was the 'head of the synagogue,' Gr. ἀρχισυναγωγος or [Lk 8⁴¹] ἄρχων τῆς συναγωγῆς. The synagogue of the Jerus. temple had in like manner its head. The 'ruler of the synagogue' had the responsibility of maintaining order in the synagogue (see Lk 13¹⁴); it was his part to decide who was to conduct the public worship (Ac 13¹⁵). If he himself wished to take part in the reading of the Scriptures, he had to be invited by others to do so, because he could not of himself assume an honourable function (Tos. Meg. iv. 227¹⁹). The 'ruler' was not a scribe, but he stood in rank immediately after the scribes (Pesachim, 49b, top; Gittin, 60a, top). At mourning feasts it was customary, following a rule dating from the 2nd cent. (Jerus. Berakh. 6a²³; Semachoth, ch. 14, end), to drink a cup, with a blessing, to the health of the ruler of the synagogue. A more extended sense was assumed by the title 'ruler of the synagogue' in the Diaspora, as is evident from the Gr. and Lat. inscriptions, in which it frequently implies no function, but is simply an honorary title, bestowed even upon women and children (Schürer³, ii. 438 f., iii. 49 f.).

The service of attendant in the synagogue as well as charge of the building and its furnishings was assigned to the synagogue official called תַּקְנָה (shortly תַּקֵּן).

The word תַּקֵּן was derived not only by Nathan b. Yechiel (Aruch, s.v.) but, before him, by Dönash b. Labrât (10th cent.) from the verb תָּקַן (Kritik gegen Saadja, ed. Schröter, No. 170). But this derivation is unsatisfactory from the point of view both of grammar and sense. It is better to assume that the root תָּקַן has the same meaning as the identically sounding Arab. root تَكَن (see Perles, Monatschrift, 1870, p. 521). This root is indeed unexampled elsewhere in Hebrew, but it is readily conceivable that alongside of תָּקַן there existed also a root תָּקַן with the same meaning (cf. תָּקַן side by side with תָּקַן). From the verb תָּקַן = 'keep charge' was formed the subst. תָּקֵן which was used to designate the man who had charge of the synagogue and its furnishings, and who had also to give attendance at the conducting of public worship.

Even the synagogue of the temple at Jerusalem had its hazzān (see Yoma, vii. 1; Sota, vii. 7, 8). The temple, however, had other attendants also called hazzānim; see Sukka, iv. 4, where the subject is the keeping of the palm branches at the Feast of Booths, and Tamid, v. 3, where the keeping of the priests' garments is spoken of. The synagogue attendant is called in Greek ὑπηρέτης (Lk 4²⁰); Epiphanius (c. Hær. xxx. 11) knows also a Grecising of the Heb. word: Ἀσινύτων τῶν παρ' αὐτοῖς διακόνων ἐμπνευσμένων ἢ ὑπηρέτων. — From the period while the temple at Jerusalem yet stood it is related that, along with the pilgrims who brought the firstlings to the sanctuary, the synagogue attendants (חֲזַנֵּי הַכְּנֶסֶת, var. lec. חֲזַנֵּי הַכְּנֶסֶת) also went up (Tos. Bikkurim, ii. 101²⁰). — The advent of the Sabbath and of festival days was announced by the hazzān from the roof of the synagogue, with a thrice-repeated trumpet blast which was the signal for the suspension of work (Tos. Sukka, iv. 199⁸; cf. Chullin, i. 7; Jerus. Shabb. 16a²²; Bab. Shabb. 35). In the legend of the schoolmaster Nakkaï (a contemporary of the Hadrianic persecutions) the latter is called both שֹׁמֵר (attendant) and שֹׁמֵר. Every Friday he arranges the lamps of the synagogue at Migdal-Zabba'aya (Jerus. Maaser sheni, 56a¹¹, Echa rabbathi on Ec 3¹).

During public worship it is the hazzān that calls to the performance of any function (Jerus. Berakh. 9c⁶¹). He hands the copy of the Scriptures to the reader, and receives it back from the hands of the man who has read the final lesson (Soph. xiv. 3). Cf. Lk 4²⁰, where Jesus, having read the passage from the Prophets, returns the book to the attendant. The hazzān rolls up the Torah roll after the reading (Jerus. Meg. 75b²⁰), and, after holding it up to view (Jerus. Sota, 21d, top), deposits it in the press. He calls upon the priests at the proper moment to pronounce the benediction (Siphrā on Nu 6²³, § 34, end; cf. Jerus. Gittin, 47b²¹, Bab. Sota, 38a). On the occasion of religious fasts he indicates when the priests have to blow the trumpets (Bab. Taanith, 16b). In the great synagogue of Alexandria he waved a handkerchief as a signal to the congregation for the Amen (Tos. Sukka, iv. 198²²). When the hazzān himself read the Scripture lesson, another had to wait upon him (אמר קטן לו) [this denom. verb does not occur elsewhere], Tos. Meg. iv. 227¹⁰. The hazzān belonged to the scribal body, of which he constituted, as it were, the lowest grade. In an Aram. saying of Eliezer b. Hyrcanus (1st cent.) the scale is stated thus: חכמים (scribes), סופרים (schoolmasters), קטנים. At mourning feasts a cup was drunk in his honour (Jerus. Berakh. 6a²³), as in the case of the ruler of the synagogue (see above). Even in early times it must have been customary, especially in smaller congregations, for the hazzān to read the Scripture lesson. An instance of this from the beginning of the 2nd cent. occurs in Bab. Meg. 25b. He acted also as leader in prayer. For an example from 3rd cent. see Jerus. Berakh. 12d²⁴.—The patriarch Jehuda I. was requested by the inhabitants of an inconsiderable place to recommend to them one of his pupils to discharge the duties of preacher, judge, hazzān, and schoolmaster. His recommendation fell upon the afterwards so well-known Levi b. Sisi (Jerus. Yebam. 13a²⁵; Gen. rabba, ch. 81, ad init.). In the 3rd cent. the Jewish inhabitants of Bostra (בוסטרא) beg of Simeon b. Lakish to recommend to them some one capable of exercising all the functions necessary, as preacher, judge, schoolmaster, and hazzān (Jerus. Shebiith, 36d²⁶). In the Midrash Kohleth rabba (on Ec 7⁵ and 9¹⁵) the hazzān already appears as leader of the prayer, in virtue of his office; i.e. the word hazzān has the character which it gained in the period of the Gaons, and which it has retained down to the present day (see also Soph. x. end, xi. ad init.; Pirke R. Eliezer, xiii. end).

Seeing that, as a rule, the instruction of children was also carried on in the synagogue, the hazzān acted, further, as assistant to the schoolmaster, or was himself schoolmaster, in addition to his other duties (Shabb. i. 3: הוון רמא היין היתוק קוראם). He discharged the functions also of an officer of the law court, carrying out, for instance, a sentence of scourging (see Makkoth, iii. 12; Tos. Makkoth, v. 44a²⁷; cf. also Tos. Sanhed. ix. 428²⁸ [= Jerus. Sanhed. 23a²⁹; חווי כנסים]). It appears, however, that officers of the law court bore the title hazzān, even when they were not at the same time synagogue attendants (see Jerus. Kiddushin, 65c³⁰, Sanhed. 19c³¹ and 23d³²; Bab. Shabb. 56a, 139a, Makkoth, 23a).—It is only in the Bab. Talmud (Kethuboth, 8b) that we meet with the title חווי תע: [the parallel passage of the Jerus. Talmud (Pesach. 6a) has רבנאם], Aram. חווי כמא (Baba mezia, 93b). Cf. Arakhin, 6b: חווי רשכריהם.

The leader in prayer who as the representative of the congregation recited aloud the prayers in the synagogue, was called קליט נצי, 'delegate of the whole' (נצי is the name of the collective body assembled in the synagogue, in opposition to the individual, נצי). This leading in prayer was a voluntary function discharged by members of the congregation who were qualified for it and invited to undertake it. According to a Tannaite tradition, the formula addressed to the person selected was not 'Come and pray,' but 'Come and offer' (כא יקר, Jerus. Berakh. 8b³⁴). The uttering of prayer was considered the equivalent of the offering of sacrifice; hence the leader was called קריבא (see Jerus. Berakh. 3c, bottom; Leviticus rabbā, chs. 19. 20).—The leader in prayer stepped in front of the synagogue press; hence the function was known also as עבר לפני התיבה (see Berakh. v. 3, 4; Meg. iv. 3), Aram. עבר קוטי חיבמא (Jerus. Berakh. 9c³⁵). The prayer is preceded by the reciting of the Shema' and the Blessings connected with it; this function was called פסע על פסע means properly to break off a piece of bread and ask a blessing over it; in the expression before us it is used in the sense of to pronounce the Blessings attached to the Shema'.

A principal part of the public worship of the synagogue is the reading from the Pentateuch and the Prophets. This office is discharged by members of the congregation, among a fixed number of whom the particular passage of the Pentateuch is portioned out. On the Sabbath the number of readers is seven, on festival days five, on the Day of Atonement six, at the New Moon and on the half-festival days of Passover and Feast of Booths four, on week days and on the afternoon of the Sabbath three (Meg. iv. 1, 2). After the reading of the Pentateuch lesson, a passage is read from the Prophets by one who may at the same time act as leader in prayer (ib. 5). When there is only one of the members of the synagogue who can read from the Scriptures, he reads the whole section (Tos. Meg. iv. 226³⁶).

The reading of the Scriptures was coupled with the translating of the Heb. text (in Palestine and Babylonia into Aramaic). The man who publicly gave the translation (Targum) in the synagogue was called תרגמן, also תרגמן or תרגמן (see, on the correct pronunciation, Bacher, Die älteste Terminologie der jüd. Schriftauslegung, p. 206). The larger synagogues would have a Targumist or Methurgēman of their own. There was one of this class at Jamnia in the time of Gamaliel I. (1st cent.), namely Rabbi Chuzpith, who was surnamed החרוזין (Berakh. 27b). In the 3rd cent. there was a Rabbi Hoshaya in Palestine with the (Aram.) surname תרגמן (Gen. rabba, ch. 51, ad fin.). But as a rule it was the schoolmasters, those who from their calling were familiar with the Bible and had a traditional acquaintance with the Targum, that gave the translation. From the beginning of the 4th cent. comes a story of how Samuel b. Jizhak once came into a synagogue and saw that the schoolmaster read the translation from a written Targum (Jerus. Meg. 74d³⁷ עאל לכנישתא חמא חר כפר סרסם תרגומא כן גו כפרא). But any one who was capable, even a minor, was entitled to give the Targum in the synagogue (Meg. iv. 6; Tos. Meg. iv. 227³⁸).

The reading of the Scriptures was followed, when a competent person was present, by an exposition of the lesson, or, in other words, by a sermon. It was customary to invite any stranger scribe who happened to be there, to deliver this address.

It is told of a Palestinian Amora of the 4th cent. how he once came to a strange place and followed up the lesson by a sermon (Jer. rabba, 3). Nahum b. Simai, a Pal. teacher of the 3rd cent. preached in Tarsus (Pesikta rabbathi, ch. 15, 78b). In Midrash Tanchuma (Teruma, i. ed. Buber, ii. p. 89) an anecdote is told of a scribe who, travelling by sea in company with some merchants was derided by them when he boasted of the wares which he had by him, and which they sought in vain. When they landed, the merchants had their goods taken from them by the custom-house officials, while the scribe went into the synagogue, preached there, and was loaded with honours and gifts. In like manner Jesus travelled about in Galilee, teaching in the synagogues (ἡ δόξα αὐτοῦ ἐκράσθη ἐν ταῖς συναγωγαῖς); see Mt 4²³, Lk 4¹⁵; and cf. Mk 12⁹, Lk 6¹², Jn 6⁵⁹ 15²⁶.

The synagogue, as has been already said, was called also σάββατον, because its principal purpose was to serve as the meeting-place of the congregation for public worship on Sabbaths (and festival days). From the period when the temple and its sacrificial cultus still existed at Jerusalem, the tradition is preserved that the body of men (קָהָל) belonging to the division of priests in charge of the temple service for the week, assembled daily in the synagogue of their dwelling-place and read the Creation story of Gn 1 (Taanith, iv. 2; Tos. Taanith, iv. 219^a; Bab. Taanith, 27b). The second and fifth days of the week also saw from early times the congregation assembled in the synagogue, because on these days there was reading from the Torah (Tos. Taanith, ii. 217^a). But the practice of daily service could prevail only in larger towns where there were at least ten members unencumbered by business and thus able to give daily attendance at the synagogue (see p. 640^a). Nevertheless, it was enjoined by the scribes that every one should, as far as was in his power, discharge his duty of prayer by taking part in the common prayer of the synagogue.

An early Tannaite, Eliezer b. Jakob (1st cent.), introduces his pronouncement on prayer with the exhortation to pray in the synagogue (Pesikta, ed. Buber, 158a). A Tannaite of unknown date, Abba Benjamin, derives from 1 K 8²⁸ the thesis that it is only prayer offered in the synagogue that is heard (Berakhoth, 56). Joshua b. Levi (3rd cent.) gives this instruction to his sons: 'Going into the synagogue morning and evening prolongs life' (Berakhoth, 8a). Jizhak, a great Agadist of the 3rd cent., says in a paraphrase to Is 50^{10, 11}: 'If there is a man who is wont to go into the synagogue and on some particular day comes not, God inquires after him, saying, Where is the God-fearing one who is wont to be among you? He ought to have trusted in the name of the Eternal and left himself in the hands of his God, and not have absented himself from the house of God for the sake of gain or any worldly end' (Berakh. 56). Another great Agadist of the 3rd cent., Levi, applying Jer 12⁴, says: 'The man in whose place of abode there is a synagogue and who does not frequent it is called an "evil neighbour" of God' (Berakh. 5a). Another Pal. teacher of the 3rd cent., adopting an artificial explanation of Job 36⁵, says: 'God does not leave unheard the prayer that is offered in company with the assembled congregation' (Berakh. 5a). A Pal. Agadist of the 4th cent., Jehuda b. Simon, makes Israel sing (Midrash, Tehillim on Ps 5): 'Behold, O God, to how much persecution and oppression I am subjected by Edom (i.e. Rome), to keep me from owning thee as my God and king. But we go daily into our synagogues and own thee in our confession of faith (the Shema) as God and king.' The same Agadist applies to Pr 8³³ the oft-recurring idea that God's glory is present with the congregation assembled in the synagogue: 'Who ever came into the synagogue without finding my glory there' (Deut. rabba, 7)?

The above and similar sayings (cf. e.g. also Derech Erez zuta, 9, ad init.) show not only the importance attached to the prayer of the congregation in the synagogue, but also the constant need there was of warning the members against negligence in their attendance. In the 3rd cent. it was told in Palestine to the credit of the Babylonian Jews that they visited the synagogue every morning and evening (Berakh. 8a).

V. THE SYNAGOGUE AS AN ELEMENTARY SCHOOL.—The synagogue was not only the place of public worship; it embraced also the school in which the first instruction in the Holy Scriptures as the principal or the sole subject of education was given. As the beth hammidrash served for the studies of more advanced youths and adults, the synagogue was the place in which—perhaps in a special room—the children were taught.

In a homiletical exposition of La 1⁹ Abba b. Kahana (3rd cent.) adds to the words of Jer 22¹ [Heb. 20] 'to cut off the children from the street, the youths from the squares' the gloss 'but not from the synagogues and the schools' (Echa rabbathi, ad loc.). Joshua b. Levi himself conducted his grandson to the synagogue, i.e. to school (Kiddush, 30a). Chija b. Abba (3rd cent.), as he passed a synagogue of Sephoris, heard children being taught to repeat Gn 20¹, and made this the subject of a remark (Gen. rabba, 52). In an anecdote of the 4th cent. we are told how a teacher in the synagogue punished a child excessively and was cursed for this by a woman who happened to be passing by (Jerus. Moed katon, 81d⁴⁴). Rab, the Bab. Amora, said that women gain special merit by conducting their children to the synagogue, i.e. to school (Berakh. 17a). See also the saying of the Pal. Amora Simon (end of the 4th cent.) reported in Jerus. Challa, 57b¹⁸. That in Babylonia the synagogue was the place of elementary education is evident from Meg. 28b; Yebamoth, 21b, top; Baba bathra, 21a. —According to the above-mentioned tradition

(ii. § 2, ad init.) regarding the synagogues of Jerusalem, each of these was provided with a school for children and one for more advanced students. In a hyperbolic statement about Bethar, the capital of Judaea in the time of Bar Cochba, it is said (Gittin, 58a): 'There were 400 synagogues in Bethar, and in each of these there were 400 teachers (סוֹמְרֵי חִנּוּקִים), each with 400 children under his instruction.'

VI. OTHER USES OF THE SYNAGOGUE.—The synagogue was also the scene of legal decisions. Of Abahu, the head of the school of Cursarea (beginning of 4th cent.), it is expressly recorded that he lectured (Jerus. Berakh. 6a, bottom) in the ancient synagogue there (see above, ii. § 2), and also decided questions of law in it (Jerus. Sanhed. 18a, bottom). In the same synagogue Jochanan, the famous teacher of Abahu, also acted at one time as judge (Bab. Yebamoth, 65a). From the NT we learn that the punishment of scourging was inflicted in the synagogues (Mt 10³³ 23¹, Mk 13⁹, Ac 25¹¹; cf. Lk 12¹¹ 21¹³, Ac 22¹⁹, 2 Co 11²⁴). It has already been mentioned (above, § iv.) that the hazzan carried out this sentence and acted in other ways as an officer of the law court. There is mention in Lev. rabba, 6, ad init., of an oath in a civil process being taken in the synagogue.

The mourning for a man who was lamented by the whole community was held in the synagogue (Tos. Meg. iii. 225^a; Bab. Meg. 28b; cf. the story of the funeral of Jehuda i. in Koh. rabba on Ec 9¹⁰). A Bab. Amora of the 5th cent. held the mourning for his daughter-in-law in the synagogue (Meg. 28b).

At the time of the war against Rome, gatherings of a political character were held in the great synagogue of Tiberias on the Sabbath and the following day (Jos. Vita, 54). R. Jochanan (3rd cent.) gave express permission to deliberate about public affairs in the synagogues and schools on the Sabbath (Kethuboth, 5a). After the destruction of Jerusalem it was customary—so a Tannaite tradition tells us—to give out in the synagogues and schools a list of articles lost (Baba mezia, 28b). Thefts were also intimated in the synagogue with a view to the detection of the perpetrator (Lev. rabba, 6, ad init.). For other announcements made in the synagogue, see Yebamoth, 63b. An Agadist of the 4th cent. once followed up an address in the synagogue by calling upon the congregation to contribute alms for a stranger (Lev. rab. 32, ad fin.).

In a Tannaite rule, amongst the prescriptions concerning what is due to the dignity of the synagogue, there is one forbidding eating and drinking in it (Meg. 28a, bottom). Nevertheless, common meals were held even in the synagogue (see on this point K. Kohler, Monatsschrift, xxxvii. p. 494, who suggests a connexion between this custom and the meals of the Essenes). An anecdote from the 3rd cent. mentions a meal as held on the Sabbath evening in the synagogue of the Pal. Kephars-Chittaja (Gen. rab. 65); while a testimony from the 4th cent. refers to a great meal in the school (Jerus. Berakh. 11c, bottom). —Joshua b. Levi (3rd cent.) laid down the principle that the synagogues and schools belong to the scribes and their pupils (Jerus. Meg. 74a⁶⁴, cf. Bab. Meg. 28b). His younger contemporary, Ammi, ordained that the schoolmasters (who at the same time filled the post of synagogue keeper) should provide quarters in the synagogue building for travellers who had the slightest acquaintance with the Torah (Jerus. Meg. 74a⁶⁵). Chija and Assi, the colleagues of Ammi, used to insist on quartering themselves in the synagogue (ib.). Meashia and Samuel b. Jizhak, Pal. Amoras of the beginning of the 4th cent., speak of eating in the synagogue (Jerus. Berakh. ch. ii. end [5d¹⁴], Shabboth, 3a⁶⁶). In Babylonia also travellers were accommodated in the synagogue and there took their Sabbath meal; upon which is founded the rule that the blessing over the wine, which elsewhere is the introduction to the meal, is to be spoken also in the synagogue (Pesachim, 101a).

In a great many passages of the Jewish tradition-literature (Talmud and Midrash) the synagogues are named along with the schools. They appear as the two institutions which are specially characteristic of Israel, and whose extreme importance for Judaism finds expression in manifold ways. In order to see what the synagogue was in the life and thought of Israel during the first centuries of the Christian era, one must make acquaintance also with those sayings of the Tannaites and Amoraim, in which synagogue and school are glorified as inseparable institutions. In these it must be observed that the synagogue means not only the place of public worship, but that of instruction for the young. As a rule, in these sayings the synagogue precedes the school (בית מדרש), a circumstance which indicates the higher repute in which the synagogue stood. But the opposite view had also its representatives: from the 3rd cent. there has come down the saying of a Pal. scribe (Meg. 27a), and from the 4th cent. that of a Bab. scribe (ib. 26b), according to which the school has a higher rank than the synagogue. The following are some of these sayings about synagogue and school:—

An Agadist of the 4th cent. attributes to the philosopher Cnemaus of Gadara, known through his intercourse with the famous R. Meir, the saying that, so long as the 'voice of Jacob' (Gen 27:22) sounds in synagogue and school, the 'hands of Esau' (i.e. Rome) are powerless against Israel (Gen. rab. 65; Pesikta, 121a).—Abahu said: 'Seek the Eternal where he is to be found (Is 55:6). Where is he to be found? In the synagogue and the school' (Jerus. Berakh. 8d, bottom).—Levi said: 'While the descendants of Abraham sit in the synagogue and the school, God's glory stands over them' [in allusion to Ps 82] (Gen. rab. 48; Pesikta, 43b).—By 'your sanctuaries' (Lv 26:31) are to be understood synagogue and school (Siphra, ad loc. 112a).—Jizhak declared that by 'our dwellings' (Jer 9:19) are meant synagogue and school (Echa rabba, Proem., No. 8).—Samuel b. Jizhak interpreted the 'sanctuary עֲדֵן' (Ezk 11:16) of the synagogues and schools of Babylonia (Meg. 29a).—The 'holy place' (Ec 8:10) means synagogue and school (Koh. rab. ad loc.; Tanchuma, ed. Buber, Jithro, ad init.).—'My heart is awake' (Ca 5:7) in the synagogue and the school (Shir rab. ad loc.).—In the allegorical interpretation of the Song of Songs many other passages are also applied to the synagogue and the school (Shir rab. passim; Bab. Eruv. 21b; Pesaah. 87a).—Jose b. Chanina (3rd cent.) discovers in the 'gardens' of Ca 6:2 the synagogue and the school (Shir rab. ad loc.).—Attending synagogue and school is contrasted with attending theatre and circus (Jerus. Berakh. 7d³⁷ [prayer of Nechunja b. Hakkana in 1st cent.]; Gen. rab. 67 [Levi]; Koh. rab. on Ec 17).—When David prays (Ps 114), 'May I dwell for ever in thy tent,' he means, 'May it be vouchsafed to me that my words may be repeated under my name in the school and the synagogue' (Jerus. Berakh. 4b).—The 'refuge from generation to generation' of Ps 90:1 is interpreted by Raba (4th cent.) of synagogues and schools. As a matter of fact, even in later centuries, these were the refuge of Israel scattered through all lands.

vii. LATEST HISTORY OF THE SYNAGOGUE.—In the present article regard has been had only to the synagogues of antiquity, i.e. of the last years of the Second Temple and the first five centuries of the Christian era. But the synagogue survived also in the following periods, through the Middle Ages down to the present day, as the most notable institution of Judaism, the focus of the religious life of the Jewish community. A history of the synagogue in the Middle Ages and in modern times would be an integral part of the history of Judaism, from the point of view alike of its outward fortunes and its inner development. The manifold character which Jewish history displays in virtue of its having the whole of the inhabited globe for its stage of action and in virtue of the influences exercised upon it by different forms of civilization, is exhibited also in the character of this Jewish institution, which is ancient indeed, but is ever renewing its youth. It may suffice to point out that in the most recent times, during something like the last 80 years, the synagogue was the central point and also the principal object of Jewish attempts at reform, and that the importance of the institution has been marked ever externally by the synagogue buildings which have been everywhere reared, on both sides of the Atlantic—a testimony to the spontaneous effort of the builders and sometimes their almost excessive love of splendour.

LITERATURE.—As far as concerns articles on the Synagogue in the various Encyclopædias, or the treatment of the subject in the works on the History of the Jews, on Biblical Archaeology, and the History of NT Times, a general reference may suffice. Schürer devotes a long section (GV 3 il. 427-464) to the Synagogue. Of the literature cited by him the following deserve special notice: Vitranga, De synagoga vetere, libri tres (1696); Leopold Löw, 'Der synagogale Ritus' (Monatsschrift, 1884, Gesam. Schriften, iv. 1-71. In the 5th vol. of the Gesam. Schriften, pp. 21-33, are 'Plan und Collectaneen' to a detailed account of 'synagogalen Alterthümer,' supplemented by the editor, Immanuel Löw). We may mention also: K. Kohler, 'Über die Ursprünge und Grundformen der synagogalen Liturgie' (Monatsschrift, xxxvii. [1893] 441-451, 489-497); S. H. Goldfahn, 'Die Synagogen der Talmudzeit' (Jüd. Literaturblatt von Rahmer, xlii.); J. Reifmann, 'Über Synagogen und Lehrhäuser zur talmudischen Zeit' (in N. Keller's Heb. periodical Bikkurim, II. Theil, 1866).—On the place of the synagogue in the Middle Ages, see I. Abrahams, Jewish Life in the Middle Ages, 1896, pp. 1-34. W. BACHER.

SYNAGOGUE, THE GREAT.—An alleged college or senate, whose founder and first president is said to have been Ezra, and which, according to tradition, exercised control over the Jewish community, especially in religious matters, from about 450-200 B.C. Its membership is generally given as 120 (e.g. Jerus. Berakhoth ii. 4), but sometimes as 85 (e.g. Jerus. Meg. i. 7). The important part attributed by some to this institution in connexion with the forming of the CANON OF THE OT (see below) demands that we should examine, as briefly as possible, the evidence for its existence and activity.

There is no mention of the Great Syn. in Philo, Josephus, or the Apocrypha, not to speak of the OT itself. Nothing can be built on 1 Mac 14²⁸, where μεγάλη συναγωγή is not a technical term, but means simply 'a great gathering.' Only once in the Mishna (Pirke Aboth, i. 1) are the Men of the Great Synagogue (אנשי בית הדין) mentioned: 'Moses delivered the Torah to Joshua, Joshua to the Elders, the Elders to the Prophets, and the Prophets to the Men of the Great Synagogue. These spake three words: Be cautious in pronouncing judgment, Make many disciples, Build up a hedge around the Torah.' Simon the Just is said (ib. 2) to have been 'of the remnants of the Great Synagogue (בשרי כהן)'. This last statement does not imply that the Great Syn. had existed for centuries, for, although the Simon who was surnamed 'the Just' was probably high priest c. 200 B.C., the author of the above notice is more likely to have identified him with Simon I. (c. 300). Now we know that the utmost confusion prevailed amongst the Jews as to the chronology of the period between the Return from Exile and the conquests of Alexander the Great. Hence it would be nothing extraordinary to find Simon, a contemporary of Alexander, represented as a member of the same body as Ezra; and, in the other direction, to find Joshua, Zerubbabel, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, and even Daniel, introduced as members. As far, then, as the testimony of Pirke Aboth goes, it would seem to favour the conclusion that the Great Syn., whatever it was, continued only for a single generation, instead of having a succession for centuries. It is noteworthy that the Talm. treatise Peah (ii. 6) omits the Great Syn. as a connecting link, and the succession passes direct from the Prophets to the Zugóth or 'Pairs.'

In Baba bathra (14b) we read that the Men of the Great Syn. wrote Ezekiel, the Minor Prophets, Daniel, and Esther; and in the Aboth of R. Nathan (a post-Talm. treatise) they are said to have secured the acceptance of Proverbs, Canticles; and Ecclesiastes, which had been formerly disputed. In Pesachim (50b) it is said that they fostered the work of copying the Torah and tephillim and mizuzoth (see Dt 6⁸). In an important passage of Midrash Tanchuma (26a) certain corrections in the text of the OT, introduced in order to prevent misunderstanding, are also traced to the Men of the Great Syn., who are reported elsewhere (Jerus. Berakh. ii. 4) to have drawn up certain prayers, in particular the Shemoneh Esreh, or 18 Blessings (berakhôth). To them are attributed also the directions for the reading of the Book of Esther, and the keeping of Purim not on the 14th and 15th, but on the 11th, 12th, and 13th of the month Adar (Makkoth 23; Jerus. Meg. i.). It is not, however, till the 16th cent. that we meet with the notion that the Men of the Great Synagogue collected the sacred books, and fixed the Canon of the OT. This notion makes its first appearance in the pages of the Massoreth Hammassoreth (1538) of Elias Levita, a Jewish contemporary of Luther.

The whole question of the Great Syn. was thoroughly investigated by Kuenen (see Literature at end), whose conclusions are accepted by the great majority of modern scholars. The institution, as it appears especially in mediæval Judaism, is held by Kuenen to be simply a characteristic transformation of the great assembly described in Neh 8-10. Just as the Talmud represents the SANHEDRIN as an assembly of scribes, because such were the schools at Jamnia and Tiberias, so the Great Synagogue, instead of being a popular assembly once called together for a definite purpose, is converted into a permanent institution discharging functions similar to those of the scribes at a later period.

That a dim reminiscence of the original identity of the Great Syn. and the convocation of Neh 8-10 still lingered on even in Rabbinical circles, may be gathered from some of the references. For instance, in Midrash Ruth we read, 'What did the Men of the Great Syn. do? They wrote a book and spread it out in the court of the temple. And at dawn of day they rose and found it sealed. This is what is written in Neh 9³⁸.' Again, there occurs in Dt 10¹⁷ this collocation, 'God the great, the strong, the terrible (הַגָּדוֹל הַחֲזָק הַנּוֹרָא)'. It is repeatedly stated in the Talmud (e.g. Jerus. Berakh. ii. 4) that this formula, which had fallen into disuse, was again brought into currency by the Men of the Great Synagogue. It seems impossible to doubt that Kuenen is right in finding an allusion here to Neh 9³⁸, where all these epithets are found. Similar Talm. statements appear to allude to Neh 9³⁸ & 7.18. Once more, the variety of statement as to the number of members that constituted the Great Syn. (sometimes 120, sometimes 85) may be explained from Neh 8-10. There were 84 that sealed the covenant, according to Neh 10¹⁻², and the number 85 may be obtained either by adding the name of Ezra (who is not mentioned), or by supposing that a name has dropped out of the list (either in v.10 or in v.4, where the Pesh. actually supplies an extra name, Shephatiah). If, on the other hand, we wish to obtain the number 120, this may be done, at least approximately, by combining the above list with the lists in Neh 8⁴⁻⁷ and 9³⁻⁸, or in Ezr 2 and 8 (for other arguments of a similar kind, see Kuenen's Essay).

The very name 'Synagogue' seems inexplicable except upon Kuenen's view. It calls up neither a college of scribes nor a legislative body, but an assembly for religious service. The word סִנְגָּוָה (see SYNAOGUE) denoted either a congregation met for worship on the Sabbath day, or, by metonymy, the building where it met. The name might be fittingly enough applied to the convocation of Nehemiah, which, as Kuenen remarks, was not a law-imposing, but a law-receiving assembly; and in the account of whose proceedings we find all the exercises characteristic of Synagogue worship, such as prayer, the reading of the Law, etc. To this memorable convocation the epithet 'Great' would, for a variety of reasons, be eminently suitable.

W. R. Smith agrees with Kuenen that what came afterwards to be spoken of as the Great Synagogue was originally a meeting, and not a permanent institution. 'It met once for all, and everything that is told about it, except what we read in Nehemiah, is pure fable of the later Jews' (OTJC² 169). Historical criticism thus leaves no place for the Great Synagogue of tradition.

LITERATURE.—Buxtorf's Tiberias sive Comm. Massor. (1620) strenuously upholds the traditional view, and is still of value for its copious citation of testimony, which, however, is used in a very uncritical fashion. On the other side is Rau's Diatribe de Syn. magna (1726), which, although marked by an excess of anti-Jewish prejudice, shows true critical instinct, and anticipates some of the weightiest of Kuenen's arguments. The question may be considered to have been finally settled, in the sense advocated above, by Kuenen in his famous monograph, Over de mannen der groote synagoge, Amsterdam, 1876 (tr. by Budde in Gesam. Abhandlungen, pp. 125-180), whose conclusions are accepted by Ryle, Canon of OT, 250 ff. (valuable as containing the Jewish testimonies relied on by Buxtorf); Wildeboer, Entsteh. des AT Kanons, 120 ff.; Buhl, Canon and Text of OT, 33 ff.; W. R. Smith, OTJC² 169 f.; and many others. SYNTYCHE (Συντήχη).—A member of the Philippian Church whom St. Paul exhorts to become reconciled to EUODIA, another member of the same Church. They appear to have held a position of importance in the Church as ladies of some wealth and position, or possibly as deaconesses, like Phœbe in the Roman Church (Ro 16¹). Their disagreement was therefore not only unseemly, it was a calamity for the entire Church. Both the names, Euodia and Syntyche, occur in the inscriptions (Lightfoot, *Ep. to the Philippians*⁴, p. 158). There is no need, therefore, to introduce the far-fetched interpretation of the Tübingen school, that they are allegorical personages representing the Jewish and Gentile sections of the Church.

SYNZYGUS (TR Σύνζυγος, but modern edd. Σύνζυγος).—If Synzygus is a proper name, he was a person to whom St. Paul addressed an entreaty to bring about a reconciliation between Euodia and Syntyche, two members of the Philippian Church who were at variance (Ph 4³). He was at the time in Philippi, and may have been the chief presbyter or bishop of the Church. The sole objection to this interpretation—the only natural one—is that Synzygus is nowhere used in Greek literature as a proper name, nor is it found in the inscriptions (but see Vincent, ad loc.). It was suggested by Weizsäcker that it may have been adopted by the bearer after his conversion to Christianity. The other interpretation is that σύνζυγος here, as in classical Greek, signifies 'yoke-fellow,' and that the exhortation was addressed to a companion of the apostle who was with him when he wrote, who was possibly his amanuensis (see vol. iii. p. 841^b). Barnabas, Silas, Epaphroditus, and Timothy have been suggested. Ramsay (St. Paul the Trav. 358) thinks that Luke was either 'the true yoke-fellow' or the actual bearer of the Epistle to Philippi. The suggestion of Renan (Saint Paul, p. 148), that the 'true yoke-fellow' is Lydia, who had become the wife of the apostle, is hardly to be taken seriously.

SYRACUSE (Συράκουσαι, but Vulg. wrongly sing. Syracusa), situated on the west coast of Sicily, was the principal city of the island, and under the Romans was the capital of the eastern half. After the western half of Sicily was taken from Carthage by the Romans (B.C. 241) at the close of the first Punic War, the eastern half continued to belong to the kingdom of Syracuse in alliance with Rome. In the second Punic War, Syracuse took the side of the Carthaginians, but was captured by Marcellus in 212, and the whole island thenceforward continued to be a Roman Province, though in two distinct divisions, in each of which a quaestor was stationed, under the authority of the single governing praetor, who presided over the whole island.

Syracuse was one of the most famous and magnificent colonies of Greece. Its defeat of the great Athenian expedition in A.C. 415 was one of the most critical events in Greek history; and its kings were among the leading powers in the Greek world. Whether it preserved its old prosperity in the first century after Christ is uncertain, as Sicily suffered severely in the Civil Wars, especially from the exactions of Sextus Pompey and in the contest between him and Augustus. Strabo, 272f., describes the whole island as in a state of decay in his time, some of the cities having disappeared, while others were declining; the interior was to a large extent given up to grazing and horse-breeding, peopled by herdsmen, and devoid of educative influences. Its ancient importance as an arable and corn-growing country had disappeared; and the reason for this lay partly in the economic conditions of the empire, and partly in the dreadful circumstances of the Servile Wars, A.C. 135-132 and 109-100. The land belonged for the most part to absentee landlords.

Syracuse was one of the 26 conscriptae civitates of Sicily, which had been conquered in war, and whose territory had been appropriated by the Roman State as ager publicus. Julius Caesar, as was natural to his statesmanlike mind, had been revolving schemes for the restoration of prosperity to Sicily, but his plans were interrupted by his assassination. Antony produced a plan which he declared to have been found among Caesar's papers, and proposed a law to extend the Roman franchise to Sicily. This was not carried out completely; and Augustus was content with a much more gradual process of elevating Sicily to the full Roman rights. He founded seven Roman colonies of military origin, one of which was Syracuse.* Pliny mentions also that there were in Sicily two Roman towns (oppida civium Romanorum) and three cities with Latin rights; but his enumeration is very imperfect, and it is certain that Roman and Latin rights were much more widely spread in Sicily before the middle of the first century after Christ than he allows. It was during this process of transition from the position of a conquered province to that of a constituent part of the Roman State that St. Paul approached the Sicilian coast.

Syracuse is mentioned in the NT only as having been a harbour where St. Paul lay at anchor for three days on his voyage from Malta to Rome. The shipwrecked crew and passengers, after spending three months in Malta, set sail on the Dioscuri, evidently one of the Alexandrian fleet of imperial transports carrying grain from Egypt to maintain the food supply in Rome.† They started, evidently, very early in the year, probably in February, before the settled weather and the customary season for navigation (mare clausum 11 Nov. to 5 March) had begun. That implies that a suitable and seemingly steady wind was blowing, which tempted them to embark, and carried them straight to Syracuse, a distance of about 100 miles. On the voyage from Malta to Rome as a whole, see RHEGIUM.

Nothing is said with regard to any preaching by St. Paul in Syracuse, nor could any be expected to occur. The ship was certainly waiting for a suitable wind to carry it north to the straits of Messina; and under such circumstances no prisoner was likely to be allowed leave of absence, as the ship must be ready to take instant advantage of the wind. A survey of the progress of early Christianity would show that it rarely spread through the activity of coasting travellers, even on shores where their voyages were very tedious and subject to frequent and long interruptions (as, for example, the coasts of LYCIA and PAMPHYLIA). It is more probable that the new religion spread from Italy to Sicily in the course of direct communication between the two countries. Many Christian memorials of a fairly but not very early date have been found at Syracuse: see the papers by Orsi in Notizie degli Scavi, 1893 and 1894, and esp. in Römische Quartalschrift f. christl. Alt. 1896, pp. 1-59. W. M. RAMSAY.

SYRIAC LANGUAGE.—See LANGUAGE OF OT, vol. iii. p. 25*.

SYRIAC VERSIONS.—No branch of the Early Church has done more for the translation of the Bible into their vernacular than the Syriac-speaking. In our European libraries we have Syriac Bible MSS from the Lebanon, Egypt, Sinai, Mesopotamia, Armenia, India (Malabar), even from China. And many of the Bible versions in other Oriental languages are dependent on, or at least influenced by, the Syriac, as the Armenian, Arabic, Ethiopic. Some of the Syriac MSS appear to be the oldest Bible MSS, in any language, which have an exact date: a Syriac Pentateuch in the British Museum (Add. 14425) is dated from the year 464, written by a deacon John at Amid.* A Syriac-Chinese stone inscription, erected at Singan-fu in the year 781, discovered by Jesuit missionaries in 1625, speaks of the 27 books of the NT. It would be a pleasant task to follow up the history of the Syriac Bible versions through all times, regions, and departments of culture: want of space, however, obliges us to confine ourselves to the importance of the Syr. VSS for the modern student of the Bible. We begin with the NT.

1. NEW TESTAMENT.—Older scholars spoke of that Syr. VS of the NT which alone was known to them as 'the Queen' of all Bible versions. But now we have more than one, at least for the Gospels.

1. Tradition.—When, in the 16th cent., the Syr. VS of the NT became known in Europe, the belief prevailed that it was due to the evangelist Mark, who was said to have written his Gospel first in Latin and then to have translated it, with the other books of the NT, into Syriac.† Jacob of Edessa († 701) and others were of the opinion that Addai the apostle (THADDEUS) and king Abgar sent interpreters to Palestine (see Moses bar Cepha [† 913] and Barhebraeus, Scholia in Ps 10). What Theodore of Mopsuestia says of the Syr. translation of the OT holds equally good of the NT: ἡμῆμενται δὲ ταῦτα εἰς μὲν τὴν τῶν Σύρων παρ' οὗου δὴ ποτε: οὐδὲ γὰρ ἐγνωσται μέχρι τῆς τῆμερον ὁρις ποτὲ οὗτος ἐστὶν (Comm. in Soph. [1, 6]; Mai, Nova Patr. Bibl. vii. 1854).

2. Place.—We do not know where the translation was made. On the ground of some lin-

* W. Wright, A Short History of Syriac Literature (London, 1894, p. 6 = Enc. Brit. 9 xlii. 824).

† 'Syri constanter asserunt S. Marcum . . . latine primum scripsisse Evangelium suum. Deinde eundem ipsum Marcum lingua patria, hoc est, Galilæa Syra, non modo Evangelium suum transtulisse, sed etiam cæteros omnes NT libros. Id mihi litteris significavit Guillelmus Postellus affirmavit se ita a Syris ipsis accepisse' (Boderianus [Guido Fevre de la Boderie] in the Preface of the Syr. NT 1571). Widmanstadt, the first editor of the NT in Syriac (1555), agrees that Mark wrote in Latin, but contents himself with affirming that the books of the NT (except Matthew and Hebrews) were translated into Syriac 'ab initio rerum Christianarum.'

* Pliny (Nat. Hist. iii. 88-90) wrongly mentions only five (one being Syracuse).

† By a strange mistake, in contradiction of Ac 28¹¹, the Dioscuri is described in Smith's DB iii. 1403 as a ship in the African corn trade, which had sailed from the province Africa intending to round Pachynum to Syracuse, and was carried out of its course to Malta. On the name of the ship, and the grammatical construction of the clause describing it, see RHEGIUM.

guistic peculiarities, Syrian grammarians, as Elias I. and Barhebraeus, reached the same conclusion as Jacob of Edessa, that the translation originated in Palestine; European scholars thought first of Antioch, because the translation became known to them through the Patriarch of Antioch: in recent times Edessa has found most favour; but nothing can be said with certainty.

3. History.—(a) The first mention of a Syriac NT seems to be the statement of Eusebius (HE iv. 26) on Hegesippus (about 160–180): ἐκ τε τοῦ καθ' Ἑβραίων εὐαγγελίου καὶ τοῦ Συριακοῦ καὶ ἰδίως ἐκ τῆς Ἑβραϊδος διαλέκτου τινὰ τίθησιν, ἐμφαίνων ἐξ Ἑβραίων ἐαυτὸν πεπιστευκέναι (Rufinus: 'de Evangelio secundum Hebraeos et Syros'; Syr. VS of Eusebius: 'from the Gospels of the Hebrews and Syrians'; see on the passage Th. Zahn, Forschungen, vi. 246).

(b) About the same time or a little earlier we hear that Tatian, who was born, according to his own statement, ἐν τῇ τῶν Ἀσσυρίων γῇ, and had been in Rome the hearer of Justin Martyr, returned home—as it seems, in the year 172—and composed (probably there; not at Rome, about 153–170 [so Harnack formerly, TU i. 213]) his famous Diatessaron, i.e. a harmony of the four Gospels (συνάφειαν τινὰ καὶ συναγωγὴν οὐκ οἶδ' ὅπως τῶν εὐαγγελίων συνθεῖς τὸ διὰ τεσσάρων τοῦτο προσωπίσας, ὃ καὶ παρὰ τισιν ἐλεῖται νῦν φέρεται, Eus. HE iv. 36; in the Syr. Eusebius: 'he gathered and mixed and composed a Gospel and called it Diatessaron, i.e. of the Mixed (ἡμιγῆρη), which is still with many'). It appears to be simply a misunderstanding that we owe the remark of Epiphanius (Her. 46. 1, ed. Dindorf, ii. 412): λέγεται δὲ τὸ διὰ τεσσάρων εὐαγγέλιον ὑπ' αὐτοῦ γεγενῆσθαι, ὅπερ κατὰ Ἑβραίους τινὲς καλοῦσι. Of this work Theodoret (till 457 bishop of Kyrrhos) tells us that it was in his times used not only by the followers of Tatian, but also in orthodox congregations; that he himself found more than 200 copies in use in the churches of his diocese; that he collected and removed all (πάσας συναγωγὰς ἀπεθέμην),* substituting for them the Gospels of the Four (τὰ τῶν τεσσάρων εὐαγγελιστῶν ἀντείσταγον εὐαγγέλια). A little earlier, bishop Rabbula of Edessa (412–435) ordered that presbyters and deacons should take care that in all churches the 'Gospels of the Separate' (ἡμερῆς ἡμερῆς; S. Ephraemi Syri, Rabulae . . . opera selecta, ed. Overbeck, Oxf. 1865, p. 220) be kept and read. Of the same Rabbula his biographer tells that he occupied himself with 'translating the NT out of the Greek into Syriac, because of its variations, exactly as it was' (ib. 172).

This Harmony of Tatian was apparently in Syriac, not in Greek [the latter is (or was) the view of Harnack].

See, on all questions connected with Tatian, Arthur Hjelt, Die altgriechische Evangelienübersetzung und Tatians Diatessaron, besonders in ihrem gegenseitigen Verhältnis untersucht, Leipzig, 1901, pp. 16–75: the literature is quoted in part in vol. ii. 697, t., iii. 536, 538. Add: E. Lippelt, Quae fuerint Justin. Martyris ἀπομνημονεύματα quae ratione cum forma evangeliorum syro-latina cohaerent (Diss.), i., Halle, 1901.

The great question is now whether this Diatessaron of Tatian was the first form in which the Gospel came to the Syrians, or whether there was already, before Tatian, a Syr. VS of the Gospels, which he may have used. The question is difficult, because Tatian's work has not survived in its original form, but only in a late Arabic recension, due to Abulfaraj Abdullah ibn at Tadjib (†1043); further, it seems to have been the basis of the Latin Harmony of Victor of Capua; it was commented on by Ephraem Syrus; but this commentary is again preserved only in translation (in Armenian); it was used by Aphraates, and few direct quotations have been preserved by Syriac lexicographers and commentators: these have been collected by Hall, Harris, Goussen. Some help towards answering the question was given when, in addition to the Syriac NT, known since older times, there came in 1858 the version of the Gospels discovered by Cureton, and in 1892 that found on Mt. Sinai by Mrs. A. S. Lewis, and edited in 1894 by Bensly, Burkitt, and Harris. But, on the other hand, the question became the more complicated.

(c) The history of these discoveries cannot be told here; suffice it to say, that of the fragments published by Cureton (Remains of a very ancient recension of the Four Gospels in Syriac, hitherto unknown in Europe, London, 1858),* the Gospel of Matthew has the very title used above by Rabbula, 'Gospel of the Separate,' and that in the Sinai Gospels the same expression is used in the subscription.

[In what follows we designate Tatian by ℣, Cureton's Gospels by ℔, the Sinai Gospels by ℞, the common Syr. VS called Peshittā (ܡܫܝܬܬܐ) by ℑ.]

(1) ܡܫܝܬܬܐ, to which supply ܡܫܝܬܬܐ, means 'the simple,' i.e. the simple version. It is first used, so far as known at present, in Massoretic MSS of the 9th and 10th cents. in contradistinction to the Harclensis; and in Moses bar Cephas (1913) in opposition to the Syro-Hexaplaris. The latter says: 'One must know that there are in Syriac two translations of the OT: the one, this ܡܫܝܬܬܐ in which we read, was made from Hebrew into Syriac; the other, that of the Seventy-two, from Greek' (see Urt. p. 229 f.). On the pronunciation, spelling, and meaning of the name (Peshittā, simplified to Peshito), see the Lit. quoted l.c. p. 230.

(2) Its origin and the spread of its use are quite obscure. Till 1842 the Peshito was the only known older Syr. VS of the Bible: it is still held by G. H. Gwilliam to be the oldest (see Studia Biblica, i. 151 ff. ['A Syriac biblical MS', iii. 47 ff. 'The materials for the criticism of the Peshito NT']; Expos. Times, Jan. 1895, 167 ff. ('The new Syriac Gospels'); Crit. Rev. Jan. 1896, 14–22 ('Communication on the Lewis Palimpsest, the Curetonian Fragments, and the Peshittā'); The Oxford debate on the textual criticism of the NT held at New College on May 6, 1897, Lond. 1897). His view is shared by A. Bonus, who thinks ℑ 'scarcely later than the latter half of the second century.' With this contrast the statement of Burkitt (JThSt, i. 571): 'I confess that I am unconvinced that what we call the NT Peshittā was in existence in S. Ephraem's day, and I believe that we owe both its production and its victorious reception to the organizing energy of the great Rabbula, bishop of Edessa from 411–435 A.D.'†

(1) Abbé P. Martin: ℑ 'is a revision of the Peshito made with the help of a MS closely resembling Codex Bezae. The Curetonian recension dates from the end of the 7th or the beginning of the 8th cent., probably from this last period. It never had much vogue. Its author was probably Jacob of Edessa [†703] (Introduction à la critique textuelle du NT, Paris, 1883). The latter hypothesis may be dismissed at once.

(2) Gwilliam (Bonus): ℑ and ℔ were not the origin of ℑ; ℑ is more modern than ℑ (Crit. Rev. 1896, p. 19); Rabbula intended that copies of ℑ should be substituted for ℣ (p. 21); but it might be, probably was, difficult to procure copies of the Peshittā, in obedience to Rabbula's order. The term Mepharreshē used by Rabbula would easily become a title for copies subsequently made. 'Are ℑ and ℔ relics of copies made by order of Rabbula?'

The position of ℑ is of great importance, because it is, as Sanday styled it, 'the sheet-anchor' of the theory of Burgon-Miller on the textual criticism of the NT. See, further, p. 740^b.

* There is no ground for the statement which is sometimes made (for instance by Jülicher, Einleitung, § 37) that he 'burned' the copies.

* The edition is out of print; a new edition by F. O. Burkitt, 'The Curetonian Syriac Gospels, re-edited together with the readings of the Sinaitic Codex, and a translation into English,' advertised by the Camb. Univ. Press (Academy, Sept. 29, 1894, p. 233b; JThSt, i. 569), is approaching completion.

† Comp. with this the statement of the present writer (PRE² xv. [1885] 195), on the work of Rabbula, that one might be inclined to see its result in ℑ resp. ℔ [= ℑ].

(3) \mathcal{S}^a — \mathcal{S}^b — \mathcal{S}^c are three recensions of one and the same version, and this is their historical order (adopted by many, for instance Allen at the Oxford Debate). \mathcal{S}^a — \mathcal{S}^b — \mathcal{S}^c is impossible, equally impossible is the genealogy $\mathcal{S}^a < \mathcal{S}^b$.

(4) \mathcal{S}^a — \mathcal{S}^b — \mathcal{T} . Conybeare: 'I believe scholars are beginning to recognize that Tatian . . . used the Curetonian version of the Gospels, which in turn rested on the new Syriac' [Academy, Jan. 12, 1895]. \mathcal{S}^a also older than \mathcal{T} (Burkitt, Holzhey, Bewer).

(5) \mathcal{S}^a older than \mathcal{S}^b (Resch, Duval; see Hjelt, p. 95).

(a) \mathcal{T} — \mathcal{S}^a (Baethgen, Zahn), before the discovery of \mathcal{S}^b .

(b) \mathcal{T} — \mathcal{S}^b — \mathcal{S}^c or

(c) $\mathcal{T} < \mathcal{S}^a$. \mathcal{T} older than \mathcal{S}^a (Zahn, Nestle, Hilgenfeld, Bardenhewer, Gwilliam, Cundberg).

(6) \mathcal{S}^a — \mathcal{T} — \mathcal{S}^b — \mathcal{S}^c . So in the main Hjelt; \mathcal{S}^a on the whole a faithful witness of the Old Syr. VS of the 2nd cent., \mathcal{S}^b a later recension of it probably from the first half of the 2nd cent., formed under the influence of \mathcal{T} ; \mathcal{S}^c a revision of the old version, which eliminated the influences of \mathcal{T} and became the Vulgate; at last \mathcal{S}^c in its turn influenced \mathcal{T} , which remained in use with the Nestorians longer than with the Jacobites.

The priority of \mathcal{S}^a would be certain, if the thesis of Hjelt were proved that \mathcal{S}^a is not a unity, but that the various Gospels were due to different hands and that nevertheless all were used by \mathcal{T} . The first part of his thesis Hjelt seems to have proved. There is a decided difference in the vocabulary of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John (see p. 96 ff.); he may be even right in his supposition, that the translation of Matthew was the oldest, due to a Jewish Christian (cf. Mt 9¹⁸ head of the synagogue, 23⁵ tephillin and purple $\alpha\beta\alpha\gamma\epsilon$).^{*} But the second part, that \mathcal{S}^a was used by \mathcal{T} , does not seem to be proved. But in any case \mathcal{S}^a and \mathcal{T} belong to the most important witnesses for the text of the Gospels.

Acts and Epistles.—Amidst the absorbing interest caused by the discovery of \mathcal{S}^a , little attention has been paid of late to the rest of the Syriac NT, Acts and Epistles. They are known as yet only as parts of \mathcal{S}^b , but there are indications that for the Acts and the Pauline Epistles also an older version was in existence. And it is of great interest that these two parts, together with the Gospels, made up the whole of the NT of the Syriac Church; all the Catholic Epistles, and not only the minor ones, being unknown. This is proved not only by the Doctrine of Addai (ed. Phillips, Lond. 1876, p. 44), where Addai orders: 'But the Law and the Prophets, which you read every day before the people, and the Epistles of Paul, which Simon Peter sent us from the city of Rome, and the Acts of the Twelve Apostles, which John the son of Zebedee sent us from Ephesus; these books read ye in the Churches of Christ, and with these read not any other, as there is not any other, in which the truth that ye hold is written, except these books which retain you in the faith to which ye have been called.' This is corroborated by the quotations of Aphraates, which are restricted to Acts and Paul, to the exclusion of the Catholic Epistles.

^{*} A great aid in these studies would be a Concordance to the Syriac Bible, which was desired by Lagarde as early as 1837. A prospectus of a Concordance of the Peshitta was sent out by Benj. Labaree and Wm. A. Shedd from Urumia in Oct. 1897, with some 'Specimen pages'; but the arrangement was not such as to satisfy the wants of the student. A Syriac Concordance in the manner of Hatch-Redpath is one of our needs.

The passages cited by Wright as references to 1 P 4¹⁶ and 1 Jn 3²⁴ 4¹⁶ have been shown by Zahn not to refer to these passages (but the former to Pr 11³¹; the latter to the Gospel of John).

At last there was published in the Studia Sinaitica, No. 1 (p. 11 ff.) from extracts made by J. R. Harris from cod. Syr. 10 on Mt. Sinai, a list of the canonical books of the Syriac Bible, giving for each book and group of books the number of hūmāra (stichi).^{*} After the four Gospels (Mat. 2522, Mark 1675, Luke 3083, John 1737 [write 1937], total 9218) follows Acts (2720), then 'Paul the Apostle' with a total 5076 for 'the apostle', immediately followed by the total for 'the holy books, which the holy Church receives.'

There are some errors and confusions in this list; but as to the primary importance of it there can be no doubt.

This exclusion of all the Catholic Epistles from the old Syriac Canon is further in full agreement with the statement of Leontius on Theodore of Mopsuestia: αὐτὴν τε . . . τοῦ μεγάλου Ἰακώβου τὴν ἐπιστολὴν καὶ τὰς ἐξῆς τῶν ἄλλων ἀποκηρύττει καθολικάς. He followed in this the older tradition of the Syriac Church. Neither do the Apostolic Constitutions recognize the Catholic Epistles.

See Th. Zahn, Das NT Theodors von Mopsuestia und der syrische Canon; Grundriss der Geschichte des neutest. Kanons (Leipzig, 1901, § 6); Jülicher, Einführung in das NT 2.4 (1901, § 41); J. A. Bewer, The History of the NT Canon in the Syrian Church (Chicago, 1900).

About the middle of the 4th cent., therefore, the Church of Edessa had no Catholic Epistles in its Canon.

But it was not only the contents but the text of its Bible that differed at that time from \mathcal{S}^b .

See in Bewer, p. 51, 'A comparison of the Acts and Epistles in Aphraates with those of the Peshitta.' A most significant example is not quoted by Bewer. Matthias in Ac 12²⁸ 29 is called by Aphraates Tulmai; this is now corroborated by the Syriac version of the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius (see TU vii. 2, p. v; the same version called Agabus of Ac 11 Addai). In 1 Co 15⁵¹ Aphraates testifies for the reading of \mathcal{S}^b for that of B.

The quotations from Ephraem have been investigated by F. H. Woods (Studia Biblica, iii. 132 ff.): the result is the same; the influence of another version than \mathcal{S}^b cannot be denied; but that influence is not half so strong as in Aphraates. But the Roman edition of Ephraem's work is excessively uncritical, and we can 'never trust a biblical quotation where it agrees with the Peshitta' (see Burkitt, JThSt, i. 570, and now Texts and Studies, vii. 2). But not only so, we cannot even trust the references to \mathcal{S}^b in the critical apparatus of Tischendorf's ed. oct.; they are neither complete nor correct; cf. 1 Co 15⁵⁷, where \mathcal{S}^b adds 'or of barley' between σῖτου and ἡ τῆς τῶν λαπῶν; on 2 Co 1¹² see Nestle, Introduction, 309. All references to \mathcal{S}^b in Tischendorf's apparatus ought to be verified in the way in which Gwynn did this work for the four minor Cath. Epp. (Hermathena, 1890).

But not only in details of text did the older Syriac NT differ from \mathcal{S}^b as now current; it differed also as to the arrangement. In the list of the canonical books mentioned above, Galatians stands at the head of the letters of Paul, before Cor. and Rom., which are followed by Hebrews. The same order, Gal., Cor., Rom., seems to have been that of Ephraem (see J. R. Harris, Four Lectures on the Western Text, p. 21), and it is expressly testified to in Marcion. From this, Zahn is inclined to conclude that Tatian may have brought with him to the East at the same time the Western Text of the Gospels and the Marcionitic order of the letters of Paul; the more so as Eusebius says of Tatian that he altered the text of the Epistles of Paul (see Nestle, Introduction, p. 220).

Further, the Church of Edessa had in the time of Ephraem in its Canon the Apocryphal Correspondence of St. Paul and the Corinthians, of which we now know for certain that it once belonged to the Acta Pauli (see vol. i. p. 498). On the other hand, the short letter to Philemon seems to have been wanting in the Bible of Ephraem (see Zahn, Gesch. Kan. ii. 664, 1003, Grundriss, p. 52; Jülicher, Einführung, doubts this).

It is totally unknown when the three greater Catholic Epistles were received. There has not been as yet even an examination of the question whether the translation of all the letters of Paul is due to the same hand, and that of the three Catholic Epistles to another. What is certain is that the four Antilegomena of the Catholic Epistles and the Bk. of Revelation never formed part of Σ^p , and were wanting therefore even in the first printed editions of the Syriac NT till 1630. It is the more surprising that the Nestorian Stone-inscription at Singan-fu speaks of 27 books left by Christ to further the soul in what is good (see J. E. Heller, Das Nestorianische Denkmal in Singan-fu, Budapest, 1897, 4to, reprint from 'Wissenschaftliche Ergebnisse der Reise des Grafen B. Széchenyi in Ostasien' (1877-1880), pp. 31, 45).

* Bensly died a few days after the return to Cambridge, 23rd April 1893.

† Reviews and papers called forth by the publication are mentioned, Urt. 112 ff.; add to them Farrar in the Expositor, Jan. 1896. On the reading Mt 11⁸ 'Joseph, to whom the Virgin Mary was betrothed, begat Jesus,' see the correspondence in the Academy, 1894, Nov. 17, 24, Dec. 1, 8, 15, 22, 29; 1895, Jan. 5, 12, April 13, May 18, June 8, 29, by Allen, Badham, Charles, Conder, Conybeare, Farrar, Lewis, Nestle, Rahfs (who first pointed out that it was also found in Greek, 29th Dec.), Sanday, Simcox, White; further, G. H. Skipwith, 'The first chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel in the light of recent research' (Nottingham Tracts, iii., London, 1895); and the Additional Notes in the second vol. of Westcott-Hort's Greek Testament, (reprint 1896).

Ceriani (Monumenta sacra et profana, v. i. 1-40, 1873). The text of the Gospels exists, according to Bernstein (Das Evangelium des Johannes, 1853, pp. 3, 29), in the codex A2 of the Bibliotheca Angelica at Rome. In 1884 Isaac H. Hall published Syriac Manuscript Gospels of a pre-Harklensian version, Acts and Epistles of the Peshito version, written (probably) between 700 and 900 (Philadelphia).

The minor epistles of the Philoxeniana were first published by Ed. Pococke (Leiden, 1630), and still earlier (1612) at Mayence a Latin translation of them (by Nicolaus Servasius, Comment. in Epist. Canonicas) from a MS brought to Rome. Pococke's text was taken over into the Peshito editions of the NT and emended by Lee (1823); still more in the New York impression, 1888. Gwynn collated fifteen MSS and gave a survey of the chief points, pending the publication of the emended text with a complete Apparatus Criticus (Hermathena, No. 16, vol. vii. pp. 281-314 ff.: 'The older Syriac Version of the Four Minor Catholic Epistles'). Cf., further, Ad. Merx, 'Die in der Peshito fehlenden Briefe des Neuen Testaments in arabischer der Philoxeniana entstammender Uebersetzung. Nach der Abschrift eines Manuscripts des Sinaiklosters von Frau A. Persis Burkitt voröffentlicht und mit Anmerkungen versehen' (ZA xii. 240-252, 348-381, xiii. 1-28). Merx frequently disagrees with Gwynn as to the value of the variants.

2. The Harklensis.—A hundred years later the work of retranslation and revision was taken up at Alexandria for the OT by Paul of Tella (see p. 445*), for the NT by Thomas of Harkel (Heraklea in Mesopotamia). This version comprises (as printed at present), like the Philoxeniana, all the books of the NT except Revelation, and was published under the (inappropriate) title of Versio Philoxeniana by Jos. White at Oxford, between 1778 and 1803. A lacuna in the Epistle to the Hebrews (11²⁷-13²⁸) has been supplied by Bensly (Cambridge, 1889). Its importance rests on the fact that one of the Greek MSS of Acts used by Thomas bore the closest relation to codex D, and that for the Epistles of Paul his text goes back to the library of Pamphilus (codex H). On Acts see Aug. Pott, Der Abendländische Text der Apostelgeschichte und die Wir-Quelle, Leipzig, 1900; R. Corssen, 'Die Recension der Philoxeniana durch Thomas von Mabug' (ZNTW, 1901, 1-12);* A. Hilgenfeld, 'Thomas von Heraclea und die Apostelgeschichte' (ZWT, 43, 1900, 3). W. Deane had prepared a new edition; it is an urgent want for the textual criticism, especially of Acts.

3. Revelation.—A Syriac text of the last book of the NT was first published by L. de Dieu (Leiden, 1627) from a MS of Scaliger, now at Leiden, written by a certain Caspar from the land of the Hindus ('Hanravitarum,' as de Dieu read). The text of the Paris (and London) Polyglot seems to be taken from an independent MS. It does not belong to the original work of Polycarp, but to that of Thomas—a fact verified at last by the documentary evidence of the Florence MS rediscovered by Gwynn (Hermathena, 1898: 'On the recovery of a missing Syriac Manuscript of the Apocalypse,' pp. 227-245).

The same scholar discovered, in 1892, in a codex belonging to Lord Crawford, another and older translation of Revelation, and published it as the first Syriac book issued from the Dublin University Press, in 1897 (The Apocalypse of St. John in a Syriac Version hitherto unknown; edited, . . . with Critical Notes on the Syriac Text and an annotated Reconstruction of the underlying Greek Text. To which is added an Introductory Dissertation on the Syriac Versions of the Apocalypse, Dublin, 4to).

4. The pericope de adultera and other passages. (a) The passage Jn 8¹¹ missing in the common Syriac Bible became known to the learned at an early date. Mara, bishop of Amid (about 519), wrote a Greek prologue to a copy of the Tetraevangelium, in which this pericope had a place in canon 89, i.e. at Jn 8²⁰, where also the pseudo-Athanasian Synopsis mentions it. With the Prologue this pericope has been translated into Syriac in the so-called Church history of Zacharias Rhetor (Land, Anecdota Syriaca, iii. 252, 255).

From a MS of Ussher (now in the Trinity Library of Dublin) the same passage had been printed by de Dieu, 1631 (Animadversiones in quatuor Evangelia). A third translation was due to the abbot Mar Paul, apparently Paul of Tella; a fourth has been printed by J. White (ex codice Barsalibei at the end of the Gospels in his edition of the Philoxeniana, i. [1778] p. 559). See on these and other points J. Gwynn (Translations, Dublin, 1881).

(b) While scarcely one Syriac MS is known in Europe containing all 27 books of the present NT (see on this Gwynn, Translations, 1886 and 1893; and compare what Rahmani states about the Mosul ṣawḏḥrān, from which he published the Testamentum Domini nostri Jesu Christi [Præfatio, pp. ix, x]), there are some MSS that contain books which are no longer included in the NT, e.g. cod. 1700 in the University Library at Cambridge, from which The Epistles of St. Clement to the Corinthians in Syriac were edited by the late R. L. Bensly (Cambridge, 1899). In the MS the Clementine Epp. stand between the Catholic and Pauline Epistles, and are divided like these into lectures for Church use. There are, again, the MSS from which that other pair of letters ascribed to Clement, de Virginibus or de Virginitate, were published by Wetstein (NT Gr. t. i. 1751, Prol. pp. 1-26) and J. Th. Beelen (Lovani, 1856; see on them J. P. N. Land, 'Syrische Bijdragen tot de Patristiek,' in Godgeleerde Bijdragen van 1856-7).

(c) On the Clementine Octateuch added as number 77-83 to the 76 books of the OT and NT in the Mosul Pandektes just mentioned, see Rahmani, l.c. p. x.

These and other instances show that the history of the NT Canon was in the Syriac Church different from its history in most other branches.

5. The Palestinian Syriac.—One other version remains to be noticed, namely, that used by the Malkite (Greek) Church in Palestine and Egypt, written in a dialect more akin to the language of the Jewish Targums; long known exclusively from a lectionary in the Vatican Library, called the Evangeliarium Hierosolymitanum; described by Assemani and Adler (1789); published in 1861-64 in two vols. by Count Fr. Miniscalchi Erizzo, and again—as his last work—by P. de Lagarde in his Bibliotheca Syriaca (Göttingen, 1892); republished by Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson on the strength of two other MSS found on Mt. Sinai (The Palestinian Syriac Lectionary of the Gospels, London, 1899, 4to). Quite recently new texts have been added from Acts and the Epistles of Paul, including Hebrews and James (Studia Sinaitica, No. vi.), and the date and birthplace of this whole branch of literature have been elucidated by F. C. Burkitt (JThSt, ii. 174-185). In spite of its secondary character, it is not devoid of interest for textual criticism. In the Apparatus its symbol has been hitherto syr^b or ^{hr} or ^{hier}.*

* To be used with caution. The intention of Thomas was certainly not 'to restore with the help of his Greek MSS the original text of Philoxenus,' and 'the old Syrian' mentioned by him in Mt 27²⁸ Mk 8¹⁷ is not Philoxenus, but the Peshito. Cf. also A. Hilgenfeld, ZWT, 44 (1901), 318-320.

* One of the urgent needs of textual criticism is fitting symbols for the Syriac versions of the NT. Tischendorf used

II. OLD TESTAMENT.—1. Tradition.—The Syrians themselves believed that a part of the OT was translated already in the time of Solomon at the request of king Hiram. Jesudad, bishop of Hadeth, c. 852 A.D., mentions the books then translated. Another tradition is that the version was due to the priest sent by the king of Assyria to Samaria; whose name is variously given as Asa, Asya, Ezra, Uria, אסא, אסא 2 K 17²⁴, 1 Ch 15¹⁸, ed. Lee and Ceriani; see the Literature quoted in Urt. p. 231, and add there Schatzhöhle, ed. Bezold, 192. 3 אורי, codd. PL תאורייה, in Arabic اوريا. The rest of the books are said to have been added in the days of Addai and Abgar (see p. 645*).

2. Origin.—Whether part of the version is of pre-Christian, or at least of Jewish origin (thus Rich. Simon, Hug, Geiger, Perles, Lagarde), is not certain, but it is possible.* There were many Jews in Mesopotamia, especially in Edessa, in early times. It may suffice to recall queen Helena and Izates, and the Abgar legend. In the latter a daily reading of 'the OT and NT' (p. 34) or 'the Law and the Prophets' (p. 44) is presupposed besides that of the Gospel, Acts, and Epistles (see p. 647*).

3. Extent.—The Syriac OT was, on the whole, the same as the Hebrew Bible. Jesudad, for instance, knows that it counts 22 books; but at a very early date the influence of the Greek Bible is felt. There are some notable peculiarities. Chronicles seems to have been wanting in the canon of the Nestorians, nor is it represented in the Massoretic labours of the Jacobites; but it is found already in MSS of the 6th cent. (cod. Ambrosianus, Brit. Mus., Wright 25), with a division at 2 Ch 6¹ (in most MSS, not in Ambros. and Florent.). Neither is Ezra-Nehemiah found in the Massoretic MSS, nor Esther in those of the Nestorians. In the Bibles of the Jacobites Esther forms, together with Judith, Ruth, and Susanna, the 'book of the women,' with 4463 stichi.

The arrangement of the books varies according to the MSS. The list on next col. gives them according to the order in the canonical list mentioned above, p. 647^b; the figures for cols. 2-5 are taken from Abbé Martin's Introduction à la critique textuelle du NT, Partie théorique, Paris, 1883, p. 667; cf. further, Gregory-Tischendorf, 3. 112, 1303; J. R. Harris, On the Origin of the Ferrar Group, Lond. 1893, 10, 26.

Note.—The Nomocanon of Barhebraeus, ch. 7, § 3 (p. 103, ed. Bedjan) on the number of the holy books and those besides (ἱερά), quotes canon 81 of the Apostles, that all clergy and laymen ought to have the Holy Scriptures of the OT, i.e. 5 books of Moses, Josh., Judges, Ruth, Judith; 4 books of Kings; 2 of Chron.; 2 of Ezra; Esth.; Job; 3 of Mac.; Job, David; 5 of Solomon; 16 Prophets. Of 'books without,' there is to be Bar Asira for the teaching of the young. The NT is to include 4 Gospels, 14 letters of Paul, 2 of Peter, 3 of John; James, Jude; 2 of Clement, 8 books of the mysteries of the same Clement, and the Praxeis of the Apostles.

The elucidation says that the 4 of Kings are Samuel and Kings, and of Solomon we know only 4 (Prov., Eccl., Cant., Wisd.); and it is possible that the 5th is that which is inscribed 'the deep Proverbs of Solomon'; and the Book of Susanna is reckoned with Daniel.

Then he quotes the great Athanasius on the great Wisdom, Bar Asira, Esther, Judith, Tobia, what is called διατάξεις ἀποκαλύψεως, and the Shepherd; Dionysius of Alexandria on Revelation as being by Cerinthus or another John; Origen on Hebrews, Apocalypsis Pauli, and other Revelations, The Doctrine of the Apostles, Epistle of Barnabas, Tobia, the Shepherd, Bar syrca, syrhr or hier, syrhc (= Schaaf-Peshito), syrp (= posterior = Philoxeniana), syrwht (= White = Heracleensis). Westcott-Hort used syrt=syrca, and now syr crt and syr sin (see vol. ii. 1896, notes, p. 5), syr vg (= Peshito), syr hl (= Harklean), syr hr. Zahn proposed S¹=Peshito, S²=Philoxeniana, S³=Harklean; for the Gospels Sc, Ss, Sh. To avoid figures, the Philoxeniana might be represented by S², the versions of Thomas by S³.

* In support of the Jewish origin of the Svr. version of Chronicles, Noldeke (Alttest. Lit. p. 109) quotes the translation of 1 Ch 52 'from Judah will go out (יָצֵא) the king Messiah'; the copyist of cod. F wrote נָצַח 'has gone out'.

Asira; the Patriarch Cyriacus on the Book of Hierotheos as being not by him, but probably by the heretic Stephen bar Sudallie.

A singular division found in some MSS is that the Law (אֲדָמָה) is directly followed by תנאים ארבע = liber sessionum, βιβλος καθίστασιν, i.e. Job, Josh., Judges, Sam., Kings, Prov., Sir., Eccl., Ruth, Canticles.

The Psalter also is divided into καθίσματα (20). This is the favourite book of the Syriac Church, which must be known by heart if one wishes to become a deacon, and was recited daily by certain monks. In accurate MSS there are Massoretic notes; cf. the edition of Bedjan (Liber Psalmorum, horarum diurnarum, ordinis officii divini et homiliarum rogationum ad usum scholarum, Parisiis, 1886, p. 117).

The number of Psalms is 150, of Hallelujahs 20, Sections (צִדְקָה) 29, Embolisms (סְפָרָה) 57, Stichi (סְפָרָה) 4333, and Books 5. The number of Words is 19,034, and the number of Letters 90,852. 'Lord' occurs 732 times, 'God' 400, 'because' (כִּי) 285, 'Moses' 6, 'Aaron' 6, 'Jacob' 24, 'Samuel' 1, 'Benjamin' 2, 'Israel' 44, 'namely' (וְכֵן) 5, 'but' (וְכֵן) 5. And 'know that there is not found in David the form חֲתִים for the preposition "under," as there is not found חֲתִים in the Apostle'; know occurs 13 times; and 'from now and to eternity' 4 times.

There is a strange statement at the head of many Psalter MSS (already in the cod. Ambr.) that the Psalms were translated from the Palestinian language into Hebrew, from Hebrew into Greek, from Greek into Syriac. In the cod. Hunt 109 (Oxford, Bodleian) this statement is transferred to the whole Syriac OT, and in cod. Rich 7154

(Brit. Mus.) it is stated that the (Syriac) Psalter was translated from the Palestinian into Hebrew, according to the translation of Symmachus the Samaritan. Other Psalters have the heading $\alpha\pi\alpha\sigma\tau\alpha\varsigma$, which is intelligible of the Gospels of the Separate (see pp. 646, 648), but scarcely of the Psalms. (Does it mean a Church-Psalter, detached from the Bible?*) Many liturgical additions are found in the Church-Psalter (see, e.g., the edition of Bedjan, which contains, of 'Canticles' at the end of the Psalter, Ex 15, Is 42, Dt 32).

Besides the books of the Greek and Hebrew Bibles, complete MSS called καθολικοί or πανδέκτες ($\alpha\pi\alpha\sigma\tau\alpha\varsigma$ or $\alpha\pi\alpha\sigma\tau\alpha\varsigma$), like the cod. Ambrosianus, have preserved the Apocalypse of Baruch,† 4 Ezra, 4 and 5 Maccabees,‡ i.e. the history of Samuina, and Josephus BJ v. Apart from Bible MSS, many other pieces of apocryphal and pseudographical literature have been preserved to us in Syriac.§ On the Syriac text of Sirach see above, p. 546; of Tobit only the version of Paul of Tella is preserved, and this only down to 7th; the rest is still later. Of the first Book of Maccabees the cod. Ambrosianus preserved a second recension.

4. Character of the Version.—The value of the Version varies greatly, as it is not the work of a single hand. The Pentateuch keeps close to the Heb. text and Jewish exegesis, but has interesting details; it knows, for instance, or thinks it knows, that the rare word כָּהֵן denotes the 'parasang,' Genesis, Isaiah (30th 46th 5th), the Twelve, the Psalter, show marks of having been influenced by the Septuagint;|| Ruth is paraphrastic, Job literal, Chronicles like a Targum; the version of Proverbs has been used by the Targumists. Many of the books of the OT have been made the subject of special studies, whose results we now possess, mostly in the shape of Inaugural Dissertations; but new investigations are necessary.

5. Editions.—The printed text of the Syriac OT is in a most deplorable state, all editions going back to the Paris Polyglot of Michel le Jay (Paris, 1645). This was reproduced without any noteworthy improvements in Walton's London Polyglot (1657); Lee reproduced the same text with a few emendations and several misprints for the British Bible Society (1821). The Urmia edition of the American Missionaries (1852) is a reproduction of Lee in Nestorian characters with Nestorian vowels and with improved spellings. At last the Dominicans at Mosul published an edition of the Syriac Bible (3 vols. 1887-92), which the present writer has not seen, but which, he is afraid, will not satisfy our wants. Ceriani's photolithographic reproduction of the cod. Ambrosianus (1876-81, Milano, 200 frs.) is not within the reach of the general student; and as the editions of Urmia and the Bible Society are scarce or out of print, there is a crying need for a new edition of one of the most important versions of the OT. Only for the Libri Apocryphi or as he wished afterwards to entitle the book Libri Deuterocanonici we have the edition of P. de Lagarde (Lips. 1861). The country of Ussher, who intended himself to bring out such an edition, the country of Walton and of Buchanan, has here a task to discharge that will amply reward itself.*

From the Syriac MSS lying in the libraries of Europe the history of the transmission of the Bible might be very well illustrated; and much useful material might be gathered from the Commentaries of the Syriac divines, even from so late a scholar as Gregory Barhebræus (see J. SYROPHŒNICIAN (Συροφœνίκισσα, Συροφœνίκισσα WH, Σύρα Φœνίκισσα WHmg) occurs only in Mk 7²⁶ as the national name of a woman who is called in Mt 15²² 'a Canaanitish (Xavavala) woman,' i.e. not a Jewess, but a descendant of the early inhabitants of the Phœnician coast-lands (see CANAAN). On ethnic and other grounds it is unlikely that the prefix Συρο- was meant to distinguish the district from the Carthaginian seaboard, called by Strabo (xvii. 19) ἡ τῶν Λιβυφœνίκων γῆ, the latter being a mongrel race (Livy, xxi. 22), and the alleged contrast being of no moment in the narrative. The term probably denotes a Syrian resident in Phœnicia proper, and may have been in current use before Hadrian adopted it as the official title of one of the three provinces into which he divided Syria. In Ac 21² the two parts of the term are already used interchangeably. Tradition (Clementine Homilies, ii. 19, iii. 73) gives the name of Justa to the woman concerned in the incident, and that of Bernice to her daughter. Swete, following but correcting Euthymius Zigabenus, argues from the context, with some force, that the woman, though of Phœnician extraction, was Greek in speech as well as in religion.

TAANACH (תַּאנַּח; once, Jos 12²¹ תַּנַּח; twice, 1 K 4¹², 1 Ch 7²⁹ תַּנַּח, which is the form adopted uniformly by Baer).—An ancient royal city of the Canaanites, whose king was amongst those whom Joshua smote (Jos 12²¹). It lay within the territory allotted to Issachar, but belonged to Manasseh, and was given to the Kohathite Levites. The Canaanites were not driven out, but they were put to tribute, or obliged to do personal service, as the Israelites increased in strength (Jos 17¹¹ 21²⁵, Jg 17, 1 Ch 7²⁹). Near Taanach, perhaps on lands belonging to the city, was fought the decisive battle between Barak and the kings of Canaan, which is celebrated in the triumphant song of Deborah (Jg 5¹⁹). The city was in the rich district from which Baana, one of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers, drew supplies for the royal household (1 K 4¹²); and is mentioned in close connexion with Megiddo—'Taanach by (or 'upon') the waters of Megiddo' (Jg 5¹⁹). It was apparently one of the line of fortresses (Dor, Megiddo, Taanach, and Bethshean) which stretched across the country from west to east, and guarded the main avenues of approach to the great plain of Esdraelon from the south. As such it is mentioned with Megiddo in the list of Thothmes III. at Karnak, and again in the list of Sheshonk, (Shishak) (Max Müller, Asien u. Europ. 158, 170). Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. s. Θανᾶχ, Θανᾶκ, Thaanach) describe it as 'a very large village,' 4 or 3 Roman miles from Legio, and it is now Ta'annuk, about 4½ miles from Lejjān. In the 13th cent. the manor of Thanis (Taanach) is noted as forming part of the possessions of the Abbey of St. Mary in the valley of Jehoshaphat at Jerusalem. Ta'annuk is a small village on the S.E. slope of a large isolated mound, Tell Ta'annuk at the S. edge of the plain of Esdraelon. The mound is covered with fragments of pottery and shapeless ruins, and there are ancient cisterns, wells, and rock-hewn tombs. Below the village is a small mosque, which was perhaps a church.

TAANATH-SHILOH (תַּנְחִי שִׁילֹה; B Θαναθὰ καὶ Σελλήσδ, A Τηναθσηλῶ; Luc. Θαναθασηλῶ).—A town on the N.E. boundary of Ephraim, mentioned between Michmethath and Janoah (Jos 16⁹). Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. s. Θαναθ) state that Taanath-shiloh was 10 Roman miles E. of Neapolis on the road to the Jordan, and called in their day Thena. This is probably the Thena (Θῆνα) mentioned by Ptolemy (v. xvi. 5) as one of the towns of Samaria. It was identified by Van de Velde with Tāna about 7 miles from Nāblus (Neapolis), and 2 miles N. of Yānān (Janoah). The ruins, foundations, caves, cisterns, and rock-hewn tombs are on one of the Roman roads leading from Neapolis to the Jordan Valley (PEF Mem. ii. 232, 245).

The Talmuds explain the word Taanath by 'threshold', and hold Taanath-shiloh to have been a long, narrow strip of land belonging to Joseph which ran southwards into the territory of Benjamin, and included the site of Shiloh.

TABBATH (תַּבַּת; B Ταβθ, A Γαβθ; Tebbath).—The Midianites, after Gideon's night attack, fled to Beth-shittah, towards Zererah, as far as the border of Abel-meholah by Tabbath (Jg 7²²). No trace of the site of Tabbath has yet been found, but it must have been in the Jordan Valley, and probably not far from the spot, to the south of Bethshean, where the hills of Samaria approach the river.

TABEEL (תַּבְּעַל 'God is good' or [Winckl.] 'God is wise'; the pointing תַּבְּעַל in Is 7⁶ may be simply due to pause [Ols., König], or, more probably, may be designed to suggest the sense 'good for nothing' [x neg.; so Del., Dillm., Nöld., Duhm, Stade, Marti, and Oxf. Heb. Lex.]; LXX Ταβέλ).—1. See REZIN, p. 267². 2. A Persian official in Samaria who was one of the parties to the letter to Artaxerxes, which was designed to hinder the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem, Ezr 4⁷.

TABER.—Only in Nah 2⁷, in the description of the destruction of Nineveh, when Huzzab 'is carried away, and her handmaids mourn as with the voice of doves, tabering (Amer. RV 'beating') upon their breasts' [lit. 'hearts'; תַּבְּרִינָן לַעֲמִידָתָן]. Beating the breast was a familiar Oriental custom in mourning (see the illustration in Ball's Light from the East, p. 119, and cf. Is 32¹² [RV, but the text is doubtful]). The word here used means lit. 'drumming' (cf. Ps 68²⁶, its only other occurrence, and see illustration in vol. iii. p. 462^b). The LXX φεγγόμεναι implies a reading תַּבְּעִינָן, which is used in Is 29¹⁶ of the voice of a wailing woman. Stade is inclined to prefer this to the MT.

The English word 'taber' means a small drum, usually accompanying a pipe, both instruments being played by the same performer. Other forms are 'tabor,' 'tabour,' and 'tambour'; and dim. forms are 'tabret' and 'tambourine.' The words are originally Arabic, and entered the English language through Old French, a step between French and Arabic being the Spanish. For the subst. cf. Shaks. Winter's Tale, iv. iv. 183—'If you did but hear the pedlar at the door, you would never dance again after a tabor and pipe.' The verb is rarer, cf. Chaucer, God Women, 354—

'In your court is many a losengeour, . . .
That tabouren in your eres many a soun,
Right after hir imaginacioun.'

J. A. SELBIE.

TABERAH (תַּבְּרָה; LXX Ἐντυριμὸς).—A station in Israel's journeyings in the wilderness of Paran (Nu 11³, Dt 9²²). Its name Tab'erah (= 'burning or place of burning') is said to have been given to it 'because the fire of the LORD burnt among them' (Nu 11³ [prob. E]). The place, which is not named in the itinerary of Nu 33, has not been identified.

Literature.

The term tabernaculum, whence 'tabernacle' of the Eng. VSS since Wyclif, denoted a tent with or without a wooden framework, and, like the σκηνή of the Gr. translators, was used in the Latin VSS to render indiscriminately the תֶּנֶךְ or goats'-hair 'tent' and the מִדְּבָרָה or 'booth' (which see) of the Hebrews. Its special application by the Romans to the tent or templum minus of the augurs made it also a not altogether inappropriate rendering of the תַּבְּרָה or 'dwelling' of the priestly writers (see § iii.), by which, however, the etymological signification of the latter was disregarded, and the confusion further increased. The same confusion reigns in our AV. The Revisers, as they inform us in their preface, have aimed at greater uniformity by rendering mishkān by 'tabernacle' and ohel by 'tent' (as AV had already done in certain cases, see § iii.). It is to be regretted, however, that they did not render the Heb. sukkāh with equal uniformity by 'booth' (e.g. in Mt 17⁴ and parallels), and particularly in the case of the Feast of Booths (EV Tabernacles).

i. THE TENT OR TABERNACLE OF THE OLDEST SOURCES.—Within the limits of this art. it is manifestly impossible to enter in detail into the problems of history and religion to which the study of 'the tabernacle' and its appointments, as these are presented by the priestly authors of our Pentateuch, introduces the student of the OT. The idea of the tabernacle, with its Aaronic priesthood and ministering Levites, lies at the very foundation of the religious institutions of Israel as these are conceived and formulated in the priestly sources. To criticise this conception here—a conception which has dominated Jewish and Christian thought from the days of Ezra to our own—would lead us at once into the heart of the critical controversy which has raged for two centuries round the literature and religion of the OT. Such a task is as impossible to compass here as it is unnecessary. The almost universal acceptance by OT scholars of the post-exilic date of the books of the Pentateuch in their present form is evident on every page of this Dictionary. On this foundation, therefore, we are free to build in this article without the necessity of setting forth at every stage the processes by which the critical results are obtained.

Now, when the middle books of the Pentateuch are examined in the same spirit and by the same methods as prevail in the critical study of other ancient literatures, a remarkable divergence of testimony emerges with regard to the tent which, from the earliest times, was employed to shelter the sacred ark. In the article ARK (vol. i. p. 149^b) attention was called to the sudden introduction of the 'tent' in the present text of Ex 33⁷ as of something with which the readers of this document—the Pentateuch source E, according to the unanimous verdict of modern scholars—are already familiar. This source, as it left its author's pen, must have contained some account of the construction of the ark, probably from the offerings of the people (33⁹) as in the parallel narrative of P (25¹⁰), and of the tent required for its proper protection. Regarding this tent we are supplied with some interesting information, which may be thus summarized:—(a) Its name was in Heb. 'ôhel mō'ed (33⁷, AV 'the tabernacle of the congregation,' RV 'the tent of meeting'). The true significance of this term will be fully discussed in a subsequent section (§ iii.) (b) Its situation was 'without the camp, afar off from the camp,' recalling the situation of the local sanctuaries of a later period, outside the villages of Canaan (see HIGH PLACE, SANCTUARY). In this position it was pitched, not temporarily or on special occasions only, but, as the tenses of the original demand, throughout the whole period of the desert wanderings (cf. RV v. 7 'Moses used to take the tent and to pitch it,' etc., with AV). Above all, (c) its purpose is clearly stated. It was the spot where Jⁿ, descending in the pillar of cloud which stood at the door of the tent (v. 9, cf. Nu 12⁵, Dt 31¹⁵), 'met his servant Moses and spake unto him face to face as a man speaketh unto his friend' (v. 11). On these occasions Moses received those special revelations of the Divine will which were afterwards communicated to the people. To the tent of meeting, also, every one repaired who had occasion to seek Jⁿ (v. 7), either for an oracle or for purposes of worship. Finally, (d) its aditus was the young Ephraimite Joshua, the son of Nun, who 'departed not out of the tent' (v. 11, cf. Nu 11²⁸), but slept there as the guardian of the ark, as the boy Samuel slept in the sanctuary at Shiloh (1 S 3¹⁰).

The same representation of the tent as pitched without the camp, and as associated with Moses and Joshua in particular, reappears in the narrative of the seventy elders (Nu 11¹⁶, 24-30), and in the incident of Miriam's leprosy (12¹⁵, note esp. v. 4), both derived from E; also in the reference, based upon, if not originally part of, the same source, in Dt 31¹⁴.

The interpretation now given of this important section of the Elohist source is that of almost all recent scholars, including so strenuous an opponent of the Graf-Wellhausen hypothesis as August Dillmann (see his Com. in loc.). Little, therefore, need be said by way of refutation of the views of those who have endeavoured to harmonize this earlier representation with that which dominates the Priestly Code. The only one of these views that can be said to deserve serious consideration is that which sees in the tent of Ex 33⁷ a provisional tent of meeting pending the construction of the tabernacle proper. This interpretation is generally combined with the theory that the tent in question was originally Moses' private tent—an opinion which dates from the time of the Gr. translators (λαβὼν Μωϋσῆς τὴν σκηνὴν αὐτοῦ, etc., so also Pesh.), and has found favour with commentators, from Rashi downwards, including most English expositors. This view is a priori plausible enough, but it falls to pieces before the fact disclosed above, that the same representation of the tent of meeting situated without the camp, with Joshua as its solitary guardian, is found in the Pentateuch, even after the erection of the more splendid tabernacle of the priestly writers. Moreover, there is no hint in the text of Ex 33¹¹ of the temporary nature of the tent; on the contrary, as we have seen, the tenses employed are intended to describe the habitual custom of the Hebrews and their leader during the whole period of the wanderings. The closing verse of the section, finally, proves conclusively that Moses had his abode elsewhere, and only visited the tent when he wished to meet with Jⁿ. At the same time, the preservation of this section of E by the final editor of the Pentateuch, when the preceding account of the construction of the ark (cf. Dt 10¹⁻⁵ with Driver's note) was excised, can hardly be explained otherwise than by the supposition that he regarded the tent of meeting here described as having some such provisional character as this theory presupposes.

During the conquest and settlement, the tent of meeting presumably continued to shelter the ark (which see) until superseded by the more substantial 'temple' of Jⁿ at SHILOH. The picture of this temple (הֵיכָל) with its door and doorposts (1 S 1¹ 3¹⁵) disposes of the late gloss (22^b), based on a similar gloss, Ex 38⁸, which assumes the continued existence of the tent of meeting (see the Comm. in loc.). So, too, Ps 78⁶, which speaks of the sanctuary at Shiloh as a tent and a tabernacle (mishkān), is of too uncertain a date to be placed against the testimony of the earlier historian. In the narrative of the older sources of the Book of Samuel (1 S 4 ff.) there is no mention of any special protection for the ark until we read of the tent pitched for it by David in his new capital on Mt. Zion (2 S 6¹⁷, cf. 1 Ch 18¹), and the phrase 'within curtains,' 2 S 7², 1 Ch 17¹). The later author of 2 S 7², however, evidently thought of the ark as housed continuously from the beginning in a tent. 'I have not dwelt in an house,' Jⁿ is represented as saying, 'since the day that I brought up the children of Israel out of Egypt, even to this day, but have walked in a tent ('ôhel) and in a tabernacle (mishkān),' or, as the text should more probably run, 'from tent to tent, and from tabernacle to tabernacle' (so Klost., Budde, basing on 1 Ch 17²). David's tent was known as 'the tent of Jⁿ' (1 K 2^{28a}). Before it stood the essential accompaniment of every sanctuary, an altar, to which the right of asylum belonged (ib. 1⁵⁰). What the tent may have contained in addition to the sacred ark is unknown, with the exception, incidentally mentioned, of 'the horn of oil,' with the contents of which Zadok the priest anointed the youthful Solomon (ib. 1⁵⁰). A solitary reference to 'the tent of meeting' in a pre-exilic document yet remains, viz. the late gloss 1 K 8⁴, the unhistorical character of which is now admitted (see Kittel, Benzinger, etc., in loc., and cf. Wellh. Proleg. [Eng. tr.] 43 f.).

To sum up our investigation, it may be affirmed that the author of 2 S 7 not only accurately represents the facts of history when he describes the ark as having been moved 'from tent to tent and from tabernacle to tabernacle,' but reflects with equal accuracy the opinion of early times that a simple tent or tabernacle was the appropriate housing for the ancient palladium of the Hebrew tribes. This is confirmed both by the analogy of the practice of other branches of the Semitic race, and by incidental references from the period of religious decadence in Israel, which imply that tent-shrines were familiar objects in connexion with the worship at the high places (2 K 23⁷ RVm, Ezk 16¹⁶; cf. the names Oholibah and Oholibamah, and art. OHOLAH).

ii. THE TABERNACLE OF THE PRIESTLY WRITERS.—The literary sources.—These are almost exclusively from the hand of the authors of the great priestly document of the Pentateuch. This document, as has long been recognized, is not the product of a single pen, or even of a single period.

The results which recent criticism has achieved in disentangling and exhibiting the various strata of the composite literary work denoted by the convenient symbol P, and the grounds on which these results are based, must be sought elsewhere, as, e.g.,—to name only a few accessible in English,—Kuenen, Hexateuch, 72 ff., Driver, LOT 40 ff., the more elaborate tables of the Oxford Hexateuch, i. 235, 261, ii. 138, and the art. EXODUS in vol. i. p. 808 ff., with the table, p. 810^b. Reference may also be made here to the present writer's forthcoming commentary on Exodus in the Internat. Critical Series.

The sections of the Pentateuch dealing with the subject of this art. are the following:—

(1) Ex 25-29, a fairly homogeneous section (but cf. Oxf. Hex. ii. 120) of the main or ground-stock of P (hence the symbol P^a), containing minute directions for the construction of the furniture and fabric of the sanctuary (25-27), followed by instructions relative to the priestly garments (28) and the consecration of Aaron and his sons (29).

(2) Ex 30. 31, a set of instructions supplementary to the foregoing. For their secondary character (hence the symbol P^b) see the authorities cited above and § viii. (c) below.

(3) Ex 35-40, also a fairly homogeneous block of narrative, reproduced in the main verbatim from 25-31 'with the simple substitution of past tenses for future,' but in a systematic order which embodies the contents of 30. 31 in their proper places in the older narrative 25 ff. (see authorities as above). It is therefore younger than either of these sections, hence also P^c. The critical problem is here complicated by the striking divergence of the LXX in form and matter from the MT, to some points of which attention will be called in the sequel.

(4) Nu 33:44-71^a contain various references to the tabernacle and its furniture, which also belong to the secondary strata of P (see NUMBERS, vol. iii. p. 568). To these sources have to be added the description of the temple of Solomon in 1 K 6 ff. and the sketch of Ezekiel's temple (Ezk 40 ff.), which disclose some remarkable analogies to the tabernacle. The references to the latter in the Bks. of Chronicles are of value, as showing how completely the later Heb. literature is dominated by the conceptions of the Priestly Code. Outside the Canon of the OT, the most important sources are the sections of Josephus' Antiquities which deal with the tabernacle (III. vi.), Philo's De Vita Moysis (ed. Mangey, vol. ii. p. 145 ff., Bohn's tr. iii. 98 ff.), and the 3rd cent. treatise, containing a systematic presentation of the views of the Jewish authorities, בריתא וכלה הכשר (ed. Flesch, Die Baraita von der Herstellung der Stiftshütte; Eng. tr. by Barclay, The Talmud, 334 ff.). The Epistle to the Hebrews, finally, supplies us with the first Christian interpretation of the tabernacle (§ xiii.).

iii. THE NOMENCLATURE OF THE TABERNACLE.*

—(a) In our oldest sources the sacred tent receives, as we have seen, the special designation (1) אהל מועד (Ex 33, Nu 11¹⁸ 12^a, Dt 31¹⁴, all most probably from E). This designation is also found about 130 times in the priestly sections of the Hexateuch.

The verb עָרַב (ער) from which מועד is derived signifies 'to appoint a time or place of meeting,' in the Niphal 'to meet by appointment' (often in P). Hence אהל מועד—as the name is understood by P, at least—signifies 'the tent of meeting' (so RV) or 'tent of trust' (OT/C² 246), the spot which J^a has appointed to meet or hold tryst with Moses and with Israel. As this meeting is mainly for the purpose of speaking with them (Ex 29:32 33¹¹, Nu 7:9 etc.), of declaring His will to them, the expression 'tent of meeting' is practically equivalent to 'tent of revelation' (Driver, Deut. 339, following Ewald's 'Offenbarungstelt'). It has lately been suggested that behind this lies a more primitive meaning. From the fact that one of the functions of the Babylonian priesthood was to determine the proper time (ādanu, from the same root as mō'ed) for an undertaking, Zimmern has suggested that the expression אהל מועד may originally have denoted 'the tent where the proper time for an undertaking was determined,' in other words, 'tent of the oracle' (Orakelzelt). See Zimmern, Beiträge zur Kenntnis d. bab. Religion, p. 88 n. 2 (cf. Haupt, JBL, 1900, p. 52). Still another view of P's use of the term מועד has recently been suggested (Meinhold, Die Lade Jahves, 1900, p. 31.). P, according to Meinhold, intends to give to the older term אהל מועד of E the same significance as his own קִדְשֹׁתוֹ אהל 'tent of the testimony' (see No. 10 below), by giving to the Niphal of עָרַב ('make known,' 'reveal one's self,' as above) the sense of עָרַב 'to testify of one's self.' The LXX, therefore, according to this scholar, was perfectly justified in rendering both the above designations by σκήνη τοῦ μαρτυρίου (see below). The rendering of AV 'tabernacle of the congregation' is based on a mistaken interpretation of the word mō'ed, as if synonymous with the cognate מָוֶה.

(2) The simple expression 'the tent' (הַתֵּן) is found in P 19 times (Ex 26:11 etc.). We have already (§ i.) met with the title (3) 'the tent of J^a' (1 K 23:3). To these may be added (4) 'the house of the tent' (1 Ch 9:23), and (5) 'the house of J^a' (Ex 23:19).

(b) In addition to the older 'tent of meeting' a new and characteristic designation is used extensively in P, viz. (6) מִשְׁכָּן mishkân (about 100 times in the Hex.), 'the place where J^a dwells' (מָוֶה), 'dwelling,' 'habitation' (so Tindale); by AV rendered equally with אהל 'tabernacle' (but 1 Ch 6:32 'dwelling-place'). A marked ambiguity, however, attaches to P's use of this term. On its first occurrence (Ex 25:9) it manifestly denotes the whole fabric of the tabernacle, and so frequently. It is thus equivalent to the fuller (7) 'dwelling' (EV 'tabernacle') of J^a found in Lv 17:4 (here § i.), Nu 16:26 etc., 1 Ch 16:29 21:9, and to 'the dwelling of the testimony' (No. 11 below). In other passages it denotes the tapestry curtains with their supporting frames which constitute 'the dwelling' par excellence (EV etc.), and so expressly in the designation (8) 'dwelling' (EV 'tabernacle') of the tent of meeting (Ex 39:32 40:2 etc., 1 Ch 6:32). In the passages just cited and in some others where the ohel and the mishkân are clearly distinguished (e.g. Ex 35:11 39:40 40:7, Nu 3:22 9:12), the AV has rendered the former by 'tent' and the latter by 'tabernacle,' a distinction now consistently carried through by RV. In 1 Ch 6:48 [MT 33] we have (9) 'the dwelling of the house of God.'

(c) Also peculiar to P and the later writers influenced by him is the designation (10) אהל הַתְּעֻדָּה (Nu 9:15 etc., 2 Ch 24:6, RV throughout 'tent of the testimony'; so AV in Nu 9:15, but elsewhere 'the tabernacle of witness'). The tabernacle was so called as containing 'the ark of the testimony' (see § ix.). Hence too the parallel designation (11) קִדְשֹׁתוֹ אהל (Ex 38:21, Nu 1:50 etc., EV 'tabernacle of [the] testimony').

(d) In addition to these we find the more general term (12) קִדְשֹׁתוֹ 'holy place or sanctuary,' applied to the tabernacle (Ex 25:9 and often; in the Law of Holiness (Lv 17 ff.) almost exclusively).

Passing to the versions that have influenced our own, we find as regards the LXX a uniformity greater even than in our AV. Owing to the confusion of מִשְׁכָּן and אהל (both = σκήνη) on the one hand, and of מָוֶה and מָוֶה on the other (but cf. Meinhold, op. cit. 31.), we have the all but universal rendering σκήνη τοῦ μαρτυρίου, 'the tent of the testimony,' to represent (1), (8), (10), and (11) above. This, along with the simple σκήνη, is the NT designation (Ac 7:44 AV 'tabernacle of witness,' Rev 15:5 AV 'tabernacle of the testimony'). In Wis 9:8, Sir 24:10 we have a new title (13) 'the sacred tent' (σκήνη ἁγία, with which cf. the lōk ṣanctus of the Carthaginian camp, Diod. Sic. ix. 65). The Old Lat. and Vulg. follow the LXX with the rendering tabernaculum and tab. testimonii, though frequently also (habitually in Numbers, Westcott, Ep. to the Hebrews, 234 t.) tab. federis, the latter based on the designation of the ark as the 'ark of the covenant' (see § ix.). As to the older Eng. VSS, finally, those of Hereford and Purvey follow the Vulg. closely with 'tab. of witness, witnessynge, testimonye,' and 'tab. of the bond of pees (t. federis). Tindale on the other hand follows LXX with the rendering 'tab. of witness' for (1) and (10), but then again he restores the distinction between ohel and mishkân by rendering the latter 'habitation,' except in the case of (7), 'the dwelling-place of the Lorde.' Coverdale in the main follows Tindale. It is to be regretted that this distinction was obliterated in the later versions.

iv. THE UNDERLYING CONCEPTION OF THE TABERNACLE-SANCTUARY.—Nature and gradation of the materials employed in its construction.—

In Ezekiel's great picture of the ideal Israel of the Restoration (Ezk 40 ff.) 'the ruling conception is that of J^a dwelling in visible glory in his sanctuary in the midst of his people.' The prophet's one aim is to help forward the realization of the earlier promise of J^a: 'My dwelling (mishkân) shall be with them, and I will be their God, and they shall be my people' (37:27). The same grand conception, the same high ideal, took possession of the priestly writers on whom Ezekiel's mantle fell. The foundation on which rests the whole theocratic structure of the Priestly Code is the provision of a sanctuary, which in its fabric, in its personnel, and in all its appointments, shall be for future ages the ideal of a fit dwelling for J', the holy covenant God of the community of Israel, once again restored to His favour. That this is the point of view from which to approach our study of the tabernacle of the priestly writers is placed beyond question, not only by the characteristic designation of the tabernacle proper as the mishkân or dwelling (see above, § iii.), but by the express statement at the opening of the legislative section: 'Let them make me a sanctuary, that I may dwell among them' (Ex 25⁸, cf. 29¹⁵).

* Cf. the suggestive note on the various designations of the tabernacle with the inferences therefrom in Oxf. Hex. ii. 120; also Klostermann in the Neue kirchliche Zeitsch. 1897, 238 ff.; Westcott, Hebrews, 234 ff.

* The authors of the Oxford Hexateuch call attention to 'the curious fact that in Ex 25-27 the sanctuary is always called the "dwelling" [mishkân], while in 28. 29 this name is replaced by the older term "tent of meeting." . . . The title "dwelling" is, of course, freely used in the great repetition, Ex 35-40, but the main portions of the Priestly Law in Leviticus ignore it' (ii. 120, where see for suggested explanation).

Such a dwelling could only be one reared in accordance with the revealed will of J' Himself. Moses, accordingly—according to the representation of P—is summoned to meet J' in the cloud that rested on the top of Mt. Sinai, soon after the arrival there of the children of Israel (Ex 24^{16a}). The command is given to summon the Israelites to make voluntary offerings of the materials necessary for the construction of the sanctuary. A pattern or model of this dwelling and of all its furniture is shown to Moses, who is at the same time instructed in every detail by J' Himself (Ex 25⁹⁻⁹ [P²] = 35⁴⁻²⁰ [P²], cf. 38²¹⁻³¹). In the later strata of P we find the call of Bezalel (so RV), the son of Uri, and his endowment by J' as constructor-in-chief, assisted by Oholiab (AV Aholiab), the son of Ahisamach (31¹⁻¹¹ = 35³⁰⁻³⁶ 38^{22a}).

A list of the materials employed is succinctly given at the head of each section (25^{32c} = 35^{4a}). Of these the three great metals of antiquity, bronze (see BRASS), silver, and gold, are used in a significant gradation as we proceed from the outer court to the innermost sanctuary. Of the last-named, two varieties are employed—the ordinary gold of commerce, and a superior quality in which the pure metal was more completely separated from its native alloys, hence known as refined or 'pure' gold (קֹהֵל קֹהֵל). As to the technical treatment of the metals, we find various methods employed. They might be used in plain blocks or slabs, as for the bases of pillars and for the mercy-seat; or they might be beaten into plates (Nu 17³ [Heb. 16²³]) and sheets (Ex 39³) for the sheathing of large surfaces, like the great altar, the frames (but see § vii. (b)), and most of the furniture. The most artistic work is the hammered or repoussé work in gold, of which the cherubim and the candlestick are examples.*

The wood used throughout was that of the tree named שִׁטָּה (AV 'shittim wood,' RV 'acacia wood'), now usually identified with the Acacia seyal or A. nilotica (see, further, SHITTAH). Its wood is noted for its durability (cf. LXX rendering ξύλα ἀσκηπτα). We come next to a graduated series of products of the loom. At the bottom of the scale we have the simple shēsh (שֶׁשׁ). This material has been variously identified with linen, cotton, and a mixture of both. The history of the textile fabrics of antiquity favours linen (see LINEN, and Dillmann's elaborate note, Exod.-Levit. 305 ff.). A superior quality of it was termed 'fine twined linen' (רָשָׁת שֶׁשׁ), spun from yarn of which each thread was composed of many delicate strands. When dyed with the costly Phœnician dyes, both yarn and cloth received the names of the dyes, 'blue, purple, and scarlet' (25⁴ etc.). The first two represent different shades of purple (see COLOURS), and may be conveniently rendered by 'violet' and 'purple' respectively. The spinning of the yarn was the work of the women, the weaving of it the work of the men (35²²⁻²⁵, cf. 39²). Among the latter a clear distinction is drawn between the ordinary weaver and the more artistic rōkēm and hōshēb, who represent respectively the two forms of textile artistry practised from time immemorial in the East—embroidery and tapestry. The rōkēm or embroiderer (so RV) received the web, complete in warp and weft, from the loom, and worked his figures in colours upon it with the needle. The hōshēb (lit. 'inventor,' 'artist,' as 31⁴; EV 'cunning workman'), on the other hand, worked at the loom, weaving with 'violet, purple, and scarlet' yarn (cf. LXX 28⁸ ἐργον ὑφαντὸν ποικίλου) his figures into the warp, and producing the tapestry for which the East has always been famed. A gradation from without inwards, similar to that in the application of the metals, will meet us in the employment of these varied products of the loom.

v. THE GENERAL ARRANGEMENT AND SYMMETRY OF THE SANCTUARY.—The Court of the Dwelling (Ex 27¹⁻¹⁹ [P²] = 38⁸⁻²⁰ [P²]; cf. Josephus, Ant. iii. vi. 2).—Once again we must start from Ezekiel. For the realization of his great ideal, Ezekiel places his new temple in the centre of a square tract of country, 25,000 cubits in the side, 'a holy portion of the land' (Ezk 45^{1a}, 48^{8a}). Within this area is a still more sacred precinct, the property of the priests alone, who thus surround the temple on every side to guard it from possible profanation. The same idea of the unapproachable sanctity of the wilderness 'dwelling' is emphasized by P through his well-known symmetrical arrangement of the camp of the Israelites. Around four sides of a huge square the tents are pitched, three tribes on each side (Nu 2^{1a}, 10^{12a}). Within this square is another, the sides of which are occupied by the priests and the three divisions of the Levites, the sons of Gershon, Kohath, and Merari (Nu 3^{22a}). In the centre of this second square, finally, we find the sacred enclosure (τέμενος) which constitutes the wilderness sanctuary. This enclosure is the 'court of the dwelling' (קֹדֶשׁ הַדְּוֶלֶת 27¹, αὐλὴ τῆς σκηνῆς, atrium tabernaculi), a rectangular space, lying east and west, 100 cubits* in length by 50 in breadth (proportion 2:1)—in other words, a space made up of two squares, each 50 cubits in the side. At this point it will help us to overcome subsequent difficulties if we look more closely at the proportions of the sanctuary as a whole, as revealed by the accompanying diagram. Beginning with the eastern square we note as its most prominent feature the altar of burnt-offering, lying 'four square' (5 cubits by 5) presumably at the intersection of the diagonals. In the western square stands 'the dwelling,' occupying three of the small plotted squares, of 10 cubits each way, its length being to its breadth in the proportion of 3:1. Like the temples of Solomon and Ezekiel, it consists of two parts, the outer and inner sanctuary, in the proportion of 2:1. The latter is the true sanctuary, the special abode of J', a perfect cube, as we shall afterwards see, each dimension one-half of the inner shrine of the Solomonic temple. It stands exactly in the centre of its square, while its own centre in turn is occupied by the most sacred of all the objects in the sanctuary, the ark, the throne of J', the dimensions of which, we shall find, are 5×3×3 half-cubits. These data are meanwhile sufficient to prove P's love for 'order, measure, number

* No account is taken here of the quantities of these metals provided for the tabernacle, for the passage Ex 38²⁴⁻³¹ was long ago recognized (Popper, Der bibl. Bericht über die Stiftshütte, 1862) as a late insertion in a late context. This is evident from the one fact alone that the silver, which provided, inter alia, for the sockets or bases at a talent each, is thought to be the produce of the poll-tax of half a shekel, which was not instituted till some time after the tabernacle had been set up (cf. Nu 11 with Ex 40¹).

* The length of P's cubit is uncertain. For convenience of reckoning it may be taken as 18 inches.

and system,' which has long been recognized as one of his most prominent characteristics. From the first section of Genesis (1¹⁻²⁹) onwards, with its arrangement by 10 and 7 and 3 (see art. NUMBER, vol. iii. p. 565*), his genealogies, his chronology, his theory of the religious development of Israel, are all constructed on a definite system.* Nowhere is this fondness for symmetry and proportion so evident as in the measurements of the tabernacle. Three, four, seven, ten, their parts and multiples, dominate the whole (see further, § xiii.). The desire to preserve the proportion and ratio of certain parts and measurements has led to awkwardness and even inconsistency in other parts—a fact which lies at the root of not a few of the difficulties that beset the path of those that attempt to construct the tabernacle from the data of the priestly writers.

The court of the tabernacle is screened off from the rest of the encampment by five white curtains (סָרִיס selā'im) of 'fine twined linen' of the uniform height of 5 cubits, but of varying length. Those on the N. and S. long sides measure each 100 cubits, that on the W. 50, while the two remaining curtains of 15 cubits each screen off the E. side, one on either hand of the entrance to the court. The latter is a space of 20 cubits, which is closed by a hanging or portière (קֹפֶת) of the second grade of workmanship explained above, i.e. embroidered in colours on a white ground. All six hangings are suspended from pillars of the same height, standing on bases (יָסֵד, EV 'sockets') of bronze. The shape and size of these bases can only be conjectured. Elsewhere in OT (Ca 5¹⁵, Job 38⁶, and corrected text of Ezk 41²²) יָסֵד is the base in the shape of a square plinth on which a pillar or an altar stands. So most probably in the case before us, the wooden pillar being sunk well into the plinth (so the Baraita), which would thus be reckoned to the height of the pillar. The pillars were then kept in position by means of the usual 'cords'† or stays (סָרִיס) fastened to pegs or 'pins' (חֹתָם) of bronze stuck in the ground. This seems preferable to the view first suggested by Josephus that the bases ended in spikes (σκαυρῆδες) like that by which the butt-end of a spear was stuck in the ground—a method scarcely in place in the sand of the desert. According to P³ (38¹⁷), the pillars had capitals (EV 'chapters') overlaid with silver. Further, 'the hooks or pegs (סָרִיס) of the pillars and their fillets (סָרִיסִים) shall be of silver' (27^{10c}, but 38¹⁹ makes the latter only overlaid with silver). The word rendered 'fillet' probably signifies a band or necking of silver (Ew., Dill. et al.) at the base of the capital, rather than, as is more generally supposed, silver rods connecting the pillars. And this for three reasons: (1) only on this view is the phrase 'filleted with silver' (27¹⁷) intelligible; (2) no mention is made of any such connecting-rods in the minute directions for the transport of the tabernacle furniture (Nu 4); and (3) the screen and veil of the tabernacle proper (§ vii. c) were evidently attached to their pillars by hooks.

At this point we encounter our first difficulty. How are the pillars placed, on what principle are they reckoned (27^{10c})? Ezekiel begins the description of his outer court with the wall 'round about' (40⁵). P does likewise, only his curtain-wall is like a mathematical line, having length without breadth. It is as though the writer were working from a ground-plan like our diagram. The periphery of the court measures 300 cubits. This and no more is the length of his six curtains. Not even in the case of the entrance portière is allowance made for folds*—the first hint that we are dealing with an ideal, not an actual, construction. The pillars must be thought of as standing inside the curtains, otherwise they would not belong to the sanctuary at all. The principle on which they are reckoned is clear. It is that one pillar, and one only, is assigned to every five cubits of curtain. Now, a curtain of 20 cubits' length, like the entrance screen, requires not four, which is the number assigned to it, but five pillars; and on the same principle each of the two smaller curtains on either side of it requires four pillars, not three, and so with the rest. But to have counted twenty-one pillars for the sides, eleven for the end curtain, and 5+4+4 for the front, would have spoiled the symmetry, and so the artificial method of the text is adopted. Counting four for the entrance, as on the diagram, and three for the curtain to the left (vv. 16, 14), we proceed round the court, reckoning always from the first corner pillar met with and counting no pillar twice. It is thus absurd to charge P with miscalculation, as his latest commentator still does (Baentsch, in loc.). But the charge is the price paid for the determination to reckon the pillars on the E. side as only ten in all, arranged symmetrically as 3+4+3 (when there are really eleven), and those of the N. and S. sides as multiples of ten.

vi. THE FURNITURE OF THE COURT.—(a) The altar of burnt-offering, Ex 27¹⁻⁸ = 38¹⁻⁷ [LXX 38²²⁻²⁴].—In the centre of the court, as the symmetry requires, stands 'the altar' (27¹ RV; for the significance of the article see § viii. c) of the sanctuary, also termed more precisely 'the altar of burnt-offering' (30²⁸ 31¹ and oft.), and, from its appearance, 'the altar of bronze,' AV 'brazen altar' (38³⁰ 39³⁰), both sets of passages probably belonging to P³. 'Foursquare' it stands, 5 cubits in length and breadth, and 3 cubits in height, a hollow chest† of acacia wood sheathed with

* Cf. Dillmann, Num.-Josua, 649f., who also considers P to have distinguished four periods of the world's history characterized by the decreasing length of human life in the proportion 8:4:2:1.

† These are first mentioned in P³ (35¹⁸ 'the pins of the courts and their cords,' 39¹⁰ etc.).

* Josephus is quite wrong, therefore, in speaking of the curtains hanging in a 'loose and flowing manner' (l.c.).

† Nothing in the text suggests a mere four-sided frame to be filled with earth, as is usually supposed.

bronze. From the four corners rise the indispensable horns, 'of one piece with it' (RV), the form and significance of which have been much debated. From the representations of similar 'horns' on Assyrian altars (see Perrot and Chipiez, Hist. of Art in Chaldea and Assyria, i. 255 f.), they would appear to have been merely the prolongation upwards of the sides of the altar to a point, for a few inches at each corner. The horns of Ezekiel's altar, e.g., form $\frac{1}{2}$ th of the total height (see 43¹³⁻¹⁷ with Toy's diagram in SBOT). The horns play an important part in the ritual of the priests' consecration (Ex 29¹²), the sin-offering (Lv 4¹⁰), the Day of Atonement (16¹⁸), and elsewhere.* According to a later tradition, the 'beaten plates' of bronze for the

'covering of the altar' were made from the bronze censers of the rebellious company of Korah (Nu 16^{36d}). Round the altar, half-way between top and bottom, ran a projecting 'ledge' (so RV for the obscure כִּנְרֵב, only 27³ 38⁴; AV 'the compass,' etc.), attached to which and reaching to the ground was a grating (RV; AV 'grate,' which see) of bronze. The purpose of these two appendages can only be conjectured (see the Comm. and works cited in the Literature for the numerous conjectures that have been put forward). Considering the height of the altar, at least 4½ feet, one naturally supposes that the ledge was for the priests to stand upon during their ministrations at the altar, and in Lv 9² we actually read of Aaron 'stepping down' from the altar. Together with the grating, it may also have been a device to prevent the ashes, etc., from falling upon and defiling the sacrificial blood, J's peculiar portion, which could still be dashed against the base of the altar through the wide meshes of the network. Four bronze rings were attached to the corners of the grating, presumably where it met the ledge, to receive the poles for carrying the altar. The necessary utensils were also of bronze; they comprised shovels or rakes (סִרְיָה) for collecting the ashes, pots (AV pans) for carrying them away, the large basins for catching the blood of the animals sacrificed, the flesh hooks or forks, and the fire-pans. The fire is to 'be kept burning upon the altar continually, it shall not go out' (Lv 6¹³), which hardly accords with the prescriptions of Lv 17 and Nu 4^{12d}.

The idea underlying this unique structure—a hollow wooden chest with a thin sheathing of bronze, little adapted, one would think, for the purpose it is to serve—is now generally recognized as having originated in the desire to construct a portable altar on the lines of the massive brazen altar of Solomon, which was itself a departure from the true Heb. tradition (Ex 20^{24d}). The account of the making of this altar, which was one-fourth larger in cubic content than the whole tabernacle of P (2 Ch 4¹), has now disappeared from the MT of 1 K 7, but was still read there by the Chronicler (I.c.), and references to it still survive (1 K 8²², 64⁹, 2 K 16^{14c}). Its disappearance is easily accounted for by the fact that its construction appeared to a later age as quite unnecessary, since the 'tent of meeting' and all its vessels, including the bronze altar of this section, were considered to have been transferred by Solomon, along with the ark, to his new temple (1 K 8⁴; see Wellh. Proleg. [Eng. tr.] 44; Stade, ZATW iii. 157 = Akad. Reden, 164; and the Comm.).

* For the special sanctity attaching to the horns see ALTAR (vol. i. p. 77). It is open to grave doubt whether this widespread custom of providing altars with these projections has anything to do with the ox or calf symbolism (see CALF [GOLDEN], vol. i. p. 342), as Stade and others suppose. 'Horn' is rather a popular metaphor for the more correct קַרְנֵי of Ezekiel (41²²; cf. Josephus' phrase cornua separanda), and their ultimate raison d'être is probably to be sought in the same primitive circle of thought as ascribed a special sanctity to the four corners of a robe (see FRINGS, vol. ii. p. 60*). Another view is suggested by RS² 436, Baentsch (Com. in loc.).

(b) The Laver (Ex 30¹⁷⁻²¹, cf. 38⁸ [LXX 38²⁵]).—Between the altar above described and the tabernacle stood the laver of bronze (כִּיֹּר, loutrhp), to the description of which only a few words are devoted, and these few are found not in the main body of P, but in a section (30. 31) bearing internal evidence of a later origin (see § ii., and more fully § viii. (c)). Beyond the fact that it was a large basin of bronze, and stood upon a base of the same material, we know nothing of its workmanship or ornamentation. It served to hold the water required for the ablutions of the priests in the course of their ministrations, and is frequently mentioned in the secondary strata of the priestly legislation (30²⁸ 31⁹ etc.; it is omitted, however, from the directions for the march in Nu 4). A curious tradition grew up at some still later period, to the effect that the laver was made of the bronze 'mirrors of the serving-women which served at the door of the tent of meeting' (38⁸, cf. 1 S 2²²). The latter, needless to say, was not yet in existence. The temple of Solomon had ten lavers of elaborate construction (see LAVER), the second temple apparently had only one (Sir 50³).

vii. THE TABERNACLE PROPER—(a) The Curtains of the Dwelling and the Tent, the outer coverings (Ex 26¹⁻¹⁴ = 36⁸⁻¹⁹ [LXX 37¹]; Jos. Ant. iii. vi. 4 [ed. Niese, § 130 ff.]).—Probably no section of the OT of equal length is responsible for so large a number of divergent interpretations as the chapters now before us. It is clearly impossible within the limits of this article to refer to more than a very few of these interpretations, even of those associated with scholars of repute. What follows is the result of an independent study of the original in the light of the recognized principles underlying the scheme of the wilderness sanctuary as conceived by the priestly writers (see § i.). Fuller justification of the writer's position with regard to the many matters of controversy that emerge will be found in his commentary on Exodus (Internat. Crit. series).

Now, on the very threshold of our study of Ex 26, we meet with a clear statement, the far-reaching significance of which has been overlooked by most of those who have written on this subject. It is contained in these few words: 'Thou shalt make the dwelling (יִשְׁכָּנוֹ, EV 'tabernacle') of ten curtains' (26¹). To this fact we must hold fast through all our discussion as to the measurements and arrangements of the tabernacle. It is the curtains, not the so-called 'boards,' that constitute the dwelling of J'. The full bearing of this fact will appear as we proceed. The walls of the true dwelling, then, are to consist, on three sides at least, of ten curtains of beautiful Oriental tapestry, full of figures of the mystic cherubim, woven in colours of the richest dyes, violet, purple, and scarlet (see § iv.). The curtains form, as it were, the throne-room of J'. It is therefore appropriate that the mysterious beings that minister around His heavenly throne should be represented in J's presence-chamber upon earth (see, further, § ix. for cherubim upon the mercy-seat). The curtains measure each 28×4 cubits (7:1), and are sewed together in two sets of five. Along one long side of either set are sewed fifty loops (נֶחֱלָב) made of violet thread. By means of an equal number of gold clasps (סָרָסָר, RV; AV 'taches') the two hangings are coupled together to form one large covering, $40 (4 \times 10)$ cubits in length by 28 c. in breadth, for 'the dwelling shall be one' (26⁶).

For a tent (בֵּית) over the dwelling (v.7), eleven curtains are to be woven of material usually employed for the Eastern tent (see CURTAINS), viz. goats' hair, and, to ensure that the dwelling shall be completely covered by them, they are each to be 30 cubits in length by 4 in breadth. These are to be sewed together to form two sets of five and six curtains respectively, coupled together as before by loops and clasps; the latter, in this case, of bronze, and forming one large surface (44×30 cubits), that the tent also 'may be one' (v.11). Thus far there is no difficulty such as emerges in the verses (v.12¹) that follow, and will be considered later (§ vii. (c)).

As the dwelling is to be covered by the tent, so the tent in its turn is to receive two protecting coverings, the dimensions of which are not given. Immediately above it is to be a covering of 'rams' skins dyed red' (סָרָסָר, ῥομβοδανωμένα). The dye employed is not the costly Phœnician scarlet or crimson dye previously met with (obtained from the coccus ilicis, see COLOURS, vol. i. p. 457 f.), but, as the Gr. rendering suggests, madder (ἐρυθρὸν δανόν, rubia tinctoria), a vegetable dye.* The outermost covering is formed of the skins of an obscure animal (סָרָסָר, AV 'badger,' RV 'seal,' RVM 'porpoise'), now most frequently identified with the dugong, a seal-like mammal found in the Red Sea (see note with illustration in Toy's 'Ezekiel' [SBOT], p. 124).

At this point in P's statement, one naturally expects him to proceed to give directions for the pitching of this fourfold tent and for the preparation of the necessary poles, ropes, and pegs. There is thus every a priori probability in favour of the theory of the tabernacle associated in this country with the name of Mr. Fergusson, that the four sets of coverings now described were in reality intended by the author to be suspended by means of a ridge-pole or otherwise over the wooden framework about to be described. But it is inconceivable that so radical a part of the construction as the provision of a ridge-pole and its accompaniments should have been passed over in silence in the text of P. (For this theory see Fergusson's art. 'Temple' in Smith's DB; the Speaker's Commentary, i. 374 ff.; more recently, and in greatest detail, by Schick, Die Stiftshütte, der Tempel, etc.). On the contrary, P's wilderness sanctuary is to combine with certain features of a nomad's tent others suggestive or reminiscent of the temples of a sessile population. In short, as Josephus puts it, the finished structure is to 'differ in no respect from a movable and ambulatory temple' (Ant. III. vi. 1 [Niese, § 103]).

(b) The wooden framework of the Dwelling (Ex 26¹⁵⁻³⁰ = 36²⁰⁻³⁴ [LXX 38¹⁸⁻²¹]; Jos. Ant. I. c. 116 ff.). — The right understanding of this important part of the dwelling, by which it is to be transformed into a portable temple, depends on our interpretation of the opening verses of the section (vv. 15-17). Literally rendered they run thus: 'And thou shalt make the kērāshim† for the dwelling of acacia wood, standing up—10 cubits the length of the single * kērēsh, and a cubit and a half the breadth of the single kērēsh—2 yādōth† for the single kērēsh, mēshullābōth‡ to each other.' Here everything depends on the three more or less obscure technical terms of the Heb. arts and crafts given in transliteration. The true exegetical tradition, we are convinced, had been lost, as was the case with the still more complicated description of Solomon's brazen lavers (1 K 7^{27a}), until the key was discovered by Stade and published in his classical essay (ZATW iii. (1883) 129 ff. = Akad. Reden, 145 ff., corrected in details ZATW xxi. (1901) 145 ff.). The Jewish tradition, as we find it first in Josephus (I. c.) and in the Baraita, has held the field to the present day. According to these authorities the kērāshim were great columns or beams of wood 15 ft. high, 2 ft. 3 in. wide, and—by a calculation to be tested in due time—1 ft. 6 in. thick, i.e. $10 \times 1\frac{1}{2} \times 1$ cubits. The yādōth were pins or tenons (Jos. στροφιγγες, 'pivots') by which the beams were inserted into mortices in the silver sockets or bases. Forty-eight of these beams were placed side by side to form the three walls (S.W. and N.) of the tabernacle, the eastern end or entrance being formed by a screen (for details and refl. see below). This interpretation, with numerous modifications in detail, particularly as regards the thickness of the so-called 'boards,' § has been adopted by every previous writer without exception.

We now proceed to test the value of this tradition. The avowed intention of P, it is admitted on all hands, is to construct 'a movable and ambulatory temple' for the desert marches. Could anything be more absurd than to begin by constructing enormous logs of wood, each with a cubic content—on the most usual computation of 1 cubit of thickness—of about 50 cubic feet, each weighing, according to a recent calculation (Brown, *The Tabernacle, 1899, 275), close upon 1 ton, and out of all proportion to the weight they would have to bear? And this quite apart from the open question of the possibility of obtaining beams of such dimensions from the acacia tree of Arabia.¶ Further, how is the fact that the tapestry curtains with their cherubim figures are always called 'the dwelling' to be reconciled with the traditional theory that they were completely hidden from view, except on the roof, by the intervention of the wooden walls? This difficulty has been felt by several writers, who have sought to avoid it by hanging these curtains inside the boards as a lining, thereby doing violence to the clear intention of the text (see below). These considerations by no means exhaust the difficulties presented by the current conception of the tabernacle, as may be seen on any page of the commentaries and special monographs cited in the Literature at the end of this article.

The way is now clear for a fresh examination of the technical terms of vv. 15-17. The first of the three (סָרָסָר) is practically confined to P's account of the tabernacle, for its only other occurrence (Ezk 27⁶) requires light from our passages rather than throws light upon them. The Gr. translators had no clear idea of what the word meant, and were content to render throughout by στύλοι, 'pillars,' a rendering

* So LXX, Pesh. etc.

† EV 'tenons'; LXX ἀγκυρίσματα = 'joints or arms,' but elsewhere μίρον, 'sides.'

‡ RV 'joined'; LXX ἐνέτις/ἐνέτις as in v.3 for סָרָסָר.

§ The familiar rendering 'boards,' adopted by Tindal, goes back to Jerome, who thought of the tabulae, of which the Roman tabernacula were frequently constructed, and from which, indeed, the name is derived.

¶ No use is here made of the argument from Nu 7⁸ compared with 38, four waggons, each drawn by a pair of oxen, for the transport of the 'boards,' bases, pillars, etc., as these passages are probably from a different hand from Ex 26.

* The Heb. name of this dye is כֶּחָל, frequent in the Mishna. In OT it occurs only as a proper name, e.g. the minor judge, Tola ben Puah (Scarlet, the son of Madder! Jg 10¹).

suggested to them by the last word of v.¹⁵, which they apparently read עֲמֻדִים, the ordinary word for 'pillars' (cf. Dillm. in loc.). Passing, therefore, to the second technical term yādōth (v.¹⁷), we find the current text of the LXX responsible for a grave misinterpretation of this verse, by prefixing 'and thou shalt make' to the original text (but AF omit καὶ ποιήσεις). In reality we have here the continuation of v.¹⁵, from which it is separated merely by a parenthesis, as translated above. The yādōth are thus seen not to be something additional to the keresh, but to constitute its main component parts (as indeed may underlie the Gr. rendering μέρη in vv.^{19, 21} and elsewhere). What then is the signification of γ as a technical term in the constructive arts? In 1 K 10¹⁹ = 2 Ch 9¹⁸ yādōth denotes the 'arms' of Solomon's throne, of which ἀγκῶνες is the technically correct equivalent (2 Chron. l.c., see illustration of chair with arms bent at right angles in Rich, Dict. of Antiq. s. 'Ancon'). In 1 K 7^{32, 33}—as Stade (ll. cc.) has conclusively proved from extant ancient models—yādōth is the technical name for the stays or supports (EV 'axletrees') underneath the body or framework of the laver (illustrs. ZATW, 1901, 152, 167), as also for the similar stays projecting from the top of the frame and supporting the stand of the basin (cf. LAVER, vol. iii. p. 64^a). Technically, therefore, like our own 'arm,' and the classical ἀγκών and ancon, γ may denote any arm-like structural element, whether straight or bent, especially if occurring in pairs. This result is strengthened by the phrase that follows, אָרְצֵי אֶל־אֶתֶרָה (v.¹⁷, cf. 36²² and the various renderings in AV and RV). Here again the description of the lavers comes to our aid (1 K 7^{28a}), for the cognate term there employed (אָרְצֵי, with which cf. אֶל־אֶתֶרָה, the rounds or rungs of a ladder in later Heb.) is now universally understood to mean the cross-rails joining the uprights of the frame of the laver. It seems evident, therefore, that the keresh of P must be a frame of wood, such as builders in all countries have employed in the construction of light walls (see Blümner, Technologie, etc. iii. 151, for the paries craticius with its arrectarii and transversarii; cf. our own brick-nogged partitions with their timber 'quarters'). This sense suits Ezk 27⁶ admirably: 'thy panels are of ivory inlaid in boxwood' (see illustr. in Toy, SBOT 150). We may now tr. v.^{15a} thus, taking the parenthesis last: 'And thou shalt make the frames for the dwelling of acacia wood, standing up, two uprights for each frame, joined to each other by cross-rails—10 cubits the height and a cubit and a half the breadth of the single frame.' We now see how it is that a writer so fond of measurements as P has omitted to give the third dimension: a frame has, strictly speaking, no thickness!*

The frames, according to our present text, are to be overlaid with gold; but the position of this instruction (v.²⁹) after the other instructions for the frames have been completed (contrast 25^{11, 24, 30}), the variant tradition of the Gr. of 38^{18a} (περιγυρῶσιν, 'overlaid with silver'), the late origin of the kindred sections in 1 K 6 f. (see TEMPLE), and other considerations, all make it very probable that we have here an addition to the original text, both as regards the frame and bars, and the pillars. Like the pillars of the court, the uprights of the framework are to be sunk in bases of solid silver,—the reason for two bases to each frame being now for the first time apparent,—regarding the shape and size† of which we are equally dependent on conjecture. For reasons that will appear in the next section, we may think of them as square plinths, $\frac{2}{3}$ cubit in the side and a cubit in height, forming a continuous foundation wall round the dwelling, with the uprights sunk well down so that the height of the framework was not materially added to.

To provide the necessary rigidity for the frames, the simple device is adopted of running five wooden bars along the three sides, passing through rings attached to the woodwork of the frames. Much needless discussion has been raised over the expression 'the middle bar in the midst of the boards' (v.²³), which has been taken by various writers to mean that the middle bar of the five is intended to pass from end to end through a hole pierced in the heart of the massive 'boards' of the traditional theory (see diagrams of Riggensbach, Brown, etc.). But the phrase is merely an epithet, after P's well-known manner, explanatory of the bar in question, the distinguishing feature of which is that it runs along the whole length of its side, north, west, south, as the case may be, in contradistinction to the remaining four, which we may presume run only half-way along—one pair at the top, the other pair at the bottom of the frames. This arrangement of the bars suggests that the frames were provided with three cross-rails—one at the top, rounded like the ends of the uprights to avoid injury to the curtains, another in the middle, and a third immediately above the bases. We thus obtain a double row of panels right round the dwelling (see the accompanying illustration with drawings to scale from a specially prepared model).

The difficulties of this section, however, are not yet exhausted. We have still to grapple with the problem of the arrangement of the frames, and in particular with the much debated vv.^{28a}, before we can proceed to discuss the manner in which the curtains were utilized. The discussion of the former problem may best start from the data of 26³, from which we learn that the veil dividing the dwelling into two parts (see next section) is to be hung 20 cubits, the width of 5 curtains, from the front of the dwelling. Now, the admitted symmetry of the whole sanctuary requires us to infer that the area of the outer sanctuary is intended to measure 20 x 10 cubits, and that of the inner sanctuary 10×10 cubits, the measurements in both cases being exactly half those of the corresponding parts of the temples of Solomon and Ezekiel (see TEMPLE). With this agrees the direction of the text, that twenty frames, each $1\frac{1}{2}$ cubits wide, are required for the two long sides, and six for the shorter west side (vv. 18, 20, 22). Now, an easy calculation shows that since the total area of the dwelling from curtain to curtain is 30×10 cubits, and inside width of the short side is only 9 cubits ($1\frac{1}{2} \times 6$), we must allow half a cubit (9 in.) for the thickness of the woodwork of either of the long sides. This would allow 6 in. (two handbreadths) for the thickness of the uprights of the framework and 3 in. (one handbreadth) for that of the bars.

* We may thus claim to have solved what our latest commentator has termed P's 'secret' with regard to v.¹⁷ (Baentech, in loc.; cf. Holzinger, who gives up the verse in despair). Riehm had previously tried to solve the problem by taking the text to mean that each board consisted of two pieces mortised together by means of the yādōth (*HWB*³, art. 'Stiftshütte', 1579 f.). Jerome's interpretation is evidently borrowed from the Rabbis, some of whom thought that the yādōth joined one board to another (Fleisch, Baraita, 51 f.).

The assumption of the majority of previous writers, from the Baraita to Baentsch, that the measurement, 30×10 cubits, gives the clear inside area of the tabernacle as formed by the wooden 'boards,' implying on the cubit of thickness theory (see above) an outside measurement of 31×12 cubits, falls to the ground if the view here advocated of the true nature of the 'boards' is accepted. But, even with the traditional interpretation, the theory of inside measurements is absolutely inadmissible. (1) The true walls of P's dwelling are, as we have already emphasized, the tapestry curtains, precisely as the linen hangings are the walls of the court (§ v.). The framework here takes the place of the pillars round the court, and, fore one of the projecting bastions (2 Ch 26⁹, Neh 3³⁴) which guarded the wall at important changes in its course. We conclude from these data that the word in the passage before us must denote something of the nature of a projecting buttress at the two western corners of the wooden framework. V. 24 has been the despair of many generations of students, and is almost certainly corrupt. If with most modern scholars we read עֲצֵי (twins) in both clauses, it seems to imply that these corner frames shall be made 'double,' i.e. consist of two ordinary frames braced together for the sake of strength; further, that each is intended to form a buttress sloping upwards and terminating short of the top of the framework, at 'the first' or topmost 'ring' (see RVm), that is, underneath the top bar of the west side (see illustration). In any case, three purposes are apparently served by these corner buttresses. They supply additional strength at the two weakest parts of the framework—the points of meeting of the two long walls with the west wall; they take up the folds of the curtains at these two corners, and—we do not hesitate to add—they raise the number of the frames to a multiple of four (48, so many were the pillars in Solomon's temple accord-like these, must be treated as une quantité négligeable where proportions are concerned. (2) All P's other measurements are outside measurements, as in the altar of burnt-offering, the ark, etc. (3) Only on the supposition that the entire fabric of the tabernacle covered a space 30×10 cubits is the true proportion (3:1) of the structure and the complete symmetry of the western square maintained. It is absolutely necessary from P's standpoint that the perfect cube of the Most Holy Place shall be entirely contained within the centre square of its own court (see diagram). With an inside area of 30×10 , requiring on the traditional hypothesis an outside measurement of 31×12 , the symmetry of the whole sanctuary is ruined.

We are now prepared to take up the problem of the two frames described with tantalizing obscurity in the difficult verses 22, 23-25.* These two frames are expressly stated to be 'for the מַסְכֵּה of the dwelling in the hinder part.' What, now, is the meaning of this rare word? The key, we believe, will be found in Ezekiel's presumably technical use of it to denote the projecting corners, popularly known as 'horns,' of his altar of shewbread (41², see for these § vi. above; and cf., besides the Assyrian altars, the plan of a Phœnician sanctuary in Pietschmann's Geschichte der Phœnizier, 200 f.). It is used by later writers to indicate a part of the wall of Jerusalem akin to, yet distinct from, קֵרן 'a corner,' apparently there-ing to the Gr. of 1 K 7⁴⁰), and the number of the bases required for the dwelling to a multiple of ten (100, see next section).

(c) The arrangement of the Curtains of the Dwelling and the Tent. The divisions of the Dwelling. The Screen and the Veil (Ex 26¹⁻¹², 31-33, 36^f, and parallels).—In the secondary stratum of P (40¹⁷) we read how 'the tabernacle was reared up' by Moses. First he put down its bases, then he placed its frames, put in its bars, and 'reared up its pillars.' Thereafter 'he spread the tent over the dwelling, and placed the covering of the tent above upon it.' Here the tapestry and hair curtains are strangely enough together named 'the tent,' and the two outer coverings similarly taken as one.* Now it is worth noting (1) that Moses is said to have 'spread' the curtains over the dwelling, the same word (סָרַף) being used as is employed of wrapping up the sacred furniture for transport (Nu 4⁶, § xi.); and (2) that neither here nor elsewhere is the ordinary word for erecting or pitching a tent (נָחַף) applied to the tabernacle, as it is to the old 'tent of meeting' (33⁷) and to David's tent for the ark (2 S 6¹⁷, see § i.). This fact of itself tells against the view, noted above, that the curtains were stretched tent-wise above the dwelling, and in favour of the usual conception, that they were spread over the framework 'as a pall is thrown over a coffin.' The tapestry curtains measuring 40 cubits from front to back and 28 cubits across (§ vii. (a)) thus constitute the dwelling, the centre portion (30 × 10 cubits) forming the roof and the remainder the three sides. On the long sides it hung down 9 cubits till it met, as we may conjecture, the silver bases of the framework, which made up the remaining cubit (so the authorities of the Baraita (Flesch, 50); cf. Philo, op. cit. ii. 148, who no doubt gives the true reason of the vacant cubit, 'that the curtain might not be dragged,' and Jos. Ant. III. vi. 4 [Niese, § 130]). At the back, however, where 10 cubits (40-30) were left over, the last cubit would have to be folded along the projecting base, one of the results of requiring the total length to be another multiple of ten (40 cubits instead of 39). A striking confirmation of the signification here assigned to the kérashim is now brought to light. Instead of nearly two-thirds of the 'all-beautiful and most holy curtain' (πάγκαλον καὶ ἱεροπρεπὲς ὄφασμα, Philo, l.c.) being hidden from view by the so-called 'boards,' the whole extent of the curtain is now disclosed, with, we may fairly conjecture, a double row of the mystic invoven cherubim filling the panels of the framework, just as they filled the wainscot panels with which the temples of Solomon and Ezekiel were lined (1 K 6²⁸, Ezk 41¹⁸).^{*} The view of Bähr, Neumann, Keil, Holzinger, and others (see Literature), that these curtains were suspended, by some method unknown to the text, inside the framework,—in their case the gold-sheathed walls,—has been already disposed of (vii. (b)).

Over the tapestry curtain was spread in like manner the curtain of goats' hair, the 'tent' of P^r. Our present text (vv. 9¹²), however, presents an insurmountable difficulty in the arrangement of these curtains. To cover the dwelling, and that completely, they required to be only 40 × 30 cubits. But even when the sixth curtain of the one set is doubled, as required by v. 9¹², a total length of 42 cubits remains. The explanation usually given, which indeed is required by v. 12, is that 'the half curtain that remaineth' must have been stretched out by ropes and pegs behind the dwelling; an assumption which is at variance with the arrangement at the other sides, and which leaves the sacred tapestry curtain exposed to view. The only remedy is to regard v. 12¹² as a gloss, as Holzinger does (Kurzer Hdbch. in loc.), from the pen of a reader who misunderstood v. 9¹². Taken by itself, this half-verse plainly directs that the sixth curtain shall be doubled 'in the forefront of the dwelling'; that is, not, as Dillm. and other commentators maintain, laid double across the easternmost tapestry half-curtain, but—as already advocated in the Baraita, p. 58—hanging doubled over the edge of the latter, covering the pillars at the door of the tabernacle and entirely excluding the light of day. This secures that the dwelling shall be in perfect darkness. This is not secured on the ordinary supposition that the edges of both curtains were flush with each other, for the screen could not possibly be so adjusted as to completely exclude the light. The objection, of which so much is made by Riggenbach, etc., that the joinings of the two sets of curtains would thus coincide and moisture be admitted, is utterly invalid when we recall the two heavy and impervious coverings that overlay the two inner sets of curtains. In this way, then, we find that the goats' hair curtains exactly fitted the dwelling on all three sides, covering the tapestry and the bases as well, and, in Josephus' words, 'extending loosely to the ground.' They were doubtless fixed thereto by means of the bronze pins of the dwelling (27¹⁰ P^r, which makes no mention of cords), precisely as the Kiswa or covering of the Kaaba at Mecca is secured by metal rings at the base of the latter (Hughes, Dict. of Islam, s.v.).^{*}

Two items still remain to complete the fabric of the dwelling, viz. the screen and the veil. The former (צָרֶף, RV 'screen,' AV 'hanging') was a portière of the same material as the portière of the court, closing the dwelling on the east side. It was hung by means of gold hooks or pegs from five pillars of acacia wood standing on bases of bronze (26³⁶, 37¹¹. [LXX 37¹¹]), a detail which marks them out as pertaining to the court rather than to the dwelling, the bases of which are of silver. Like the rest of the woodwork, they were probably left unadorned in the original text, for the text of P^r (36³⁶, cf. Gr. of 26³⁷) speaks only of the capitals being overlaid with gold, a later hand, as in 1 K 6 f., heightening the magnificence of the tabernacle by sheathing the whole pillars (26³⁷).

At a distance of 20 cubits† from the entrance screen was hung another of the same beautiful tapestry as the curtains (v. 31), depending from four pillars 'overlaid with gold,' and standing, like the framework, on bases of silver (v. 34). This second screen is termed the pārōketh (פָּרוֹכֶת, AV 'vail,' RV 'veil'; LXX καταπέτασμα, cf. He 9³ 'the second veil' as distinguished from the veil or screen just mentioned). By means of 'the veil' the dwelling was divided into two parts, the larger twice the area of the smaller (2:1). The former is termed by the priestly writers 'the holy place' (קֹדֶשׁ 26³³ and oft.); the latter receives the name קֹדֶשׁ הַקֹּדֶשׁ, best rendered idiomatically 'the most holy place,' also literally 'the holy of holies,' § in LXX τὸ ἅγιον and τὸ ἅγιον (or τὰ ἅγια) τῶν ἁγίων. These names first came into use in priestly circles in the Exile. The corresponding parts of Solomon's temple were known as the hēkal or temple proper (1 K 6³ RVm), and the debir (EV 'oracle,' v. 16).|| The former is retained by Ezekiel, while the latter is discarded and the 'most holy place' substituted (41⁴, but also 'holy place,' v. 23). P by his nomenclature stamps his sanctuary still further with the attribute of holiness in an ascending scale as we approach the presence of J^r.

viii. THE FURNITURE OF THE HOLY PLACE.—

(a) The Table of Shewbread (Ex 25³⁰⁻³⁶ = 37¹⁰⁻¹⁶ [LXX 38⁹⁻¹²]; Jos. Ant. III. vi. 6).—This section is intended merely to supplement the art. SHEWBREAD by giving the barest details regarding the 'presence-table' (שֻׁלְחָן הַלֶּחֶם, see l.c. § i.) of the priestly writers.

Our understanding of this section is materially assisted by the representation of the table of Herod's temple, which may still be seen on the Arch of Titus at Rome. Careful measurements were taken and drawings made, both of the table and of the candlestick (see next section) by friends of Adrian Reland in 1710-11, at a time when the sculptures were less dilapidated than at present. These were published by him in his work, De spoliis Templi Hierosolymitani, etc., 1716.

The material was acacia wood, overlaid like the ark with pure gold. The sheathing of these two

^{*} The arrangement of the Kiswa, indeed, affords a striking analogy to that of the curtains of the tabernacle.

† This follows from the fact that the veil is to hang directly under the gold clasps joining the two sets of tapestry curtains, and therefore 5 times 4 cubits (the breadth of the individual curtain) from the front of the dwelling (v. 33). The importance of this datum for the dimensions of the tabernacle has already been pointed out.

‡ This word has an interesting affinity with the Assyrian word paraku, the innermost shrine or 'holy of holies' of the Babylonian temples in which stood the statue of the patron deity.

§ The usage of Lv 16 is peculiar to itself. The 'holy place' of P is here curiously 'the tent of meeting' (v. 16 etc.); the 'most holy place' is named simply 'the holy place' (vv. 2, 16 etc.), shortened from 'the holy place within the veil' (v. 2).

|| The presence of the term 'most holy place' in 1 K 6¹⁶ etc. is now recognized as due to post-exilic glossators.

sacred articles of the cultus and of the later altar of incense (§ viii. (c)) is quite in place, and stands on quite a different footing from the sheathing of such secondary parts of the fabric as the framework and the pillars at the entrance, the originality of which we saw reason to question. The height of the table was that of the ark, $1\frac{1}{2}$ cubits, its length and breadth 2 cubits and 1 cubit respectively. The massive top—in the Roman sculpture 6 in. thick—was decorated with a zēr (זֶר), AV and RV 'crown,' RVM 'rim or moulding') of gold. The precise nature of this ornament, which is also prescribed for the ark (v. 11) and the altar of incense (30²), is unknown. That it was some species of moulding may be regarded as fairly certain. The Gr. translators render variously by στεφάνη, whence the Vulg. corona and our 'crown'; by κυμάτια στρεπτά; or by a combination of both. The authors of the divergent Gr. text of 35–40 omit this ornament altogether (LXX 38¹²). The phrase κυμάτια στρεπτά suggests a cable moulding, as explained by pseudo-Aristeas (Epist. ad Philocratem, ed. Wendland, § 58, 'worked in relief in the form of ropes'), which also suits Josephus' description (τὸ εἶδος ἑλίκος [a spiral], L.c. § 140). On the other hand, the same phrase is used in architecture of an ogee moulding, and this is certainly the nature of the ornament on the table of the Arch of Titus (see Reland, op. cit. 73 ff., and plate of mouldings opp. p. 76). In any case, both the sides and ends of the massive top were separately decorated by a solid gold moulding, which gave them the appearance of four panels sunk into the table (Reland, ut sup., and cf. Jos. § 140, καὶ λαμβάνει δὲ καθ' ἑκάστον πλευρὰν, κ.τ.λ.). The legs, according to Josephus, were square in the upper and rounded in the lower half, terminating in claws, a statement confirmed by the sculpture and by the analogy of the domestic art of the ancients. They were connected by a binding rail (παρὰ, EV 'border') 'of an handbreadth round about' (v. 20), also ornamented with a cable or an ogee moulding. It doubtless marked the transition from the square to the round portions of the legs. The broken ends of this rail are still visible on the arch with a pair of trumpets leaning against them (illustr. under MUSIC, vol. iii. p. 462). At its four corners four gold rings were attached, through which, and parallel to the sides, the two poles or staves were passed by means of which the table was moved from place to place.

For the service of the table a number of gold vessels (cf. Reland, op. cit. 99–122), presumably of hammered or repoussé work, were provided. These comprised, in our RV rendering, 'dishes, spoons, flagons, and bowls to pour out withal' (v. 20, cf. AV). The 'dishes' were the flat salvers or chargers on which the loaves of the presence-bread were conveyed to, or in which they were placed upon, the table, or both together. The 'spoons' were rather the cups containing the frankincense (LXX τὰς θυσίας) which entered into this part of the ritual (Lv 24⁷), two of which were still visible in Reland's day. The 'flagons' were the larger, the 'bowls' the smaller vessels (σπονδεῖα καὶ κύαθοι) for the wine, which we must suppose also entered into the ritual of the shewbread. The silence of the OT on this point led the Jewish doctors to give novel and absurd explanations of the vessels last mentioned—such as hollow pipes between the loaves, or parts of a frame on which they lay. Similarly, these authorities differ as to whether the loaves were laid in two piles lengthwise across the width of the table—as one would naturally suppose—or along its length. A favourite tradition gives the length of each loaf as ten handbreadths ($2\frac{1}{2}$ ft.) and the breadth as five. Since the width of the table was only 1 cubit, or six handbreadths, the loaves were baked with two handbreadths [their 'horns'] turned up at either end, thus taking the shape of a huge square bracket! (For these and similar speculations, as curious as useless, see Menahoth xi. 4 ff.; the Baraita, § vii., with Flesch's notes and diagrams; Edersheim, The Temple, 154 ff.; and Ugolinius' treatise in his Thesaurus, vol. x.). The position of the table was on 'the north side' of the holy place (26²⁰).

(b) The golden Lampstand (Ex 25^{31–40} = 37^{17–24} [Gr. 38^{13–17}]; cf. Jos. Ant. iii. vi. 7, BJ vii. v. 5).—Of the whole furniture of the tabernacle, the article to which, since Wyclif's time, our Eng. versions have given the misleading designation 'the candlestick,' afforded the greatest opportunity for the display of artistic skill. It was in reality a lampstand (מִנְיָה, מִנְיָה—the latter in Mt 5¹⁵ and parallels, where RV gives '[lamp]-stand,' Vulg. candelabrum) of pure gold (§ iii.), hence also termed the 'pure lampstand' (31⁸ 39²⁷ etc. [cf. 'the pure table,' Lv 24⁶]; for other designations see below). See also LAMP.

The lampstand on the Arch of Titus differs from that described in the text of P in several particulars, notably in the details of the ornamentation (see Reland's plate, op. cit. 6). In this respect it agrees better with the description of Josephus, who speaks of its 'knops and lilies with pomegranates and bowls,' seventy ornaments in all. The base, further, is hexagonal in form and ornamented with non-Jewish figures, while Jewish tradition speaks of the lampstand of the second temple as having a tripod base. The earliest known representation of the stand is found on certain copper coins doubtfully attributed to Antigonus, the last of the Hasmoneans (Madden, Coins of the Jews, 102, with woodcut). At a later period the seven-branched 'candlestick,' more or less conventionally treated, was a favourite motif with Jewish and Christian artists on lamps, gems, tombs, etc.

Like the cherubim above the propitiatory (§ ix.), the lampstand was of 'beaten (i.e. repoussé) work' (מִיֶּזֶק). A talent of gold was employed in its construction, the general idea of which is clear (see illustration): from a central stem three opposite pairs of arms branched off 'like the arrangement of a trident' (Josephus), curving outwards and upwards till their extremities, on which the lamps were placed, were on a level with the top of the shaft. The upper portion of this central stem, from the lowest pair of arms upwards, is termed the shaft (מִנְיָה, so RV; not as AV 'branch'), also the lampstand par excellence (v. 34); the lower portion is the base (so rightly RV for מִנְיָה, lit. 'loins,' in the Mishna קֶסֶם Kel. xi. 7). The latter, we have seen, probably ended in a tripod with clawed feet, as in the table of shewbread. The leading motive of the ornamentation on stem and arms is derived from the flower or blossom of the almond tree. The complete ornament, introduced four times on the stem and three times on each of the six branches, is termed קַּבִּי (gēbīa, lit. 'cup,' so RV; AV 'bowl'), and consists of two parts,* corresponding to the calyx and corolla of the almond flower, the kaphṭōr (EV 'knop') and the perāh (EV 'flower') of the text. At what intervals these 'knops and flowers' are to be introduced is not stated (for the speculations of the Rabbis see Flesch, op. cit. with diagrams), nor do we know how the four sets of v.³⁴ are to be distributed. It is usually assumed that these include the three knops which in v.³³ ornament the points where the branches diverge from the stem. It seems to us more in harmony with the text to regard the three knops in question, with which no flowers are associated, as suggested rather by the scales of the stem of a tree, from whose axils spring the buds which develop into branches. We accordingly prefer to find seven knops on the central stem, viz. two 'knops and flowers' to ornament the base, three 'knops' alone, forming axils for the branches, and two 'knops and flowers' on the upper part of the shaft. Shaft and arms alike probably terminated in a 'cup' with its knop and flower, the five outspread petals of the corolla serving as a tray for one of the seven lamps.† The latter were doubtless of the unvarying Eastern pattern (see LAMP). The nozzles were turned towards the north, facing the table of shewbread, the lampstand having its place on the south side of the Holy Place. To see that the lamps were supplied with the finest produce of the olive ('pure olive oil beaten,' for which see OIL, vol. iii. p. 591^a, 592^a), trimmed and cleaned, was part of the daily duty of the priests. The necessary apparatus, the snuffers and snuff-dishes (which see) with the 'oil vessels' (Nu 4^b), were also of pure gold.

* A flagon is a favourite type on Jewish coins (MONEY, vol. iii. p. 431^a).

From the notices in the different strata of P (Ex 27²⁰, cf. 30⁷, Lv 24^{1a}, Nu 8^{1a}) it is not clear whether the lamps were to be kept burning day and night or by night only. The latter alternative was the custom in the sanctuary of Shiloh (1 S 3^b). From Lv 24^{1a} (note v.³)—of which Ex 27²⁰ is perhaps a later reproduction—it would appear that the lamps burned only 'from evening to morning.' At the time of the morning sacrifice they were to be trimmed, cleaned, and replaced (Ex 30⁷, cf. Tamid iii. 9, vi. 1), ready to be relit in the evening (30⁸, 2 Ch 13¹¹). Against this, the prima facie interpretation, must be put such considerations as these: (1) the ancient custom of the ever burning lamp alluded to under CANDLE (vol. i. p. 348^b); (2) the expression קָדַח נֵר, a 'continual lamp or light' (Lv 24²=Ex 27²⁰); and (3) since the dwelling was absolutely dark, there must, one would think, have been some provision for lighting it during the day. The practice of a later period, vouched for by Josephus (Ant. III. viii. 3 [§ 199], with which cf. his quotation from pseudo-Hecataeus, c. Apion. i. 22 [§ 199]), by which only three of the lamps burned by day and the remaining four were lighted at sunset, seems to be a compromise between the directions of the text and the practical necessities of the case (so Riehm, *HWB*², art. 'Leuchter'). The Rabbinical notices are still later, and differ from both the data of P and those of Josephus. (On the whole question

* This appears from 25³³, where the cups are defined as each consisting of 'a knop and a flower'; hence in v.³¹ 'its knops and its flowers' are to be taken as in apposition to 'its cups' (see Dillm. in loc.), not, as already in LXX, as two additional ornaments (cf. ἀντήρες καὶ αἱ ἐκαστῶν καὶ τὰ ἄνω; cf. the similar misinterpretation regarding the frames of the dwelling on the part of the LXX, § vii. (b) above).

† In the Mishna perāh ('flower') has on this account become the usual term for the plinth or tray of an ordinary lampstand (Ohaloth xi. 8, Kelim xi. 7). Cf. the idivium of the divergent description in the Gr. text (37^{17a}).

see Schürer, HJP II. i. 281 f. with full ref., and 295 f.).

The fate of the golden lampstand of the second temple, made under the direction of Judas Maccabaeus (1 Mac 4^{40c}) to replace the earlier stand (τὸν λαμπτήρα τοῦ πατρὸς, ib. 1²¹, Ben Sira's λαμπτήρας, 2617) carried off by Antiochus IV., has been narrated under SHEWBREAD (§ iii.). Onias in furnishing his temple at Leontopolis was content with a single golden lamp, suspended by a chain of gold (Jos. BJ VII. x. 8).

(c) The Altar of Incense (Ex 30¹⁻²=37²⁵⁻²⁸ [the latter absent in Gr.]; Jos. Ant. III. vi. 8 [§ 147 ff.]).—No part of the furniture of the tabernacle has been the subject of so much controversy in recent years as the altar of incense, which in our present text of Exodus occupies the place of honour in front of the veil. The attitude of modern criticism to Ex 30. 31 has been already stated (§ iii.), and it must suffice here to indicate in a summary way the principal grounds on which recent critics, with one voice, have pronounced against the presence of this altar in the tabernacle as sketched by the original author of Ex 23-29 (cf. EXODUS, vol. i. p. 810^b; INCENSE, vol. ii. p. 467 f.; TEMPLE).

(1) The tabernacle and its furniture have been described in detail, as also the dress and consecration of its ministrant priests, and the whole section brought to a solemn close with 29^{46f}. Advocates of the traditional view must therefore explain the absence from its proper place in ch. 25 of an article ex hypothesi so essential to the daily ritual (30¹⁷) as the altar of incense. They have also to account for the fact that the position of Ex 30¹⁻¹⁰ varies in the MT, the Samaritan-Hebrew, and Gr. texts (being altogether absent from the latter in the recapitulation in ch. 37). (2) Pt in the most unmistakable manner refers to the altar of burnt-offering as 'the altar' (so not less than 100 times, according to the Oxf. Hex. ii. 127), implying that he knew no other. Only in strata that bear other marks of a later origin does it receive a distinguishing epithet (§ vi. (a)). (3) The reference in 30¹⁰ is clearly based on, and is therefore younger than, the ritual of the Day of Atonement as described in Lv 16¹²⁻¹⁴. But this chapter ignores the altar of incense, and, in harmony with Lv 10¹ and Nu 16⁷, requires the incense to be offered on censers. (4) Careful examination of the MT of 1 K 7 and Exk 41 (see SHEWBREAD, TEMPLE) has disclosed the fact that an incense altar found a place neither in the real temple of Solomon nor in the ideal temple of Ezekiel. The references in 1 Ch 28¹⁸, 2 Ch 4¹⁰ etc., are too late in date to enter into the argument as to the contents of P. The first historical reference to the 'golden altar' is found in the account of the sack of the temple by Antiochus IV. (1 Mac 1²¹). On the other hand, the extreme scepticism of Wellhausen (Proleg., Eng. tr. 67) and others as to the existence of such an altar even in the second temple is unwarranted (see Delitzsch, 'Der Räucheraltar' in Zeitschr. f. kirchl. Wissenschaft., 1880, 114-121).

Assuming, then, that we have to do with a later addition (novella) to the original code, we note that this second altar is named קֶדֶשׁ קִטְוֶה קִטְוֶה (30¹) or simply קִטְוֶה (30¹⁷ etc.), also the 'golden altar' (39³⁸ etc., 1 Mac 1²¹); in the LXX τὸ θυσιαστήριον τοῦ θυμιάματος, in Philo and Josephus τὸ θυμιατήριον—so Symm. and Theod. 30¹; for He 9⁴ see end of section. Like the larger altar it is 'four square,' a cubit in length and breadth, and 2 cubits in height, and furnished with horns (for these see § vi.). The material is acacia wood, overlaid with pure gold, the ornamentation a moulding of solid gold (v., see § viii. (a)), with the usual provision for rings and staves (v.⁴²). Its position is to be in the Holy Place, in front of 'the veil that is by the ark of the testimony' (v.⁶). Aaron and his sons shall offer 'a perpetual incense' upon it night and morning, when they enter to dress and light the lamps of the golden stand (v.^{27a}). Once a year, on the Day of Atonement, its horns shall be brought into contact with the atoning blood (v.¹⁰). Owing to the ambiguity in the directions of v.⁶ (cf. 6^b with 6^a in MT, Sam., and LXX; also Holzinger, in loc.) if taken by themselves, and to the influence of the late gloss (1 K 6^{23b}), a tradition grew up, which finds expression in the famous passage He 9⁴, that the incense altar stood in the Most Holy Place, 'which had a golden altar of incense* and the ark of the covenant.' The same verse contains a similar divergent tradition regarding the contents of the ark (see next section).

ix. THE FURNITURE OF THE MOST HOLY PLACE.—The Ark and the Propitiatory (Ex 25¹⁰⁻²²=37¹⁻⁹ [Gr. 38¹⁻⁸]; Jos. Ant. iii. vi. 5).—Within the Most Holy Place stood in solitary majesty the sacred ark, on which rested the propitiatory or mercy-seat with its overarching cherubim. The history of the ancient palladium of the Hebrew tribes, 'the ark of J', of the older writers, has been given under ARK. We have here a more elaborate shrine, to which P gives by preference the designation 'ark of the testimony' (אֲרוֹן הָעֵדוּת) 25²² and often, ἡ κιβωτός τοῦ μαρτυρίου, a phrase parallel to and synonymous with that favoured by Deut. and the Deuteronomistic editors, 'ark of the covenant.' In both cases the ark was so named as containing the Decalogue (אֲרוֹן הַתְּעוּדָה 'the testimony,' 25^{16, 21}), written on 'the tables of testimony' (31¹⁸). The ark itself sometimes receives the simple title 'the testimony' (16²⁴ etc.); and the tabernacle, as we have seen (§ iii.), as in its turn containing the ark, is named 'the dwelling of the testimony' and 'the tent of the testimony.'† See TESTIMONY.

The ark of P is an oblong chest of acacia wood overlaid within and without with gold, 2½ cubits in length, and 1½ in breadth and height (i.e. 5 × 3 × 3 half-cubits). Each of its sides is finished with a strip of cable or ogee moulding (רָ, EV 'crown,' see § viii. (a)) of solid gold in the same manner as the top of the table of shewbread; with this difference, however, that in the former the upper line of moulding must have projected beyond the plane of the top of the ark, probably to the extent of the thickness of the propitiatory, in order that the latter, with its cherubim, might remain in place during the march. Within the sacred chest was to be deposited 'the testimony' (v. 16) or Decalogue, as already explained. Before it—not within it, as a later tradition supposed (He 9*)—were afterwards placed a pot of manna (Ex 16³²) and Aaron's rod that budded (Nu 17¹⁰).

Distinct from but resting upon the ark, and of the same superficial dimensions (2½ × 1½ cubits), was a slab of solid gold, to which the name kappōreth is given (only in P and 1 Ch 28¹¹ EV 'mercy-seat').

The familiar rendering 'mercy-seat,' first used by Tindale, following Luther's Gnadenstuhl (cf. SHewBRAD, § i.), goes back to that of the oldest VSS (LXX ἀναστήμιον, Vulg. propitiatorium)—and is based on the secondary and technical sense of the root-verb כָּפַר, viz. 'to make propitiation' for sin. Hence the Wyclif-Herford rendering 'propitiatory,' derived from Jerome, is preferable to Tindale's 'mercy-seat.' In our opinion the rendering 'propitiatory' must be maintained. The alternative 'covering' (RVm) adopted in preference by so many modern, particularly German, scholars (cf. ισθίον in Gr. of Ex 25¹⁷, and Philo, op. cit. [ed. Mangey, ii. 150] ισθίον ἀναστήμιον [a lid]), is open to two serious objections. On the one hand it is based on the still unproved assumption that the primary signification of כָּפַר was 'to cover,' and on the other hand the kappōreth was in no sense the lid or cover of the ark, which was a chest or coffer complete in itself. Dillmann and others have unsuccessfully attempted a via media by taking kappōreth in the sense of a protective covering (Schutzdach, Deckplatte, etc.). See, further, Deissmann, Bible Studies (Eng. tr.), p. 124 ff.

Near the ends of the propitiatory stood, facing each other, two small § emblematic figures, the cherubim, of the same material and workmanship

* So RVm and American RV in text for χρυσῶν θυμιατήριον with most recent interpreters; AV and RV 'a golden censor.'

† In the art. ARK (§ i.) attention was briefly called to the three sets of designations of the ark characteristic of the early, the Deuteronomistic, and the priestly writers respectively, of which all the other OT titles, some twenty in all, are merely variations and expansions. See for later discussions H. P. Smith, Samuel, 33; 'Ark' in Encyc. Bibl. i. 300 f.; Meinhold, Die Lade Jahves, 2 ff.

‡ The most recent research seems to point in favour of the alternative 'to wipe off': see Zimmermann, Beiträge zur Kenntnis d. babyl. Religion, 92; Haupt in JBL, xix. (1900) 61, 80.

§ It must be noted that, with bodies bent and wings outstretched, the cherubim were accommodated on a surface less than 4 ft. from end to end.

as the golden lampstand, viz. 'beaten' or repoussé work (הָפֵק, χρυσόροπος) of pure gold. Being securely soldered to the propitiatory they are reckoned as 'of one piece' with it (v. 19). Each cherub was furnished, like the larger and differently placed cherubim of Solomon's temple (1 K 6²⁴), with a pair of wings which met overhead, while their faces were bent downwards towards the propitiatory. Whatever may have been their significance in primitive Hebrew mythology, the cherubim as here introduced, like the kindred seraphim in Isaiah's vision, are the angelic ministers of J', guarding in the attitude of adoration the throne of His earthly glory (cf. Book of Enoch, ed. Charles, 71⁷). The propitiatory, with the overarching cherubim, was, in truth, the innermost shrine of the wilderness sanctuary, for it was at once J''s earthly and the footstool of His heavenly throne* (cf. 1 Ch 28²). Not at the tent door, as in the earlier representation (Ex 33⁷), but 'from above the propitiatory, from between the cherubim' (25²²), will J' henceforth commune with His servant Moses (30⁶). 'There, in the darkness and the silence, he listened to the Voice' (Nu 7⁸).

For the transport of the sacred chest, its propitiatory and cherubim, two poles of acacia wood overlaid with gold are provided. These are to rest permanently (Ex 25¹⁸, otherwise Nu 4⁶, where the staves are inserted when the march begins) in four rings, attached, according to our present text, to the four 'feet' (רַגְלָיו v. 12, so LXX, but AV 'corners') of the ark.

But this text and rendering are open to serious question. For (1) of the shape, length, and construction of these 'feet' nothing is said; (2) why should the author employ the Phœnician word (רַגְלָיו) for 'foot' here in place of the usual רַגְלָיו (v. 26)? (3) If the rings were attached so far down, a state of dangerously unstable equilibrium would result; (4) all the oldest versions apparently read, or at least, as our own AV, rendered as in v. 26 רַגְלָיו 'its four corners.'† We must suppose, then, that the rings were attached, perhaps below the moulding, at the corners of the short sides of the ark (so the Baraita, Neumann, Keil), along which, and not along the long sides (as Rignebach, Dillm., and most), the poles rested. The object of this arrangement is to secure that the Divine throne shall always face in the direction of the march. The weight of the whole must have been considerable, with poles, certainly not 'staves,' and bearers to correspond.‡

In the second temple there was no ark, and consequently no propitiatory, notwithstanding the statement in the Apocalypse of Baruch (6⁷) that it was hidden by an angel before the destruction of the temple, A.D. 70. According to P the sole contents of the ark, as we have seen, were the two tables of testimony on which the Decalogue was inscribed. Once a year, on the Day of Atonement, the high priest alone entered the Holy of Holies to bring the blood of the sin-offerings into contact with the propitiatory (Lv 16¹⁴; see ATONEMENT, DAY OF, vol. i. p. 199).

x. ERECTION AND CONSECRATION OF THE TABERNACLE.—In the oldest stratum of the Priests' Code the directions for the preparation of the sanctuary and its furniture (Ex 25-27), which have engaged our attention up to this point, are followed by equally minute instructions as to the priestly garments (28), and by the solemn consecration of Aaron and his sons for the priestly office (29). The altar alone of the appointments of the sanctuary is singled out for consecration (29^{36f.}). In the first of the accretions to the older document (30. 31), however, we find instructions for the anointing of 'the tent of meeting' and all the furniture of the sanctuary with the 'holy anointing oil' (30^{26f.}), with which also the priests are to be anointed. When we pass to the still later stratum (35-40; see above, § iii.), we find a record of the carrying out of the preceding instructions to the last detail, followed by the erecting of 'the dwelling of the tent of meeting' (40^{1f.}) on the first day of the first month of the second year, that is, a year less fourteen days from the first anniversary of the Exodus (40¹⁻¹⁷, cf. 12²⁻⁶). A comparison with 19¹ shows that according to P's chronology a period of at least nine months is allowed for the construction of the sanctuary and its furniture. Some of the questions raised by 40¹⁸⁻¹⁹ as to the manner in which the curtains 'were spread over the dwelling' have been discussed by anticipation in § vii. (c); it must suffice now to add that after the court and the tabernacle proper had been set up, and all the furniture in its place, the whole, we must assume, was duly anointed by Moses himself in accordance with the instructions of the preceding verses (40^{24f.}), although this fact is not mentioned until we reach a later portion of the narrative (Lv 8^{10f.}, Nu 7¹). This consecration of the sanctuary naturally implies that it is now ready for the purpose for which it was erected. Accordingly 'the cloud covered the tent of meeting, and the glory of J^h filled the dwelling' (40^{34f.}). J^h had now taken possession of the holy abode which had been prepared for Him. With the new year, as was most fitting, the new order of things began.

* For this idea and its possible bearing on the ultimate historical origin of the ark as the empty throne of an imageless deity, see Meinhold, Die Lade Jahves (1900), 44 and passim, based on the researches of Reichel in Ueber Vorhellenische Götterculte (esp. 27 ff.); cf. also Budde in Expos. Times, June 1898, p. 396 ff. (reprinted [in German] in ZATW, 1901, p. 194 ff.).

† Cf. 1 K 7²⁰, where עַמֻּדֵי מַתָּן of MT (AV here also 'corners') is similarly regarded by recent commentators as a corruption of עַמֻּדֵי מַתָּן or מַתָּן.

‡ The propitiatory, even if only a fingerbreadth thick, would alone weigh 760 lb. troy. The weight of the whole must be put at about 6 cwt. The Talmud mentions four bearers (Fleisch, op. cit. 66). Two sufficed for the historical ark (ARK, vol. i. p. 1506).

xi. THE TABERNACLE ON THE MARCH (Nu 2¹⁷ 3²³⁻³⁸ 4^{1f.} etc.). — The cloud which rested on the dwelling by day and appeared as a pillar of fire by night accompanied the Hebrews 'throughout all their journeys' in the wilderness. When 'the cloud was taken up from over the dwelling' (Ex 40³⁷, Nu 9¹⁷) this was the signal for the tents to be struck and another stage of the march begun; while, 'as long as the cloud abode upon the dwelling, whether it were two days or a month or a year,' the children of Israel remained encamped and journeyed not (Nu 9^{18f.}). The charge of the tabernacle and of all that pertained thereto was committed to the official guardians, the priests and Levites (Nu 3^{36f.}). When the signal for the march was given by a blast from the silver trumpets (10^{1f.}), the priests entered the dwelling, and, taking down the veil at the entrance to the Most Holy Place, wrapped it round the ark (4^{5f.}). This, as the most sacred of all the contents of the tabernacle, received three coverings in all, the others but two. Full and precise instructions follow for the wrapping up of the rest of the furniture (4⁷⁻¹⁴). This accomplished, the priests hand over their precious burden to the first of the Levitical guilds, the sons of Kohath, for transport by means of the bearing-poles with which each article is provided (v. 15^{f.}). The second guild, the sons of Gershon, have in charge the tapestry curtains of the dwelling, the hair curtains of the tent, the two outer coverings, the veil, and the screen (3^{25f.} 4^{24f.}). For the conveyance of these, two covered waggons and four oxen are provided by the heads of the tribes (7³⁻⁷). The remaining division of the Levites, the sons of Merari, receives in charge the frames and bars of the dwelling, together with the pillars and bases of the dwelling and of the court, with four waggons and eight oxen for their transport (ib.).*

* The fondness of the priestly writers for proportion (2:1) has again led to strange results, for, even with the colossal 'boards' of previous writers reduced to frames (see § vii. (b)), the loads of the Merarites were out of all proportion to those of the Gershonites. Nu 7, however, is now recognized as one of the latest sections of the Hexateuch.

Everything being now in readiness, the march began. The Levites, according to Nu 2¹⁷,—and as the symmetry of the camp requires,—marched in the middle of the line, with two divisions of three tribes each before them and two behind. This, however, does not accord with Nu 10^{17f.}, according to which the sons of Gershon and Merari marched after the first division of three tribes, and had the tabernacle set up before the arrival of the Kohathites with the sacred furniture between the second and third divisions.

xii. THE HISTORICITY OF P'S TABERNACLE.—After what has been said in our opening section—with which the art. ARK must be compared—as to the nature, location, and ultimate disappearance of the Mosaic tent of meeting, it is almost superfluous to inquire into the historical reality of the costly and elaborate sanctuary which, according to P, Moses erected in the wilderness of Sinai. The attitude of modern OT scholarship to the priestly legislation, as now formulated in the Pentateuch (see §§ i. and iv. above), and in particular to those sections of it which deal with the sanctuary and its worship, is patent on every page of this Dictionary, and is opposed to the historicity of P's tabernacle. It is now recognized that the highly organized community of the priestly writers, rich not only in the precious metals and the most costly Phœnician dyes, but in men of rare artistic skill, is not the unorganized body of Hebrew serfs and nomads that meets us in the oldest sources of the Pentateuch. Even after centuries spent in contact with the civilization and arts of Canaan, when skilled artists in metal were required, they had to be hired by Solomon from Phœnicia. Again, the situation of P's tabernacle, its highly organized ministry, its complex ritual, are utterly at variance with the situation and simple appointments of the Elohist tent of meeting (see § i.). With regard, further, to the details of the description, as studied in the foregoing sections, we have repeatedly had to call attention to the obscurities, omissions, and minor inconsistencies of the text, which compel the student to the conviction that he is dealing not with the description of an actual structure, but with an architectural programme, dominated by certain leading conceptions. The most convincing, however, of the arguments against the actual existence of P's tabernacle, is the silence of the pre-exilic historical writers regarding it. There is absolutely no place for it in the picture which their writings disclose of the early religion of the Hebrews. The tabernacle of P has no raison d'être apart from the ark, the history of which is known with fair completeness from the conquest to its removal to the temple of Solomon. But in no genuine passage of the history of that long period is there so much as a hint of the tabernacle, with its array of ministering priests and Levites. Only the Chronicler (1 Ch 16³ 21²⁹ etc.), psalm-writers, editors, and authors of marginal glosses, writing at a time when P's conception of Israel's past had displaced every other, find the tabernacle of the priestly writers in the older sources, or supply it where they think it ought to have been (cf. 2 Ch 13^{f.} with 1 K 3^{2f.}). See, further, Wellh. Proleg. (Eng. tr.) 39ff., and recent works cited in the Literature at the end of this article.

xiii. THE RULING IDEAS AND RELIGIOUS SIGNIFICANCE OF THE TABERNACLE.—If, then, the tabernacle of the foregoing sections had no historical existence, is its study, on that account, a waste of time and labour? By no means. On the contrary, the tabernacle as conceived by the priestly writers is the embodiment of a sublime idea with which are associated many other ideas and truths of the most vital moment for the history of religion. In this place it is impossible to do more than indicate in summary form some of these vital religious truths to which reference has been made. We have already (§ iv.) expressed the conviction that the only standpoint from which to approach the study of the true significance of the tabernacle, as designed by the author of Ex 25-29, is that laid down by this author himself. Following the lead of Ezekiel, his chief aim, and the aim of the priestly writers who expanded the original sketch, is to show to future generations the necessary conditions under which the ideal relation between Jⁿ and Israel may be restored and maintained. This ideal is expressed by Ezekiel and by P as a dwelling of Jⁿ in the midst of His covenant people (reff. in § iv.). The methods, however, by which these two kindred spirits sought to impress this ideal upon their contemporaries are diametrically opposed. Ezekiel projects his ideal forward into the Messianic future; P throws his backwards to the golden age of Moses. Both sketches are none the less ideals, whose realization for prophet and priest alike was still in the womb of the future. Both writers follow closely the arrangements of the pre-exilic temple, P, however, striving to unite these with existing traditions of the Mosaic tent of meeting. It is the recognition of these facts that makes it possible to say that 'a Christian apologist can afford to admit that the elaborate description of the tabernacle is to be regarded as a product of religious idealism, working upon a historical basis' (Ottley, Aspects of the Old Test. 226).

The problem that presented itself to the mind of P was this: Under what conditions may the Divine promise of Ex 37²⁷ ('my dwelling shall be with them, and I will be their God, and they shall be my people') be realized? This we take to be the supreme idea of the priestly code, the realization of the presence of God in the midst of His people (Ex 25⁸ 29⁴⁵). This thought, as we have seen, is expressed in the characteristic designation 'the dwelling,' given by P to the most essential part of the sanctuary which is to be the concrete embodiment of the thought.

The Divine dwelling must be in accordance with the Divine character. Now, in the period from Deuteronomy to the close of the Exile, the two aspects of the Divine character which the inspired teachers of the time place in the forefront of their teaching are the unity and the holiness of Jⁿ. Each of these attributes has its necessary correlate. The unity of Jⁿ requires the unity or centralization of His worship, which is the keynote of Deuteronomy. The holiness of Jⁿ demands the holiness of His people, which is the recognized keynote of the Law of Holiness (Lv 19 ff.). The crowning result of the discipline of the Exile may be summed up in the simple formula 'one God, one sanctuary,' a thought which dominates the priestly code from end to end. That there should be but one sanctuary in the wilderness, a symbol of the unity of Jⁿ, is therefore for P a thing of course, requiring neither justification nor enforcement.

With regard to the other pair of correlates, a holy God and a holy people, the whole ceremonial system of the priestly code expends itself in the effort to give expression to this twofold thought. The centre of this system is the tabernacle and its priesthood, and every effort is made to render the former a visible embodiment of the holiness of the God who is to be worshipped in its court. We have seen (§ iv.) the precautions taken by Ezekiel to guard his new sanctuary from profanation; the same thought is prominent in H (Law of Holiness), and is impressively exhibited in the arrangement of the desert camp in P. Between the tents of the twelve tribes and the throne of Jⁿ there intervene the cordon of the tents of the tribe of Levi, the court, and the Holy Place—into which priests alone may enter,—all so many protecting sheaths, to borrow a figure from plant-life, of the Most Holy Place, where Jⁿ dwells enthroned in ineffable majesty and almost unapproachable holiness.* Once a year only may the high priest, as the people's representative, approach within its precincts, bearing the blood of atonement. Not only, therefore, is the one tabernacle the symbol of Jⁿ's unity, it is also an eloquent witness to the truth: 'Ye shall be holy, for I, Jⁿ, your God am holy' (Lv 19²). Yet these precautions are, after all, intended not to exclude but to safeguard the right of approach of Jⁿ's people to His presence. The tabernacle was still the 'tent of meeting,' the place at which, with due precautions, men might approach Jⁿ, and in which Jⁿ condescended to draw near to men. It is thus a witness to the further truth that man is called to enjoy a real, albeit still restricted, communion and converse with God.

One other attribute of the Divine nature receives characteristic expression in the arrangements of P's sanctuary. This is the perfection and harmony of the character of Jⁿ. Symmetry, harmony, and proportion are the three essentials of the æsthetic in architecture; and in so far as the æsthetic sense in man, by which the Creator has qualified him for the enjoyment of the beauty and harmony of the universe, is a part of the Divine image (Gn 1²⁶) in each of us, these qualities are reflexions of the harmony and perfection of the Divine nature. The symmetry of the desert sanctuary has already been abundantly emphasized. The harmony of its design is shown in the balance of all its parts, and in the careful gradation of the materials employed. The three varieties of curtains (§ iv.) and the three metals correspond to the three ascending degrees of sanctity which mark the court, the Holy Place, and the Most Holy respectively. In the dwelling itself we advance from the silver of the bases through the furniture of wood, thinly sheathed with gold, to the only mass of solid gold, the propitiatory, the seat of the deity. As regards the proportions, finally, which are so characteristic of the tabernacle, we find here just those ratios which are still considered 'the most pleasing' in the domain of architectural art, viz. those of an exact cube or two cubes placed side by side . . . and the ratio of the base, perpendicular and hypotenuse of a right-angled triangle, e.g. 3, 4, 5 and their multiples' (see art. 'Architecture' in *Encyc. Brit.*⁹). The perfect cube of the Most Holy Place is universally regarded as the deliberate attempt to express the perfection of Jⁿ's character and dwelling-place, the harmony and equipoise of all His attributes. The similar thought, the perfection of the New Jerusalem, 'in which no truth will be exaggerated or distorted,' is expressed by the fact that 'the length and breadth and height of it are equal' (Rev 21¹⁶).

The 'symbolism of numbers' in the measurements of the tabernacle, of which so much has been written, is too firmly established to admit of question (for general principles see art. NUMBER). The sacred numbers 3, 4, 7, 10, their parts (1½, 2½, 5) and multiples (6, 9, 12, 20, 28, 30, 42, 48, 50, 60, 100), dominate every detail of the fabric and its furniture.† In all this we must recognize an earnest striving to give concrete expression—in a manner, it is true, which our Western thought finds it difficult to appreciate—to the sacred harmonies and perfection of the character of the Deity for whose 'dwelling' the sanctuary is destined.

* For 'the fundamental sense of unapproachableness which is never absent from the notion of Jⁿ's holiness,' see HOLINESS, vol. ii. p. 397^a.

† The curious student will easily detect these measurements and numbers in the previous sections.

On the other hand, that the author of Ex 25-29 intended to give expression to ideas beyond the sphere of J's relation to His covenant people, or even within that sphere to invest every detail of material, colour, ornament, etc., with a symbolical significance, we do not believe. Following in the wake of Philo (op. cit.) and Josephus (Ant. III. vii. 7), the Fathers, and after them many writers down to our own day, among whom Bahr stands pre-eminent, have sought to read a whole philosophy of the universe into the tabernacle. Now it is designed to unfold the relations of heaven and earth and sea, now of body, soul, and spirit, and many wonderful things besides. Happily, the taste for these fanciful speculations has died out and is not likely to revive.

Quite apart from the authors of such far-fetched symbolisms stand several of the NT writers, who see in the tabernacle the foreshadowing of spiritual realities. Once and again the terminology of St. Paul betrays the influence of the tabernacle (e.g. the laver of regeneration, Tit 3⁵ RVm). For the author of the Fourth Gospel the tabernacle on which rested the Divine glory in the cloud prefigured the incarnate Word who 'tabernacled' (ἐσκήνωσεν) among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory of the only begotten of the Father' (Jn 1¹⁴). In the Epistle to the Hebrews, again, the tabernacle, its furniture, and ministering priesthood supply the unknown author with an essential part of his argument. With 'singular pathos,' to borrow Bishop Westcott's apt expression, he lingers over his description of the sacred tent and all its arrangements. Yet, like the whole Levitical ceremonial, it was but the shadow of the heavenly substance (8²), a 'parable for the time present' of 'the greater and more perfect tabernacle' (9¹¹) which is heaven. Into this tabernacle Jesus Christ has entered, our great High Priest, by whom the restricted access of the former dispensation is done away, and through whom 'a new and living way' has been opened of free access into the 'true' Holy of Holies (9²⁴), even the immediate presence of God. Last of all, in the Book of Revelation we have the final consummation of the kingdom of God portrayed under the figure of the tabernacle: 'Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he shall tabernacle (σκηνώσει) with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them' (Rev 21³—for v. 10 see above)—in which the final word of revelation takes up and repeats the sublime ideal of Ezekiel and the priestly writers. 'In this representation of the New Jerusalem culminates the typology of the OT sanctuary' (Keil).

LITERATURE.—Works on the tabernacle are legion, but there is no monograph from the standpoint of the foregoing article. The student must start from a careful study of the text of Exodus and of the more recent commentaries, such as Dillmann-Ryssel, Strack, Holzinger, Baentsch. The commentary in the International Critical Series by the writer of this article is in preparation. The critical problems are treated by Popper, Der bibl. Bericht über die Stiftshütte, 1862; Graf, Die geschichtl. Bücher d. AT, 51 ff., 1866; Kuenen, Hexateuch; Wellhausen, Prolegomena; and more recent writers (see § ii. above). In addition to the relevant sections in the Archæologies of Ewald, Haneberg, Keil, Benzinger, Nowack (vol. ii.), the articles should be consulted in the Bible Dictionaries of Winer, Riehm, and PRE² (by Riggenbach), all under 'Stiftshütte'; artt. 'Tabernacle' and 'Temple' (the latter especially) in Smith's DB. The more important monographs are by Neumann, Die Stiftshütte, 1861; Riggenbach, *Die Mosaische Stiftshütte*², 1867; Schick, Stiftshütte und Tempel, 1896; and (in English) Brown, *The Tabernacle*⁶, 1899. The most exhaustive treatment of the tabernacle, its arrangements and its significance, is Bähr's Symbolik d. Mosaischen Cultus, 2 vols. 1837-39 (Bd. i. 2nd ed. 1874), full of fanciful ideas. On somewhat different lines is Friederich, Symbolik d. Mos. Stiftshütte, 1841. Sound criticisms of both, and an attempt to reduce the symbolism to sane limits, characterize Keil's full treatment in vol. i. of his Archæology (Eng. tr.). See also Westcott, Epistle to the Hebrews, 1889, Essay on 'The general significance of the Tabernacle', p. 233 ff.; Otley, Aspects of the OT, esp. p. 261 ff. TABERNACLES, FEAST OF.—The names of this feast and the references to it in the Bible are given in the art. FEASTS AND FASTS.

As the present article is a supplement to the above-named general one, the reader is recommended to refer to the latter (vol. i.), especially pp. 860, 861, and the synopsis on p. 863. (In the ref. to Tabernacles outside the Pentateuch insert 'Neh' between 'Exr 34' and '814-17'). In what follows, a number by itself will be a reference to a page in that article.

Of the six passages containing injunctions concerning the observance of this feast, two are from Ex. and two from Deut. (863). The two in Ex. call it the Feast of Ingathering, refer to it as one of the three Pilgrimage Feasts (860^a and note), place it at the end of the year, and enjoin the attendance of all males at the sanctuary with offerings.

The injunctions in Deut. contain noteworthy additions to those in Exodus. The Feast of Ingathering is called the Feast of Booths (sukkōth, without explanation as if the term were familiar), its duration is fixed for seven days, and it is to be kept at Jerusalem, 'the place which the LORD thy God shall choose.' Also in the year of release in the Feast of Tabernacles the law shall be read before all Israel in their hearing (Dt 31^{10c}). The name of the festival points to the custom of erecting booths in the vineyards during the time of the vintage (cf. Is 1⁸ 'a booth in a vineyard,' RV), a custom which is continued to the present day in parts of Palestine; it served also (Lv 23⁴⁰⁻⁴³ [H]) to remind the Israelites that their fathers dwelt in booths or tents during their passage from the house of bondage to the Promised Land. Of the two ceremonies enjoined in Dt 26, the second (vv. 12-15) was probably performed at this festival. Both in Ex. and Deut. the connexion of this and all three Pilgrimage Feasts with agriculture is clearly indicated (cf. 860^b).

Before considering the two remaining passages, let us trace the observance of the feast before the Exile. It appears to have been a custom of the Canaanites to keep a vintage festival, for according to Jg 9²⁷, after gathering the vineyards and treading the grapes, the men of Shechem held a feast in the house of their god, and at this gathering dissatisfaction with Abimelech's rule was openly expressed. (For a discussion of this incident see art. ABIMELECH, and cf. Moore on Jg 9²⁷).

In Jg 21¹⁹ mention is made of a similar festival observed at Shiloh, when the maidens went out to dance in the vineyards; but note the contrast between the Canaanites in the house of their god and the feast of the LORD held by the Israelites. Although this festival was held at Shiloh, where the ark was, it appears to have been an observance by a tribe or part of Israel only.

The yearly sacrifice which Elkanah offered to the LORD of Hosts in Shiloh (1 S 1⁹) was probably in the autumn. The dedication of Solomon's temple took place 'at the feast in the month Ethanim, which is the seventh month' (1 K 8²), i.e. at the Feast of Tabernacles. It was in imitation of this feast that Jeroboam instituted a feast at Bethel in the eighth month (1 K 12²⁹).

From these references to the feast in pre-exilic times it may be inferred that, (1) at least in the times before the establishment of the kingdom, the pilgrimage to the sanctuary was made but once a year (most probably in the autumn); (2) festivals at other times of the year were also observed [cf. 1 K 9²⁵, 2 Ch 8¹², Is 9⁴ 'the joy in harvest'; the same word as in Ex 23¹⁶ is applied to the feast elsewhere called the Feast of Weeks]

* A difficulty arises in comparing this passage with 1 K 6²⁸, where it is stated that the house of the LORD was not finished till 'the month Bul, which is the eighth month.'

29¹ ('let the feasts come round,' RV) 30²⁹, Hos 2¹¹ Am 5²¹].

Let us now consider the two remaining passages, which contain injunctions concerning this feast (Lv 23 and Nu 29), and here we notice that, instead of prescriptions relating to the three Pilgrimage Feasts as in Ex. and Deut., we have a sacred calendar in which the position of each festival is fixed by the month and day. A special name (שָׁנִי קָדֶשׁ 'a holy convocation') is given to the festivals, or rather to certain days of the festival periods, and servile work is prohibited on those days. The Feast of Tabernacles lasts for seven days as in Deut., but an eighth day is observed at its close as an מועד 'a solemn assembly' (see Driver's note on Dt 16⁸).

The post-exilic references to this feast are contained in Ezra and Nehemiah. In Ezr 3⁴ it is stated that the Feast of Tabernacles was observed by the returned exiles as soon as the altar was set up, and before the foundation of the temple of the LORD was laid. The terms used in vv. 3-6 show acquaintance with the prescriptions of P with reference to burnt-offerings.*

Very different in character from the notice in Ezr 3 is the account found in Neh 8¹³⁻¹⁸. Here the details are interesting and instructive. The reference to Lv 23⁴⁰⁻⁴³ is clear. The material gathered by the people is that prescribed in Lv 23⁴⁰ (the wording of the two passages is in some respects different; cf. Ryle's note on Neh 8¹³). With it they make booths, and set them up in the courts of the temple and in the open spaces of the city, and dwell in them, according to Lv 23⁴². The feast was kept seven days, and the ázereh of the eighth day was duly observed.† The writer is aware that a new method of keeping the festival is introduced, one unknown to the people during the rule of judges and kings, and the ceremonial throughout is that enjoined in Leviticus. It is not, however, definitely stated whether the numerous sacrifices prescribed for this festival in Nu 29 were offered on this occasion.

The OT history of the Feast closes here. The eighth day, which is still distinguished from the seven days of Deut., is by the time of the writer of 2 Mac 10⁶ reckoned as part of the Feast. Josephus (Ant. III. x. 4) speaks of keeping a festival of eight days, and also mentions the custom of bearing the lulab, consisting of a myrtle, willow, and palm branch in the right hand, and the ethrog or citron in the left. For this and other ceremonies observed at the feast see Jos. Ant. XIII. xiii. 5; and the Talmudic treatise, Sukkah; Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, ii. 149, 157; and the references on p. 861 of art. FEASTS; and the NT references in the synopsis.

On one point is stress laid in all the accounts: that the ingathering which the feast commemorates is general ('when thou gatherest in thy labours out of the field,' Ex 23¹⁶; 'the fruits of the land,' Lv 23³⁹; 'from thy threshing-floor and from thy wine-vat,' Dt 16¹³). The Feasts of Unleavened Bread (mazzôth) and of Weeks or Harvest marked certain stages in the work of ingathering, but the autumn festival, the last of the yearly cycle, was the thanksgiving for the combined produce of the whole year. As the vintage and olive harvests had just been gathered, the worshippers might think chiefly of these rich gifts, yet the injunctions above quoted bade them take a wider view, and thank God for all His good gifts. It is also to be noted that in the autumn festival no special offering of the fruits of the earth is enjoined corresponding to the sheaf of the wave-offering (Lv 23¹⁴) at Passover, and the two wave-loaves with sacrifice at Pentecost (23¹⁵⁻²¹). Yet in other respects the Feast of Tabernacles is specially distinguished from other feasts. In Deut. it is the only one of the three at which the Israelite must dwell at Jerusalem for seven days, and in Numbers the sacrifices prescribed for this festival are in excess of those for any other (for details see p. 861^b). Its pre-eminence is asserted by Josephus (Ant. VIII. iv. 1—it was ἐορτή σφόδρα παρὰ τοῖς Ἑβραίοις ἀγαστέρα καὶ μεγίστη). In the OT it is sometimes called 'the Feast,' κατ' ἐξοχήν: 1 K 8^{2, 66} (=2 Ch 5^{7, 78}), Ezk 45²⁵, Neh 8¹⁴; cf. Lv 23³⁹ (H), 1 K 12²³ (Driver, Deut. 197). But it was also the festival which in early times was common to Israel and to the heathen round about them. May it be that the wider view of the autumn festival and the avoidance of any special offering of the fruits of the ground at this season were designed in order to make a distinction between their own festival and that of their neighbours, and possibly to avoid excesses which attended the heathen celebrations,—to impress upon the Israelite, when he appeared before the LORD his God, that he was present at a harvest thanksgiving rather than at a vintage carnival?

TABITHA.—See DORCAS.

TABLE.—A word used in several senses, either in sing. or plural, 108 times in the OT and 20 times in the NT. In the former when singular it is usually (56 times) the tr. of שֻׁלְחָן shulhân (LXX τράπεζα, Vulg. mensa). 'Table' is used with the following meanings. 1. A flat-topped stand, upon which victuals were set during meals, and around which people squatted or reclined. Such stands were usually small; in ancient Egypt they were rarely more than a foot in height. Lepsius represents a table of this kind heaped with meat, bread, and fruit, with two persons sitting by it (Denkm. ii. 52). In the Middle and New Empire stands are sometimes represented as frameworks of laths bearing jars and other vessels on the top, and with an underself for the solid food. Such tables are named wth or wtn or tbhu. In Assyrian contracts, temple tables are called salhu. The tables used by the fellahin of Palestine are mostly round, and rarely more than 12 inches high. Probably the ancient domestic tables were also round, as Goodwin and Zornius have inferred from such expressions as 'round about the table.' The table in the prophet's chamber (2 K 4¹⁰) was probably a stand of this kind. It is possible that the shulhân may have been originally a mat or something spread under the food platter, as can be often seen at present among the fellahin; but it must sometimes have been sufficiently high to allow of portions of food dropping from it. The seventy kings who gleaned their meat under Adonibezek's table (Jg 1⁷) may have been fed from the leavings of the royal meals; but the boast is probably an Oriental exaggeration, and the number a copyist's mistake. Posidonius tells of the king of the Parthians throwing food to persons sitting around him (Athenæus, iv. 38). The Greek trapeza was usually four-footed, hence perh. the name (Eustath. Comm. ad Odys. A. 111); nevertheless it was sometimes called tripous (Ath. ii. 32), a usage ridiculed by Aristophanes in an extant fragment of Telmaces. Homer represents each guest as having a separate table (Od. xvii. 333). These were sometimes covered with a cloth (Crates, Theria, in Ath. vi. 267). The table was removed after the feast. The larger tables of a guest-chamber were longer trapezai, around which the guests reclined, and helped themselves from the common dishes; hence the expression in Lk 22²¹ 'the hand . . . is with me on the table.' The food was usually on a platter, but sometimes laid on the table without any dish; hence the disgust of the condition described in Is 28⁸.

* The doubts raised as to the historical character of this section do not materially affect the statement here made.

† The difference between keeping the festival with and without the additional eighth day is illustrated by comparing the accounts of the dedication of Solomon's temple in Kings and Chronicles. In 1 K 8⁶⁶ it says, 'on the eighth day he sent them away,' i.e. on the 22nd of the month; but in 2 Ch 7⁸⁻¹⁰ it says, 'in the eighth day they made a solemn assembly (ázereh) . . . and on the three and twentieth day of the seventh month he sent the people away. . . . The Chronicler describes the feast as kept according to the rule of Leviticus; the writer of Kings assumes that the rule of Deut. was followed.

2. To prepare a table for any one is to feed or nourish him, as in Ps 23⁵. Figuratively, the personified Wisdom is said to furnish a table for man's instruction (Pr 9²). Distributing the means of sustenance to those of the early Christians who lacked, was called by the apostles 'serving tables' (Ac 6²). To eat at one's table is to be a member of his household or an honoured guest. David, as one of Saul's officers, ate at the king's table (1 S 20²⁸), and Mephibosheth as a guest ate at David's table (2 S 9⁷⁻¹⁰, 11, 12, 1 K 2⁷). The 850 prophets who are said to have eaten at Jezebel's table (1 K 18¹⁹) did not necessarily sit down with their royal hosts, nor did the servants of Solomon who consumed the meat of his table, the variety and amount of which amazed the queen of Sheba (1 K 10²): the expression means that they were fed by the royal bounty (see Heraclides in Athen. iv. 26). The same is probably true of the 150 Jews and rulers whom Nehemiah claims to have had at his table (Neh 5¹⁷). The honour of sitting at meat with the king was a special favour (2 S 19²⁸), requiring careful behaviour (Pr 23¹), and sudden leaving of the table was a mark of displeasure (1 S 20³⁴). Those round the table are said to sit at table (1 K 13²⁸), and the members of the family circle are said to be round about the table (Ps 128³); squatting, as the children of the fellahin do still. 'The table,' in the sense of the indulgence in dainties, is to be a snare for the wicked (Ps 69²², Ro 11¹⁹). God's table to which the birds of prey are invited is provided with the flesh of His enemies (Ezk 39²⁰), a figurative description of His just judgment of the wicked. The table in Ezk 23⁴¹ is prepared for purposes of the toilet.

In the NT 'table' is used in the sense of meal in Lk 22²¹⁻³⁰, Jn 12² (where RV substitutes 'sat at meat' for the AV 'sat at the table'). In Jn 13²⁸ 'no man at table' is the tr. of οὐδεὶς τῶν ἀνακειμένων. The dogs in the neighbouring Gentile district fed under the table (Mt 15²⁷⁻²⁸, Mk 7²⁸, Lk 16²¹). Lazarus the beggar desired the crumbs which were gathered and thrown out from under the rich man's table (Lk 16²¹).

3. For the table of shewbread see artt. SHEWBREAD, and TABERNACLE, p. 662 f.

4. The 'table of the Lord' stands in Mal 17. 12 (cf. Ezk 41²² 44¹⁶) for the altar. In 1 Co 10²¹, where it is contrasted with the 'table of devils,' it is evidently from the context the Lord's Supper as compared with pagan idol-feasts, the expression being probably borrowed from our Lord's words 'at my table' in Lk 22³⁰.

5. The tables of the money-changers (αἱ τράπεζαι τῶν κολλυβιστῶν) were the small square trays on stands which are familiar objects at the gates and bazaars of Eastern towns on which coins are displayed, and beside which the money-changers stand. These are not infrequently overturned in the numerous disputes about the value of exchanges. These money-changers were the bankers of primitive times: thus in the Isæus of Dionysius of Halicarnassus the expression τράπεζαν κατασκευάζειν is used in the sense of setting up a bank (Reiske, vii. 309). Our Lord overthrew those set up in the courts of the temple (Mt 21¹², Mk 11¹⁵, Jn 2¹⁵).

6. Table in the sense of a flat surface upon which writings were inscribed is expressed by the word מִלָּה. See following article.

7. In Ca 1¹⁹ 'table' is the tr. of כִּסֵּי, rendered by LXX ἐν ἀνακλισει αὐτοῦ and Vulg. in accubitu suo; cf. perh. 1 S 16¹¹, and in late Heb. כִּסֵּי (Levy, 3. 163) and כִּסֵּי (ib. 464; Schechter, Ben Sira 56). It probably means, from the context, a couch. See, further, the Comm. ad loc.

In RV 'table' is left out in Mk 7⁴. AV here tr. κλινῶν, 'tables,' but puts 'beds' in margin. The words καὶ κλινῶν are read by ADΧΠΠΣΦ al min²⁴ latt syrr. pesh bel go arm Or; omitted by אבלא min perpauo syr aln me.

TABLE, TABLET.—1. לִּי (etym. unknown). This word, which may be used of wooden boards or planks (Ex 27⁸ 38⁷ in the altar of the Tabernacle, Ezk 27⁵ in the ship fig. of Tyre, Ca 8⁹ in a door) or of metal plates (1 K 7³⁸ on bases of lavers in Solomon's temple), is far more frequently used of stone tablets, esp. those on which the Ten Words are said to have been written (Ex 24¹² 31¹⁸ bas 32¹⁵ bas. 18 bas. 19 34¹ ter. 4 bas. 38. 39, Dt 4¹³ 5¹⁹ (Eng. 22) 9⁹ bas. 10. 11. 15. 17 10¹. 2 bas. 2 bas. 4 5, 1 K 8⁹, 2 Ch 5¹⁰); of a tablet for writing a prophecy upon (Is 30⁷ [|| פָּרָא], Hab 2²); fig. in Pr 3³ 7³ (wise counsels are to be written on the table of the heart), Jer 17¹ (the sin of Judah is graven [חָרָוּ] upon the table of their heart). In all these passages both AV and RV tr. לִּי, when used of stone, by 'table(s),' except Is 30⁸ where RV has 'tablet,' a rendering which might well have been adopted uniformly. The LXX reproduces by πλάτ (except Ex 24¹², Is 30⁸, Hab 2² [all πυλίων], Pr 3³ 7³ [both πλάτος], and Jer 17¹ [wanting in LXX]), and this is also the NT term (2 Co 3³, He 9⁴). The 'writing-table' (παρακλίδιον, RV 'writing-tablet') of Lk 1⁴⁸ was probably a waxen tablet. For a description of the use of both stone and wax for writing purposes see art. WRITING.

2. נִיָּן (the tablet inscribed with a קֶטֶף [stylus], 'to Maher-shalal-hash-baz,' Is 8¹ AV 'roll'). The essential signification of this word appears to be something with a smooth polished surface, whether of wood, stone, or metal. [For נִיָּן B has τύμος καινού μεγάλου, Α τόμ χάρτου κ. μ., Aq. κεφαλὴς μεγάλῃ, Symm. τεύχος μέγα]. The only other occurrence of the Heb. word is in Is 3², where [in plur.] it prob. means 'tablets of polished metal,' 'mirrors' (so Targ., Vulg., Ges., Del., Cheyne, Dillm.-Kittel, but see Marti, ad loc., and cf. the LXX τὰ διαφανῆ Λακωνικά). 3. AV 'tablets' (כִּטְוֹת [etym. unknown]; LXX περιδέξιοι, περιδέξια; RV 'armlets'), Ex 35²², Nu 31³⁰. The Heb. word prob. stands for some neck ornament† (RVm 'necklaces'; cf. Dillm.-Ryssel or Baentsch, Exodus, ad loc.). 4. The 'tablets' (i.e. lockets) of AV in Is 3² become in RV 'perfume boxes' (so Ges.; cf. Vulg. olfactoriola), and some such sense [possibly 'ointment boxes'; so P. Haupt (deriving from Assy. pasûnu, 'to anoint oneself') in Cheyne's 'Isaiah,' SBOT p. 82] is required by the context for the Heb. שָׁמֵר אֵל, although it may be doubted whether שָׁמֵר ever in the OT [Pr 27⁹ is a doubtful passage] actually means 'odour.' The meaning is perh. 'of health,' i.e. serving to give health to those who smell them (= 'reviving,' 'refreshing'; cf. the Niph. of the root שָׁמַר, and its use in Ethp. in Syr.

† This is no doubt the meaning of the English word used by AV, for in the language of the day an ornament hanging from the neck could be called a 'tablet,' as Golding, Ovid, 123, 'Riches pearls were hanging at her ears, and tablets at her breast.'

TABOR (תָּבוֹר; B Θαββαῖά, A and Luc. Θαβώρ; Vulg. Thabor).—A city in Zebulun given to the Merarite Levites (1 Ch 6⁷⁷). No name having any similarity to Tabor occurs in the earlier list of Levitical cities in Zebulun (Jos 21³⁴⁻³⁵). Various suggestions, none of them quite satisfactory, have been made in regard to this place,—that the occurrence of the name in 1 Chron. is due to a transcriber's error; that it is an abbreviation of Chisloth-tabor, a town on the border of Zebulun (Jos 19¹²); that it is the Daberath of Jos 21²⁸, now Debūriḥ; and that either a town on Mount Tabor or the mountain itself is intended. Some authorities suppose it to be the same place as Tabor on the border of Issachar (Jos 19²², B Γαθβώρ, A Θαβώρ, Luc. Θαβώρ), and that at which the brothers of Gideon were slain by Zebah and Zalmunna (Jg 8¹⁸).

TABOR, MOUNT (תֶּבֶר; LXX ὄρος Θαβώρ, δὲ Ἰταβύριον (in Jer. and Hos.); Thabor).—One of the most celebrated, and, at the same time, one of the most striking, mountains in Palestine. At the N.E. extremity of the rich plain of Esdraelon, and only about 5 miles E. of Nazareth, a limestone hill of unique outline rises to a height of 1843 feet above the sea. This is Mount Tabor, the Atabyrium, or Itabyrium of Greek and Roman writers, now called Jebel et-Tār. The mount overlooks the adjacent hills of Lower Galilee, and, being connected with them only by a low ridge, is practically isolated. Its form approaches that of a truncated cone with rounded sides, and a fairly level, oval-shaped summit. When viewed from a distance, especially from the S.W., it has the appearance of a hemisphere, and is remarkable for its symmetrical form, its graceful outline, and its wooded slopes. The mount is often capped with mist, and even in the dry season heavy dews refresh the parched soil, and give new life to the oaks, pistachios, and other trees that partially cover its slopes. In these coverts, during the Middle Ages, wild beasts found shelter; and wild boars, birds, and small game still make them their home. The slopes are steep and rocky, but the ascent can be made with ease—nearly everywhere on foot, and in more than one place on horseback. The view from the summit is disappointing, in so far that there is no one spot from which a complete panorama can be obtained; but from many points places of the greatest sacred and historic interest can be seen. To the S.W. and W., stretched out like a map, the great plain of Esdraelon extends beyond Taanach and Megiddo to the gorge of the Kishon and the ridge of Carmel. To the N. are the heights of Lūbiḥ and the 'Horns of Hattin,' where Guy de Lusignan and the Templars made their last stand before surrendering to Saladin; and beyond them lie Safed and the hills of Upper Galilee, with snow-capped Hermon and the peaks of Lebanon in the distance. To the N.E. and E. are the Sea of Galilee and the rugged Haurān, the Jordan Valley, the deep gorge of the Yarmuk, and the high tableland of Bashan; and to the S.E. the mediæval fortress of Belvoir (Kaukab el-Hawa), the Jordan Valley below Bethshean, and the mountains of Gilead. To the S., on the lower slopes of Jebel Duhy (Little Hermon), are Nain and Endor, and beyond Jebel Duhy can be seen the crest of Mt. Gilboa.

A mountain so situated, and so beautiful, necessarily played an important part in the history of Israel. Its isolation, and the steepness of its slopes, marked it out, from time immemorial, as a fortress or rallying point; and its attractive beauty led the Rabbis to maintain that it was the mountain on which the temple ought of right to have been built had it not been for the express revelation which ordered the sanctuary to be built on Mount Moriah (Schwarz, p. 71). Amongst the mountains of his native land, the Psalmist (Ps 89¹²) could have selected no more fitting representatives than Tabor with its rounded features and scattered glades, and Hermon with its lofty peak and pure canopy of snow. So, too, its natural strength and conspicuous position led the prophet (Jer 46¹²) to use it and Carmel as an image either of the power and pre-eminence of the king of Babylon, or of the certainty and distinctness of God's judgments. Some commentators suppose Tabor to be the mountain alluded to in Dt 33^{18, 19} (see discussion in Driver, ad loc.); and hence it has been conjectured that Tabor was an early sanctuary of the northern tribes, which afterwards became the scene of idolatrous rites (Hos 5¹).

Mount Tabor is mentioned by its full name only in Jg 4^{6, 12, 14}, where it is stated to have been the place at which Deborah and Barak assembled the warriors of Israel before the memorable victory over Sisera (Jos. Ant. v. v. 3).

The mount is probably (but see Dillm. ad loc.) intended in Jos 19²², where the boundary of Issachar is said to have reached to Tabor; and this view was held by Josephus (Ant. v. i. 22) and Eusebius (Onom.). Whether the Tabor at which the brothers of Gideon were slain (Jg 8¹⁸) was the mount, is more doubtful (see preceding art., and Moore, ad loc.). According to Josephus (Ant. viii. ii. 3), Mt. Tabor was in the district of Shaphat (Jehoshaphat in 1 K 4¹⁷), one of Solomon's commissariat officers. In the 3rd cent. B.C. there was an inhabited city, Atabyrium, on Mt. Tabor, which Antiochus the Great took (B.C. 218) by stratagem and afterwards fortified (Polyb. v. lxx. 6). In the time of Alexander Jannæus (B.C. 105-78) Tabor was in the possession of the Jews (Ant. xiii. xv. 4). But the mount passed to the Romans when Pompey conquered Palestine, and, near it, Gabinius, the Roman proconsul of Syria (c. B.C. 53), defeated Alexander, son of Aristobulus II., who had risen in revolt (Ant. xiv. vi. 3; BJ i. viii. 7). At the commencement of the Jewish war Tabor was occupied by the Jews, and fortified by Josephus, who surrounded the summit with a wall (Vit. 37; BJ ii. xx. 6, iv. i. 8). A little later, after Josephus had been taken prisoner by the Romans at Jotapata, a large number of Jews took refuge in the fortress. Placidus was sent against them with a body of horse, and, having succeeded by a feint in drawing the fighting men into the plain, defeated them and cut off their retreat. Upon this, the inhabitants of the place, whose supply of water, derived from the rainfall, was failing, submitted (BJ iv. i. 8).

The later history of Tabor is connected with the belief that Christ was transfigured on the mount, and with the churches and monasteries erected upon it in consequence of that belief. The narrative (Mt 16. 17, Mk 8. 9) seems to demand a site near Cæsarea Philippi; but, apart from this, the existence of a fortified town on the summit of Tabor before and after Christ, makes the selection of that mountain improbable. Eusebius, who states (Onom.) that Tabor was situated in the plain of Galilee, and from 8 to 10 Roman miles E. of Diocæsarea (Sefūrieh), makes no allusion to the tradition; whilst the Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333) places the scene of the Transfiguration on the Mount of Olives. The first notice of Tabor as the place of the Transfiguration is a remark by Cyril of Jerusalem, c. A.D. 350 (Cat. xii. 16). Jerome, A.D. 386, says that St. Paula 'climbed Mt. Tabor on which the Lord was transfigured' (Ep. Paul. xvii.; cf. Ep. ad Mar. viii.), but does not mention a church. Antoninus Martyr, c. A.D. 570, saw (vi.) three churches 'at the place where St. Peter said to Jesus: "Let us make here three tabernacles."' Arculf, c. A.D. 670, found (ii. 25) a large monastery with many cells, and three churches, enclosed by a stone wall. Willibald, A.D. 754, mentions (xiii.) a monastery and a church, 'dedicated to our Lord, and to Moses and Elias.' Sæwulf, A.D. 1102, saw three monasteries, and adds that the one dedicated to Elias stood a little apart from the others. The Russian abbot, Daniel, A.D. 1106-1107, gives a full description of the mount, which he compares to a haycock, and of its holy places (lxxxvi.-lxxxviii.). Its slopes were covered with olive, fig, and carob trees; and on the summit, at the S.E. end of the platform, a small rocky knoll was shown as the place of the Transfiguration. Here there was a fine church, probably that built by Tancred, and near it, on the N. side, a second church dedicated to Moses and Elias. The churches and a Latin monastery were enclosed by solid stone walls with iron gates; and outside the walls were fields, vineyards, and fruit trees. A bowshot W. of the place of the Transfiguration was shown a rock-hewn cave in which Melchizedek was said to have dwelt and to have received Abraham when returning from the slaughter of Chedorlaomer (cf. Fetellus, A.D. 1130). Amongst the churches and monasteries noticed by Sæwulf and Daniel must have been the church built by Tancred, to whom Galilee was granted as a fief; and the monastery founded by the Black Friars of the reformed order of Benedictines of Cluny, who in A.D. 1111 disputed the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Nazareth (Albert of Aix, vii. 16; W. of Tyre, ix. 13; de Vitry). In 1113 the monasteries were pillaged by Arabs from Damascus, and the monks massacred; but they were soon re-occupied. Theoderich, in 1172, mentions a church and monks under an abbot (xvi.) who, according to Ludolph von Suchen, 'used a leaden bulia, like the Pope'; and places the scene of the meeting between Melchizedek and Abraham at the foot of the mount. In 1183 the monks repulsed an attack by the troops of Saladin. Two years later, 1185, Phocas, a Greek monk, found a Latin monastery at the place of the Transfiguration, and to the north of it a Greek monastery. He also saw the grotto of Melchizedek, with chambers above and under ground, and many cells for anchorites; and close by, a church on the spot where Melchizedek met Abraham. In 1187 the mountain was laid waste by Saladin; but in 1212 it was strongly fortified by his brother el-Melek el-Âdel. The fortress was unsuccessfully attacked by the Crusaders in 1217, and dismantled by el-Âdel in the following year. The monastery and church must have been spared, or little injured, for Yâkût, A.D. 1225, mentions it (ii. 675; cf. Mar. i. 434) as standing on the S. side of the mountain; and adds that there were many vineyards, from which the monks made wine. This is confirmed by the tract 'Citez de Jherusalem,' pt. ii., which notices 'a church of black Latin monks' on Mt. Tabor. In 1233 the Church of the Transfiguration was levelled with the ground by order of Sultan Bibars; and later visitors found only 'hollow places and caves beneath the ruins of splendid buildings, wherein lurk lions and other beasts.' Amidst these ruins, however, the Latin and Greek monks from Nazareth continued to hold an annual service in memory of the Transfiguration. The ruins on the summit are those of a fortress with square flanking towers, and, in places, a rock-hewn ditch. There are also many rock-hewn cisterns and a pool, and the remains of the churches and monasteries noticed above. The ruins are Jewish, Byzantine, Crusading, and Arab; but, without excavation, it is difficult to make any clear distinction between them. The Latins and Greeks have in recent years erected churches and monasteries on the sites of the earlier buildings, and the Latins have recovered the place of the Transfiguration mentioned by abbot Daniel.

TABOR, THE OAK OF (AV THE PLAIN OF TABOR; אֵלֶךְ הָאֵלֶךְ; ἡ δρυς Θαβώρ; quercus Thabor), is mentioned (1 S 10⁶) between Rachel's sepulchre in the border of Benjamin at Zelzah and the 'hill of God,' or Gibeah, as one of the points passed by Saul on his homeward journey after his anointing by Samuel. The site is unknown. Thenius emends, from Gn 35⁸, אֵלֶךְ הָאֵלֶךְ 'Oak (terebinth) of Deborah' (Rachel's nurse). This tree is called in the Genesis passage Allon-bacuth, and Ewald and others identify it further with the palm (דָּלִמָּה) of Deborah mentioned in Jg 4⁵. (Cf. Moore on Jg 4⁵; Dillm. on Gn 35⁸; Siegfried-Stade and Oxf. Heb. Lex. s. אֵלֶךְ).

TABRET (see art. TABER) is AV tr. of תָּבַר in Gn 31²⁷, 1 S 10⁶ 18⁶, Is 51² 24³ 30², Jer 31⁴, Ezk 28¹³. The same Heb. word is tr. 'timbrel' in Ex 15²⁰, Jg 11³⁴, 2 S 6⁵, 1 Ch 13⁸, Job 21³, Ps 81³ 149³ 150⁴. The RV, strangely enough, follows this want of uniformity in rendering, except in 1 S 10⁶ 18⁶, where it substitutes 'timbrel' for 'tabret.' It might have been well to drop both 'timbrel' and 'tabret,' neither of which conveys any clear sense to a modern ear, and adopt some such rendering as 'tambourine' or 'hand-drum.' The LXX always tr. תָּבַר by τύμπανον except in Job 21³, where we have ψαλτήριον, and Ezk 28¹³, where a different Heb. text has been followed. [This last may have been the case even in Job 21³.] See, for a description of the תָּבַר, vol. iii. p. 462^b.

The AV rendering of Job 17⁶ 'aforetime I was as a tabret,' has arisen from a confusion of תָּבַר 'spitting' (פָּתַח, אָסַף) with תָּבַר 'tambourine.' The words תָּבַר אָסַף אֶת־נַפְשִׁי, in parallelism with the preceding תָּבַר אָסַף אֶת־נַפְשִׁי ('I am made [lit. 'one hath made me'] a byword of the peoples'), mean 'I am become one to be spit on in the face' (RV 'an open abhorring'). See A. B. Davidson, ad loc., and cf. the notes of Dillm. and Duhm. The LXX reproduces תָּבַר by γέλωτ, 'a laughing-stock.'

TABRIMMON (תַּבְרִימון, 'RIMMON [Rommian] is good or is wise' [see TABEEL]; B Ταβερμύδ, A Ταβερμύδ, Luc. Ταβερμύδ).—The father of Benhadad, 1 K 15¹⁸.

TACHES.—An old word of French origin (cf. attacher) used by AV to render the Heb. תָּכָסִים kērāšim, which occurs only in P's description of the tabernacle (Ex 26⁶ 11. 33 35¹¹ etc.). The Gr. rendering is κρίκος, which denotes the rings set in eyelets at the edge of a sail for the ropes to pass through; Vulg. circuli, RV 'clasps.' The Heb. word evidently signifies some form of hook or clasp like the Roman fibula (see Rich, Dict. of Rom. and Gr. Antiq. s.v.). Fifty 'taches' or clasps of gold, attached at equal distances along the edge of one set of tapestry curtains, fitted into the same number of loops along the edge of the second set, and 'coupled' the two sets together. A similar arrangement of bronze clasps joined the two sets of hair curtains which formed the 'tent' (see TABERNACLE, § vii. (a)). The veil which divided the tabernacle or 'dwelling' into two parts, the Holy Place and the Most Holy, was suspended immediately underneath the line of clasps, a detail of considerable significance for the dimensions of the tabernacle (see § vii. (c)).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

TACKLING.—In Is 33² 'Thy tacklings (תַּקְלֶיךָ) are loosed,' the Heb. word plainly means a ship's ropes. And that was the ordinary meaning of the Eng. word 'tackling' about 1611, as in Shaks. Rich. III. iv. iv. 233—

'Like a poor bark, of sails and tackling reft.'

But the Eng. word was also used more comprehensively of the whole gearing, as in Ascham's Schoolmaster, 65, 'Great shippes require costlie tackling.' And so it is used in Ac 27¹⁹ 'We cast out with our own hands the tackling of the ship' (RVm 'furniture'). The Greek word (σκευή) is as vague, says Rendall, as the English 'furniture,' and may include any heavy fittings that could be readily detached, or spare masts and spars. See SHIPS AND BOATS.

The word is of Scand. origin; the le in 'tackle' is the instrument, so that the tackle is that which takes hold of; the ing is collective.

TADMOR (1 K 9¹⁸ [so Kêrê, AV, RVm; Tamar in Kêthibh and RV; B om., A Θερμὸς, Luc. Θοδμῶρ], 2 Ch 8⁴ B^K Θοδμῶρ, A Θεδμῶρ, Luc. Θεδμῶρ).—The Tamar of 1 Kings is believed by the present writer to be the same place as the 'Tadmor' of 2 Chronicles (see, however, art. TAMAR; G. A. Smith, *HGHL*¹ 270, n.²; Kittel, Könige, ad loc.).

Whatever view be held as to Tamar, Tadmor is undoubtedly the Palmyra of history, a city whose ruins have excited the admiration of all travellers, and whose history under the rule of Odenatus and Zenobia can never be read without feelings of high interest. The city rose from an oasis in the Syrian desert due to springs welling up through the sands, or from rivulets descending from the neighbouring hills, giving rise to vegetation and groves of palms.* At a later period it was supplied with water by means of an aqueduct built by Justinian. The position of the city is about 150 miles N.E. of Damascus, half-way between the valleys of the Orontes and the Euphrates; and the caravan routes in ancient times as well as in the beginning of our era, connecting the Persian Gulf with the Mediterranean, and between Northern Syria, Petra, and Central Arabia, passed through Palmyra. During the wars between Rome and Parthia, Palmyra endeavoured to maintain a position of neutrality; and, about the year A.D. 130, Hadrian took the city under his special favour, giving it the name of Adrianopolis. At a later period Palmyra received the Jus Italicum and became a Roman colony; and in the early period of the Persian wars the city became an important military post, and the inhabitants thus gained a knowledge of military tactics which they afterwards turned to use against their instructors.

Odenatus and Zenobia.—Up to this time Palmyra was governed by a senate; but on the defeat of the Roman army under Valerian by Sapor, king of Persia, and the rejection of the offer of alliance made by Odenatus, who had attained the position of king or prince of Palmyra, the Palmyrene army hovered round the Persian host as it was retreating across the Euphrates with the captive Roman emperor and enormous booty, and inflicted such loss on the Persians that they were glad to put the river between them and their pursuers.† By this exploit Odenatus laid the foundation of his future fame and fortunes. With the consent of the emperor Gallienus the Roman senate conferred the title of Augustus on the brave Palmyrene, and seemed to entrust to him the government of the East, which he in effect already possessed.*

On the death of Odenatus, by assassination, Zenobia his widow, who had shared with him the government of the kingdom, became his sole successor, with the title of 'Queen of Palmyra and the East.' Of this remarkable personage Gibbon says: 'Modern Europe has produced several illustrious women who have sustained with glory the weight of empire; nor is our own age destitute of such distinguished characters. But if we except the doubtful achievements of Semiramis, Zenobia is perhaps the only woman whose superior genius broke through the servile indolence imposed on her sex by the climate and manners of Asia. She claimed her descent from the Macedonian kings of Egypt, equalled in beauty her ancestor Cleopatra, and far surpassed that princess in chastity and valour.† On ascending the throne (A.D. 267) Zenobia maintained the same policy of hostility, both to Persia and Rome, which had been adopted by her husband, and defeated a Roman army commanded by Heraclianus. She also invited the celebrated Platonic philosopher Longinus to her capital to be her instructor in Greek literature and her counsellor in affairs of state. But Aurelian, who had ascended the throne of the Western empire, had resolved to endure no longer the authority of a rival in the East; and in A.D. 272 he marched to attack Zenobia with all the forces of the empire. Zenobia, being but weakly supported in the unequal contest by Varahran, successor to Sapor, was defeated in battle, and attempted to escape by flight towards the Euphrates;‡ but was captured on the banks of that river and brought before her conqueror, who carried her to Rome to grace his triumph. While crossing the straits which divide Europe from Asia, Aurelian received intelligence that the Palmyrenes had risen in revolt and massacred the governor and garrison he had left behind. Enraged at this conduct he at once retraced his steps, and the helpless city felt the full weight of his resentment. A letter of Aurelian himself admits that old men, women, children, and peasants were involved in indiscriminate slaughter; but, taking pity on the miserable remnant of the inhabitants, he granted them permission to rebuild and inhabit the city. 'But (as Gibbon observes) it is easier to destroy than to restore. The seat of commerce, of arts, and of Zenobia gradually sank into an obscure town, a trifling fortress, and at length a miserable village. The present citizens of Palmyra, consisting of thirty or forty families, have erected their [nude] cottages within the spacious court of a magnificent temple.'§

Ruins.—The ruins of Palmyra attest its former magnificence. The principal building is the great Temple of the Sun (Baal), with its lofty arch and grand rows of columns, originally about 390 in number; but besides this there are remains of the walls of Justinian which enclosed the city, and outside the wall towards the north several ruined sepulchral towers, together with the remains of the aqueduct.|| For an account of the Gr. and Aram. inscriptions see de Vogüé, Syrie centrale, pp. 1-8. TAHATH (תָּחַת; BA Luc. Καθάθ, F Καθόδαν).—One of the twelve stations in the journeyings of the children of Israel which are mentioned only in Nu 33. It comes between Makheloth and Terah (v. 30⁶), and, like them, has not been identified.

TAHPANHES, TEHAPHNEHES (תָּחַפְנִישׁ Jer 43⁷. 44¹ 46¹⁴, תָּחַפְנִישׁ Ezk 30¹⁸, תָּחַפְנִישׁ [text. error] in Kethibh of Jer 2¹⁶, Ταφνός, Ταφνάλ).—A city on the E. frontier of Lower Egypt. There is no doubt that it is the same place that was known to classical writers as Daphnæ. The etym. of the name is unknown, and no hieroglyphic equivalent has yet been found. It seems likely, however, that this frontier city was named 'the beginning of the . . . (?)' Ta-hat-p . . . (?). The modern name, Tell Defneh (often mis-spelled Defeneh or Defenneh on maps) is very close to the Greek. The site is now a desolate mound on the edge of the desert, and but little removed from the brackish swamp of Lake Menzaleh. Formerly this district was to a great extent cultivated, being irrigated and drained by the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, now silted up. Pelusium, situate at the mouth of the Nile and surrounded by swamps, was nearly 20 miles away. Flinders Petrie excavated the site for the Egypt. Expl. Fund. and has demonstrated much of its history. One mound is apparently Ptolemaic and Roman, showing where the Daphno of the Rom. itineraries had been. Another mound, still apparently bearing a name connecting it with the Jews, contained remains of a palace or citadel destroyed by fire, which stood in the midst of a great camp. In the camp and fortress were found amongst other things thousands of arrow-heads, of small weights, and many fragments of fine Gr. and Egypt. pottery; while in the foundations of the central building were plaques inscribed with the name of the builder, Psammetichus I. This king, the founder of the Saite dynasty (B.C. 664) is recorded by Herodotus (ii. 30) to have established a garrison at Daphnæ as one of three chief frontier posts, and the Greek objects found there show that Herodotus was referring to the same place when he mentions (ii. 154) that Psammetichus established a camp of Ionians in this region. The number and variety of the weights afford some indication of the amount of trade and money-changing that must have gone on here. It is very unfortunate that no inscriptions of importance could be found; a great tablet of hard quartzite was indeed discovered, but, as it had been exposed for centuries to mutilation, few signs were left upon it. They are apparently the remains of a historical inscription of Psammetichus I. There was little indication of Daphnæ having existed before Psammetichus, but for two centuries from that time it was a frontier post of the highest importance, and a name particularly well known to nations living on the E. of Egypt. A colony of fugitive Jews under Johanan established themselves there after the murder of Gedaliah, Jer 43⁷. 44¹. The fulfilment of Jeremiah's prophecy, made on this spot, that Nebuch. would invade and take Egypt (43¹²⁻¹³), has not yet been ascertained from the monuments, but the excavations gave evidence of violent destruction and conflagration. Herodotus (ii. 30) says that in his time the Persians kept up the garrison there. The place is mentioned Jth 1⁹.

Hanes, in Is 30⁴, can hardly be Daphnæ, for the latter did not rise to importance till a later date.

TAHPENES (תָּחַפְנִישׁ; B Θεκεμείνα, A Θεκεμείνα, Luc. Θεκεμείνα).—The name of the queen of 'Pharaoh king of Egypt,' who gave his sister in marriage to Hadad the Edomite before the death of David (1 K 11¹⁹). Winckler (AT Untersuch. 1-6), and still more Cheyne (Encyc. Bibl. s.v. 'Hadad'), consider the passage as full of corruptions, the chief point being that Mizraim (Egypt) should be corrected back to Musri (in North Arabia). If we accept the text as it stands, Hadad's marriage was not so grand as to be improbable. David was contemporary with the weak 21st dynasty, which appears to have had no influence abroad; nor is it probable that the 21st dynasty kings reigning at Tanis had any considerable authority even over the high priests at Thebes. The name 'Tahpenes' has an Egyptian appearance, but has not hitherto been found on the monuments.

F. LL. GRIFFITH.

TAHREA (תָּחֵרָה).—A grandson of Mephibosheth, 1 Ch 9⁴ (B Ὀπαρχ, A Ὀπαρ, Luc. Ὀπαρ). The name appears (prob. by a copyist's error) in 8³³ as Tarea (תָּחֵרָה; B Θεπέε, A Ὀπαρ, Luc. Ὀπαρ).

TAHTIM HODSHI, THE LAND OF (תָּחִימ הֹדְשִׁי; B εἰς τὴν Ὀπαρσῶν ἢ ἐστὶν Nadasai, A εἰς τὴν Ὀπαρσῶν Ἀδασαί; terra inferiora Hodsi).—A place east of Jordan, which Joab and his officers visited when making the census for David (2 S 24⁶). It is mentioned between Gilead and Dan-jaan. The MT, however, is certainly corrupt. In all probability we should read תָּחִימ הֹדְשִׁי 'to the land of the Hittites, towards Kad'sh (sc. K. on the Orontes).' The emendation תָּחִימ is due to Hitzig (GVI p. 29), תָּחִימ to Thénien (who suggested תָּחִימ or תָּחִימ). Both emendations, which are strikingly confirmed by Luc. εἰς τὴν Κερριεῖα Κადῶς, are accepted by Wellh., Driver, Budde, et al. Another emendation of תָּחִימ is that of Ewald (Hist. iii. 162), who would read תָּחִימ (Hermon). This is supported by Buhl (GAP 69), and somewhat favoured by Löhr and H. P. Smith (Sam. ad loc.), mainly on the ground that Kad'sh on the Orontes is too far north to suit the requirements of the passage. C. W. WILSON.

TAKE.—The verb 'to take' is one of a short list of English words which Earle 'can offer with most confidence as words which have come in through Danish agency' (Philology, § 59). It is at any rate a Scand. word; and from the meaning of the Gothic tekan and its relation to Lat. tangere it is probable that its earliest meaning is to 'touch with the hand,' as in Morris' Old Eng. Misc. p. 31, 'Ure lord . . . spredde his hond, and tok his lepre; . . . and al so rathe he was i-warid of his maladie.' From this would easily flow 'lay hold of,' 'seize,' 'receive,' and the like. The examples that deserve attention in AV may be grouped as follows:—

1. To seize one's person: Sir 23³¹ 'This man shall be punished in the streets of the city, and where he suspecteth not he shall be taken (πιασθήσεται)'; Jn 7³⁰ 'Then they sought to take him (πιάσαι), but no man laid hands on him.' Cf. Mt 4¹³ Tind.

'When Jesus had heard that Jhon was taken, he departed into Galilee.'

2. To come upon one unexpectedly: 2 Mac 5²⁶ 'Taking the Jews keeping holiday, he commanded his men to arm themselves'; 1 Co 3¹⁹ 'He taketh the wise in their own craftiness.' Cf. Earle, Mircocos. 'A Constable'—'Hee is a very carefull man in his Office, but if hee stay up after Midnight you shall take him napping'; Shaks. As You Like It, iv. i. 175, 'You shall never take her without her answer, unless you take her without her tongue.' So to be taken (i.e. 'overtaken') with night, Sir 36²⁶; with evil, Gn 19¹⁹; disease, 2 Mac 9²¹, Mt 4²⁴; fever, Lk 4³⁸; palsy, 1 Mac 9⁵²; pangs, Mic 4⁹; one's iniquities, Pr 5²²; a demoniacal seizure, Mk 9¹⁵; fear, Lk 8³⁷. Cf. Lk 7¹⁶ Rhem. 'And feare tooke them al, and they magnified God'; Rutherford, Letters, 61, 'Take you no fear.'

3. 'Take' was formerly used of the fascination of some good or bad influence, which was often supposed to be due to supernatural powers. Thus Palsgrave, 'Taken, as chyldernes lymmes be by the fayries, fate'; Cotgrave, 'fée, taken, bewitched'; Markham, Treatise on Horses, 'A horse that is bereft of his feeling, mooving, or styrring, is said to be takn . . . some farriers conster the word taken to be struck by some planet or evil spirit.' So Pr 6²⁵ 'Lust not after her beauty in thine heart; neither let her take thee with her eyelids' (אֵינָהּ לֹא תִקַּחְךָ עֵינֶיהָ, LXX μηδὲ συναρασθῆς); so 6²; Sir 9⁴ 'Use not much the company of a woman that is a singer, lest thou be taken with her attempts' (μή ποτε ἀλφῆς; RV 'Lest haply thou be caught'), 23⁷. Cf. Bunyan, Holy War, 17, 'They were taken with the forbidden fruit'; Adams, II Peter 46, 'It is said that Judith's pantofles ravished Holofernes' eyes; her sandals took him.'

4. The following phrases demand attention: (1) Take care, in the sense of 'be anxious' (see CARE), To 5²⁰ 'Take no care, my sister, he shall return in safety' (μὴ λῶγον ἔχῃ); 1 Co 9⁹ 'Doth God take care for oxen?' (μή τῶν βοῶν μέλει τῷ θεῷ; RV 'Is it for the oxen that God careth?'). Tind. 'Doth God take thought for oxen?'—See THOUGHT. (2) Take indignation, Bel 2²⁸ 'They took great indignation' (ἡγάκησαν λίαν); 2 Mac 4³⁰ (ἐδελνάζον). The usual phrase is 'to have indignation,' as Mal 1⁴, Mt 26⁴. (3) Take heart, Bar 4³⁰ 'Take a good heart, O Jerusalem' (θάρσει). (4) Take one's journey, Dt 2¹. Cf. Ex 40³⁸ Tind. 'When the clowde was taken up from of the habitacyon, the children of Israel toke their iornayes as oft as they iornayed.' (5) Take order, see ORDER. Cf. Ac 8² Rheims, 'Devout men tooke order for Stephens funeral.' (6) Take a taste of, 2 Mac 13¹⁸ 'When the king had taken a taste of the manliness of the Jews' (ἐιληφώς γεύσιν). (7) Take thought, see THOUGHT. (8) Take in vain, see VAIN, and cf. Erasmus, Crede, 153, 'This thyng is to be noted and marked that he dyd not saye, thou shalte not name god, but he sayde, thou shalte not take the name of god. For that thyng is taken which is applied and put to some use, and that thyng is taken in wayne and indiscreetly which is taken to a prophane and a vyle use, as when a man sweareth by god in a matter of smal wayghte or valoure.'

Notice, finally, some antiquated uses of the phrase to take up: (1) To lift, Is 40¹⁵ 'He taketh up the isles as a very little thing'; cf. Ac 7³⁵ 'Ye took up the tabernacle of Molech' (i.e. to carry it about with you); 21¹⁵ 'We took up our carriages' (ἀποσκευασάμενοι, edd. ἐπισκ., RVm 'made ready'). (2) To translate to heaven, 2-K 2¹ 'When the Lord would take up Elijah into heaven by a whirlwind', 2¹⁰, Ac 1² 'Until the day in which he was taken up', 1⁹, 11²². (3) To utter, used of a parable, as Nu 23⁷ 'He took up his parable, and said,' so 24¹³, 15, 20, 21, 25, Mic 2⁴, Hab 2²; also of a proverb, Is 14⁴; a word, Am 5¹; a reproach, Ps 15³; a lamentation, Jer 7³, Ezk 19¹; a weeping, Jer 9¹⁰; and a wailing, Jer 9¹⁸. Cf. Ps 16¹ 'Nor take up their names into my lips'; Ezk 36² 'Ye are taken up in the lips of talkers.' (4) In Neh 5² the meaning is to obtain on credit. 'We take up our corn for them, that we may eat and live' (RV 'let us get corn'; see Kyle's note). Cf. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, i. 1, 'I will take up, and bring myself in credit, sure.' J. HASTINGS.

TALE.—The Anglo-Sax. talū meant a 'number' (cf. Germ. Zahl) as well as a 'narrative,' and the verb tellan meant to 'count' as well as to 'narrate.' In all the examples but one of 'tale' in AV (apart from the Apocr.) it means 'number' or 'sum.' Thus Ex 5⁸ 'And the tale of the bricks which they did make heretofore, ye shall lay upon them'; so 5¹⁸, 1 S 18²⁷, 1 Ch 9²⁵. In Nu 1³⁸ Tindale speaks of Benjamin being numbered 'by the tale of names,' but in 1³⁰ Zebulun is counted 'after the nombre of names,' and in 1³⁸ Dan is numbered 'in the summe of names.'

In like manner 'tell' occurs frequently in the sense of 'count,' as Gn 15⁵ 'Tell the stars, if thou be able to number them'; 2 Ch 2² 'Solomon told out threescore and ten thousand men to bear burdens'; Sir 18⁹ 'Who shall number the strength of his majesty, and who shall tell out all his mercies?' Cf. 1 S 14¹⁷ Cov. 'Saul sayde unto the people that was with him, Tell and se which of us is gone awaye. And when they nombred, beholde, Jonathas and his wapen bearer was not there'; Is 10¹⁹ Cov. 'The trees also of his felde shalbe of soch a nombre, that a childe maye tell them'; Nu 1²⁷ Cov. 'All that were able to warre, were tolde in the trybe of Juda'; cf. also Jer 33¹³, 1 K 8⁸, 2 K 12¹⁰, Ps 22¹⁷, 48¹², 56¹, 147⁴ (in several of which 'tell' might be misunderstood as 'mention'), and Milton, L'Allegro, 67—

'And every shepherd tells his tale
Under the hawthorn in the dale.'

In 1 S 27¹¹ occurs the expression 'tell on,' used, as it is still vulgarly, in the sense of 'inform against.'

TALENT.—See artt. MONEY and WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

TALITHA CUMI.—The command addressed by our Lord to the daughter of Jairus (Mk 5⁴¹), and interpreted by the Evangelist, 'Maiden, I say unto thee, arise.' The Aram. words תַּלְיָתָא (so Dalman, Gram. d. Jud.-Pal. Aramäisch, p. 118, n. 6; p. 266, n. 1) have been variously transliterated in Greek MSS of NT. Tisch., with ΤΑΛΙΝΗ, reads τάλιθά; WH, with B, τάλειθά (see on the spelling Westcott-Hort, NT. ii. Append. p. 155, and Winer-Schmiedel, Gram. pp. 43, 44). D has the extraordinary variant ταβιτά (found in different forms in Old Latin texts, e.g. the curious reading of e. tabea acultha; cf. Chase, Syro-Latin Text, p. 109 ff.). κοῦμ (rather than κοῦμι) has the best attestation. This is borne out by the occurrence of the same imperative τῷ in the Talmud, used in Shabb. 110b 'seven times in one page,' where a woman is addressed (so Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, i. p. 631). τάλιθά is probably the Aramaic fem. of tal, found in Hebrew only in plur. תַּלְיָתָא. The relating of the actual (Aramaic) words used by Jesus is characteristic of St. Mark's graphic narrative; cf. 7¹¹, 14³⁸, 15³⁴. It is needless to speak of 'mysterious Aramaic words' as Keim does (Jesus of Nazara, iv. p. 170) on the assumption that the Gospels clothe our Lord's words of command given in miraculous healings

'in Aramaic . . . as if they were magical formulæ' (iii. p. 183). The Evangelist simply reports the very sounds which fell from Jesus' lips upon the ears of the chosen disciples on a specially solemn and memorable occasion.

H. A. A. KENNEDY.

TALMAI (תַּלְמַי).—1. A clan, possibly of Aramaic origin, resident in Hebron at the time of the Hebrew conquest and driven thence by Caleb (Nu 13²² [BA Θελαμειν, Luc. Θαλαμειν], Jos 15¹⁴ [B Θαλμει, A and Luc. Θαλμαί], Jg 1¹⁰ [B Θαλμειν, A Θαμει, Luc. Θαμει]). See, further, art. AHIMAN, No. 1. 2. Son of Ammihur (or Ammihud), king of Geshur, and a contemporary of David to whom he gave his daughter Maacah in marriage. He was still living many years after Maacah's marriage, for her son Absalom, when he fled from David after the death of Amnon, found refuge with Talmai at Geshur (2 S 3³ [B Θομμει, A Θολμει, Luc. Θολμυ] 13²⁷ [B Θολμυαίημ, A Θολομαί, Luc. Θολμυ], 1 Ch 3⁴ [B Θοαμαί, A Θολμει, Luc. Θολομυ]).

G. B. GRAY.

TALMON (תַּלְמוֹן, in Neh 12²⁸ תַּלְמוֹן).—The name of a family of temple gatekeepers, 1 Ch 9¹⁷, Ezr 2⁴², Neh 7¹⁰ 11¹⁹ 12²⁸ (B Ταμμόν, Τελμών, Τελαμών, Τελαμειν; A Τελμόν, Τελμών, Τολμών; Luc. Σελμών, except in 1 Ch 9¹⁷ Τελμών). See, also, TELEM.

TAMAR (תָּמָר 'palm-tree').—1. (Θαμάρ) A Canaanite woman, married to ER and then to his brother ONAN. When Judah, deterred by the death, successively, of two sons, hesitated to give his surviving son, Shelah, to perform the duty of levir (see MARRIAGE, vol. iii. p. 268*), Tamar, who had assumed the disguise of a kēdēshāh in order to effect her purpose, became by her father-in-law himself the mother of twin sons, PEREZ and ZERAH (Gn 38 [J], Ru 4¹², 1 Ch 2⁴, Mt 1³). 2. (Θημάρ, Θαμάρ) The beautiful sister of Absalom, who was violated and brutally insulted by her half-brother, Amnon, 2 S 13¹. This conduct led to the murder of the latter by Absalom, v. 28*. The significance of v. 13 ('speak unto the king, for he will not withhold me from thee') is noticed in art. MARRIAGE, vol. iii. p. 267*. 3. A daughter of Absalom (2 S 14²⁷ B Θημάρ, A Θαμάρ). The LXX adds that she became the wife of Rehoboam. She would thus be identical with MAACAH of 1 K 15², 2 Ch 11^{20*}. In the Lucian reads Μααχ even in 2 S 14²⁷. This question, however, of the identity of Rehoboam's wife is involved in considerable obscurity. See the Comm. ad loc.

J. A. SELBIE.

TAMAR (תָּמָר 'palm-tree'; Θαμάρ; Thamar).—1. In the vision of Ezekiel, the eastern boundary of the land which the twelve tribes were to inherit was to terminate at the East, or Dead Sea; and the S. boundary was to be 'from Tamar as far as the waters of Meriboth-kadesh to the wādy of Egypt' (Ezk 47¹⁹; read also תָּמָר 'unto Tamar, for תָּמָר 'ye shall measure' in v. 18). The land was to be divided into parallel strips extending from E. to W., and the southern strip was to be assigned to Gad, whose S. boundary was to be that of the twelve tribes (Ezk 48²⁸). A comparison of the boundaries in Ezk 47 with those given in Nu 34, shows that the same limits are intended, and Tamar must therefore be looked for in the vicinity of the ascent of Akrabbim to the S. of the Dead Sea (cf. the boundary of Judah in Jos 15¹⁴). Tamar cannot be 'Hazazon-tamar which is Engedi' (2 Ch 20²), for this place is near the middle of the W. shore of the Dead Sea, and is mentioned under its later name by Ezekiel (47¹⁹). It may possibly be the Asasan Thamar of Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. 85. 3, 210. 86), which they identified with Thamara, a village with a fort and Roman garrison, which was a day's journey from Hebron on the road to Elath. This place appears as Thamaro in the Peutinger Tables, on the road from Hebron to Petra; and as a place in Judaea in Ptolemy (v. xvi. 8). But it has not yet been identified.

2. In 1 K 9¹⁸ the RV, following the Kēthibh, reads Tamar (B om., A Θερμάθ) as the name of one of the places which Solomon built, whilst AV, following the Kērl, reads Tadmor (cf. 2 Ch 8⁴). All the other places mentioned in this passage, Gezer, Beth-horon, and Baalath, are in Southern Palestine, and the expression 'Tamar in the wilderness, in the land,' seems to imply that, like Baalath, it was either in the Negeb, or in the wilderness of Judah. It is probably the same place as No. 1 above. 'Tadmor' of the Kērl prob. came from 2 Ch 8⁴, and its place there may have been due to a characteristic desire on the part of the Chronicler to bring Solomon into connexion with the historic Palmyra (see Thenius or Kittel, ad loc.).

C. W. WILSON.

TAMARISK (תְּמָר, δρουρα).—This name occurs 3 times in OT (RV only; see GROVE, No. 2). Abraham planted a tamarisk tree in Beersheba, Gn 21¹⁸ (J); Saul sat under the tamarisk תְּמָר 1 S 22⁴; Saul and his sons were buried under the tamarisk in Jabesh, 1 S 31¹². There are 8 or perhaps 9 species of tamarisk in Palestine and Syria. Of these the most abundant are Tamarix Syriaca, Boiss., T. tetrandra, Pall., T. tetragyna, Ehr., and T. Palasi, Desv., all of which are found along the coast. There are also T. Jordanis, Boiss., T. mannifera, Ehr., T. articulata, Vahl, and T. macrocarpa, Bunge, desert species. They are shrubs or small trees, with a flattened hemispherical comus, and brittle branches and twigs, with minute scale-like leaves, white or pinkish, perfect or dioecious flowers, in dense spike-like racemes. Most of them thrive, especially in sandy soil, or exposures where they receive the sea air laden with salt. They sometimes attain a height of 30 ft., and would easily, in that case, serve as landmarks (1 S 22⁴). The tamarisk in Jabesh may have marked a shrine.

G. E. POST.

TAMMUZ (תַּמְזָר, Θαμμοῦς, Adonis).—In the 6th year of Jehoiachin's captivity, and the 5th day of the 6th month, Ezekiel saw women in the north gate of the temple 'weeping for Tammuz' (Ezk 8¹⁴). Tammuz was a Bab. deity whose worship had been imported into the west at an early period. The name was originally the Sumerian Dumu-zi, 'the son of life,' which became in Semitic Babylonian Dummi-zu and Dūzu, though in Babylonian contract-tablets of the age of Abraham we also find Tamuzu (see Rec. de trav. relat. à la phil. et arch. égypt. et assyr. t. xvii. p. 39 note). The form Tā'ūz given by en-Nedim, an Arab writer of the 10th century, contains a reminiscence of the abbreviated form, like the Thoas and Theias of Greek mythology.

Tammuz was originally the Sun-god, the son of Ea and the goddess Sirdu, and the bridegroom of the goddess Istar. He seems to have been primarily a god of Eridu, the culture-city of Babylonia on the Persian Gulf. His home was under the shade of the tree of life or world-tree, which grew in the midst of the garden of Eridu, and on either side of which flowed the rivers Tigris and Euphrates. The legendary poems of Babylonia described him as a shepherd, cut off in the beauty of youth, or slain by the boar's tusk of winter (see Macrobian Saturn. i. 21), for whom the goddess Istar mourned long and vainly. She even descended into Hades (see BABYLONIA, vol. i. p. 221^b) in the hope of restoring him to life, and the hymn which described her descent through the seven gates of the infernal world was recited at the annual commemoration of the death of the god by 'the wailing men and wailing women.' This took place in Babylonia on the 2nd day of the 4th month, which bore, accordingly, the name of Tammuz (our June), the day being called a day of 'weeping.' Istar was believed to have mourned her lover with the words, 'O my brother, the only (son)!' and to these the mourners further added, 'Ah me, ah me!' This mourning for the 'only son' is referred to in Am 8¹⁰ (cf. Zec 12¹¹), and the words of the refrain are given in Jer 22¹⁸. Under the form of αἰλῶν (ai-lênû, 'woe to us') they were carried from Phoenicia to Greece, and gave rise to the belief in the mythical Linos.

In Canaan Tammuz was addressed as Adonai, 'my lord,' the Greek Adonis, and the story of Adonis and Aphrodite, the Ashtoreth or Istar, of the Semites, made its way to Cyprus, and from thence to Greece. But Tammuz had long since changed his character. He had ceased to be the young and beautiful Sun-god, and had become the representative of the vegetation of spring, growing by the side of the canals of Babylonia, but parched and destroyed by the fierce heats of the summer. Hence in Babylonia his funeral festival came to be observed in the month of June, and in Palestine two months later.

Gebal was the chief seat of the Phœn. observance of the festival. In the red marl brought down in the spring-time by the river Adonis (now Nahr Ibrahim), the women of Gebal saw the blood of the slaughtered god. 'Gardens of Adonis' were planted, pots filled with earth and cut herbs, which soon withered away, and in which a wooden figure of the god had been placed. The wailing women tore their hair and lacerated their breasts during the seven days that the period of lamentation lasted. In the time of the 23th Egypt. dynasty, Adonis of Gebal was identified with Osiris, and the festival of his resurrection was accordingly commemorated as well as that of his death. The announcement of it was made by a head of papyrus which came over the waves from Egypt, while the Alexandrians declared that it was at Gebal that Isis had found the dismembered limbs of Osiris (see Lucian, de Dea Syr. 7). How the funeral festival was celebrated in the temple of Aphrodite (Ashtoreth) on the Lebanon is described by Lucian (de Dea Syr. 6). In an ancient Bab. hymn Tammuz is called 'the lord of Hades.'

In the Nabatean Agriculture of Kuthâmi, a Mendaite writer of Chaldea in the 5th cent. A.D., we are told of the temple of the Sun at Babylon, in which the images of the gods from all the countries of the world gathered themselves together to weep for Tammuz, and Ibn Wahshiyyah, the translator of the work into Arabic, adds that he had 'lit upon another Nabatean book, in which the legend of Tammuz was narrated in full; how he summoned a king to worship the 7 (planets) and the 12 (signs of the Zodiac), and how the king put him to death, and how he still lived after being killed, so that he had to put him to death several times in a cruel manner, Tammuz coming to life again each time, until at last he died.' Abû Sayyid Wahb ibn Ibrahim (quoted by en-Nedim) states that the festival of weeping women in honour of 'Ta'uz' was on the 15th of Tammuz, and that Ta'uz had been put to death by having his bones ground in a mill. The Græco-Phœnician version of the legend is given by Melito in his Apology (Cureton's Spicileg. Syriacum, p. 25 of Syr. text): 'The sons of Phœnicia worshipped Balthi (Beltis), the queen of Cyprus. For she loved Tamuzo, the son of Kuthar, the king of the Phœnicians, and she forsook her kingdom and came to dwell in Gebal, a fortress of the Phœnicians. And at that time she made all the villages subject to Kuthar the king. For before Tamuzo she had loved Ares, and committed adultery with him, and Hephæstos her husband caught her, and was jealous of her. And Ares came and slew Tamuzo on Lebanon while he was hunting the wild boars. And from that time Balthi remained in Gebal, and died in the city of Aphaka where Tamuzo was buried.'

TANHUMETH (תַּנְחֻמֶּת).—The father (?) of Seraiah, one of the Heb. captains who joined Gedaliah at Mizpah. He is called in 2 K 25²³ the NETOPHATHITE, but in Jer 40 [Gr. 47]⁸ the words 'and the sons of EPHAI' come between 'Tanhumeth' and 'the Netophathite' both in MT and LXX. The form of the name Tanhumeth (LXX in 2 K 25²³ Β θανέμαθ, Α θανέμαρ, Luc. θανέμαθ; in Jer 47⁸ Β θανέμαθ, Α θανέμαθ) looks like a feminine (cf. Lagarde, bild. d. Nom. 126 f.).

TANIS (Τάνις), Jth 1¹⁰.—See ZOAN.

TANNER (βυρσεύς) occurs only in Ac 9⁴³ 10⁶⁻²² of the Simon at whose house St. Peter lodged in Joppa; but tanning was a trade that the Jews carried on in OT times (Ex 25⁵, Lv 13⁴⁶). It was, however, regarded with aversion (see the citations from Taln. in Farrar, St. Paul, i. 264 n.), as it necessitated more or less of ceremonial uncleanness, especially if the skins of unclean animals were dealt with. The fact that St. Peter did not hesitate to lodge in the house of a tanner indicates that he had already become somewhat liberal in his views regarding the ceremonial law. Simon's house was by the seaside, which accords with the custom to-day in towns by the sea. In ancient times tanneries were usually without the walls of towns, because of the unclean character of the trade, and the disagreeable odours caused by the work.

The process of preparing skins for use by the Jews may be inferred from what is known of it among the Egyptians and Arabs. The hair of the skins was removed by lime or the acrid juice of the Periploca secamine, a desert plant (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii. 186, ed. 1878); the skins were first treated with flour and salt for three days, and cleansed from fat and other extraneous matter. The stalks of the above plant were pounded and placed in water, and then applied to the inner surface of the skin. This caused the hair to loosen, after which the skin was left to dry for two or three days, and then subjected to the further processes of tanning. In these they used the pods of the Sunt or Acacia Nilotica, which is common in the desert, or the bark or leaves of certain species of Sumac, Rhus Coriaria or R. oxyanthoides, the former of which is common throughout the country (see Post's Flora of Syr. and Pal.).

Though the trade of the tanner in general was disliked by the Jews, the preparation of skins for parchment was regarded as an honourable calling.

TAPHATH (תַּפְחָת; B* Ταφῆθελ, A Ταφατά, Luc. Ταφάθ).—Daughter of Solomon and wife of Benadinadab, 1 K 4¹.

TAPPUAH (תַּפּוּאָה; B Θαπούς, A Θαφφού, Luc. Φεθ-πούθ).—A 'son' of Hebron, 1 Ch 24¹.

TAPPUAH (תַּפּוּאָה 'apple').—1. (BA om., Luc. Θαφ-φούα) A town in the Shephelah mentioned between En-gannim and Enam, and in the same group with Zanoah, Jarmuth, Adullam, and Socoh (Jos 15³¹). It was probably to the N. of Wady es-Sunt, but the site has not been recovered. Tristram (Bible Places, p. 48) proposes 'Artuf, near Zo'rah; G. A. Smith (HGHL 202 n.) places it in Wady el-Afranj. 2. (B Ταρού, Θαφείθ, A 'Εφφονέ, Θαφθώθ) A town on the border of Ephraim (Jos 16⁸), which lay within the territory of Ephraim, whilst its lands belonged to Manassah (Jos 17⁸). It is mentioned in connexion with the brook Kanah (Wady Kana), and is probably the same place as Entappuah. Tristram (Bible Places, p. 195) suggests 'Atuf, on the N. side of Wady el-Ferrah. See EN-TAPPUAH. 3. (B 'Αραφούρ, A Θαφφού) One of the towns W. of Jordan whose kings Joshua smote (Jos 12¹⁷). It is mentioned between Bethel and Heper, and was perhaps the same place as No. 2 above; but this is by no means certain.

TARES (ζιζάνια).—There are 4 species of tares in the Holy Land: Lolium perenne, L., the Ray Grass, L. multiflorum, Gaud., L. rigidum, Gaud., and L. temulentum, L., the Bearded Darnel. The latter is the most common in the grain fields, and, being as tall as the wheat and barley, is doubtless the plant intended in the parable (Mt 13²⁴⁻³⁰). The other species are lower, and have more slender spikes, and smaller grains. The Gr. and Lat. zizania are prob. derived from the Arab. zū'an or zuwān, the common name for the tare. The seeds are poisonous to man and the herbivorous animals, producing sleepiness, vertigo, nausea, vomiting, diarrhoea, and convulsions, and sometimes death. They are, however, innocuous to poultry. They are sold in all Oriental grain markets as food for chickens. It is customary to gather out of the grain fields, not only tares, but all the taller plants growing among the grain, which can be easily pulled up without causing the person engaged to bend over in a way to endanger breaking the stalks of grain. This not only cleans the fields of other plants, but furnishes a large amount of forage for cattle. The allusion in the parable is in substantial accord with modern custom in the East, which is to leave the cleaning of the fields until the grain is well advanced towards the harvest, and can be readily distinguished from all other plants. Then the women and children go into the fields and weed them out, so that an Oriental grain farm in harvest-time is a model of cleanness and beauty. The Talmud asserts that tares are degenerate wheat; and Tristram (with Thomson and others) says that the peasants of the Holy Land believe 'that the darnel and the wheat spring from the same seed . . . and that in very wet seasons the wheat itself turns to tares; the fact being that, in such seasons, the wheat perishes, while the rain is favourable to the development of the darnel' (Nat. Hist. 487). It is clear, however, that the owner of the field, in the parable, had no such idea, as he attributes the result to the sowing of the seeds of tares by the hand of an enemy. The bearing of this parable upon theories of the Church and of Church government is beyond the scope of the present article, and must be studied in works on the Parables.

TARGUM (תַּרְגֻּם 'translation,' 'interpretation,' cf. תַּרְגֻּם Ezr 47).—The Targums are the translations or paraphrases of the OT books made in the Aram. dialect, which superseded Hebrew as a spoken language among the Jewish population of Palestine and Babylon. The language of the Targums was formerly called Chaldee, but, while the incorrectness of this is universally recognized, no quite satisfactory designation has replaced it. The Targums were composed in Palestine; their language is the Aramaic of Judaea, a later representative of the Aramaic already found in Ezra and Daniel.† In the features that chiefly distinguish Eastern and Western Aramaic it agrees with the old Pal. forms as against the dialect of the Bab. Talmud. Those Targums that were officially recognized in the Bab. schools probably owe something to the influence of the Aramaic spoken by those who edited and copied them, while the influence of the Hebrew is seen in those translations which exhibit least tendency to free composition and paraphrase.‡

Jewish tradition connects the origin of the Targums with the need for an intelligible translation felt by those who no longer spoke or easily understood the Heb. language. The disuse of Heb. as the vernacular of the Jews, before the encroachments of Aramaic on all sides, was a very gradual process, and was probably not general much before the time of Christ. Several books or parts of books in the OT canon stand as proof that Heb. was written and read fully three centuries after the return from Babylon. The bilingual character of the books of Ezra and Daniel (however it is to be explained) presupposes equal familiarity with both languages. Then the Semitic words which occur in the NT are, with few exceptions, Aramaic. Probably the desire to possess explanations of the Heb. text in Aramaic made itself felt in some places earlier than in others. The first translations consisted of the oral explanations given along with the reading of the Sabbath lessons in the synagogue. These were made by a class or guild of interpreters called methorgēmānīm (מְתוֹרְגְמָנִים), appointed for the purpose, but in no sense was their exposition regarded as official or 'authorized.' How far back the custom extended we cannot be certain. The Mishna (c. 200 A.D.) contains some rules made to regulate the practice.§ Thus the reading of the Law was to proceed verse by verse, first in Heb. by the reader, and then its Aram. equivalent by the methorgēmān. In the reading of the lesson from the Prophets three verses at a time might be read, to be followed by their Aram. rendering. There is no mention here of reading out of written Targums, and elsewhere|| the use of such writings was forbidden, at least for the Law, in the Sabbath service, but not the preparation and use of them by individuals for private study or school instruction (see, further, art. SYNAGOGUE, p. 641^b). There must therefore have been a time when the caprice of the methorgēmān contributed to the form of the translation, and in fact it is known that certain renderings which have found their way into the Targums were not approved.¶ Nevertheless, the general phraseology of the oral translations would tend to become fixed by the custom of learning them, and by the recurring use of them in public. Thus we find in NT times traces of Aram. renderings of Heb. verses in books like the Psalms.* The agreement of these with readings still found in Targums, which we know were not reduced to their present form till long after, cannot be purely accidental. The tradition of the confiscation of a Targum on Job in the 1st cent. A.D.† shows that written Targums existed then, though the use of them was not countenanced by the authorities and guardians of the sacred text. Of the character of these earliest attempts at translating the Heb. Scriptures into Aramaic we know nothing, as none of them have come down to us. All those in our hands are the products of a much later time, none perhaps older than the 4th or 5th cent. A.D. Like much else in Jewish literature, these late productions were based upon older exegetic material, the origin of which lies far behind our first means of access to it. But it is no longer possible for us to separate the different strata and assign them to different ages of composition. The examinations of them which have been made in this direction do not yield a sufficient number of cases of distinctly older contents to enable us with confidence to assign them to an early date, embedded as they are in documents admittedly late, of which they share the linguistic and other peculiarities.

The Targums now known to be extant are as follows:—

i. For the Pent., three Targums: (1) the Targ. of Onkelos, also called the Bab. Targ. on the Pentateuch; (2) a Targ. of certain parts of the Pent., called the Jerus. Targ. II. or the Fragmentary Targum; (3) a complete Targ. on the Pent. akin to No. (2), called the Targ. of Jonathan [pseudo-Jonathan], or Jerus. Targ. I.

ii. On the Prophets, Earlier and Later: the Targ. of Jonathan bar Uziel, also called the Bab. Targ. on the Prophets.

iii. On the Hagiographa we have Targums for (1) Psalms, Proverbs, Job; (2) the Megilloth (Cant., Ruth, Lam., Eccles., Est.); (3) Chronicles.

No Targums have been found for Ezra, Nehemiah, Daniel.

In harmony with their character as popular translations of religious books, intended in part to meet the wants of the religious community, the Targums are not always or primarily literal translations. The translations are often mixed up with curious paraphrases and stories such as we meet with in the other Jewish exegetic or homiletic works (midrašim). They contain, besides, expansions or alterations adapted to secure that the sense of Scripture current among the authorities should find access in an intelligible form to the minds of the people. The theology of the early books of Israel's history and religion took no pains to obviate the appearance of a very distinct anthropomorphic character, but the time came when the main feature of Jewish criticism and exegesis was the anxiety to remove or soften down all references to God that could thus give rise to misunderstanding in the popular mind. The history of the Heb. text itself bears witness to this scrupulous feeling for the Divine majesty: cf. the likkūnē Sôphêrim; the use of נאָן or קל when used directly before the name of God; punctuation like לִיָּהּ Is 1¹², etc.; and the LXX has sometimes been influenced by the same solicitude (cf. Ex 24¹⁰). But the clearest expression of this hermeneutic principle is to be found in the Targums, and every page of them illustrates the practice. In fact the basis for anthropomorphic views of God is taken away by the Jewish notion that man was created, not in the image of God but in the image of the angels (cf. Gn 1²⁶ Jerus. Targ.). It will be sufficient here to enumerate the more usual ways by which everything was avoided that could lead to erroneous or undignified conceptions of God in His own nature or in His manner of revealing Himself.

When God is spoken of as coming into relation with man, walking, speaking, swearing, repenting, etc., some periphrasis for the Divine name is used, by which literary device it was felt that God was somewhat removed or raised above the plane of human affairs, and that His action, therefore, was less direct and more fittingly mediated. There is some evidence that כְּרִמָּה, 'word of Jahweh,' found only in the so-called Jerus. Targ. (cf. Lv 11), was poetically and fantastically personified, and so treated as a mediating factor between God and the world.* In much the same way the מִסְרָא, as God's messenger in nature and in history, unfailingly operative wherever He sends it, is the most usual expression for bridging over the chasm between God and man. But it is so identified with Jehovah Himself as creator, judge, helper, deliverer of His people, that, from the mediating use of it, it has become but another name for Him (e.g. Gn 18¹ 35⁸, Ex 3¹² 68¹² 12⁴², Am 8⁸, Is 42¹, Ps 24¹², Job 12¹). How completely מִסְרָא has lost all reference to its own meaning is seen esp. from such a phrase as מִסְרָא דִּיהוָה, סֵד, Jos 22³¹.

God has His dwelling-place in the central division of the highest heavens, and the throne of His glory is there. This glory, resting upon the throne, is conceived of as light, and manifestations of God become manifestations of His glory, veiled doubtless in a cloud so as not to cause blindness (cf. Gn 27¹ Targ. Jerus.). This 'glory of God' (קְרָא דִּי) and 'the presence of the glory of God' (שְׁכִינָתָא דִּי) are further expressions which may be used for God Himself active in the world: Gn 28¹³, Ex 3¹ 20²⁰ 34⁵ (pseudo-Jon.), 1 K 22¹⁹, Is 64³, Ps 9¹³ 17⁸; similarly אִפְךָ Ps 134, cf. Ex 33¹¹ (pseudo-Jon.); וִי שְׁכִינָתָא דִּי Ps 42³. This instance is indicative of the tendency in later times to use a double expression for the earlier simple one, e.g. מִסְרָא דִּי Gn 16¹³ 21³³ (Frag.), יְקָר שְׁכִינָתָא דִּי Gn 22¹⁴ 49²⁷ (Frag.), Job 14¹⁸.

As God is and remains infinitely exalted above and distant from men, His actions and theirs become, equally, events that happen in His presence as a spectator. Hence the preposition קִים is in almost exclusive use before the Divine name throughout the Targums. As a variant for it we sometimes find לִישָׁא esp. in the Jerus. Targums (cf. Ex 22¹⁹, Lv 23¹²); or such words as מוֹלָתָא, מוֹלָתָא are used before the Divine name (Nu 14², Dt 4⁴). Of course, unlike מִסְרָא, קְרָא, שְׁכִינָא, these cannot be subjects of verbs.

Another way of removing the Divine name from too immediate a relation to man was found in putting a verb to which the name was subject in the passive voice: Gn 44¹⁶, Ex 19¹⁶, Nu 9⁹. In this way יִרַע, יִרַע קִים = שָׁעַר = שָׁעַר קִים = שָׁעַר, נָוָא, אֲחֻנִּי = עָבַר, נָוָא.

In passages where eyes, arms, hands, fingers, face, mouth, wings, etc., are attributed to God, some other expression (as 'word,' 'might,' 'shekinah') is often (not always) employed: Gn 8²¹, Ex 7⁴ 15¹⁶, Jos 4⁴ 9¹⁴, Ps 36⁸. Expressions in the gen. case before the name of God are paraphrased: Gn 28¹ 31¹³, Ex 4²⁰.

The sense of a passage is even altered from motives of reverence or to avoid anthropomorphism: Gn 44²⁰ 12¹³, Ex 33⁴, Is 11⁸ 10⁶, Ps 27. Interrog. sentences are rendered by the words that expressed the translator's sense of what the answer intended would be: Gn 18²⁵, Dt 3²⁴.

When one and the same expression has for object both God and men, the difference to the translator's mind is obtained by using a different preposition: Gn 32²³ 50²⁰, Ex 14³¹, Nu 21⁵. The word מַלְאִים, when used of heathen deities, is usually rendered מְרֻמָּה: Jos 23⁷ 15, Jg 2¹². When applied to men it is rendered רֵב (Ex 41⁶ 7), רֵינִי (Ex 21⁶, in Ps 82¹); cf., further, Gn 3⁸ מַלְאִים = סִמְלָאִיא Ps 8⁸, כְּמַלְאִים = כְּרִבְרִין.

i. TARGUMS ON THE PENTATEUCH.—1. Onkelos.

—The official Targ. on the Pent. has been handed down under the name of the Targ. of Onkelos. According to the Bab. Talmud, Onkelos was a proselyte who lived in the 1st cent. A.D., but only once is any mention made of him as the writer of a Targum; § and here the corresponding passage in the Jerus. Talmud,|| which makes no mention of a Targ. of Onkelos, makes it clear that a confusion with the Gr. translator Aquila is the origin of the tradition which connects Onkelos with the Targ. called by his name. The author of the Targ. is quite unknown; and it is not at all certain that we have to seek for it a single author. It has certainly a uniformity of style and diction, but this may equally well arise from official revision. The work, or parts of it, may have been first compiled during the 2nd or 3rd cent. A.D. in Judaea, but it never seems to have obtained any great currency or esteem in Palestine. It is first quoted by the name of Onkelos in a writing of Gaon Sar Shalom in the 9th cent. A.D.* In the Bab. Talmud it is referred to as 'our Targum' (תרגום דין), or by the formula 'as we translate.'† The name 'Babylonian Targum' does not therefore refer to its linguistic character, as was formerly supposed, for its language is the Aramaic of Judaea, but has been given to it because in the 4th or 5th cent., after a final revision in Babylon, the centre of literary activity among the Jews at that time, it was sanctioned or recognized as an 'authorized' version. It came, in fact, to enjoy the reputation of being the best of all the Targums, and a special Massorah was prepared for it as for the original text itself. Even after the original purpose of the Targ. had been left behind, when Aramaic had disappeared before the rise of Islam and the spread of the Arabic language, the Targ. of Onkelos continued to be written, and printed, as an accompaniment of the Heb. text, verse after verse, or in parallel columns. The custom of reading it in the synagogue has gradually died out. Yemen, in South Arabia, is now the only exception to this.

Speaking generally, the translation is good, and faithful to the original. The text from which it was made was in all essentials the Massoretic text, and it is rendered in accordance with the conceptions that prevailed in the Jewish schools of the period. Poetic passages, e.g. Gn 49, Dt 32, 33, are not rendered so accurately, probably on account of their greater difficulty; paraphrase occasionally takes the place of translation; mid-rāshim, both halākhā and haggādā, though by no means in the same degree as in the other Targ. to the Pent., are not entirely wanting. The removal of anthropomorphic or anthropopathic expressions referring to God is effected by the devices mentioned above; but, apart from this, the characteristic Jewish theological doctrines find scarcely any illustration in this Targum. Figurative language, as a rule, is not translated literally, but is explained: e.g. Gn 49²⁸, Ex 15² s. 10 29³². For an instance of cabalistic interpretation in Onkelos cf. Nu 12¹, where אמת שמתה is the Targ. for אמת ויכשת. Gn 49¹⁰ and Nu 24¹⁷ are 'Messianically' explained. Geographical names are sometimes replaced by those current at a later time; cf. Gn 10¹⁰ 37²², Dt 3¹⁷.

The first edition of this Targum was published at Bologna in 1482.

2. Fragmentary Jerusalem Targum.—This Targ. contains only certain parts of the Pent., estimated at about 850 verses in all. Three-fourths of it are on the historical sections of the Pent., and the remaining fourth on the legislative sections in Exod., Lev., Numbers. In about 90 verses the translation refers only to some single word of the text, and in about 14 chapters there is no translation or annotation at all. Where longer sections of it occur it is often extremely paraphrastic, the text being overlaid with midrashic stories. Its language is Palestinian Aramaic, but of a degenerate type, foreign words occurring in it to a great extent. It has affinities with the language of Onkelos, the Pal. Talmud, and mid-rāshim, and also with the vocabulary of the Bab. Talmud.‡

Its fragmentary condition has been accounted for in various ways. (1) Zunz§ considered it a collection of various readings to the so-called pseudo-Jonathan Targum on the Pentateuch. But the agreements are no less numerous and striking than the differences, and cannot be reasonably explained by the assumed negligence of the compiler of the variants. (2) It has been supposed* to be a collection of variants and corrections to the Targ. Onk., more suited to the taste of the compiler and his age than the bald and literal version that had gained supremacy in the schools of Babylon. (3) Another form of this view† is that the Fragmentary Targ. contains extracts from an earlier Jerus. Targ. which at one time existed complete.

Its present form is not due to chance: the selection of passages was made to be interpolated in the Targ. Onk., supplementing or correcting it at certain points. Such an interpolated Onk., with the supplements and corrections combined, is actually found for the Song of Moses and for the Decalogue in old Machzor MSS, and has been made known by Hurwitz's publication of the Machzor Vitry.‡ That there was an earlier complete Jerus. Targ. on the Pent. has been inferred from the fact that in various Jewish works from the 11th to the 14th cent. there have been counted over 300 quotations from a Jerus. Targ. which are not to be found in the Fragmentary Targ., and nearly 300 which do not occur in the Targ. of pseudo-Jonathan. As these quotations often belong to several verses of the same chapter, and many chapters of all the books of the Pent. are represented, the source of them was evidently a continuous and complete work.§ The Fragmentary Targ. is more akin to this source than the Targ. of pseudo-Jon., for, in passages where both the Frag. Targ. and pseudo-Jon. exist, over 100 quotations are found in the Frag. Targ., while only about 20 are found in pseudo-Jon. which are wanting in the Frag. Targum.¶ In about 100 passages the older Jerus. Targ. shows itself dependent on late sources: the two Talmuds, Tanchuma, Rabba Gen., and Rabba Leviticus. It cannot be dated earlier than the second half of the 7th cent., and may be later. The Frag. Targ. therefore cannot be earlier than the 8th century.¶

First edition of Frag. Targ., Venice, 1517.

3. The Jerusalem Targ. (so-called pseudo-Jonathan).—The complete Palestinian Targ. on the Pent. has, since the 14th. cent., borne the name of Jonathan bar Uzziel, the reputed author of the Targ. on the Prophets. From the manifest incorrectness of this—יחזקאל בר אבון intended for יחזקאל בר אבון being read יחזקאל בר אבון—the name pseudo-Jonathan has gained currency. The name יחזקאל בר אבון is found in writers of the 11th cent., and יחזקאל בר אבון is only another, not so accurate, variation of this. It had its origin in Palestine, and its language is the Pal. dialect. It is a complete Targ. on the Pent. (only about a dozen verses are wanting), of the same general character as the Frag. Targ., and based partly upon this latter (or perhaps upon its source, the old Jerus. Targ. mentioned above) and partly upon Onkelos. Its essential character is its free haggadic handling of the text. The Targumist's purpose, plainly, was to make the translation but a vehicle for all the popular stories and comments that had grown up around the Biblical characters and events. Among the indications of its date may be noted: Ex 26⁹, the six orders of the Mishna are referred to; Gn 21²¹ קריש and נכישא, a wife and daughter of Mohammed, are mentioned as wives of Ishmael; Gn 49²⁸, Dt 33², Edom and Ishmael are spoken of as world-powers in a way possible only in the 7th cent. at the earliest. Like the other Targums, it sets aside figurative speech, and eliminates (though not with the same regularity as Onkelos) all anthropomorphic expressions re-that age has come down to us. None of the Targg. to the Hagiog. which we possess is earlier than the close of the Talmudic period, and probably all of them are much later. The first mention of them is in the 11th century. Unlike the translations of the Law and the Prophets, the Targg. on the Hagiog. are entirely the work of individual translators, modelled upon the older Targums. They were never meant for public use in synagogue or school, having, in fact, been composed after the need for Aram. translations had ceased. They may be conveniently divided: 1. Psalms, Job, (Prov.). 2. The Megilloth. 3. Chronicles.

1. It is possible that the Targg. on the Psalms and Job come from a single author; at any rate they exhibit marks of similarity in their general method of handling the Heb. text, and they have some linguistic and other features in common. Unlike the Jerus. Targg. on the Pent., they aim at giving a pretty faithful rendering of the original. Haggadic additions are met with occasionally, but they are concise, and can easily be separated from the translation proper. Many verses are provided with double translations, the second being ascribed to a different Targ. (א"ח=חרטום). In such cases one of the translations is generally haggadic, while the other is more literal. Between forty and fifty verses in Job have such alternative translations, but there are not so many in the Psalms. Half a dozen verses in Job have even a third rendering. The age of the interpolator has been given as the 8th or 9th cent., but there is really no reason for claiming a higher age for the Targg. themselves. Their language is late and artificial; they are compositions in what is no longer to the translators a living speech. The general exegetic devices of the older Targg. are reproduced. Anthropomorphisms as a rule, and all figures of speech, are set aside; references to the history of Israel, to the Law and its study, are frequently introduced; passages are applied to Edom, Ishmael, or Gog; and the eschatological ideas of the synagogue are all met with. We may note that מלך in the Psalms is rendered לוי (cf. Hab 3³. 9. 13).

The peculiar dialect in which the Targ. to the Proverbs appears has taken up so many features from Syriac that it can only be regarded as an incongruous mixture of the Aramaic of the Targg. and the Syriac of the Peshitta. Linguistic elements have been gathered from different quarters and placed side by side, without any regard to the unity of structure which must exist in a spoken or written language.* Many entire verses, estimated as forming a third of the whole book, are identical with the Syriac translation; in a further large number there are close resemblances between the two versions, all the more striking where they agree as against the Heb.; cf. 1⁷ 4²⁸ 5⁹ 7²² 13 9¹¹ 12¹⁹ 16⁴. 20. It has been shown† that the peculiarities of the Targ. are due to the use of the Pesh. by the Targumist. The view that the Pesh. has borrowed from the Targ. does not account for the Syriacisms which the latter contains; the analogy of the Jerus. Talm., where most of the peculiarities of the Targ. occur, though in less proportions, does not help us to understand why just in such large proportions these peculiarities are here found together. Apart from the distinctly Syriac forms, the language and style of the Targ. are akin to that of the Targg. on the Psalms and Job, and there is no reason for assigning it an earlier date.

2. The Targg. on the Megilloth are distinguished among the Targg. to the Hagiog. by their extreme paraphrastic treatment of the text. In parts of them we can still find the translation embedded in the paraphrase, but in other parts the legendary and homiletic sections which have been added form the main feature of the work. These are made up in various ways. Historical parallels are cited for the narratives of the text, with what would be anachronisms if the Targ. were regarded as a tr. of an ancient writing; motives and reasons are supplied to explain the occurrence of events; proper names are etymologized and 'explained'; while figurative language is rendered into prose, allegory takes the place of narrative; the Sanhedrin is frequently mentioned, and the study of the Law introduced on every possible occasion; lengthy genealogies are appended to some of the names occurring in the text; general statements are connected with the names of particular individuals, esp. the patriarchs, Nimrod, Pharaoh, Nebuchadnezzar, Titus and Vespasian, Alexander (?= Antiochus), Messiah the king, and Elias the high priest. The books of Ruth and Lam. are less paraphrastic than Eccles., Esth., or Canticles. One text of the Targ. on Esther (that given in the Antwerp Polyglot) is, with few exceptions, a literal translation. Essentially the same text, with many haggadic additions, is printed in the London Polyglot, and this forms the usual Targum to Esther. The so-called second Targum (Sheni) is much more voluminous than the last named, and is regarded as an amalgam from other Targums and midrāshim which from time to time were made for this favourite book. It is quoted by the commentators as 'haggadā' and as 'midrash.' More than half the work has nothing to do with the story of Esther, but contains legends about Solomon, the queen of Sheba, etc. The Targ. on Canticles is of the same midrashic class: on the basis of certain words of the text we have outlined for us the varying fortunes of the Jewish people from the days of Moses down to the Talmud. We may note besides in this Targ. references to the two Messiahs—Messiah son of David, and Messiah son of Ephraim (iv. 5, vii. 3; cf. Jerus. Targ. on Ex 40¹¹; also Jerus. Targ. on Zec 12¹⁹ in Lagarde, p. xlii).

3. No Targ. to the Books of Chronicles was known to exist until after the great Polyglot Bibles had been published. In 1680-83 a somewhat incomplete Targ. from an Erfurt MS was edited with tr. and notes by M. F. Beck;‡ and in 1715 a more complete form of the text from a Camb. MS was edited with tr. by D. Wilkins. There are numerous variations in the two recensions. The tr. is in many parts fairly literal, but examples of midrashic amplification are not wanting (cf. 1 Ch 1²⁰. 21 4¹⁸ 7¹¹. 22 12²³. 2 Ch 2⁸ 3¹ 23¹¹). The author made use of the Jerus. Targg. to the Pent. (cf. Gn 10²⁰ and 1 Ch 1²¹, Gn 36²⁰ and 1 Ch 1²⁸). The Targ. on the Books of Samuel and Kings was also largely used, of course with the changes in diction and orthography which characterize the Jerus. Targums. 1 Ch 16 is tr. from the Heb. text of Chronicles, and the variations from the Targ. on the Psalms are quite as noticeable as the agreements. Indications of the age of the Targ. are the translations or modern forms of geographical names. The redaction of the text represented by the Erfurt MS has been assigned to the 8th cent., that of the Camb. text to the 9th.‡

The text of the various Targg. has been handed down and edited in a very unsatisfactory condition. The official Targums on the Pent. and Prophets are relatively the best preserved, but an examination of MSS and the printed edd. shows that a critical ed. was never attempted, nor were the materials for it forthcoming. The early disuse of the Targg. accounts for the unskilful and arbitrary treatment of the texts, and of the non-official Targg. it would be correct to say that they never reached a fixed form till such was obtained by the multiplication of printed copies. The vocalization is specially faulty. The South Arabian MSS, with the simpler supralinear system of vowel points first brought to Europe in 1876, provide us with an older and more trustworthy recension of the Targ. on the Law and Prophets than any yet in our hands. MSS on the Pent., Prophets, and Megilloth are now to be found in London, St. Petersburg, and Strassburg, and selections from these have been published.*

Even when critically edited, the Targums are not likely to be of much use for the criticism of the Heb. text of the OT. That text was fixed as we have it before any of our Targg. were compiled, and it is but seldom that they throw any reliable light where it is needed. For a reflexion of the spirit of Judaism, on the other hand, as well as for the Jewish interpretation of the text of their sacred books, they are invaluable. Not that any importance would now be attached to the use formerly made of them by Christian controversialists. The Jewish Messianic ideas run throughout all their Targg.,† but it is now clear that the correct interpretation of particular passages was not exclusively to be found either on the Jewish or on the Christian side (cf. Is 7¹⁴, 52¹²–53¹²).

TARPELITES (תַּרְפֵּלִיטָה, plur. emph.; B Ταραφαλαῖοι, A and Luc. Ταραφαλαῖοι).—One of the peoples settled by Assurbanipal (?) in the cities of Samaria, Ezr 4⁹. Their identity is quite uncertain. Rawlinson suggested the Tuplai of the Inscriptions, i.e. the Tūpānnoī on the coast of Pontus; Hitzig conjectured Tripolis in N. Phœnicia.

TARSHISH (תַּרְשִׁישׁ).—1. See following article. 2. The eponym of a Benjamite family, 1 Ch 7¹⁰ (B Παμεσαι, A and Luc. Θαρσαι). 3. One of the seven princes of Persia and Media who 'sat first in the kingdom,' and had the right of access to the royal presence, Est 1⁴ (LXX om.). See ADMATHA. 4. The name of a precious stone (once Ezk 10⁹ תַּרְשִׁישׁ אֶבֶן, elsewhere simply תַּרְשִׁישׁ), Ex 28²⁰ 39¹³, Ezk 1⁶ 10⁹ 28¹³, Ca 5¹⁴, Dn 10⁶; identified by AV and RV with the beryl, although RvM offers as alternative renderings chalcedony or topaz or stone of Tarshish. The LXX has in Exodus and Ezk 28¹³ (cf. Jos. Ant. III. vii. 5) χρυσόλιθος, in Ezk 40⁹ ἀσθαξ, elsewhere θαρσαι. See, further, art. STONES (PRECIOUS), p. 620b, and TOPAZ, p. 797.

TARSHISH (תַּרְשִׁישׁ; LXX Θαρσαι [on other renderings see below]).—The name of a maritime country, situated far to the W. of Palestine. The biblical passages teach us the following facts about this much discussed name:—

In Gn 10⁶=1 Ch 1⁷ Tarshish is one of the sons of Javan, under which latter name the Orientals seem to have comprised almost all Western maritime nations. In Gn 10 we find the order: Elishah (i.e. Cyprus, after the most modern researches), Tarshish, Kittim (AV Chittim, which was, until recently, usually explained as the Cyprians, but they belong, with all probability, to much more westerly tracts of the Mediterranean; cf. Winckler, Forschungen, ii. 442), and Dodanim (or Rodanim, a very obscure name). This arrangement does not allow any certain conclusions.—In Jon 1³ the prophet embarks at Joppa to flee to Tarshish (cf. 4²), which seems to represent here the extreme ends of the earth, so far as it was known to the Hebrews, the country farthest away from Jehovah's seat.—In Is 66¹⁹ it represents, together with Javan, with the isles afar off and several Asiatic (if we except the somewhat doubtful Pul or Put) countries, the most remote quarters of the earth to which the exiled Jews may have fled; cf. below on 66⁹.—Somewhat similarly, Ezk 38¹³ places Sheba and Dedan and the merchants of Tarshish parallel with (or, better probably, in contrast to) the mysterious Gog of Magog. It is impossible to draw any inferences about the situation of Tarshish from this parallelism; certainly vicinity to the Arabian countries Sheba and Dedan is not indicated (cf. Gn 10¹).—Ps 72¹⁰ quite analogously places the kings of Tarshish and of the isles in contrast to the kings of Sheba and Seba.—In Is 23⁶ the prophet sarcastically advises the Tyrians to flee from the approaching destruction of their city to Tarshish and the isle (read evidently the plural: isles). V. 10 works this out more fully: 'Overflow (RVm) thy land as the Nile, O daughter of Tarshish: there is no more girdle' (AVm; text 'strength'), i.e. that country will be overcrowded by Phoenician fugitives. Evidently, Tyrian ships were specially familiar with the journey to Tarshish.

The remote position of Tarshish led to the use of the expression 'Tarshish ship' for a certain class of specially strong and large ships, destined for longer voyages, exactly as sailors used to mean by an 'East Indiaman' a type of ship, not only one sailing to or from India (thus, correctly, already Gesenius, Thesaurus). Ezk 27²⁸ (RV) 'the ships of Tarshish were thy caravans for thy merchandise,' need not necessarily point to a prevalence of naval trade with Tarshish. Is 60⁹ 'the isles shall wait for me, and the ships of Tarshish first to bring thy sons from far,' might, indeed, also be understood literally as a parallel to 66¹⁹. The curse on Tyre, however, in 23¹, beginning 'Howl, ye ships of Tarshish,' means, evidently, the Tyrian fleet, or its best ships; or, at any rate, not ships belonging to the inhabitants of Tarshish. Ps 48⁷ 'with the east wind thou breakest the ships of Tarshish,' intends only a very general illustration of God's power over the most mighty things. Cf., analogously, Is 21⁶ 'the day of the Lord shall be on all ships of Tarshish.' In 1 K 10²² 'the king (Solomon) had at sea a navy (better: a ship) of Tarshish with the navy of Hiram,' and this ship was sent to bring 'gold and silver, ivory, and apes and peacocks'; evidently, the expeditions to Ophir (v. 11 and 9²⁶) are meant. Wherever that country of Ophir may have been, it is clear that the Tarshish ship was not sailing to or from Tarshish, but along the E. African coast, as already its sailing port Ezion-geber shows. The Chronicler, however, no longer understood that old nautical expression, and interpreted it, literally, of an expedition sent to Tarshish. Thus 2 Ch 9²¹ 'ships that went to Tarshish with the servants of Huram,' etc. (after 1 K 10²²), and 20³⁶ 'Jehoshaphat of Judah joined himself with Ahaziah, king of Israel, to build ships in Ezion-geber to go to Tarshish.' These ships were broken so that they were not able to go to 'Tarshish,' while the original text, 1 K 22²⁸, spoke merely of 'ships of Tarshish to go to Ophir for gold.' These passages might be understood (together with Ezk 38¹³, Ps 72¹⁰) as pointing to a region of Arabia, Africa, or even India, assumptions which of course would be in direct conflict with Gn 10, etc.*

The products of Tarshish are mentioned Ezk 27¹²; Tarshish traded with Tyre with a 'multitude of all kinds of riches, with silver, iron, tin, and lead.' According to Jer 10⁹ 'silver spread (RV 'beaten') into plates' is brought from Tarshish. Finally, the precious stone called tarshish may be noticed; but this, unfortunately, cannot be identified. See preceding article.

The tradition of the ancient versions on the situation of Tarshish is very unsatisfactory. First, the passages are to be set aside where it was felt, correctly, that Tarshish, translated literally as a geographical name, would be misunderstood, i.e. the passages speaking of the Tarshish ships. The Jewish scholars translated, or rather paraphrased there freely, but not inadequately, 'sea ships.' Thus already LXX in Is 2¹⁶ (πλοῖα θαλάσσης).* The Vulg. extends this translation to less suitable passages; cf. Is 23^{1, 10} (filia maris!) 60¹⁹ 66¹⁹ (gentes in mari), Ezk 27²⁸, 1 K 10²² (per mare), 2 K 22²⁸ (40), elsewhere, mostly, Tharsis. Thus also the Targum (סרס), usually, in the Prophets (for exceptions see below). This was followed by Saadia and modern versions (e.g. Luther). Jerome (on Is 2¹⁶) was told by his Jewish teachers that Tharsis was the proper Hebrew word for 'sea' † (in opposition to Aramaic ‡): a strange artifice!

* To avoid this conflict, Bochart assumed two Tarshishes—one in the W. of the Mediterranean, the other in the Indian Ocean. This desperate effort to avoid the acknowledgment of a small misunderstanding by the Chronicler is now universally abandoned. See, further, W. R. Smith, OTJC 140; A. B. Davidson, Ezekiel, p. 200; Bayce, HCM 130.

Another Jewish tradition appears in the LXX of Ezk 27¹² (also Vulg.) and Is 23, where Tarshish is rendered 'Carthage' or 'Carthaginians'; likewise Targ. in 1 K 22²⁸, Jer 10⁹ 'Africa' (i.e. the Roman province of Africa, the former territory of Carthage). This tradition is evidently founded on the frequent association of Tarshish with Tyre, the apparent mother-city of Carthage, ‡ but it does not suit the sense of the other passages.

Josephus (Ant. i. vi. 1) read the name apparently Tarshush, and explained it as Tarsus in Cilicia, an interpretation which formerly seemed very satisfactory. Now, however, we know from coins of Tarsus and from Assyrian inscriptions (Delitzsch, Paradies, 103, etc.) of Shalmaneser that the old Cilician city had the name 𐤏𐤕𐤓 Tarzi, not as Josephus presupposed.

The interpretation most widely accepted at present was proposed by Bochart, Phaleg (preceded by Eusebius [Onom. ed. Lag. 166. 8, cf. 183. 17–18], who already combined Tarshish and the Iberes, i.e. Spaniards). Bochart found the Hebrew name Tarshish in the Greek Tartessos, explaining the seeming interchange of t and sh by the analogy of Aram. th for Heb. sh (which analogy, unfortunately, does not apply here, where no Aramaeans come in question). The remote position attributed both to Tarshish and to Spain, the W. end of the world, according to the opinion of the ancients, suits well, and so does the wealth in metals (especially the Spanish silver and tin); finally, some connexion of the Phoenicians with Spain seems to be recognizable before the Carthaginian conquest. Tartessos is supposed to have been the name of a city (?), extended first to the S. of Spain, then to the whole country. The name of the southern coast, Turdetania, and of a tribe, somewhat farther north, the Turduli, Turduli, seems to allow a comparison (cf. Strabo, below).

A very vigorous attack upon this popular theory has been made by P. le Page Renouf in PSA xvi. (1894) 104. He urges that the whole theory rests only on a deceptive similarity of sound, that Bochart's appeal to Aramaic is unsuitable (see above), that we have no proof for Phoenician settlements in Spain (which were only alleged to have existed in order to suit Is 23⁶ etc.). § He even claims that the city or country Tartessos seems 'to have existed only in the realms of imagination, like the isle of Calypso or the garden of the Hesperides. Its site was certainly unknown at the time of Strabo, though it was then identified on grounds of probability with the

* This might, however, be taken from a Hexaplaric source (Symmachus or Theodotion?).

† 'Hebraei putant lingua propria mare Tarshish appellari.'

‡ More correctly, the mother-city was Sidon.

§ For such colonies, indeed, the tradition (Strabo, p. 157, Arrian, etc.) is very recent. It is questionable if those late writers were able to distinguish between Carthaginian and earlier Phoenician colonies.

neighbourhood of the Bætis or Quadalquivir.* Late writers, like Valerius Maximus, Pliny, and Arrian, confounded Tartessus and Gades. The metallic treasures of Spain, Renouf claims, were developed only by Hamilcar Barcas after the first Punic war, and the tin in the bronze of earliest Greece and Babylonia came rather from Eastern mines (?).† Thus the necessity for going to Spain for tin is removed. Renouf's (l.c. p. 138) idea is that Tarshish has a Semitic etymology, 'the broken' (?), which might (!) mean 'shore, coast' (?), whence the translation 'sea' in the versions (?).‡ The passages connecting it with Tyre show then, he claims, that the Phœnician coast itself is meant. This theory is so inconsistent with Ezk 27, etc., and so forced, that it does not deserve a detailed refutation.

Wüncle (Forschungen, i. 445) modifies the Tartessus theory of Bochart, by referring Tarshish to Taparior, a place mentioned by Polyb. iii. xxiv. 1 as one of the principal cities of Carthaginian Spain.§ This view, however, he puts forward with great reserve.

Cheyne (Or. Lit. - Zeitung, iii. 151; cf. the present writer, ib. 294) expresses the opinion that Tarshish is identical with Tiras (better vocalized probably Túr(a)s) of Gn 10². This latter name might have come in from another source or as a gloss, so that the same nation would be represented in two different forms. Vocalizing Túrshush (cf. Josephus), we should obtain the Tyrsenians, Tyrsenians or Etruscans, bold seafarers, and well known as pirates already to the ancient Egyptians (c. 1200 B.C.), by whom they were called Tursha. Their name might stand for the whole of Italy, possibly even for all European coasts west of Greece. This comparison with the Tyrsenians (proposed already by Knobel) agrees with the wealth in metals, especially with the tin. The Etruscans might have brought this from Spain, although a more probable assumption would be that they obtained it either in the harbours of Southern Gaul (cf. Diodorus, v. 38, on the trading of English tin through Gaul to Massilia) or more directly in Upper Italy, where it might have been brought from various places in Central Europe.

This last identification seems to the present writer the most plausible. Next to it, the identification with Spain might claim most relative probability. Certainty will hardly be obtained with our present means of knowledge.

W. MAX MÜLLER.

TARSUS (Tapóbs; on coins τῶν) is mentioned in the Bible only as the city where St. Paul was born, of which he was a citizen (Ac 9¹¹ 21²⁹ 22³), and in or near which he spent a number of years not long after his conversion (Ac 9³⁰ 11²⁵). It has been universally recognized that his birth and his early education in this city were important factors in preparing the Apostle of the Gentiles for his career. No direct evidence is accessible as to

* Cf. Strabo (148 ff.), who, indeed, quotes this only as a hypothesis, does not know with certainty what the ancients meant by Tartessus, and cannot identify an alleged city Tartessus (at the mouth of the Bætis or at Carteia?). The old name Tartessus (!) of Spain seems to him to survive in that of the Ταρσοῦλοι (?) and Ταρσηνῆες (?). However, le Page Renouf seems to overstate here the shadowy position of Tarshish. Herodotus (e.g. iv. 192) uses it clearly for Southern Spain. Eratosthenes (in Strabo, 148) takes it more narrowly as the region around Calpe-Gibraltar.

† This belief, for which he quotes O. Schrader, Prehistoric Ant. 192, etc. (where the Paropamisus is thought of), has been refuted by Wüncle, Forschungen, i. 161 (cf. the present writer in Or. Lit. - Zeitung, ii. 295, on the Egyptian texts). The tin of the ancient East came from the West, evidently through maritime commerce.

‡ Sea and coast are, however, very different ideas.

§ This was mostly confounded with Tartessus, while, in Polybius, it seems to have been another name of Mastia. The text in Polybius is, besides, very obscure.

the surroundings of St. Paul's early years, which makes it all the more necessary to study the general character of the city and the society in which he grew up. The history of Tarsus is at the same time the history of Cilicia, which affords the opportunity of somewhat fuller treatment of that subject than was given under CILICIA.

i. SITUATION.—Tarsus, the chief city of Cilicia in ancient times, was situated in a rich and fertile plain, only slightly elevated above sea-level, less than 10 miles from the seacoast at its nearest point. The river Cydnus flowed through the middle of the city, and entered the Rhegma,* a sort of lake† some distance below the city and close to the sea. This lake served as an arsenal and harbour for Tarsus; but ancient ships could ascend the river right up to the city (as Cleopatra did). In modern times the lake has become a large marsh‡ on the west side of the river, while the bed of the river has become shallow and impassable to anything larger than a small rowing-boat, and its mouth is blocked by a bar. These changes are the result of the ignorance, carelessness, and incapacity of government and inhabitants, neglecting the engineering operations which must have been applied by the ancients to regulate the river-bed. The proximity of the marshes has made Tarsus more unhealthy than it was in ancient times, though from its low situation in the plain under the mountains of Taurus it can never have had an invigorating climate. South-west of Tarsus towards Soli lay the strong walled city Anchialos, which must have been between Mersina and the Cydnus, a little way back from the coast.§ Mersina, the modern port of Tarsus, stands on or close to the ancient Zephyrion, a small town near a promontory of the same name, 16 miles W.S.W. from the great city. This promontory is a very little way west of Mersina. Anchialos is described by Ritter as the port of Tarsus, and as closely connected with it (like Piræus with Athens), so that the two might be regarded as a single great city, which would suggest that Anchialos was somewhere near the west side of the lake. But Aulai is said to have been the name of the port-town on the lake, and Ritter's view seems a misinterpretation of Arrian, Anab. ii. 5. || The statements of the ancients as to the mutual relations of these places are confused.

The Cydnus originally flowed through the heart of Tarsus, as many authorities mention. But, when a flood in the river had done great harm in the city, Justinian (527–563) cut an artificial channel to carry part of the water round the east side of the city. It would appear that gradually the branch of the river that flowed through the city grew smaller as its bed became choked, and in modern times almost the whole of the water passes through Justinian's channel.¶ In 1432 the inner branch is described as a tiny stream; and in 1473 the eastern branch is spoken of as the only one (see the quotations in Ritter's Kleinasiens, ii. p. 184 f.). The falls of the Cydnus beside the northern entrance to the city are still very picturesque, though only a few feet high.

Tarsus possessed almost all the qualifications required for a great commercial city. Not merely did it possess a safe and good harbour and a rich territory, it was also placed in front of the southern end of the great trade and war route across Mount Taurus, through the Cilician Gates, to Cappadocia, Lycania, and inner Asia Minor generally. Such a situation made it a great city from time immemorial.

ii. TARSUS THE ORIENTAL CITY.—Its foundation was attributed by legend to Sardanapalus, who was said to have built Tarsus and Anchialos in one day, and whose tomb is said to have been at the latter place. A more Oriental form of the legend, as reported by Eusebius (Chron. i. p. 27*), named Sennacherib, king of Nineveh, as the founder. When Tarsus became a Greek city, a centre of Greek civilization and seat of a university, it could not be satisfied with such an origin, but invented a Greek foundation. Perseus or Herakles was named by the Tarsians as founder of the city (see Dion Chrysostom's Oratio xxxiii. ad Tars.; Libanius, Or. xxviii. 620); but this is only the Assyrian legend in a slightly Grecized form, for Perseus was a peculiarly Oriental and Assyrian hero (Herod. vi. 54), connected with the mythology and religion of many places in the eastern parts of Asia Minor; and Herakles was the Tyrian god, the founder of colonies. These legends contain a memory of the time when the Assyrian power extended over Syria and Cilicia, and Tarsus was their western capital. Tarsus is mentioned on the Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser among the towns which he captured in the middle of the 9th cent. B.C. Athenodorus, the Tarsian, said that the city was originally called Parthenia, from Parthenius, son of Cydnus, and grandson of Anchiale, daughter of Japetus: here, too, fancy is giving a Greek colour to local Asiatic legend.

Tarsus continued for a long time an essentially Oriental town. Its early coinage was struck, not by a municipal government like that of a Greek city, but by native kings or Persian satraps, who used Tarsus as their capital. It is true that at an early time considerable influence was exerted on the city by Greek trade and civilization. Thus Greek letters were sometimes engraved on the early coins, and the coinage as a whole was modelled after Greek coins, and was probably made by Greek artisans employed by the rulers of Tarsus. Yet even in the Roman period, after Tarsus had for centuries been transformed (at least externally) into a Greek city, marked Oriental characteristics are apparent. A deity standing on a horned lion, thoroughly non-Greek and Asiatic in character, probably the god Sandon, often appears on coins under the empire; and a monument at Anchialos, inscribed with letters believed to be Assyrian, is often mentioned† by Greek writers. Tarsus therefore was never so thoroughly Hellenized as to lose or to forget its Asiatic character and origin; even as a Greek city it was far from being wholly Greek. Its population, doubtless, was very mixed (as it is at the present day); and even to a greater degree than Syrian Antioch it may be regarded as a meeting-place of Greeks and Orientals.

In the Assyrian and afterwards in the Persian period hardly anything is known of Tarsus. When the central government was strong, presumably the city was governed by satraps. When the central government was weak, the satraps tended to become more and more independent, and even a dynasty of native kings seems to have held Tarsus during part of the 5th and 4th cents. B.C.

In the Anabasis of Xenophon, Tarsus is described about B.C. 400 as a great and wealthy city, containing the palace of Syennesis the Cilician king. But its coinage is much older. Electrum coins of the 6th cent. have been assigned to it, though not with great probability. The kings or satraps of Cilicia struck coins at Tarsus throughout the 5th and 4th cents., with legends mostly Aramaic, but partly Greek, frequently with Baaltars, the Baal or Zeus of Tarsus, enthroned, holding sceptre, grapes, and corn. Coins of Baaltars were struck during the last efforts of the Persians and under the earlier Seleucid kings; but they appear to have been minted at Babylon, and many of the extant specimens have come from India.

iii. TARSUS THE GREEK CITY.—In Seleucid times autonomous coins were first struck at Tarsus, showing its transformation from an Oriental town into a Greek polis, a highly important stage in its history. This municipal and strictly Greek coinage began under Antiochus IV. Epiphanes (B.C. 175–164), when the city was styled 'Antioch beside the Cydnus,'* and took that name on its coins. The growth of Tarsus is evidently the result of a change in the Seleucid rule; it is connected with their frontier policy, and shows that increasing attention was paid to Cilicia by that Syrian king. Before 190 Cilicia had been a district in the heart of the Seleucid empire; but, at the peace of 189, the whole of Asia Minor up to the Taurus mountains was taken from Antiochus III., and Cilicia became a frontier land. It was necessary now to pay more attention to its organization and defences; and the refoundation of cities like Tarsus-Antiocheia, Epiphaneia, Adana-Antiocheia, Magarsa-Antiocheia, belongs to the same reign.† Mopsuestia, guarding the important crossing of the Pyramus, was refounded as Seleuceia by Seleucus III. (187–175). Almost all these cities (along with Alexandria ad Issum and Hieropolis-Castabala) began to coin as self-governing municipalities in the reign of Antiochus IV.‡ It is therefore highly probable that Cilicia had previously been treated more like a subject country or satrapy,§ and that now its cities began to be allowed greater liberty and to be more thoroughly Grecized in their institutions, when it was important to make them heartily loyal. The incident mentioned in 2 Mac 4²⁰ takes us into the midst of this process, and shows that about 171–169 is the probable date of this important transformation. In 171 Antiochus gave the revenues of Tarsus and Mallus to his mistress Antiochis. This provoked riot and even insurrection; and Antiochus had to go in person to quell the disturbances. Apparently he succeeded in this peaceably, by granting freer constitutions to the cities and reorganizing the country generally. The year 170 B.C., therefore, marks an epoch in the history of Tarsus, for it was now refounded as a Greek polis, and called by a new name, 'Antiocheia on the Cydnus.'

There is no reason to think‡ that the change of name was a mere act of adulation to the reigning king, implying no real development in the city constitution. It is true that the name Antioch soon fell into disuse, and the name Tarsus revived; but this was due partly to the fact that the town was not thoroughly Grecized, partly to the fact that the name Antioch was already too common, and the three new Antiochs would hardly establish a right to exist beside the many older Antiochs. Rather we must look on the refoundation of Tarsus as a critical epoch in its history.

The refoundation was certainly accompanied by an increase of population, for the regular Seleucid policy in such cases was to introduce a body of settlers whose loyalty might be reckoned on, and to give them special privileges in the city. The colonists whom the Seleucid kings most commonly planted in the cities of Asia Minor were Jews;¶ and therefore it is highly probable that a Jewish colony was established at Tarsus about B.C. 170.

iv. TARSUS THE ROMAN CITY.—From the decaying Selencid empire Tarsus passed into the hands of the Romans. From B.C. 103 onwards the name Cilicia became 'the Roman term for a great, ill-defined, half-subdued agglomeration of lands, comprising parts of Cilicia, Pamphylia, and other lands' (Ramsay, Histor. Comm. on Galatians, p. 103). In 66 Cilicia Campestris was decisively conquered by Pompey, after having been under the power of king Tigranes more or less since 83; and in 64 it was properly organized (see CILICIA) as a province with Tarsus for its capital, though considerable parts of the country were left for a long time under native kings—Tarcoudimotos I. and II. and Antiochus being the most famous.

Tarsus, while exposed to the oppression generally exercised on subject cities by the Roman republican officials, was favourably treated by Julius Caesar, Antonius, and Augustus. Caesar passed through the city on his march from Egypt to Pontus; and the strong partisanship of the Tarsians for him was shown by the name Juliopolis which was granted to, or assumed by, them (Dio C. 47. 26). In punishment for its devotion to Caesar, Tarsus was harshly treated by Cassius in 43. But Antonius soon after granted it the privilege of enjoying its own laws (as civitas libera) and the right of duty-free export and import trade.* He also made it his residence for a time; and received here a visit from Cleopatra, who sailed up to Tarsus in B.C. 38 in circumstances of extraordinary magnificence and luxury. It formed part of the large realm which he bestowed on the Egyptian queen (see vol. ii. p. 86). When Augustus triumphed over Antonius he recognized that the Tarsians were partisans, not of Antonius specially, but of the Empire as contrasted with the Republic; and he even increased their privileges. Cilicia was now united in one large province with Syria.

Thus Tarsus, when St. Paul was a child, stood before the world at the entrance to the greatest province of the East as a metropolis, a free city with a free harbour, mistress of a large and fertile territory, a centre of Roman imperial partisanship. It had been a Greek self-governing city since B.C. 170, and the enthusiasm with which it had taken up Greek education and civilization had made it one of the three great university cities of the Mediterranean world. Strabo (14, 5, 13, p. 673) speaks of the Tarsian university as even surpassing in some respects those of Athens and Alexandria; and he observes that all the students were natives,† and no strangers came to it; but, on the contrary, many natives of the country went abroad to study and reside, few returning home again: Rome was full of Tarsian and Alexandrian scholars. So strong was the Tarsian love for letters and education! They filled their own university and foreign cities and Rome itself. Demetrius, as Plutarch tells (de Defect. Orac., ad init.), went to Britain and Egypt, the Erythraean Sea and the land of the Troglodytes, to satisfy his scientific curiosity. Athenodorus the Stoic was the companion of Cato the younger, and died in his house; another Stoic, Athenodorus Kananites, was the teacher of Augustus; Nestor taught the young Marcellus, his heir (and Tiberius the emperor, according to pseudo-Lucian, Macr. 21); Antipater the Stoic was head of the school in Athens and the great opponent of Carneades; and other philosophers and poets of Tarsus are named by Strabo, p. 674 f.

† Among the natives (οἱ τῆς πόλεως) Strabo includes, doubtless, persons from the neighbouring parts of Asia Minor. Athenodorus, the most famous of Tarsian philosophers, was called Kananites, from the name of his native village. The village probably was Kanna in eastern Lycaonia, which afterwards rose to be a city coining money.

Philosophers governed Tarsus at the important crisis when it was adapting itself to the imperial system. Athenodorus retired to Tarsus in his old age, greatly honoured by his pupil Augustus, and invested by him with extraordinary authority in the city. He found that Tarsus had been seriously misgoverned and plundered by a certain clique, favoured by Antonius, but now greatly weakened since his defeat. After vainly attempting to bring them back by reason to a law-abiding spirit, Athenodorus, in virtue of the powers conferred by Augustus, sent them into exile, and reformed the constitution of Tarsus.* It appears from Dion Chrysostom (Orat. xxxiii. ad Tars. 20) that the constitution in the Roman period was of oligarchic or rather timocratic type, citizenship requiring a certain fortune;† and there can be no doubt that this was the kind of reform introduced by Athenodorus, for it was in harmony with the whole tendency of the Roman imperial policy.‡ After the death of Athenodorus, at the age of 82, another Tarsian philosopher named Nestor, who also had approved himself to Augustus, succeeded to his commanding position in the city, and enjoyed the respect of a series of provincial governors. The rule of these two philosophers probably continued from about B.C. 29 to some time after Christ.§ It is very probable that St. Paul may have seen and listened to Nestor, who lived 92 years.|| The influence of Athenodorus, too, lasted long in Tarsus, where he was worshipped as a hero, for Dion Chrysostom about A.D. 100 quotes his name (in the Oration which he addressed to the Tarsians) as a household word among them. His doctrines may be taken as those which most influenced Tarsus in the time of St. Paul, and which the latter is likely to have been taught in the schools of that city. Being a Stoic, he found the aim and end of life in release from passions; but, if we may judge from the scanty quotations from or allusions to his writings, he estimated the quality of human action greatly by reference to its relation to God. 'Know,' said he, 'that you are set free from all passions, when you have reached such a point that you ask nought of God that you cannot ask openly'; and Seneca, who quotes this,¶ goes on to state as the rule of life, in his spirit, if not in his words, 'So live with men as if God saw; so speak with God as if men were listening.' The spirit in which he guided the politics of Tarsus is expressed in a longer extract, the gist of which is: 'It would be best to strengthen one's mind by making oneself useful in politics to fellow-citizens and the world; but in the degraded and envenomed state of politics one must be content with the opportunity for free expansion of the mind in benefiting one and all by educating them, by encouraging virtue, by teaching them to comprehend the gods, and to have a good conscience: thus even in private life one fulfils a public duty. The student lives well, not by renouncing humanity and society, but by drawing friends round himself. He who lives and studies for his own sole benefit will from lack of work fall into mere misuse of the time which nature requires us to spend. One must be able to give an account of one's time and prove one's old age by the amount of what one has done for the good of the world, and not simply by the length of time one has lived.'

§ The exact date of Athenodorus is uncertain. He is commonly conjectured by modern writers to have been a pupil of Posidonius (B.C. 130-60); but Eusebius, Chron., gives the date when he was flourishing as A.D. 7. This tends to show that the common dating of his career is too early; perhaps he may be placed B.C. 72 to A.D. 10; or, more probably, Eusebius made a mistake, taking his death in the height of influence for the date when he flourished: in that case 75 B.C. to 7 A.D. was his period.

Such was the environment, on its best side, amidst which St. Paul spent his early years. To estimate its influence on him would be out of place here; but we remember that, when he was rescued from imminent death, bruised doubtless and torn by the hands of the mob in Jerusalem, in answer to the question of the Roman officer, the words that rose to his lips as he recovered breath were: 'I am a Jew, a man of Tarsus in Cilicia, a citizen of no mean city' (Ac 21³⁹). In such circumstances a man does not waste words, or speak what does not lie deep in his nature. St. Paul had to show the officer that he was not an Egyptian, but the tone in which he spoke of Tarsus shows a warm feeling about it as a city and for its own sake.*

The timocratic system introduced by Athenodorus into Tarsus has an important bearing on St. Paul's life. In a city where the mass of the inhabitants could be said to be 'outside of the citizenship,' i.e. not possessing the full rights of a citizen,† he claimed to be a citizen. Citizenship in Tarsus was the certificate of respectability and standing which he mentioned to Claudius Lysias, when it was necessary at once to explain away appearances which were certainly much against him as he was pulled out of the murderous hands of the mob. One may ask why he did not mention his Roman citizenship at that time, for Roman citizenship was a higher honour and a greater proof of respectability; and it seems hardly possible to make any other answer except that, in the excitement of that terrible scene, the feeling that lay deepest in his heart about worldly position rose to his lips. When he was a child he felt himself a 'Jew, a citizen of Tarsus,' and almost unconsciously the words rose to his lips. But the Tarsian citizenship had this value in the eyes of those who possessed it, because it was confined to a select small body.

The history of Tarsus under the empire is a large subject. The following points may be noticed as characteristic of the Asiatic Roman cities generally, and illustrative of their relation to the early Christians and to the Roman State:—

The loyalty of those great cities to the emperors was very strong, and is unusually well illustrated in the case of Tarsus, which assumed titles from the name of the emperors Hadrian, Commodus, Severus, Antoninus (Caracalla), Macrinus, and Alexander Severus; dropping some when the emperor died, and keeping others for long. It took the title of Temple-Warden (ναυκράτος, δὲς ναυκράτος), indicating that one, or two, temples of the imperial worship were built in the city. It induced governors of the province and even the emperor himself, Alexander Severus, to accept office (of course merely honorary) in the city, and boasted of this on coins and in inscriptions.

Titles like these, however, sprang as much from vanity as from loyalty. The great cities vied with one another in inventing titles and appropriating the titles of rivals. Tarsus and Anazarbus competed with one another in this way. Each claimed such titles as Metropolis, First and Greatest and Fairest, Temple-Warden; but Anazarbus was never Twice Temple-Warden, nor Metropolis of the Three Eparchiae (Cilicia, Lycania, Isauria), but only Metropolis of the Nation (ἡμεῖς, ἡμεῖς, i.e. Cilicia). On one occasion, about A.D. 218, Anazarbus induced the emperor Elagabalus to accept the office of Demiourgos‡ in the city, and struck coins to commemorate this honour. Tarsus doubtless was downcast till it could strike similar coins boasting of Alexander Severus as Demiourgos. Both cities boasted that the kolnoubouion (Council of the Kolnon of Cilicia) met within its walls; but Tarsus alone could boast of the festival and games common to the three united provinces. And so on, title after title was devised to imitate or outshine a rival.

Tarsus was saved by the barrier of Mount Taurus from many of the invasions which swept over Asia Minor. Only an enemy who took the route from Syria over Mt. Ananus through Cilicia would reach Tarsus; but most invasions preferred the route through Eastern Cappadocia, keeping north of Mt. Taurus. Thus, in the long peace of the empire the defences and the defensive powers of the people in Cilicia must have grown weak, and when at last an enemy entered the country they found it a helpless prey.

In the Byzantine ecclesiastical and political system Tarsus became even more important than in the older empire, owing to the steady growth of the Eastern provinces in wealth, education, and weight. Thus Basil of Caesarea (Ep. 34), in A.D. 373 (or 369), emphasizes its importance as 'a city so placed as to be united with Cilicia, Cappadocia, and Assyria' (i.e. Syria).

Two churches are mentioned at Tarsus. In A.D. 485 Leontius forced Verina to proclaim him emperor at Tarsus in the Church of St. Peter outside the city. Such an important ceremony is likely to have been held in the principal church of Tarsus, and we may identify this Church of St. Peter as the great church of Tarsus destroyed by the Moslems in A.D. 885.* If so, it is remarkable that the principal church was not dedicated to St. Paul; but it is recorded that the Church of St. Paul in Tarsus was built by the emperor Maurice (583–602),† while we may be confident that the great church of Tarsus was built as early as the 4th century.

V. TARSUS THE ARAB CITY.—In view of the strongly Syrian associations of Tarsus, it is important to observe the way in which it lost its Western relations, and reverted to a purely Oriental type during the long wars against the Mohammedans. The Arabs first crossed into Cilicia by the Syrian Gates from Antioch in 641. In 646 the Arabs found all the fortresses between Antioch and Tarsus deserted; presumably the terror of these raids and the neglect of frontier defence by the emperor made the people flee to the mountains.

In 650 the Arabs invaded Isauria (so Theophanes; 649 Ibn Al Athir). This would appear to imply that Tarsus, with Cilicia generally, was in Arab hands, though it must be remembered that the Arab invasions were often only passing raids, in which the forts and cities were left unattacked, or watched by detachments of the invading forces, while the open country was ravaged, and captives swept off into slavery. Cilicia, however, having been so neglected by the central government, was exposed defenceless to the Arabs. Yet the military strength of the empire soon revived, while the Arab raids made little permanent impression. Tarsus was quickly recaptured by the Christians; but in 673 it was captured (after a defence presumably) by the Arabs. In the following years the Arab attacks were made chiefly by the north road nearer the Euphrates, or by sea; Cappadocia was occupied, and Armenia and Pontus attacked, while Cilicia was not much molested by formal invasions, but its cities seem to have still remained unprotected, and exposed to any small raids. Thus in 692 an Arab army advanced from the Euphrates nearly to Amorion, and returned by Cilicia.

In 699–700 the Christians recovered Cappadocia, and the Arabs henceforth made regular use of the Cilician route in invading the Byzantine empire. Mopsuestia at the important crossing of the Pyramus was fortified in 701, and Tarsus was now permanently occupied as an Arab capital on their north-western frontier. The northern part of Eastern Cilicia, with the town of Sision (now called Sis), was conquered in 703; in 706 the last struggle of the Romans to retain this country is recorded by Al Tabari. The wars of the following years imply that Cilicia was the permanent basis for the Arab operations‡ in Lycania, Pisidia, Phrygia, and Bithynia. At the same time Caesarea, with Eastern Cappadocia, was again taken by the Arabs in 726, but recovered by Constantine in 746. After this the Arab frontier cities on the north were generally Melitene and Germaniceia, and a debateable land lay between them and Cæsarea, though the Christians attacked or even destroyed one or other of the two Arab fortresses in 750-754 and 778, while the Arabs frequently advanced north and north-west into Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, etc. In 806 and 830 the Arabs carried forward the Cilician frontier to Tyana, building a mosque and settling colonists there; but both attempts failed immediately, and Tarsus remained the capital of Orientalism against the West.

In 807 the emperor Nicephorus invaded Cilicia, and defeated the Arabs near Tarsus; but the Caliphs Harun and al-Mamun strengthened the Arab power on this frontier. The latter died at (or near) Tarsus in 833. About the middle of the 9th cent. Byzantine power grew stronger, and Cilicia and Tarsus were the scene of many conflicts, while the Caliphs' vigour waned. In 883 Tarsus is mentioned as a strong fortress, the capital of an independent Mohammedan State. In 891 an Arab fleet is said to have sailed from Tarsus towards the Byzantine coasts; and in 900 the fleet at Tarsus was burned by the Caliph on account of the disloyalty of the city. In 908 the Greek forces landed near Tarsus and gained a victory over the Arabs. About this time Tarsus is mentioned frequently as the centre of Mohammedan opposition to the reviving Christian power. In 904 a Tarsian fleet burned Thessalonica. At length, in 965, after all the rest of Cilicia had been recaptured by the Christians, Tarsus surrendered on favourable terms, the Moslem population were given safe retirement to Antioch, and only Christians were left in the city. The great gates of Tarsus were carried in triumph to Constantinople.

vi. MODERN TARSUS.—The new Christian city of Tarsus had a checkered history. Byzantine Greeks, Latins, Armenians, Turcomans, Turks, Egyptians struggled for it, and alternately held it and lost it. For a century Greek rule in Cilicia was practically unchallenged by the decaying Saracen empire; but even during this time Tarsus must have undoubtedly retained many traces of the three centuries of Arab rule, and become far more Oriental than it had been under the Roman and early Byzantine rule. About 1067 the Seljuk Turks began to ravage Asia Minor, and their terrible armies were seen and felt in Cilicia; and in 1071 the victory of Mauzikert laid the country prostrate and helpless at their feet. Their rule over Phrygia, Lycæonia, Cappadocia, Armenia, Pontus, was recognized by the feeble emperors; but Cilicia still remained, on the whole, in Christian hands, so that the wall of Mt. Taurus once more formed a line of demarcation between the two religions (though now Islam was on the north and Christianity on the south). A new power now appeared in Cilicia: in 1080 Reuben, the first Armenian prince of Cilicia (called often during the next three centuries Lesser Armenia), seized some forts in the eastern Taurus mountains on the north frontier of Cilicia. The history of Lesser Armenia was stormy, and its bounds varied from year to year, sometimes confined to the Taurus forts, sometimes including Tarsus and Cilicia as a whole. In 1097 Baldwin with his Crusading army captured Tarsus, and introduced another factor into the confused history of Cilicia.

The vicissitudes of Tarsian history in this period are so rapid and so numerous that they cannot be traced in detail. Tarsus, the capital, passed from hand to hand. The Turks, who captured it in 1078, did not hold it; the Crusaders were a more permanent power. The emperor John Comnenus took Tarsus in 1137, the Armenian Reuben II. in 1182. The Mamluk Sultans of Egypt became a factor in Cilician history in 1260. The terrible Egyptian invasion of 1322 devastated the country. The Armenians suffered from quarrels in the governing family, from religious feuds, and from national inability to unite in a vigorous defensive policy. In 1375 the Armenian kingdom of Cilicia (Lesser Armenia) finally gave place to the Egyptian power, and Tarsus may from this time be said to have relapsed into its original condition of a purely Oriental city. But it was still not subject to Turkey. It was the prey sometimes of Egypt, sometimes of Turcoman chiefs called Ramazanoglu, whose tribes seem to have entered the Taurus fastnesses about 1230, and to have gradually established their hold on the plain, and to have brought the country once more almost into nomadic barbarism. In 1466 the Osmanli or Ottoman Turks entered Cilicia, when the army of Mohammed II. captured Tarsus; but the city was often recaptured, until Selim destroyed the Mamluk power in 1516. Again in 1832 the Egyptian forces of Mehemet Ali entered Cilicia, and held Tarsus till 1840, when once more it passed under Ottoman power.

Tarsus remains a wretched town of the Turkish style, little more than a large collection of hovels, with a trying climate, an oppressive atmosphere, retaining not a trace of its former splendour, and few scraps even of ancient marbles. There are few places where the contrast between ancient and modern life is more conspicuous. The unsightly and shapeless mass of concrete, wrongly called the Tomb of Sardannapalus, is the only ancient monument that is displayed to the tourist. It is the substructure of the platform on which stood a temple of the Roman period, and was originally hidden under the marble walls and floors and steps, afterwards utilized to make mediæval buildings, which in their turn have been utterly destroyed.

TARTAK (𐎲𐎠𐎵; 𐎲𐎠𐎵; Tharthac).—An idol of the Avvites, introduced by them into Samaria, whither they had been transported by the Assyrian king Sargon (2 K 17³¹). Tartak is mentioned with another deity called NIBHAZ, and, according to the Bab. Talmud (Sanhedrin, 63b), was worshipped under the form of an ass.* Various speculations have been made as to the identity of this deity, the religious systems of the Egyptians, Persians, and Carmanians having been laid under contribution to supply points of comparison; but the Typhon of the first, and the sacrificing of an ass by the last to their god (identified with Mars), do not seem to afford satisfactory explanations. In Assyro-Babylonian mythology no god in the form of an ass is at present provable, and the comparison of the name Tartak with the Babylonian god Itak (on account of the second syllable) can no longer be made, the correct reading of the latter being Išum. In all probability no trustworthy identification of the deity, nor satisfactory explanation of his name, will be made until the position of the place (AVVA or IVVAHT) whence his worshippers came, has been determined. TARTAN (𐎲𐎠𐎵; BA Taradár, B^b Naḏár, 𐎲𐎠𐎵, d. a. a. l. Q* Ṣarḏá[r] in Is 20¹; B Ṣarḏár, A Ṣarḏár in 2 K 18¹⁷; Tharthan).—The title of an Assyrian military officer, sent by Sargon to Ashdod (Is 20¹), and later (probably another person) despatched by Sennacherib, accompanied by RAB-SARIS and RAB-SHAKEH, 'with a great host,' against Jerusalem. Like the other titles in the latter passage, it was long thought to be a personal name; and it is apparently this (notwithstanding the presence of the article in the Greek) which has given rise to the variant Nathan (an abbreviation of Tanathan) in B^b. In the Assyrian inscriptions and lists of officials, however, it appears as the title of the highest officer of State next to the king, and probably corresponds to the modern military title 'commander-in-chief.' In the list of officials given in WAI ii. pl. 31, ll. 26, 27, two grades appear, turtanu imni, 'the turtan of the right,' and tartanu šumeli, 'the tartan of the left,' the former probably corresponding with the turtanu rabā, 'great Tartan,' or 'field-marshal' of Shalmaneser II., and the latter with the tartanu sanū, 'second Tartan,' mentioned by Johns. That the two forms, turtanu and tartanu, were interchangeable, is shown by the contract-tablet in which the form turtanu šumeli occurs, and the variant spellings turtannu and tartannu in the inscriptions of Sargon.‡ As one entitled to hold the office of Eponym, the Tartan came next in order to the king (see the titles for the Eponyms for B.C. 809, 780, 770, 752, and 742). Who the Tartans were who are referred to in Is 20¹ and 2 K 18¹⁷ is not known. In B.C. 720, Ašur-iska(?)-udannin was Eponym, and possibly held the office, and in that case may have been the one sent to Ashdod. For the reign of Sennacherib we have Abda'u, who held the office during the eponymy of Ilu-ittēa, B.C. 694; and Bēl-

* The companion-deity, Nibhaz (changed to Nibhan by reading [for], is stated to have been in the form of a dog—an explanation which is due to the supposition that the word was connected with nābah, 'to bark.' It is therefore not improbable that the statement that Tartak was a deity in the form of an ass may be due to a similar (popular) etymology.

† Sachau (ZA 12, 48) identifies it with the modern Imm, between Antioch and Aleppo.

‡ The forms with double n imply that the second vowel was long (tartānu), as in Hebrew.

name of R. Hoshaiiah that there were 480 synagogues in Jerusalem, and each had a beth-sepher and a beth-Talmud, the former for the mikra (text of Scripture), the latter for the mishna (oral tradition). A frequently quoted sentence about the order of a child's education—of late date, being found in an appendix to the Aboth of the post-Talmudic period—states that 'at 5 years old (he comes) to the reading of Scripture, at 10 to the Mishna, at 13 to the practice of the commandments, at 15 to the Talmud, at 18 to marriage,' etc. (Pirké Aboth, v. 21). For further particulars on this point see Schürer (HJP II. ii. § 27, and artt. EDUCATION and SYNAGOGUE).

In the NT, teaching is mentioned chiefly with reference to the exposition of specifically Christian ideas. Nicodemus acknowledges Jesus to be 'a teacher (διδάσκαλος) come from God,' and addresses Him with the recognized Jewish name of a teacher, 'Rabbi' (ραββί, Jn 3²). In all four Gospels the usual name for our Lord is 'Teacher' (διδάσκαλος, tr. 'Master' in AV and RV, but 'Teacher' in RVM and in Twentieth Cent. NT). This word is not only used by the disciples; it is also employed by others in addressing our Lord, e.g. the Pharisees and Herodians (Mk 12¹⁴). No doubt it is the evangelist's rendering of the Aramaic title, 'Rabbi,' which occasionally appears in its original form in Jn (1³⁸, 3², 20⁶), and once Rubboni, ραββονι, 10¹⁶). It is important to observe that a clear distinction between 'teaching' (διδάσκω) and 'preaching' (κηρύσσω) is maintained throughout the NT. This is manifest in our Lord's public ministry. He commenced with preaching, as John had done before Him (Mk 1⁴). This preaching was the call to repentance in connexion with the announcement that the kingdom of God was at hand, and was called 'preaching the gospel of God' (Mk 1⁴). Then, having gathered some disciples about Him, our Lord proceeded to instruct them in the mysteries of the kingdom, its nature, laws, and principles. This instruction is called 'teaching,' and it was with such teaching rather than with preaching that the later part of His ministry was occupied.

A similar distinction was observed in the apostolic ministry and in the life and organization of the early Churches. Among the various functions in the Church mentioned by St. Paul in Romans occurs that of 'teaching' (Ro 12⁷). It there takes the third place in a series, being preceded by prophecy and ministry, and followed by exhorting, giving, ruling, and showing mercy. The last of these functions being of a general character, and such as any one might be called on to exercise, suggests that the list as a whole may not point to definite offices. But, in a nearly contemporary and probably earlier epistle, teaching is assigned to specific persons. In 1 Co 12²⁸ this also comes third in a list; but the list as a whole is different from that in Romans, containing titles of persons, not merely functions; so that we have 'teachers,' not merely 'teaching.' They are preceded by 'first apostles, secondly prophets'; then we come to 'thirdly teachers.' The form changes after this to gifts and functions—'miracles,' 'gifts of healing,' etc. That the teaching is ascribed in an especial way to some people, to the exclusion of others, is shown by St. Paul's questions, 'Are all apostles? Are all prophets? Are all teachers?' (v. 29). Nevertheless, the following questions, 'Are all workers of miracles? have all gifts of healing?' etc., show that the personal differences rest on differences of gift. At Corinth they who have gifts of teaching are teachers, as they who have gifts of healing are healers. Another arrangement appears in Ephesians: 'and he gave some to be apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers' (Eph 4¹¹). Here we have four offices, and that of teacher set last, an office not mentioned in the earlier lists—the evangelist's—coming between it and the offices of apostles and prophets. Further, it is also known by the name of 'pastor'; for the arrangement of the clauses ('and some, introducing each class) shows that the 'teachers' and the 'pastors' are the same persons. The distinction of the teacher from the evangelist is significant, suggesting the differentiation of function in which the evangelist preaches, declaring the gospel, and the teacher instructs the converts. The companion title 'pastor' points to a settled ministry within the Church as distinct from the travelling missionary activity of apostles and evangelists; but it is to be observed that the apostles gathered up in themselves the several functions that were afterwards distributed among various members of the Churches. Thus St. Paul describes himself as appointed 'a preacher and an apostle . . . a teacher,' etc. (1 Ti 2⁷—assuming these to be St. Paul's words). When we turn to Acts we meet with yet another arrangement. Here teachers seem to be identified with prophets (Ac 13¹); but St. Luke may mean that the prominent men whose names he gives consisted of prophets and teachers, as two classes. In course of time the teacher melts into the bishop, his function is absorbed in the episcopate; as a separate officer he is discredited by comparison with the higher official, and ere long he disappears entirely. These stages may be noted thus: (1) At the first appearance of the teacher there is no reference to the bishop: thus there is no indication of bishops in 1 Cor. or Romans. (2) At the time of the Epp. of the Captivity the teachers seem to have practical oversight, like that of the early bishops, even if the name is not given to them, since they are called 'pastors' (Eph 4¹¹). It seems reasonable to suppose that these were equivalent to the 'bishops' of Ph 1¹, especially since the word 'bishop' in the latter case may be functional rather than official, as Dr. Hort suggested. (3) In the Pastoral Epistles teaching is joined to the episcopal office. The bishop must be 'apt to teach' (1 Ti 3²; compare Tit 1⁹). Especial honour is to be given to the elders who 'labour in the word and in teaching' (1 Ti 5¹⁷): this suggests that teaching was not carried on by all the elders. St. Paul will not allow women to teach publicly in the Church (1 Ti 2¹²), and yet he had written of aged women being 'teachers of that which is good' (Tit 2³), when he must have meant home teaching, or perhaps teaching by example, unless we are to suppose that he changed his views on the subject between Titus and 2 Tim., which is improbable. Already the teacher's office is falling into unworthy hands; and the apostle writes of the time when people will not endure 'healthful teaching' (RVM ὑγιαίνουσας διδασκαλίας, not 'sound doctrine' AV and RV), but, having itching ears, will heap to themselves teachers after their own lusts (2 Ti 4³). (4) In the sub-Apostolic age we still meet with the teacher as distinct from the bishop, though teaching now is more and more appropriated by the latter officer, and the teacher is sinking in importance. In the Didaché there are 'teachers' as well as 'apostles' and 'prophets.' All three of these functionaries appear as itinerant ministers visiting the Churches. The teacher is to be tested by what he teaches, and received or rejected according as his instruction agrees with what is laid down in this treatise or differs from it (see Didaché xi.). These travelling teachers are quite distinct from the 'bishops and deacons' whom the writer bids his readers 'appoint for yourselves' (xv.). Still later we meet with 'teachers' in the Shepherd of Hermas, and here they appear among the officers of the Church, coming between the bishop and the deacon. The stones in the mystical building 'are the apostles and bishops and teachers and deacons' (Vis. iii. 5). Hermas writes disparagingly of 'self-appointed teachers,' who 'praise themselves as having understanding,' 'senseless though they are' (Sim. ix. 22). We have no definite account of the manner in which the teachers performed their work, or of the substance of their instructions. We are tempted to think of the catechetical teaching of later times; but there is no clear indication of a catechumenate in NT. Still something of the kind must have arisen early from the necessity of the case. The Didaché seems to have been a text-book for some such teaching. It has been suggested that the Logia recently discovered in Egypt might be a list of sayings of Jesus drawn up for use in teaching. Possibly St. Matthew's Logia was compiled with that end in view; and the same may be suggested of the canonical Gospels (cf. A. Wright, NT Problems, p. 91 ff.). With reference to teachers and teaching in the NT see Allen, Christian Institutions, pp. 28, 29, 40, 42; McGiffert, Apostolic Age, 528 ff., 640 ff., 654 ff.; Weizsäcker, Das Apostolische Zeitalter, pp. 621, 622. TEBAH (תֵּבַח; A Τάβηκ, Luc. Τάβηκ).—A 'son' of Nahor by his concubine Reumah, Gn 22²⁴ [J]. The name stands for an Aramaean town, prob. the same as is named in 2 S 8⁶ [where read, after LXX, Pesh., and 1 Ch 18⁹, תֵּבַח for תֵּבַח]. See TIBHATH].

TEBALIAH (תֵּבַלְיָה 'J' hath dipped, i.e. purified'; B Ταβλαί, A Ταβέλις, Luc. Ταβήλ).—A Merarite gatekeeper, 1 Ch 26¹¹.

TEBETH (תֵּבֶת, Tēbēth).—The 10th (Bab.-) Jewish month. See TIME.

TEHAPHNEHES, Ezk 30¹⁸.—See TAHPANHES.

TEHINNAH (תֵּהִנָּה; B Θαίμν, A Θανά, Luc. Θεεννά).—The 'father' of Ir-nahash, 1 Ch 4¹².

TEIL TREE.—A mistranslation (AV Is 6¹³) of תֵּל (RV 'terebinth'). For the various tr^s of 'ēlāh see OAK and TEREBINTH.

TEKEL.—See MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN.

TEKOA (תְּקוֹא; LXX Θεκωε, Θεκοε, Θεκώμ, Θεκός).—A town in the tribe of Judah, about 10 miles S. of Jerusalem and 5 S. of Bethlehem, situated on a detached hill about 2700 ft. high which is girt with other lower hills. From the summit there is a broad prospect. In the W. and S. the view is closed by hills, cultivated or clothed with low vegetation. On the N. is the ravine of Urtās and its continuation Khureitūn, cutting deeply through the hills down to the Dead Sea. The Frank mountain and Bethlehem are visible: Jerusalem is hidden behind intervening hills, but the Mount of Olives can be seen and, still farther to the N., Nebi Samwil. To the S.E. is another deep and wild valley, Wady Jehār, running towards the Dead Sea, glimpses of which can be obtained through the distant cliffs. Eastwards the hill slopes down to the Wilderness of Judah. Canon Tristram describes the approach from the Wady Bereikeh: 'In front of us is a long hill, with a copious spring at its foot. . . . The district in its natural features seems to have been always what it is now—bare, treeless, open pasture. We here lose all traces of the ancient terraces which gird the undulations of every hill farther west with their swathing bands. Here and there are still patches of cultivation in the hollows of the valleys, but the soil is dry and stony, and we begin here to lose the rich vegetable mould which, however scanty, still covers more or less the whole of the central hills, and have, in its stead, only a thirsty, chalky marl. That vegetable soil is doubtless due, in the first instance, to the primeval forest, which certainly once covered the whole of the Judæan, as of the Gilead, range, but has left no trace of its existence on the Western slopes towards the Dead Sea.'

The town is not mentioned very frequently in Scripture. The Heb. of Jos 15⁵⁰ does not include it in the list of places belonging to Judah: the LXX gives it and ten other towns, one of them being Bethlehem. 1 Ch 2⁴⁴ ascribes to Tekoa an antiquity coeval with the Conquest. According to these passages, Ashhur, Caleb's half-brother, was the father, i.e. the founder, of Tekoa. In 2 S 14 the wise woman of Tekoa is spoken of in such a manner as to convey the impression that her shrewdness had brought her dwelling-place into notoriety. David spent much time in this part of the country during his Wanderjahre: afterwards it was a recruiting ground for the ranks of his mighty men (2 S 23²⁸, 1 Ch 11²⁸). From 2 Ch 11⁶ we learn that it was one of the towns fortified by Rehoboam. Its commanding position and its situation on the utmost frontier of the cultivated land would ensure its being made a military post. Jer 6¹ shows that its defences continued to be kept up. The prophet bids the children of Benjamin raise up a signal on Beth-haccherem (Jebel Fureidis, the Frank mountain), and blow the trumpet in Tekoa. This is not said merely for the sake of the play on words, tik'd, Tēkōa [note also tak'd in v.²], but also because this was a garrison town. The Wilderness of Tekoa is named at 2 Ch 20²⁰ as the battlefield where Jehoshaphat defeated the Ammonites and their allies. In the Bk. of Nehemiah (3²⁷⁻²⁷) the public-spiritedness of the commonalty is sharply contrasted with the contemptuous refusal of their chiefs to bend the neck to the Tirshatha's yoke. 1 Mac 9³³ relates that Simon and Jonathan fled to the Wilderness of Tekoa from before Bacchides. The crowning glory of Tekoa was its connexion with the prophet Amos (Am 1¹).

Josephus, who mentions Tekoa as one of the 'strong and large cities' built by Rehoboam (Ant. VIII. x. 1), speaks of it as a village in the Macchabæan period (BJ IV. ix. 5) and in his own day (Vita, 75). Jerome (Comm. in Jerem. vi. 1) calls it a village, 12 (Roman) miles from Jerusalem, visible to him from Bethlehem every day. In the Pref. to Amos he adds: 'There is no village beyond Tekoa, not even [a probable conjectural emendation is 'except'] rustic huts, of the appearance of ovens, which the Africans call mapalia: such is the desolateness of the desert which extends as far as the Red Sea and the boundaries of the Persians, Ethiopians, and Jews. And because no kind of crop whatever grows on the dry and sandy soil, the whole neighbourhood is occupied by shepherds, to compensate for the barrenness of the soil by the multitude of sheep.' The same Father asserts that the tomb of Amos was shown at this place. The Talmud speaks of the oil of Tekoa as the best in the country; and one of the Arab geographers says that its honey was so excellent as to have become proverbial. In the early part of the 6th cent. Saba founded a new monastery here, which, in contradistinction to Laura (Mār Sāba), was called Laura Nova, 'New Monastery.' Soon after his death it became the scene of fierce conflicts between the Monophysites and the orthodox. In Crusading times it was inhabited by a large population of Christians, who afforded considerable help to the Franks during the first siege of Jerusalem. The village was sacked by a party of Turks from beyond the Jordan in A.D. 1138, but the majority of the inhabitants had taken refuge in the great cave of Khureitūn. There is a somewhat puzzling reference in Bahaoddinus, Vita Salad., ed. Schultens, p. 237. He writes of 'the river of Tekoa (نهر تقوع), one parasang [=about 3 Eng. miles] from Jerusalem, which furnished a sufficient supply of water to Richard of England and his army' of Crusaders. It is obvious that the distance here given does not agree with the facts. The suggestion has been made that the water in question was that of the lake mentioned 1 Mac 9³³ τὸ ὕδωρ λάκκου Ἀσφάρ (8, Ven.), or Ἀσφά (A), which Josephus (Ant. XIII. i. 2) calls τὸ ὕδωρ τὸ καλούμενον λάκκου Ἀσφάρ, and which Mühlau identifies with ez-Zāferāne S. of Tekoa, Robinson (BRP ii. 202) with Bir Selhub S.W. of En-gedi.

The Palestine pilgrims of the Middle Ages do not enlighten us greatly as to the condition or history of Tekoa. In the account of St. Willibald's pilgrimage (8th cent.) it is said that he came hither, and 'there is now a church, and there rests one of the prophets.' The anonymous itinerary of this journey asserts that Nathanael was one of the infants at Bethlehem when Herod slew the children; that his mother hid him under a fig tree (Jn 1⁹), and that he escaped to Tekoa. In the 12th cent. John of Würzburg and Fetellus state that the tomb of Amos was shown there, the latter adding, 'From its confines Habakkuk was borne by the angel to Babylon. In Thecua many of the prophets used to meet together to discuss divine things.' Isaac Chelo (A.D. 1134) speaks of the tomb of Amos as being in a cave at this place. From William of Tyre we learn that in A.D. 1144 queen Melesinda gave the spot to the canons of the Holy Sepulchre in exchange for property at Bethany.

The ancient name Tekoa still clings to the site (Robinson, Pal. ii. 406 ff.; Guérin, Judée, iii. 141 ff.). In the neighbourhood large flocks of sheep and goats, together with a few oxen, are pastured by Arabs, genuine representatives of the nomads who dwelt there in ancient days. On the level ground immediately near the hill corn is grown. The shepherds use for sheep-cotes the numerous caves with which the mountains are honeycombed. On the broad summit of the hill of Tekoa there are ruins which cover a space of four or five acres. They 'consist chiefly of the foundations of houses constructed of large hewn stones, some of them bevelled. At the N.E. are the remains of a square tower, occupying a very commanding position; and near the middle of the site are the ruins of a Greek church, with several broken columns and an octagonal baptismal font of rose-coloured limestone, 5 ft. diam. on the outside, 4 on the inside, and 3 ft. 9 in. deep. There are also many cisterns excavated in the rock.' The view of the font in Wilson's Picturesque Palestine, iii. 184, is well worth seeing.

Cyril of Alexandria asserts that the Tekoa of Amos was an Ephraimite, not a Judæan city. The author of the Lives of the Prophets says that it was in the tribe of Zebulun—probably a mistake for Simeon, since Simeon bordered closely on Judah. Abarbanel and Kimchi place it in the tribe of Asher. But there is not a particle of real evidence in favour of a second Tekoa.

Tekoite.—A native or inhabitant of Tekoa. The adjective is used three times in the singular number (2 S 23²⁸, 1 Ch 11²⁸ 27²⁹) of one of David's mighty men, Ira, the son of Ikkeah the Tekoite. In 2 S 14⁴ the Heb. has the fem. form, but our versions render the expression, 'ishshāh hat-tēkō ith, by 'woman of Tekoa.' In Neh 3⁵ the plural is employed for one of the bands of volunteers who rebuilt the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah. It is a little doubtful whether these men actually occupied Tekoa at the time. Tekoa does not figure in the list of repeopled towns given in Ezr 2; they may have been simply 'a clan of fellow-townsmen who had held together during the Exile, and were known by this name after they had settled in Jerusalem.' In any case their public-spirited zeal (v. 27) sheds lustre on the name.

TEKOA.—This is the AV form in 2 S 14² 4⁹ for Tekoa, and is retained by RV in 1 Mac 9³³ in the expression 'wilderness of Tekoah.'

TEL-ABIB (תל אביב, perh. 'hill of corn,' but see Del. Heb. Lang. 16; μετέωρος; ad acervum novarum frugum).—A place on the Chebar (Ezk 3¹⁶),—one of the rivers or canals in Babylonia. The site is unknown. The LXX and Vulgate have translated the term as if it were not a proper name.

C. W. WILSON.

TELAH (תלה; B Θάλας, A Θάλε, Luc. Θάλα).—An Ephraimite, 1 Ch 7²⁵.

TELAIM (תלמים 'the lambs'; εν Γαλαλαιοις; quasi agnos).—The place at which Saul concentrated his forces, and numbered his fighting men before his campaign against the Amalekites (1 S 15⁴). The LXX reads Gilgal for Telaim, and Josephus (Ant. vi. vii. 2) also makes Gilgal the place of assembly. Gilgal, however, though so frequently mentioned in connexion with the history of Saul, would be an inconvenient mustering-place for a force about to operate against the Amalekites in the desert S. of Palestine. Still it is possible that Saul may have started from the sanctuary to which he returned with his prisoner and booty. A more suitable locality for the place of assembly would, however, be in the Negeb, or South; and here lay Telem (Jos 15²⁴), with which Telaim is probably identical. So Wellhausen, Driver, and Budde, who prefer to point תלם. Wellhausen reads תלם also in 1 S 15⁷ for תלמים. The same reading should also probably be found in 1 S 27⁶ (see Wellh. and Driver, ad loc., and Hommel, AHT 243).

C. W. WILSON.

TELAŠSAR (תלשאר 2 K 19¹², תלשר Is 37¹² 'hill of Asshur'; B Θεασθέν, A Θαλασσάρ; Thelassar, Thelassar).—A town, inhabited by 'the children of Eden' (see EDEN), which had been conquered by Sennacherib's forefathers, and was in the possession of the Assyrians during that monarch's reign (2 K 19¹², Is 37¹²). It is mentioned with Gozan, Haran, and Rezeph—places in Western Mesopotamia. In this direction lay Beth-Eden, or Bit-Adini (see art. EDEN, vol. i. p. 642^b), a district between the Euphrates and the Belik. It probably stretched along both banks of the Euphrates, between Balis and Birejik. In the inscriptions, Gozan, Haran, Rezeph, and Bit-Adini are stated to have been destroyed by Sennacherib's forefathers—a fact which harmonizes well with what is said in 2 Kings and Isaiah (Schrader, KAT 327). A place of this name (Til-Aššuri) is mentioned by Tiglath-pileser III. (Ann. 176, ed. Rost, cf. Nirm. ii. a 23); but this seems to have been in Babylonia. The name is, however, as Schrader remarks, one that might have been given to any place at which a temple had been built to Asshur; and the Til-Aššuri, which Esarhaddon speaks of having conquered (KIB ii. 219), near the land of the Mitanni, as Del. (Parad. 364) remarks, suits better.

C. W. WILSON.

TELEM (תלם; B Τέλημ, A Τέλλημ).—A gate-keeper who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10²⁴; called in 1 Es 9²⁶ Tolbanes; perhaps the same as Talmon of Neh 12²⁵.

TELEM (תלם 'oppression'; B Μαϊνάμ, A Τέλεμ; Telem).—One of the uttermost cities of Judah towards the border of Edom in the South, or Negeb (Jos 15²⁴). It is mentioned between Ziph and Bealoth, and may be the same place as Telaim (1 S 15⁴). In the LXX reading of 2 S 3¹², Abner is said to have sent messengers to Thelam (Θαλάμ), where David was; and, if this reading be correct, Telem or Telaim was probably intended. The site has not been recovered, but a trace of the name seems to linger in that of the Dhallām Arabs who occupy the country S. of Moladah (Tell Milh). According to Schwarz (HL 71), who places Telem N. of Moladah, the whole district is called Toulam. Telem is probably the Talmia of the Talmud (Neubauer, Géog. du Talm. 121). A position to the S. of Tell Milh would meet the requirements of all the above passages. See, further, TELAIM.

TEL-HARSHA (תֵּל חַרְשָׁא 'hill of the wood'; B Θααρσά, Ἀρσά, Α Θελαρσά, Θελαρσά; Thelharsa).—A Babylonian town, of unknown site, from which some of the Jews, who 'could not show their fathers' houses, and their seed, whether they were of Israel,' returned to Judaea after the Captivity (Ezr 2⁶⁰, Neh 7⁶¹). In 1 Es 5²⁶ the name is written Thelersaa.

TELL.—See TALE.

TELMELAH (תֵּל מֶלַח 'hill of salt'; B Θερμῆλεθ, Θελμῆλεθ, Α Θελμῆλεθ, Θελμῆλεθ; Thelmala).—A Babylonian town, of unknown site, which is mentioned with Tel-harsha and Cherub (Ezr 2⁶⁰, Neh 7⁶¹). In 1 Es 5²⁶ it is written Thermeleth.

C. W. WILSON.

TEMA (תֵּמָא 'on the right,' 'south'; Θαιμάν, Θημάν; Thema).—A tribe of Ishmaelite Arabs, and a place or district in Arabia, which took their name from Tema, one of the twelve sons of Ishmael (Gn 25¹⁵, 1 Ch 1³⁰, Is 21¹⁴). The people were leaders of caravans, or camel-men, and their encampments were apparently on a caravan-route which would be followed by fugitives from Dedan (Job 6¹⁹, Is 21¹³⁻¹⁴). According to some authorities, the passage in Job refers to 'caravans crossing the desert in the dry season; pressing forward to look for water in the winter torrents, and finding none. Their disappointment is a lively image of the experience of Job when he looked for sympathy from his brethren' (Smith, DB, Amer. ed., note to TEMA). In Jer 25³ Tema is mentioned with Dedan and Buz, and it may be inferred from Is 21¹³⁻¹⁴ that it was E. of the former place. Ptolemy (v. xix. 6) mentions a town called Themma (Θέμμα) in the Arabian desert; and, according to Schrader (KAT 149), Tema is the Timai of Tiglath-pileser II., mentioned in conjunction with the Mas'ai (the Massa of Gn 25¹⁴).

Tema is now Teimā, a well-known place in N. Arabia, about 40 miles S. of Dumat el-Jendel (Dumah), and on an old route from the Gulf of 'Akabah to the Persian Gulf. The ancient city was enclosed by a stone wall about 3 miles in circuit, and there are still remains of this, and of some great rude stone buildings. Teimā is described as 'a tall island of palms enclosed by long clay orchard walls, fortified with high towers.' The houses are low buildings of mud or clay (Doughty, Travels, i. 285). The Aramaic inscriptions discovered by Euting at Teima prove it to have been the seat of an ancient civilization (see Sitzungsber. der Berl. Akad. der Wissensch., 1884, p. 813 ff.; and cf. Studia Bibl. i.). The LXX reading, followed by Eusebius and Jerome (Onom.), apparently connects Tema with Teman.

LITERATURE.—Dillmann on the passages above cited in Genes. Isaiab. and Job; Sitzungsber. d. Berl. Akad., 1884, p. 813 ff.; Euting, Nabat. Inschr. 9 ff.; Buhl's Geogr., s.v.

TEMAH (תֵּמָה: AV Tamah is due to the occurrence of the word in pausal form תֵּמָה).—The eponym of a family of Nethinim, Ezr 2⁵⁸ (BA Θέμα, Luc. Θεμαδ)=Neh 7⁵⁸ (B Ἡμαθ, A Θήμα, Luc. Θεμαδ).

TEMAN (תֵּמָן 'on the right,' 'south'; Θαιμάν; Theman).—A district, and perhaps also a town, which received its name from, or gave it to, a grandson of Esau, who was one of the 'dukes' of Edom (Gn 36^{11-12, 42}, 1 Ch 1³⁶⁻³⁸). Teman was one of the most important districts in Edom. From it ('the land of the Temanites,' Gn 36²⁴⁻²⁵) came one of the early kings of Edom; and it is sometimes used poetically for Edom. The name is apparently used in its wider sense for Edom in Am 1¹² (cf. Am 2²⁻⁵, where the country and its chief town are connected); in Ob⁹ (cf. 'the mighty men of Edom' in Jer 49²¹); in the poetical parallel (Jer 49²⁰), where the inhabitants of Teman are those of Edom; in Hab 3⁹, where Teman stands for Edom, as Seir does in Dt 33²; and in Bar 3²²⁻²³. In its narrower sense the name occurs in Gn 36²⁴⁻²⁵, Job 2¹¹ 4¹ 15¹ 22¹ 42², Ezk 25¹³, and perhaps also in Jer 49⁷. The Temanites were pre-eminent for their wisdom (Jer., Ob., Bar., as quoted above); and it was fitting that ELIPHAZ, one of the wise men of Teman, should be the chief of the three friends of Job.

The name of Teman has not been recovered, and its position is uncertain. A district in the N. of Edom seems to be implied in Ezk 25¹³ 'from Teman even unto Dedan,' and in Am 1¹² it is mentioned with Bozrah (el-Buseireh); but, on the other hand, it is connected with the Red Sea in Jer 49²⁰⁻²¹. Eusebius states (Onom.) that, in his day, Teman was a town 15 (Jerome 5) Roman miles from Petra, and a Roman post; but he does not give the direction. No trace of this place has been found, but it was probably on the road from Elath to Bozrah.

TEMPERANCE.—The Eng. word 'temperance' occurs in Scripture only in the NT; but the idea of temperance, i.e. self-control, pervades the OT as well as the Scriptures of the Christian period, and the duty of realizing it is strongly insisted on throughout the Bible. The legal regulations about clean and unclean foods required self-restraint in the matter of diet. The Wisdom literature dealing especially with practical conduct is explicit and urgent on the duty of self-control. This is prominent in the Bk. of Proverbs, as in the sayings concerning eating—'When thou sittest to eat with a ruler, consider diligently what (or who) is before thee; and put a knife to thy throat, if thou be a man given to appetite' (Pr 23¹⁻³); wine-drinking—'Look not upon the wine when it is red,' etc. (v. 41); licentiousness—the laws against adultery, the frequent warnings in Prov. against 'the strange woman'; anger—'He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city' (16⁷); revenge—'Rejoice not when thine enemy falleth' (Pr 24¹⁷); and elsewhere greed of wealth—'Thou shalt not covet' (Ex 20¹⁷); 'Woe unto them that join house to house,' etc. (Is 5⁸). A specific self-restraint was put upon the Nazirites (see NAZIRITE), and a similar self-restraint was practised by the Rechabites (see RECHABITES); and certain forms of abstinence were required by the Law in all the Jews, as at fasts (see FASTING), and pre-vicious to solemn religious services (Ex 19¹⁸). The religious life of the OT saint was not ascetic, but it was simple and free from the excesses of paganism. While the Israelite was encouraged to receive the gifts of God with thankfulness, and to use them without fear of any Nemesis on his prosperity, he was not to plunge into reckless self-indulgence. Solomon's luxurious living is not Israelite, but a result of the importation of foreign manners. Baal-worship was denounced for its licentiousness as well as for its idolatry, and the unfaithfulness to Jehovah it involved on the part of the Israelites. The prophets repeatedly denounce the luxurious living of the wealthy, and the growth of self-indulgence generally, as foreign to the rigour of righteousness, and certain to bring ruin on a nation (e.g. Am 4¹ 6¹⁻⁶, Is 3¹⁷⁻²⁴ 5¹¹⁻¹³).

When we come to the NT treatment of this subject, we have the description of John the Baptist in his rough dress and simple fare, feeding on the native products of the wilderness (Mk 1⁹), whom our Lord contrasts with those who 'wear soft raiment,' and 'are in kings' houses' (Mt 11⁸). But the supreme example of temperance is afforded by the life of Jesus Christ. That was not ascetic; the charge of gluttony and wine-bibbing was brought against our Lord by malignant slanderers because He did not practise asceticism. And yet the extreme simplicity of His living, the many hardships He voluntarily endured, and His complete unconcern with regard to His own comforts, as well as His perfect freedom from all forms of sin and selfishness, show Him to us as one who lived the ideal life of temperance, avoiding excess and extravagance in all directions. This was the method of life He inculcated on His disciples. There is no passage in His teaching requiring asceticism, and no direct commendation of fasting (the word 'fasting' is omitted in RV of Mk 9²⁹ and the parallel Mt 17²¹ in accordance with best MSS); but there is much urgent dissuasion from the life of ease and self-indulgence. The disciple of Christ is required to hold his thoughts as well as his words and actions under control (e.g. Mt 5^{21, 22, 27, 28}). In the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus the self-indulgence of the former, while he ignores the sufferer at his gate, aggravates his guilt. The Gr. word for 'temperance,' ἐγκράτεια, and its verbal form, ἐγκρατεύμαι, are found in the NT only in Acts (there ascribed to St. Paul), St. Paul's Epistles, and 2 Peter. Derived from κράτος, 'strong,' they indicate the strength a man uses towards himself in self-control. St. Paul makes temperance one of the subjects of his very personal address to Felix (Ac 24²⁵); and elsewhere brings it forward as one of the fruits of the spirit (Gal 5²²). Using the verbal form of the same word, he appeals to the analogy of the athlete whose training involves universal self-restraint (1 Co 9²⁵). The virtue is one of the requisites for a bishop (Tit 1⁸). In 2 P 1⁶ it appears in an ascending series of commended attainments, following knowledge and preceding godliness.

TEMPLE (A.S. tempel, from Lat. templum, a space marked out; a sanctuary: cf. τέμενος [from τέμνω, 'to cut'], a piece of land cut off from the rest and dedicated to a god).—In the EV 'temple' renders the Hebrew words:—הֵיכָל (hēkal, in a narrower sense the Holy Place) and בַּיִת ('house,' including hēkal and dēbīr בְּדֵיִר, or Most Holy Place). Three Gr. words are tr. 'temple' in the NT: τεῖχος (more correctly the whole of the sacred enclosure), ναός (strictly the sanctuary or sacred edifice alone, embracing hēkal and dēbīr), οἶκος.

i. SOLOMON'S BUILDINGS.—The pile or series of edifices of which the Temple formed one part, a embraced in addition the king's house, b the porch of pillars, γ the throne porch, δ the house for Pharaoh's daughter now married to Solomon, ε the king's dwelling, and the haram. The following is Stade's § plan of the royal buildings as slightly simplified by Benzinger in his Heb. Arch. η and in his Com. on Kings. θ

The above plan takes for granted that the pile of buildings formed a complete whole. There was one 'great court' (1) which surrounded the whole. The 'other court' (2) encompassed the king's palace; and haram; κ in 2 K 20⁴ it is called the 'middle court,' because it lay between the inner or temple court and the southernmost buildings (Lebanon house, etc.). The 'inner court' λ (3) was that which contained the temple and its belongings: 'inner' not in contrast with an outer court of the temple (of such a court Solomon's temple knows nothing), but as distinguished from the 'greater court,' which contained within it all the royal buildings. Apart from the description in 1 K 5-7, Ezk 43⁸ μ makes it exceedingly likely that the whole of these buildings were together, making one whole.

On the other hand, Thenius, ν Furrer, ξ and others place the temple on the east hill, but the other royal buildings on the modern Mount Zion and the haram hill, between which two α But to the author, or at all events the editor, of even Kings the temple was the principal building of the group, if not the final name of the whole.

β 1 K 7² 'House of the forest of Lebanon,' so called on account of the cedar wood used in its construction and the piles upon which it rested. J. D. Michaelis, Dathe, Iken (Dissert. Philolog. i. diss.), and Hamelsfeld (Bibl. Geog. i. p. 338) hold that the house in question was a summer residence for king Solomon built on Lebanon or at the foot of it. Dathe refers for support to 1 K 9¹⁹, 2 Ch 8⁶. But the fact that Solomon deposited the golden shields in the house (see 9¹⁹) shows that the house was close to Jerusalem. Besides, we never read of Solomon's having more than one palace.

hills the Tyropœon valley is situated. But the references we have are wholly opposed to this, as is also the probability that the king would have his palace erected in closer proximity to the royal sanctuary.

In 1 K 6²⁵, we read of the building of the temple. V.³⁶ tells us of an inner court, meaning clearly the court which enclosed the temple area and was itself included in the great court,^a which had in it the whole complex of royal buildings, sacred and secular. The passage in Ezekiel^β already noted makes this arrangement still more likely.

The eastern hill on which the royal buildings were erected is that which is known in the OT as ZION and also as MORIAH. The modern fiction, which fixes Zion on the hill west of the Cheese-mongers' (=Tyropœon) valley, has nothing to support it except tradition. It has against it topographical and historical considerations which are overwhelming.^γ Had the buildings been extended to a west hill, substructions of a deeper and more expensive character would have been necessary.

Relative positions of the Royal Buildings at Jerusalem.—Assuming that the royal buildings were all of them on the eastern hill, how were they relatively situated? The temple must have been either north or south of the other buildings, as the distance between the Tyropœon and the eastern declivities was too small to allow of its being on the east or west. It is exceedingly likely that it was on the north, and therefore on higher ground. From 2 K 11¹⁹, Jer 22¹ it follows that the way from the temple to the palace was a descent. On the other hand, in 1 K 21⁹²⁴, Jer 26¹⁰ it is equally implied that it was an ascent from the palace to the temple. In these passages it is taken for granted that the temple was in proximity to the other royal buildings. When Jeremiah was arrested for foretelling the destruction of the temple, the princes were at once upon the scene and constituted themselves into a body of magistrates to deal with the matter^δ—an incident illustrating the closeness of their residences to the sanctuary. Probably the southern wall of the temple was also the northern wall of the 'other' or 'middle' court, a gate leading from one into the other.^ε

If we can fix the position of the altar of burnt-offering, we can locate at once the main parts of the temple and also the other royal buildings. There is good reason for believing that the sakhra or rock under the dome of the mosque of Omar is the spot where the altar in question stood. A very old tradition connects with this spot the incident in which Abraham prepared to offer Isaac, as also the threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite. It was on this threshing-floor that the destroying angel stood when Jehovah stopped him in his work of destroying the people.^ζ Even if these associations with the place are imaginary, yet they show that it was a sacred spot from very primitive times, and in the conservative East there is but little change in roads or towns or sanctuaries. Solomon would be very likely to erect his chapel close to some spot where a Divine manifestation had been made or some altar had been raised.

The form of the stone gives good reason for concluding that it was that on which the sacrifices were offered. It is a huge limestone rock, measuring some 60 by 50 ft., standing above the marble pavement about 5 ft. On its top there is an opening, through which the blood of the victims sacrificed could pass. Lower down there is an open cave in the same rock, at the bottom of which the stones make a hollow sound when struck. This, with other indications, makes it very probable that there was an opening at the bottom through which the blood passed, this opening leading into a subterranean passage which continued its way to the Kidron Valley. This agrees with what the Mishna says,^η that under the altar of burnt-offering there was a conduit by means of which the blood of the victim flowed into the valley of the Kidron.

Close to the sakhra or rock there were formerly two fountains, one of them still sending up fresh and beautiful water. The natives say the water of this last is very putrid, but Pierotti tasted it and found they were wrong. He was of opinion that the water had the name of being filthy on account of its long-time association with the sacrificial blood which mingled with it.^θ Nowack^ι thinks that, probably, the sacrificial blood after passing into the aperture at the bottom of the cave joined the waters of that fountain which flowed fast by the oracle of God,^κ and fell with them into the eastern valley, joining ultimately the Kidron.^λ

The altar was rough and in its natural stone, which meets the requirement of Ex 20²⁴,^μ that the altar should be either of earth or of unhewn stone. Moreover, there were to be no steps going up to the altar,^ν—a condition also satisfied by this rock, supposing it to be the altar of Solomon's temple. This last is, however, but twice named in Kings^α and only once in Chronicles;^β in all these three instances the altar is described as brazen; besides the size which the Chronicler gives,^γ that is all we are told of the altar of burnt-offering of Solomon's temple. Nowack, indeed, completes the picture from the fuller description of Ezekiel's temple,^δ but with questionable justification. It is likely enough that the adjective 'brazen' is a later addition, and that the altar of the first temple was one of unhewn stone. If this stone had not all along occupied a very important place in popular esteem, it could not have been tolerated, but it would many centuries before have been levelled to the ground.

Since the temple and its courts were arranged in terraces, the house itself, together with the altar, must have stood on the highest platform: this is true of the ground on which the rock rests.

Among leading authorities who have held that the altar was at the present sakhra, the following may be named:—Williams,^ι Tobler, Furrer, Pierotti,^ζ Stade,^η Beninger,^θ and Nowack.^ι Sir Charles Warren puts the altar just a little to the south of the rock, but quite close to it.^κ If the sakhra marks the site of the altar,^λ the house must have been to the west,^μ the inner or temple court east, west, south, and north, while the remaining structures built on the hill would lie towards the south.

In order to make the rock-crowned Moriah fit for building upon, the rocky surface would have to be levelled—the sakhra being left as it was—and the parts lower down raised to be as high as the rest. Subterranean passages and rooms were erected, 'hewn stones,' 'costly stones,' 'great stones' being used, large quantities of earth being thrown in to fill up the intervening spaces.^ξ There are to be seen at the present time remains of these underground buildings.^ο

All agree that somewhere on the modern Haram esh-Sherif the temple was built; but this area is a quadrangle of unequal sides. Its west side measures 1590 ft., its east 1525 ft. The north and south sides are 1036 and 921 ft. respectively. It is impossible that the temple enclosure included the whole of this space, though de Vogüé, de Saulcy, Sir Henry James, and Sepp maintain that Herod's temple, with its courts and enclosures, did cover the Haram surface. German and French writers almost to a man, and the majority of English and American authorities, unite in holding that the temple building proper stood west of the rock as advocated above, and that with its adjuncts it covered about 600 ft. east to west and 400 ft. north to south.

A number of English writers have followed Fergusson^π in maintaining that the temple occupied a square of some 600 ft. at the S.W. angle of the Haram (so Thrupp, Lewin,^ρ and W. R. Smith^σ). Fergusson was led to this view by architectural considerations, and especially by his acceptance of the Mosque of Omar site for the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. W. R. Smith states succinctly what is to be said for this opinion, but there does not seem much inclination on the part of students of the subject to accept it. Indeed, but for the necessity to support a foregone conclusion, Fergusson would hardly have hit upon this site for the temple at all.

Sources.—Our original sources for the history and description of Solomon's temple are threefold. (1) We have what is said in 1 K 6, 7, which leaves out much that is absolutely necessary to make a complete picture. Many technical terms are used, the meaning of which it is beyond our power to elucidate with any feeling of confidence. Moreover, the text is exceedingly corrupt and defective, so that conjectural emendation and addition have to be constantly employed. Böttcher in his Achronologie, Thenius in his Commentary, and especially Stade in his ZATW iii., have made praiseworthy attempts to supply the student with a correct text. (2) We have, further, the parallel history in 2 Ch 2¹⁻⁵; but that the history in this book, however sincere and pious, is constructed from the point of view of a Jerusalem Levite of the time after the Exile, and represents events as they were regarded and not as they were, any one who compares Kings and Chronicles, and considers the history of religious thought and institutions among the Israelites, may see. Chronicles aims at glorifying David as the founder of the kingdom and of the religious society, especially of the priesthood and the psalmody. According to the Chronicler, David received from God a detailed plan of the temple,^a and gathered together materials, especially gold, silver, copper, and iron,^β for the building. Kings gives a fuller account, but leaves out this and similar things. (3) The temple of Ezekiel's vision ^γ must have been more or less suggested by the temple which he actually saw; and from its elaborate description one may, to a certain extent, fill in the omissions in the shorter description of Solomon's temple; only, it is to be considered that the temple which the prophet saw on the banks of the Chebar is as symmetrical as imagination unhampered by fact could make it. The text of Ezekiel is also corrupt; but Böttcher in his Proben Alttest. Schrifterklärung, the altar, the chambers, etc. This supposed connexion has led to many wrong results as to the dimensions of the first temple; as in the height of the building, which, because stated to be 30 cubits, i.e. thrice, not twice, that of the tabernacle, is made to refer to the exterior, not to the interior, though the other measurements are admitted to be internal. But the assumption of Fergusson, based on the oldest authorities, falls to the ground when it is remembered that the tabernacle in question had no actual existence at any time, and no existence in thought until about the time of the Exile. It would be far nearer the truth to say that the tabernacle is itself modelled upon the second temple, than to say that the first temple was modelled on the tabernacle. See TABERNACLE.

The temple of Solomon included the house and the court which surrounded and enclosed house, altar, and other belongings.

The 'house' was a rectangular building 60 cubits long (east to west), 20 cubits broad, and 30 cubits high.^α These are inside measurements, as the account of the dēbir, or Holy of Holies, in 1 K 6¹⁴ (cf. v.²⁰) shows, and as the temple of Ezekiel

Smend, Bertholet, and especially Cornill, in their Commentaries, have done much to obviate this difficulty.—We have secondary sources in Josephus^δ and the Mishnic tract Middoth, but these are valuable chiefly for Herod's temple; for, even when describing the temples of Solomon, Ezekiel, and Zerubbabel, it is Herod's which they have in mind. Josephus has also a strong passion for exaggeration, especially when the glory of the temple is concerned. In matters of size and measurement his imagination seems almost as free as was Ezekiel's.^ε

1. PLAN AND DIMENSIONS OF SOLOMON'S TEMPLE.—Fergusson^ζ says that the temple of Solomon was a copy of the tabernacle, the dimensions of the latter being doubled, and such other changes made as were necessary in a fixed as compared with a portable structure. But the resemblances so often, especially in former times, pointed out, are accompanied by differences of an important character—as in the porch, the two pillars Boaz and Jachin, suggests. But no allowance is made for the wall separating the hēkāl, or Holy Place, from the dēbir, which in Ezekiel's temple was 6 cubits thick.^β The building looked towards the east. It is of course quite possible that this arrangement may have been due to the form of the hill, which made it much more suitable to build west to east than north to south.

The sanctuary structure.—The temple building had three parts, or rather two and a porch which is not reckoned as a portion of the house. The arrangement and number of the chambers is conjectural, being based on what we know of Ezekiel's temple.

The larger of the two parts of the house is the hēkāl,^γ the dēbir^δ being the smaller. The hēkāl

^α 1 K 6² 12 Ch 3². The latter passage does not give the height.

^β Ezk 41⁵.

^γ Hēkāl (הֵקָל) is probably the same as the Accadian e-gal, 'great house,' as Schrader, Haupt, and most Assyriologists hold. It may mean properly a hall (AJSL, July 1901, p. 244 ff.). See the Oxf. Heb. Lex. on the word. Though used in other senses, its commonest meaning is that of the Holy Place (שֶׁנִּי), which is the later term. In this article hēkāl has always this meaning.

^δ Dēbir (דְּבִיר) is the term employed in Kings for what in the parallel parts of Chron. is often called 'Holy of Holies' (קֹדֶשׁ קֹדֶשׁ).

was an oblong rectangle 40 cubits from west to east, and 20 cubits from north to south. The debir was a cube measuring 20 cubits in all three directions. Since the whole house was 30 cubits high—the house (ḥēkāl) including ḥēkāl and debir—there must have been 10 cubits of space-room on the top of the debir, this being used probably for storing purposes, though Ewald says it was inaccessible and empty.

Stieglitz and Grüneisen view the debir as externally lower than the ḥēkāl by 10 cubits, but 1 K 6² says the whole house had a height of 30 cubits. Kurtz and Merx held that the ḥēkāl had an inside height of 20 cubits only, and that on the top of the whole house there was an upper room, 60 cubits in length, for keeping the relics of the tabernacle.^a They say further that the Chronicler means this upper space by his ḥēkāl (LXX ὁ ἱερόσωον). But how could such an upper chamber be reached, and why do we never read about it or about the means of getting at it? The chambers about the house^β reached, taking the three storeys together, to 15 cubits. Above these were the windows; ^γ but there would be scant room for the windows between the roofs of the chambers and the ceiling word is said in Kings about the height of the porch, but in 2 Ch 3⁴ it is said to be 120 cubits. But such a structure would have been called a ḥēkāl (tower) and not a ḥēkāl (porch). The proportions, 20, 10, 120, are impossible on both æsthetic and statal grounds. There is certainly a corruption of the text, or we have another example—a gross one here—of the love of exaggeration to which the Chronicler is prone when describing the sanctuary and its worship. It is most natural to think of the porch as having the same height as the house; and it is not stated in 1 K 6, because that would be inferred by the reader.

Walls.—There is no information given as to the thickness of the walls, but it must have been substantial, because they had rebatements of a cubit, or at least of half a cubit, at each successive storey of chambers.^a It could be diminished therefore by 2 cubits, or at least by one, without any material change in the appearance. Ezekiel gives of the house if the latter were but 20 cubits above the floor. The Chronicler does not say where his ḥēkāl were placed, and it is most probable that by them we are to understand the ḥēkāl, or the chambers ranged along the three sides of the house.

The porch.—In front of the house and continuous with it—the two, indeed, forming one building—was the porch,^δ which was not considered a part of the house. Its length, east to west, was 10 cubits; its breadth, north to south, being the same as the breadth of the house, viz. 20 cubits. Not a ḥēkāl. Jerome connected the word with the Hebrew ḥēkāl (debir) 'to speak,' and followed the LXX ἱερόσωον in rendering it oraculum (oraculi sedes). It is really derived from the root still used in Arab., ḥāḥ (V) 'to be behind.' So debir = what is behind; that is, what lies to the west, the east being called ḥāḥ, or what lies to the front, just as the south is the right-hand side (ḥāḥ) and the north the left-handed (ḥāḥ). Debir is the older term, and in the LXX of 1 Kings and in 2 Ch 3¹⁵ 4²⁰ it is simply transliterated debir and debir. Debir occurs also in Ps 23², prob. also 2 K 19²² (for ḥēkāl).

In the OT, length and breadth, when used of a surface of the thickness of the walls of his temple as 6 cubits.^β

In 1 K 6¹⁸ the cedar-covered walls are said to have figures carved on them of knops and open flowers; but this verse is not in the LXX, and it breaks in upon the account of the ḥēkāl in v. 17 and of the debir in v. 19, besides repeating what has been said in v. 15. Probably this carving was the work of a later king, a later editor, by mistake, ascribing it to Solomon. Yet in v. 38 the doors of both ḥēkāl and debir are said to have been adorned with figures of cherubim, palm trees, and open flowers; and the verse is above suspicion.

Roofing.—Very little is told us concerning the roof of the house. 1 K 6^{9b} ^γ is made by Bähr, Keil, Thenius, in their Comm. and Treatises, as also by the Targ., Pesh., Vulg., and Arabic versions, to refer to the covering of the roof. But Benzinger and the LXX take it to mean the covering or wainscoting of the walls; and 1 K 7² ^δ shows that the same verb certainly can be used of the walls, two dimensions, mean the greater and smaller measurement respectively.

^a 1 K 6⁹.

^β Eak 415.

^γ He covered the house with beams and planks of cedar.

^δ And it (the throne porch) was covered with cedar from floor to floor.

—which Thenius is inclined to deny,—and that it probably is so used in this passage. Yet, as Thenius objects, the wainscoting of the walls is described in 6¹⁵. V.⁹ is otherwise awkward in its present position; and it is hard to make out the exact meaning of the technical terms translated ‘beams and planks.’^a Probably the verse is an interpolation.

1 K 6¹⁵β in the EV has the word ‘ceiling’ in it. Instead of ‘walls’ we must read ‘beams’: γ ‘from the floor of the house unto the beams of the ceiling.’ We thus learn that the ceiling had cedar beams, but that is all we learn about it.

But these beams must have been covered with stone, probably the hard limestone of which the walls were built, to protect the house from the rain. In the three most rainy months there descends as much rain in Jerusalem and its neighbourhood as the average rainfall upon any similar area in Great Britain throughout the year.

Was the roof flat or gable-formed? Most certainly it was flat, as all ancient temples and houses were, and as, with hardly an exception, Eastern houses continue to be up to the present time. The custom with regard to private houses is to have a parapet all around the roof to prevent persons who are on the much-frequented roofs from falling.^δ Certainly no other kind of roof than the flat one is hinted at anywhere in the Bible, nor is any other known in the primitive East. It is remarkable to find leading Rabbinical writers, followed by Lund,^ε Hirt, Schnaase, Winer, and Thenius, plead that the roof was gabled. Hirt argues that there were spikes on the roof to keep off the birds, and that the roof was overlaid with gold. But he gets these, as perhaps also his gable roof, from the temple of Herod.^ζ

Inner supports or not?—It is uncertain whether inside the house there were pillars to bear up the roof. In the hēkāl, at all events, it is very likely there were such supports, as the walls were 30 cubits high, and a roof of wood and of stone would be in great danger of tumbling unless there were something besides the walls to keep it up.

Fergusson^η argues for such pillars, and he thinks there would be eight in all, four on each side of the house, one between each couple of tables and lampstands.^θ Such an arrangement would, he thinks, promote at once architectural effect and the stability of the structure. He refers to 1 K 10¹², but the word rendered pillars^ι means ‘support,’ and the parallel word in Chron.^κ means ‘highways,’ though it is rendered in EV ‘terraces.’ There is so much doubt as to what is meant that the passage cannot be made to carry what is put upon it.

The material of which the house and its appendages were built was the white hard limestone which abounds in the country, and which can be polished like marble; indeed it is a kind of marble. The slabs used were prepared at the quarry before they were brought to the temple, so that there was neither hammer nor axe nor any tool of iron heard in the house while it was in building.^μ

The inside walls of the house were, as seen before, overlaid with cedar planks,^ν on which were carved ‘knops’ and ‘open flowers.’ As to the gold said to cover the inside of the house,^a see below under ‘The gold covering of Solomon’s temple’ (p. 700^b).

The floor of the house was probably made of hewn stone of the same material as that of the walls. But this stone floor was covered with cypress^β wood, as the walls were with cedar; so that nowhere inside could the stone be seen.

Chambers surrounding the house. γ.—In every side of the house except the east there were chambers^δ arranged in three storeys. They did not go around the porch, as Grüneisen said, for the house only is mentioned; nor were there any on the east. We are not told how thick the walls of these chambers were, how many in number the chambers were, nor is anything said of their arrangement. For such details and others see EZEKIEL’S TEMPLE, below. Similar side rooms have been discovered at Birs Nimroud.^ε The beams on which the upper storeys were constructed—made, no doubt, of cedar wood—rested upon rebatements in the temple wall, so as to prevent the wall from being built into—the house being too sacred for that.^ζ The temple wall so built would therefore, at the roof of the first chambers, according to most writers, recede half a cubit, and at the roof of the next row of chambers it would recede another half cubit. The opposite wall—that built specially for the chambers—had a corresponding rebatement. So Keil, Stade, Now., Benz., and most; and at least symmetry is secured by this arrangement. Thenius^η and others think the whole rebatement of one cubit at each storey took place in the house wall, and it seems to the present writer that this is likeliest, as not a word is written about rebatements in the chamber wall.

The chambers on the ground were 5 cubits broad, those on the middle storey being 6, while those on the top storey were 7 cubits broad. The chambers were entered from the court on the south side through a door^θ (Fig. 2, E). In Ezekiel’s temple there were entrances on the north as well as on the south. From the lowest storey one ascended to the others by means of a ladder and trap-door, and not, as used to be thought, by means of a winding stair: of such winding stairs the ancient East was quite ignorant.^ι The history is silent as to whether or not there were windows in these chambers. Probably, however, there were, and they would be of the same kind as those of the house. See below concerning these. The chambers seem to have been used for the storing of the furniture, vessels, and other things belonging to the temple.^κ In them, too, were placed some relics of the wilderness worship.^λ 1 K 8⁴, however, has many signs of having been tampered with. Of ‘Levites’ as distinct from ‘priests,’ Kings knows nothing. Nor does Kings show acquaintance with any tent besides that built by David for the ark.^μ ‘Tent of meeting,’^ν if genuine, must have the sense it bears in JE (Ex 33⁷, Nu 11¹⁶ 12⁴) and not in P.

temple as the term 'windows' is now understood. In Bible times glass was not used for what are called windows; nor is it so used at the present time in Eastern countries. Indeed the main purpose of the apertures translated 'windows' is to let impure air out and pure in, rather than to give light to the house.^a Considering the thickness of the walls—6 cubits, or say 9 ft., in Ezekiel's temple—it would have been difficult for the light to enter. In most Eastern houses the lamps are kept burning night and day; it is by them that the house is lighted. This was true probably of the temple as well.

In 1 K 04 the windows are described as latticed—most Eastern windows are—and beamed; γ i.e., besides the latticed covering, there were beams used to protect the opening and to form the framework of the window. Various other reconstructions of the windows have been suggested. The Targ., Pesh., several Rabbinical writers, Luther, and others have rendered 'windows broad within and narrow without.' Keil explains as 'windows with closed beams'; i.e. whose lattices cannot be opened or closed at pleasure, as the lattices of ordinary windows could.^z For a statement and examination of other views see the Comm. of Thénien and Keil, and especially Keil's valuable treatise on Solomon's temple.

We know nothing about the size of the windows, nor is it stated in what part of the walls they were made. The chambers surrounding the house reached a height of 15 cubits—5 cubits being the height of each, if we are to infer from Ezekiel's temple. If, therefore, the windows of the house looked directly to the outside, they must have been some 20 cubits from the ground. It is probable that the chambers had windows as well; and in that case the house windows might have looked immediately opposite to those of the chambers, and have been put in three parallel rows. This is quite possible, as we are not told the number or the position of the windows. There was perhaps a row of windows above the chambers as well.

It is generally thought that there were no windows in the dēbir, and 1 K 8¹²η has been advanced to prove this. The difficulty of having windows between the uppermost roof of the chambers and the ceiling of the dēbir is pointed out. But this difficulty is not insuperable, for, assuming the chambers, between them, to reach a height of 15 cubits, there would still be a space above of several cubits for the windows. If, however, the windows of the house looked immediately upon those of the chambers, the difficulty in question disappears.

Doors.—Both hēkāl and dēbir had doors.^θ We are not told what size they were, but in Ezekiel's temple they were 10 and 6 cubits broad respectively.^ι How high they were is not said. The hēkāl door was square,^κ while that of the dēbir was pentagonal.^λ The door of the hēkāl was ^a חלון, lit. 'a perforated space,' 'a hole,' from חלל = 'to pierce or perforate.'

^β שוט, lit. 'shut.' The Arabic word for such windows is shubbak.

^ι 1 K 633, reading, as LXX, Vulg., Then., and Benz., חֲבֵרָה 'beams made into a square.'

^λ It is better so to understand חֲבֵרָה in 1 K 631. Ges. (Thes. 1. 42 ff.). Keil, Bähr, Then., and Bött. take the numerals in 1 K 631.33 to denote some fraction of either the width of the wall—Ges., Keil, and Bähr—or of the entrance wall (jambs, posts), as Then. and Böttcher. But no writer would choose this way of expressing this idea. It is far better, with the Rabbis, Stade (ZATW iii. p. 148), and Benzinger, to understand the words as above.

made of cypress wood, its posts being of olive wood. The door of the dēbir was of olive wood. Both doors were divided into two horizontal halves; but the two leaves thus formed were in the case of the hēkāl door further divided vertically, each into two folds, which were joined by hinges. It was not therefore needful to open the whole leaf in order to enter the hēkāl.

The dēbir door had two leaves only without the subdivisions, because it was not opened and shut as was the outer door, but was always kept open according to Keil,^a though he says the veil kept the interior hidden. See, however, below, and also VEIL.

Ezekiel's temple had the same construction for the hēkāl and dēbir doors, viz. that which seems to have obtained for the hēkāl door alone in Solomon's temple.^β This is the more striking, as the idea of sanctity is more strictly recognized in Ezekiel's temple. Not at all improbably the inner door of Solomon's temple was constructed exactly like the other, though this is not stated owing to an oversight of the writer. Upon both doors were carved cherubim, palm trees, and open flowers;^δ but there is no reliable evidence that the walls had such figures on them (see 'Walls').

In 2 Ch 314 it is said there was a veil before the door of the dēbir, corresponding to that of the tabernacle.^ε In Zerubabel's temple there was such a veil,^ζ and it was this which gave rise to the veil of the tabernacle, and caused the Chronicler to transfer it to the first temple; but Kings says nothing about it, though Thénien, approved by Riehm,^η brings the word into 1 K 631 by arbitrarily altering a very difficult text; the text is, however, probably an interpolation, as Stade,^θ Now,^ι and others hold. The veil was an invention of the time when the sacred had to be more rigidly separated from the profane. It was quite possibly introduced into the pre-exilic temple after Solomon's time, though of that we know nothing definitely.^κ

The gold covering of Solomon's temple.—The following parts of the temple are said to have been overlaid with gold: (1) the walls of the dēbir; ^λ (2) the walls of the hēkāl; ^μ (3) the floor of the whole house; ^ν (4) the altar before the dēbir [but the support for this—1 K 6^{2b}—is not to be found in the LXX, and it shows otherwise strong marks of being an interpolation. Far better with Stade^ξ and Benzinger omit the clause. With it goes the puzzle of knowing what is meant by the 'altar belonging to the dēbir.' He ^ρ speaks of an

^a Der Tempel, 75.

^β Merx and Ewald have held that the two leaves of the hēkāl door were divided horizontally only. But the epithet חֲבֵרָה—'going around each other'—supports the first view; which is that defended by Thénien, Keil (Comm.), and Benzinger.

altar α belonging to the dēbir, but this error arises from the above interpolated clause rightly rejected by Stade and Benzing[er]; (5) the cherubim; β (6) the leaves of the door. γ

It is probable that the statement about gilding is a late addition in all the above instances, and that, in Solomon's temple, it had no place. It is significant that in every one of the passages in question there are other indications which awaken suspicion (for details consult Stade, ZATW iii. 140 ff.). When Shishak, king of Egypt, attacked and conquered Jerusalem, he took away the treasures of both temple and palace: the golden shields are distinctly named, but not a word occurs about the gold of the walls, etc. δ Jehoash, king of Israel, overcame the king of Judah, and took from Jerusalem the gold and silver and the temple vessels, but nothing is said about his stripping walls, etc., of the gold that covered them. ϵ Similarly, Ahaz in his extremity took the oxen on which the brazen sea rested, and also other things (2 K 16¹⁸⁻¹⁷). One would expect to read of his purloining the gold that was so conspicuous if it covered walls, doors, inner altar, cherubim, and even floors. When Hezekiah stripped the doors and pillars of the temple, in order to make a present to the king of Assyria (2 K 18¹⁸⁻¹⁷), nothing is written about there being any gold given, though of course this is not denied either. 'Gold' in the EV, as the italics indicate, is not in the Hebrew.—Ezekiel's temple does not appear to have had any of this gold-overlaying. In short, apart from the suspicious reference named, we have no allusion in the subsequent history to this gold covering. In post-exilic times the wealth of Solomon was greatly exaggerated, just as his wisdom and power were, among Arabs as well as Hebrews, in yet later days. It was felt by those who made the additions ϵ gold that Solomon's exalted character demanded them. Besides, the P tabernacle was pictured as plentifully supplied with gold: this would afford a strong motive for making gold more conspicuous in Solomon's temple.

2. THE PATTERN OR STYLE OF ARCHITECTURE IN WHICH THE TEMPLE OF SOLOMON WAS BUILT.—Those who claim to speak with authority on this point have held opinions widely apart, showing that the data are inadequate for a clear and reliable decision.

Some (e.g. Williams, etc.) have found the model of Solomon's temple among the Greeks. Thrupp, ζ de Vogüé, η Thenius, θ and Benzing, pronounce the architecture of the temple to be Egyptian. Benzing, together with a plan, in order to show how much Solomon's temple resembled this. He calls special attention to the threefold division of porch, hēkal, and dēbir which obtained in both temples. Nowack, on the other hand, points out that this same feature characterizes the ancient temples of Sicily. α Thenius' diagrams at the end of his valuable Commentary on Kings are all based on Egyptian originals, and he is controlled throughout his Commentary and treatise by the idea that the first Jerusalem temple was a copy of the Egyptian temples. Puchstein and Nowack α argue for a Syrian origin. W. E. Cobb β makes the Syrian factor the principal one, as indeed Puchstein does, only the latter contends that Assyrian art was originally Syrian.

Fergusson ξ pronounces the problem insoluble, only that he says Egypt is out of the question. He thinks that either the valley of the Euphrates or Phœnicia was the most likely home of the temple architecture. But he does not give any arguments of weight to support his opinion.

Friedrich, ρ Perrot and Chipiez, τ and W. R. Smith σ trace the style to Phœnicia. The fact that HIRAM, the artificer (1 K 7¹³⁻⁷, 2 Ch 2¹³⁻⁷), was a Phœnician, though connected with Israel, lends strong support to the last view, and Fergusson is not against it.

The natural conclusion to come to is that either Phœnician or Syrian art—it is hardly possible to distinguish these two—was that followed in the construction of Solomon's temple; but the arguments and illustrations advanced by Benzing, Cobb, and others go to prove that there was a close resemblance between the sacred architecture of the Semitic world and of Egypt.

Contents of the hēkal.—In front of the dēbir was an altar-shaped table on which the SHEW-

BREAD was set as an offering to God. α This is not the altar of incense, as Keil, β Bähr, γ and most of the older authorities contend, for we do not find such an altar named or implied in any pre-exilic document. δ There was no such altar in Ezekiel's temple, nor for a long time afterwards. See Benzing, Heb. Arch. p. 401 n. On the other hand, there was in the latter temple a table-like altar of shewbread, ϵ which is more fully described than that of the first temple. See art. INCENSE, vol. ii. p. 467^b.

According to 1 K 7⁴⁸⁻⁵⁰ the following were also made and set in the hēkal: (1) a golden altar, the altar of incense; (2) a table for the shewbread; (3) ten golden lampstands, ζ five on the right side and five on the left; (4) lamps for these; (5) many other smaller things.

But these verses have all the appearance of being by a later hand, for the purpose of heightening the impression. In 1 K 6²² the hēkal is said to contain the altar-like table, but there is no hint of anything besides being in this part of the house. Chronicles ν has, however, a parallel account to 1 K 7⁴⁸⁻⁵⁰. Jer 52¹⁹ refers to 'lampstands' δ as taken by the Chaldeans, but in the parallel account of 2 K 25 nothing is said of lampstands. If, however, the writers of Jer 52¹⁹, 1 K 7⁴⁸⁻⁵⁰, and 2 Ch 4¹⁹⁻²³ were under the influence of P, they would have spoken of one lampstand, such as obtains in P's tabernacle, and not of ten. There must have been some ground for the tradition of the ten lampstands. Probably these did exist—but brazen, not golden ones—in Solomon's temple, or they were added soon after, for there must have been some way of lighting the interior of the house. They would be kept burning day and night, as house lamps in the East are at the present day. ϵ They might have been fixed upon pedestals, the Eastern fashion,—but most likely they were set on the ten tables about which we read in 2 Ch 4⁸. α Keil, however, maintains that these tables were for the shewbread; but 2 Ch 13¹¹⁻²⁹ seem to show that there was but one such table.

Contents of the dēbir.—After the building of the temple was completed, the ark λ was brought from the city of David at the south-east of the temple hill, and placed in the dēbir, which, using the later name, is explained as the Holy of Holies. μ It was carried by the priests, though, according to the older history of 2 S 6¹³, priests were not considered the only proper bearers of the ark.

The ark is said to have contained nothing except the two tables of the Law. ν In David's time and Solomon's the ark seems to have been looked upon as involving in some way the Divine presence,—as a kind of numen praesens. Stade, Benz., Nowack, and many others think that the ark held originally a stone which was considered to represent Jehovah, and that it was at a time later than Solomon's that it contained or was believed to contain the two tables of stone.

In He 9⁴ the pot of manna and Aaron's rod are said to have been in the ark. ξ Nowhere else in the Bible is this said, though these articles are spoken of as being laid up before the ark of the tabernacle. The writer of Hebrews has on his side the common belief of the later Rabbis. α Overshadowing the ark were two huge cherubim, ρ each being 10 cubits high, i.e. exactly half as high as the ceiling of the dēbir. These had two wings apiece, each being 5 cubits broad. These wings were outstretched, the outer ones touching the walls, the inner ones reaching to each other. The four wings of 5 cubits each were stretched from wall to wall, extending along the whole width of 20 (= 4 × 5) cubits. The ark had its place under the two inner wings. On the form and significance of these cherubim see CHERUBIM.

α 1 K 6²⁰ renders the last part of this verse, 'And he made (not overlaid) an altar of cedar': so LXX. Then., Benz. etc.

In 2 K 18⁴ it is recorded that Hezekiah 'removed the high places, and brake the pillars, and cut down the Asherah; and he brake in pieces the brazen serpent that Moses had made; for unto those days the children of Israel did burn incense to it.' Where in the temple—if in it at all—this symbol of deity was kept we have no intimation. The brief notice is interesting, however, as showing to how late a time the Israelites worshipped Jehovah in the form of some material object. See art. NEHUSHTAN.

The court.^a—Keil and the older authorities generally hold that there was an outer temple court^β as well as an inner one.^γ What can be said for this view is well said by Keil in Der Tempel Salomos, p. 114 ff. So far, however, as the history and description of Solomon's temple are concerned, we know of but one temple court, the other courts mentioned not being temple courts at all. The epithet 'inner,' when employed to designate the temple court, gets its meaning from the fact that it was surrounded by the greater court, and formed, indeed, a part of the latter.^δ This one court is called by the Chronicler the 'court of the priests,'^ε but under the influence of later ideas and usages Ezekiel was the first to think of reserving a court for the priests, and in the later temples his conception was carried out. It was owing to stricter notions of holiness, and the belief in a more urgent need for Jehovah to be approached through His appointed ministers, that God's house—the place where He dwelt—came to be safeguarded by a walled space into which priests alone could enter. But in Solomon's day and for a long time afterward such conceptions were unknown. No need was therefore thought to exist for more than one temple court.

The greater court—of which the temple court formed a part—was surrounded by a wall made of three layers of hewn stone, and on the top of them a layer of cedar planks, the latter probably gable-shaped, so that the water might fall to the ground.^ζ Keil^η and others think the cedar planks stood upright, making a kind of railing. There was the same sort of wall around the temple court, as well as around the court below, in which the royal palace stood.

No information is supplied about the extent of the court. Ezekiel's inner court was 100 cubits square;^θ and Keil thinks the court in question had the same size. But it must be remembered that the court about which Keil is thinking was, like Ezekiel's, for the priests alone; the one and only court of Solomon's temple was for the people as well as for the priests. The Rabbis say that the temple court was 187 cubits from east to west, and 135 cubits from north to south. They get these figures, however, from the second temple, and moreover they, too, believed that the first temple, like the others, had an outer court.

We are left equally in the dark as to the form of the court. Judging, however, from other temples, we should expect it to be rectangular, if not a square. Hirt and Grüneisen say the front or east side of it formed a semicircle; but this is simply a guess. The fact that so little is said concerning the court shows how small was the importance attached to it at this early time.

Gates of the court.—No court gates are named in the history of the building of the temple. It is natural to think that there was a gate on the south side, for it was on that side that the royal palace lay,^κ and the king would enter by that gate. It is possible that the people also had to enter the sacred enclosure through this southern gate. But it is probable that there were gates on the north and east also, as there were in Ezekiel's temple.^λ We have evidence that for some time before the Exile there were gates. In Jer 38¹⁴ we read of a 'third entry into the house of Jehovah,' and three keepers of the threshold are referred to in Jer 52²⁴,

2 K 25¹⁸. But these references are not conclusive as to the court of Solomon's temple. Moreover, we read of a northern gate,^α which is probably identical with the 'upper gate of the house of Jehovah,'^β the 'upper gate of Benjamin,'^γ and 'the altar gate,'^δ—so called because to this the people brought their offerings. Assuming that the same gate is meant in all these passages, we gather from 2 K 15³⁵ that it was built by Jotham (B.C. 740–736); moreover, it is called a 'new gate.'^ε It could not therefore have been made in Solomon's time, though it might have taken the place of a much older gate. In 1 Ch 9¹⁸ an eastern gate is named, and it is called 'the king's gate,' probably because the king used it either principally or exclusively.^ζ We have supposed that Solomon would be more likely to enter through a south gate, about which, however, we know nothing certain.

The floor of the court was paved; at least it was so in Ahaz' day (B.C. 736–728), for it was upon the pavement that he set the brazen sea after he had taken away its proper support.^η The Chronicler^θ says it was paved from the very first. Ezekiel's outer court was paved for 50 cubits all round the outer wall, except on the west; and it is likely that his inner court was paved, for the other is called the lower pavement, implying the existence of a higher. According to Smend,^κ the whole of Ezekiel's inner court was paved.

Contents of the court.—The Altar of Burnt-offering.—We have in Kings no account of the making of this altar, though its existence is implied in 1 K 8²⁴, where it is called a 'brazen altar,' and in 2 K 16¹⁰, where we read that king Ahaz ordered Urijah the priest to set aside the brazen altar that was in the 'forefront of the house' λ in favour of a new altar, built according to an Assyrian model which the king saw at Damascus. In 2 Ch 4¹ it is said that Hiram Abi, the temple artist, made an altar of brass, 20 cubits in both length and width, and 10 cubits high. Beyond the instructions thus given we know nothing authentic of this altar. Its being made of brass was contrary to the directions laid down in the Book of the Covenant,^μ and is probably due to contact with surrounding peoples. Keil^ν tries to save the character of Solomon by maintaining that the inside of the altar was made up of earth and unhewn stone, and that its outside was alone of brass,—brass plates, he says. But such an altar could hardly be called one of brass.

Keil^ξ reconstructs the altar according to what we know of the altar of the tabernacle. Most modern authorities reconstruct it in accordance with what we know of Ezekiel's altar.^σ But neither procedure is a safe one; certainly not the former, since the whole account of the tabernacle is conceived under the influence of late ideas and practices. Nor is it safe to argue from Ezekiel's to Solomon's altar of burnt-offering; for, assuming that the prophet's conception was governed by what he had seen of the pre-exilic temple at Jerusalem, yet many changes are likely to have been made between Solomon's time and that of the prophet. Some of these are known to us, and have already come under our notice.^τ

The altar of the first temple stood probably at the spot where David erected an altar after the plague was stayed.^ρ Indeed this altar might have been the very one that David raised, though 2 Ch 4¹ is against this supposition, as is also the fact that the rest of the temple was new.

The Brazen Sea.—Between the house and the altar, but towards the south, was the Brazen Sea (called also 'the Molten Sea' and simply 'the Sea'). See SEA (BRAZEN).

the right and left wings of the temple, there were ten brazen stands on wheels, with brass basins set upon them (see the very elaborate article, with illustrations, entitled 'Die Kesselwagen des salom. Tempel,' by Stade, in ZATW, 1901, p. 145 ff.). They were filled with water, which was used for the purpose of washing the flesh that was to be offered in sacrifice. Perhaps the water in them was obtained from the brazen sea. Or it may be that both the brazen sea and also the lavers were supplied direct from the stream mentioned in Ezk 47¹.

In 1 K 74⁰ (|| 2 Ch 411) we are told that Hiram made also pots, ^a shovels, ^b and basins, ^c but it is not stated where these were kept.

Of any additional chambers in the court besides those around the house the Biblical accounts say nothing. There is no mention, for example, of chambers for sacrificing, for washing the sacrificial flesh, for storing the instruments used in sacrificing, etc.

Rabbinical writers say there were eight stone tables on the north of the altar of burnt-offering, fastened to the pavement by twenty-four iron rings. Lund,³ who follows Jewish authorities far too slavishly, gives details of these tables, depending upon his Jewish guides. If, however, these tables obtained at all, it was in the temple of Herod alone, with which Jewish writers were familiar, and from which far too freely and uncritically they drew conclusions concerning the temple of Solomon.

Subsequent history of Solomon's temple.—Solomon did not intend the temple he built to be a rival to the already existing high places of the land, much less did he intend by his sanctuary to supplant the many others. For long after his time, as the genuine Books of Kings show, the bāmōth or high places had the stamp of approval as much as the Jerusalem sanctuary. The writings of the early prophets make this very clear. From Amos and Hosea we see that the people of the Northern kingdom made pilgrimages to Beersheba in the south (Am 5³, cf. 8¹⁴, Hos 4¹⁰ (text as amended by Wellh., Now., etc.)), and that they worshipped there and at Dan, Bethel, and other places (Am 4⁵ 8¹⁴, Hos 10¹⁰) without incurring blame, so far as concerned the locality of the sanctuaries. On the other hand, the inhabitants of Judah sacrificed at Gilgal as well as Jerusalem (Hos 4¹⁰; but text dub., see Wellh. ad loc.). The opposition to the bāmōth arose from the superstition and immorality associated with them, and the danger of worshipping the Canaanite deities to which they were originally consecrated.^e It should be noted that the temple-worship of Jerusalem is as strongly reprobated by Isaiah as worship at the bāmōth is by Amos and Hosea, and for a similar reason; see Is 1, etc. Elijah was one of the first to set his face against these local cults; but the first to make any attempt to suppress them was Hezekiah (B.C. 729–629).^f But the high places continued to be recognized until about B.C. 621, when Josiah (B.C. 640–609) employed vigorous measures, and for the most part succeeded in stamping them out.^g More and more the temple became the centre of the nation's life, religious and political, especially after the return from exile (see Smend, Alttest. Religionsgesch. 216 f., 230 f., 315 f., 438 ff., and especially his article in SK, 1884, p. 689 f.).

In 2 Ch 20⁶ mention is made of a 'new court' belonging to the house of Jehovah before which Jehoshaphat stood; an outer court could hardly have existed at this time; probably the Chronicler is influenced by the temple of his own day.

We have already spoken of the following incidents connected with the temple: (1) the new gate made by Jotham; ^h (2) the supplanting by king Ahaz of the altar of burnt-offering, and the removal by him of the brazen oxen on which the brazen sea rested; ⁱ (3) the taking away by Hezekiah of the gold, etc., of the house.^j But worse than that of Ahaz or Hezekiah was the conduct of Manasseh, for he caused altars to be raised in the court to all the host of heaven, and an image to be put in the house of Jehovah.^k Moreover, he erected abodes for hierodules, in which women wove tents for the Asherah, these tents to be put up in the sanctuary.^l He had also horses, consecrated to the sun, kept in a part of the inner court.^m Josiah purged the temple of these abominations,ⁿ but unfortunately his life was cut short at Megiddo in the war with Egypt, about B.C. 609.^o Twelve years later Jerusalem was attacked by the Chaldeans under their king, Nebuchadnezzar.^p In B.C. 586 Jerusalem and its temple were burned to the ground, and whatever of value remained in the temple was carried to Babylon.^q Thus ended the first temple after an existence of over four centuries.

ii. EZEKIEL'S TEMPLE.—Ezekiel's programme for the new State and temple was suggested to him by the sights he had seen in the Holy City, and the events amidst which he moved. Hence the picture he drew of the temple that was to be is helpful in understanding what the temple was immediately before its destruction. In a less degree, less than is generally supposed, it is an aid, too, in reconstructing the temple of Solomon.

But Ezekiel's temple obtains its chief significance from its relation to the future. The legislation set forth in the last 9 chapters of Ezekiel represents an intervening stage in ritual and theological conceptions between the Deuteronomic legislation and the Priestly. In Ezekiel's ideal picture the temple and its priesthood stand in the very foreground. Some items in his programme could not be realized. For instance, the territory in which each of the 12 tribes was to dwell is marked out, but the 12 tribes did not return. Again, the temple buildings did not, and could not, occupy exactly a square of 500 cubits each way.

The description of Ezekiel's temple is to be found in 40¹–43²⁷ and parts of the following chapters.

The text is often very corrupt, and has to be conjecturally emended. Bötcher's Proben alttest. Schriftklärung (1883) and Thénius' Com. on Kings are very serviceable in reconstructing the text. The Commentaries of Smend and of Cornill are of the utmost value in the same direction; especially Cornill's monumental work, which deals mainly with the text. One cannot but wish, however, that Cornill were less wedded to the text implied in the LXX. We ought not to omit noticing the Commentaries of Kell, Bertholet, and Kraetzschmar, all of which the present writer has found helpful, more particularly that of Bertholet.

Hävernick in his Commentary on Ezekiel has called attention to the fact that in the account of Solomon's temple it is the house—including hēkāl and dēbir—which receives most attention; but in the description of Ezekiel's temple it is the external circumstances that stand out most prominently, such as the courts with cells and doors, the guard-rooms, chambers, ornaments, dresses, and the like. The house is but slightly touched upon. This may be owing to the fact that in both temples the house was in all essentials identical: the differences and additions were in the external parts.

1. GENERAL ARRANGEMENT.—Solomon's temple was but one part of the complex of royal buildings on the eastern hill. It was enclosed in the great court, as were the royal palace, the house inhabited by his Egyptian wife, and other erections. In this temple court the people were in the habit of gathering to offer sacrifices. Priests and people mingled around the altar and in the immediate precincts of the house. In Ezekiel's time no palace and no State buildings were needed. The space on which these had been built was now devoted, accordingly, to that outer court which is the grand feature of this new temple. Israel had suffered for want of proper reverence. God had not been worshipped with becoming respect. His house had been desecrated, the sacrifices profaned. Now the house was to be shut off from secular buildings. In close proximity to it the priests alone were to be allowed; it was only in the large outer court, which stood where previously the royal buildings were, that the common people could gather. There was to be a new land separated to Jehovah, and cut off on the west by the sea, and on the east by the rapid Jordan and its consequent freedom from practical restraints. The area it covered was a square 500 cubits α on each side. The proportion 2:1 obtains largely. The gateways are 50 cubits long and 25 broad. The house with walls and chambers had a length of 100 cubits and a breadth of 50. Between the house and the 3 inner gates was a square of 100 cubits each side. A glance at the plan below will show the thoroughly symmetrical character of the whole. From square to square is 50 cubits.

The temple area was encompassed by a wall (ghij) 6 cubits high and of the same thickness. β In the centre of the N., E. and S. walls there were gateways γ (GGG). Just opposite to them, towards seas, or rather lakes. But of that all-holy land the temple hill was to be first secured as a kind of tērūmah α or first-fruits. An enclosed land was to have its sanctuary enclosed—nay, doubly enclosed, the inner enclosure for the priests alone. It is no doubt this idea of the holiness of Jehovah and His house that prompted the prophet, in the spirit of his time and people, to appropriate the whole of the upper hill for his temple, and to substitute the outer court for Solomon's all-encompassing great court.

A leading feature in Ezekiel's temple is its symmetry: this is due to its ideal character, and its the inside and exactly 100 cubits distant, there were three gates of the same construction leading into the inner court γ (G' G' G'). Within the precincts of the inner court was the house, embracing both hēkāl or Holy Place and dēbīr or Most Holy Place (H). In our more detailed description we shall follow the order in which the angel showed the temple to the prophet in the vision. We begin, therefore, at the eastern gate of the outer court.

The first thing we encounter as we approach the eastern gateway is the ascent by 7 steps α to the level of the outer court, which was higher than the ground outside. At the inner gate there was a corresponding flight of steps which conducted to the inner court, but here there were 8 steps β not 7. In a similar way an ascent of 10 steps had to be made before the house could be entered. γ The whole constituted thus three terraces, all which would yield a commanding view from the mountains and high ground around, and from the lowest court.

Height of steps.—According to Ezk 41¹⁸ the 10 steps leading immediately to the house were equal to an elevation of 6 cubits, i.e. each step was $\frac{3}{4}$ of a cubit high. The other steps were probably of the same height.

FIG. 6.—AN OUTER GATE.

Having reached the topmost of the steps in front of the outer gateway, we enter the gateway itself, which, as is common in the East, has rooms on both sides, δ though it has none above, such as are often found in Eastern countries, and, indeed, not seldom in Europe. First of all we enter the threshold ϵ (T), an open space with a length ζ (E. to W.) of 6 cubits η and a breadth ξ of 10 cubits θ .

Passing beyond the threshold, we find right and left of us guard-rooms: in which the temple officers were stationed to keep order and to watch the house. κ These were four-square, the side being 6 cubits. Five cubits farther on there were two identical guard-rooms, and the same distance yet farther to the west there were two more. There were thus six guard-rooms in all (Fig. 6, $G G G G G G$).

No doors are mentioned as belonging to the guard-rooms, but it is probable that on the sides towards the outer court there were doors. On the inner side of each guard room there was a 'border' ($R V$) or 'barrier' λ (Cornill, Bertholet, A. B. Davidson) (see Fig. 6, $m n$), of one cubit thickness. The purpose of this barrier was to enable the sentry to see along the whole length of the gateway without being jostled by the crowd that passed in and out. Of its form we are told nothing, but it was probably simply a straight stone wall, a cubit in thickness and 6 cubits across. Between the guard-rooms there were 'posts' (EV) or 'wall fronts' α (A. B. Davidson) (Fig. 6, $J J J J$), which from guard-room to guard-room were 5 cubits. There were four in all—two on each side. Their use was purely architectural. At the west end of the guard-rooms there was a second threshold β (T'), the same in all respects as the other, but acting as threshold to one entering from the outer court, as the other did to one entering from the outside.

We now enter the porch (P), an empty space 8 cubits long (E. to W.), $c d$, and 20 broad (N. to S.), $\gamma k i$. The breadth of the gateway all along its length was 10 cubits, δ except where the barriers occur: these occupying a cubit each side would reduce the distance between the guard-rooms from barrier to barrier ($m m n n$) to 8 cubits. The length of the gateway, leaving out the steps, which are not counted, was 50 cubits, ϵ and it was wholly roofed, as may be gathered from the fact that guard-rooms and intervening 'posts' required windows. The length of the gateway is thus made up—

|--|------------|
| Outer threshold (T) $a b$ | 6 cubits. |
| 8 guard-rooms ($G G G$) | 18 " |
| 2 'posts' or 'wall fronts' ($J J$) | 10 " |
| Inner threshold (T') $a c$ | 6 " |
| Porch (P) $c d$ | 8 " |
| 'Posts' or 'wall fronts' ($J J$) $d e$ | 2 " |
| Total | 50 cubits. |

Windows.—According to Ezk 40¹⁸ there were windows in the guard-rooms, in the 'posts' between them, and in the porch. Those of the guard-rooms looked out into the court, and lighted at once the rooms themselves and also the adjoining gateway. ζ The windows in the 'posts' extended all through their thickness of 6 cubits. If these posts were solid walls, it must have been so, and not, as Davidson's diagram η represents, a mere opening on the outside wall. On the nature and function of the windows see above. There must have been windows on the north and south of the porch, and probably the 'post' walls had them too. See Fig. 6. The end 'posts' ($d e$) had palm trees engraved on them. θ

The north and south gates are said to have been exactly like the eastern gate, and so did not need separate description.

Outer court.—For remarks on the function and significance of the outer court see above. And

γ The width of the porch (N. to S.) is not given in the MT. In Ezk 40¹⁴, however, we read, 'He made also posts of 60 cubits.' Kliefoth, followed by Heng., Keil, Schröder (Lange), Perrot and Chipiez—(see their restorations)—and others defend the text as it stands. The two 'posts' at the end of the porch were like church steeples—so says Kliefoth; and it was such gate pillars that suggested our church steeples. But the 'posts' in question formed no part of the sanctuary, as church steeples usually do: unless, indeed, Kl. was thinking of the campanile or bell-tower churches, such as is to be seen at Chichester, etc. It is far more sensible to emend the text with the aid of the LXX, and to read, 'And he measured the porch (changing עֲלֵי הַיָּמִין ellm to עֲלֵי הָאֵמ) 20 cubits'; i.e. in breadth—the other measurements have been given: thus Smend, Cornill, Davidson, and Bertholet. This would leave 5 cubits for the two side walls, i.e. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ cubits apiece. The 'jambs' or posts towards the outside ($d e$) are said to have had a thickness of 2 cubits.

ϵ Ezk 40¹⁵. The statement in v. 13 that the gateway was 25 cubits, though supported by the Versions, is in direct collision with v. 15, and must, with Smend and Cornill, be rejected as an interpolation. Bött., Hitz., Häv., and Keil retain, however, and explain thus: the whole gateway (וְיָגֵד) consisted of a covered portion at each end, with an unroofed space in the middle. It is, they hold, the covered part that is meant in v. 13. But if so, why is this not stated? Bertholet's defence of the words requires a non-natural interpretation of the verse.

ζ The 'barrier' was probably a wall sufficiently low for the light to pass over it. There is nothing in the text opposed to this. There might have been windows in the barrier itself; this is likely if the barrier walls were high.

VOL. IV.—45

for considerations showing that the first temple had but one court, see 'Court' under SOLOMON'S TEMPLE. The outer court was comparatively free from buildings. Besides the north, east, and south gates, it had 30 cells arranged along its outer walls.

The 30 cells (Fig. 5, 1, 2, 3, etc.) which went around the court were used for keeping utensils and provisions, and served also as residences for the priests.^β They were also used for sacrificial feasts. The ancient high places had connected with them a festive chamber, where sacrificial meals were partaken of.^γ

We are not told the size of these cells, nor how they were distributed. A stone pavement extended from the outer-wall to a distance corresponding to the gateways, i.e. 44 cubits, which with the width of the wall (6 cubits) made 50 cubits. The cells are said to have been 'upon the pavement,' which seems to mean that they had the pavement for floor. But the preposition rendered 'upon' means prevailingly 'to,'^δ and the Hebrew permits the translation: 'the cells were attached to the pavement,' i.e. they were placed at the termination of the pavement without being on it. But the analogy of other cells makes it practically certain that these were attached to the boundary wall. Taking this for granted, the prophet is quite silent as to how they were arranged.

Most authorities—Stade,^ε Benzinger,^ζ Nowack^η (both the latter follow Stade closely), Davidson, Perrot and Chipiez, Keil, etc.—place 10 cells on the north, east, and south sides, leaving the west side for the biḡyān (Fig. 5, B). Five are supposed to be on each side of the respective outer gates. This answers well to the symmetry so characteristic of Ezekiel's temple. Orelli and Bertholet—the latter trends closely in the footsteps of his Basel colleague—allocate six of these cells to the west side, 3 on each side of the biḡyān (B). There are then 8 on each of the remaining 3 sides, 4 on one side of each gate and 4 on the other. The biḡyān occupying but a small part of the western wall, leaves room enough for 3 cells on each side of it. The words 'chambers and a pavement' made for the court round about,^ι support the plan of putting cells on each of the 4 sides, unless, indeed, with Kilefoth and Cornill, we limit the words 'round about' to the pavement.

Opinions are divided also as to the way in which the cells stood in relation to one another. Keil^κ maintains that the cells on each side of the north, east, and south gates were but rooms in one building, like the rooms of a house. He has therefore on his plan but 6 buildings for the 30 cells, 5 cells in each. But in that case we should have expected to read of 6 buildings, and not merely of 30 cells. Davidson separates the cells by an intervening space.^λ Stade, Benz., Now., Orelli, Berth., and Perrot and Chipiez join the cells, putting a mere wall between them; and this is the likeliest view, for on Davidson's conception there would be a considerable waste of labour and materials in the extra walls required.

Pavement.—The pavement already spoken of is called the 'lower pavement,'^μ from which one would infer that the inner and upper court^ν was also paved. Smend concludes from 2 Ch 7³ and Aristaeus' letter that the whole of the inner court was paved. Cornill rejects the words as an interpolation, though on purely subjective grounds.

Kitchens.—In each of the four corners of the outer court there was a kitchen in which the sacrificial meals were got ready,^ξ the size of each being 40 cubits long by 30 broad. The 'ministers of the house' o boiled in them what the people brought to be sacrificed.

The Inner Court.—The inner court was for the priests alone; and its being thus exclusively used, and there being more than one court at all, marks a new step in the religion of Israel. As compared with the outer and larger court, the inner was crowded with buildings having to do with the temple service, particulars of which will be found below. From the external margin of the outer walls to the walls of the inner court there was a distance of 150 cubits. The entrance to the inner court was by means of 3 gates opposite to the 3 outer gates and of the same construction, only that the parts—threshold to porch—occurred in reverse order; the porch of the inner gate being next the steps, and not farthest away, as in the outer gate, etc. There were 8, not 7 steps between the two courts—a sign perhaps of the increased progress in holiness as compared with the passage from the outside to the first court.

Sacrificial cell and tables about the porch of the inner Northern (or Eastern?) Gate.—On one side of the inner northern gateway, joining the porch, and with a passage into the porch, there was a cell, not further described as to structure, size, or position. Smend^α represents it as on the south side of the porch, having the same length and a third of its breadth. This cell was used for washing the burnt-offerings.^β Kilefoth, Keil, and Schröder (Lange) maintain that the sacrifices were washed—the last process they were put through before they were laid upon the altar—at each of the 3 inner gates. Indeed Kilefoth goes so far as to say that there were two washing cells attached to each porch of the inner gates, one on each side. But the slaughtering took place at one gate only,^γ and it is practically certain that the washing did too. 'Gates' in v.^δ should be read 'gate' with the LXX and most authorities.

Another debated and debateable question is—Which gate is meant at which this washing cell was situated? Ew., Hitz., Smend, Corn., and Berth. hold that it is the eastern, their principal grounds being, that (1) the eastern gate was the most sacred, that (2) the stream that supplied water for washing the sacrifices passed by the east end of the temple,^δ and that (3) at the N. and S. gates there were other buildings (Fig. 5, P.P.). On the other hand, Böttcher,^ε Hävernick, and Davidson hold that the northern gate is meant,^ζ and for reasons which, to the present writer, appear conclusive. Here are some of them:—(1) The prophet is already at the N. gate. Cornill gets rid of this difficulty by his usual and often successful way of emending the text. In the beginning of v.^η he introduces a clause answering to the beginning of v.^θ 'And he brought me to the door of the porch of the eastern gate.' But he has absolutely no external support for the change thus made. (2) According to the regulations in Leviticus,^ι the slaughtering of animals for sacrifice was to take place at the N. side of the altar in the case of burnt-, sin-, and trespass-offerings. No directions are given as to peace-offerings.^κ It is to be expected beforehand that Ezekiel's legislation and that of the Priestly Code would tally. (3) The N. gate is called in ⁸² the 'gate of the altar.' Since it was to this gate that the people brought their offerings, it was the most frequented. The two E. gates were kept shut except on Sabbaths and new moons,^λ or on other special occasions when the prince desired to present freewill-offerings.^μ The western gate was closed by buildings connected with the temple. In the pre-exilic temple the S. gate was joined to the palace court, which is partly true of the eastern gate as well.

Passing into the inner N. gate, on both sides of the porch—which is first reached—we see 4 tables, 2 on each side (T'), on which the burnt-, sin-, and trespass-offerings were slain;^ν or at least they were used in connexion with the slaying of these sacrifices, as Keil and Davidson understand the words. The actual slaughtering took place probably on 4 tables outside, the 4 inside tables being used in that case for preparing the sacrifices for the altar. According to Lv 1¹¹ ⁶⁵ 7² the above-named sacrifices had to be killed on the N. side of the altar.^ξ If these tables were placed near the N. gate, this requirement of P would be met.

There were without the porch two tables on each side—4 in all (T); on these, as stated above, the actual slaughtering took place.^η In addition to the 8 tables noticed above there were 4 of hewn stone, each with a length and breadth of one cubit and a half, having a height of one cubit. They had ledges running round the 4 top edges a hand-

2. THE HOUSE AND ITS MEASUREMENTS. γ —The house and its appurtenances formed a square of 100 cubits each way. The manner in which this is made up will be shown in summary after the several details have been considered.

γ In 44¹⁵⁻³¹ the Levites are said to have charge of the house.

^a Cf. 43^{13ff.}

γ Ezk 40⁴⁸⁻⁴¹⁴.

^{β} Ezk 8¹⁶, J1 2¹⁷, Mt 23³⁵.

The porch a (P).—The porch (Fig. 7) was 20 cubits from N. to S. (d c), and 11 cubits, or rather 12, β from E. to W. (d f). The platform of the house was 6 cubits higher than the ordinary level of the inner court: this was reached by 10 steps. γ Close to the 'posts' or 'wall fronts' of the porch were two pillars, δ the Boaz and Jachin of 1 K 7²¹ (B J).

The hēkal or Holy Place ε (H).—The hēkal was 40 cubits long (E. to W.) and 20 broad (N. to S.)—inside measurements. The posts of the entrance wall (i h) were 6 cubits thick. The door or entrance way into the hēkal was 10 cubits (h h, i i).

The dēbtr or Most Holy Place ζ (D, Fig. 7).—The dēbtr was a cube of 20 cubits each way. Its posts (o p) were 2 cubits in thickness, this being the thickness of the wall (n o) which extended from the N. and S. walls of the house to the door. This wall η (n o) was 7 cubits wide, leaving 6 cubits for the door. θ Doors of hēkal and dēbtr.—Both hēkal and dēbtr had folding doors of the kind already described. κ It is not said that the dēbtr of Solomon's temple had such doors. The doors of the hēkal were carved with cherubim and palm trees, λ as the hēkal walls were. μ The porch entrance (a-a: b-b)—we read of no door—was 14 cubits wide. μ The door or entrance to the hēkal was 10 cubits wide, ν that of the dēbtr being 6. ξ The entrances were therefore in the proportion 7:5:3 (14:10:6). It is singular, though probably only a coincidence, that the wall projections (= 'sidepieces') ο had exactly opposite ratios, viz. 3 (z a): 5 (f h): 7 (n o).

The side chambers. π.—On every side of the house except the east, Ezekiel's temple, like Solomon's, had side chambers. The MT gives the number of them as 33, and Smend displays much ingenuity in justifying the text, which in this connexion is by universal confession very corrupt. In favour of there being 30 are the LXX, Josephus, ρ Böttcher, Cornill, and most recent authorities, as also is the fact that there were 30 cells along the outer wall, not to add the greater symmetry of the round number. In Kings the number is not given. The chambers, arranged as in Solomon's temple in 3 storeys, were on the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd storeys respectively, 4, 5, and 6 cubits broad: in the first temple the figures were 5, 6, and 7. The 2nd and 3rd storeys rested upon rebatements, on which see p. 699^b. Concerning the rebates in the temple wall, the ladders by which the upper storeys were reached, and the uses of the chambers, see above, p. 699^b.

Ezekiel's temple had doors (E E'), one N., one S., by which admission to the chambers could be obtained. There was but one for the first temple, and it was situated at the south: (see Fig. 2, E). There was probably a ladder at each entrance: Ezekiel's temple would thus have two ladders (S S'), Solomon's temple one (Fig. 2, S).

The munnāh, τ or 'what was left' (EV).—On the outside of the chambers N. and S. there was an empty margin of 5 cubits (M). It was out of this munnāh that entrance was had to the chambers through the two doors (E E').

κ Above, p. 700^b, Fig. 4. λ 41²⁶ 41¹⁷.

μ Though the Hebrew does not give the width, it is supplied by the LXX of 41⁴⁸. Adding to this 14 cubits the two projecting walls (d b, b c) we get 6 (= 2 × 3) + 14 = 20, the width of the porch (N. to S.), which is a confirmation of the LXX.

ο 41¹⁸⁻¹¹. ρ Anz. viii. iii. 2.

π 1 K 6⁶. τ Euk 41¹⁸ 11.

The gizrāh, α or 'separate place' (EV).—On every side except the E. there was a space of 20 cubits, called the gizrāh (Fig. 5, b c e f). This court ran round the whole house buildings, including the munnāh, on N. and S.; or it went round the raised platform on which these stood. Reckoning together gizrāh, munnāh, chambers, and house, there was a breadth (N. to S.) of 100 cubits, which makes it highly probable that the gizrāh formed part of the upper platform, instead of merely enclosing it. The text β is silent as to any use to which the gizrāh was put. Perhaps, like our cloisters, it was for the priests to exercise themselves in, and take fresh air when unable to get farther afield.

The binyān γ or 'building' (EV).—On the W. side of the house and adjoining the gizrāh there was a rectangular structure called, apparently, technically binyān (Fig. 5, B), the inside measurements of which were 70 cubits from E. to W. and 90 from N. to S. Its encompassing wall was 5 cubits in thickness. Its W. limit reached to the western wall and joined it, as may be seen from the dimensions below:—

|--|-------------|
| Length of binyān (E. to W.) | 70 cubits. |
| 2 walls of do. (E. and W.) 2 × 5 | 10 " |
| Gizrāh | 20 " |

We know that the western side of the house was 100 cubits from the outer wall, so that there could be no space between the latter and the binyān.

Thenius δ contends strongly that there was such an intervening space, and that behind the binyān there were gates through which wood and animals to be sacrificed were brought into the temple area, and through which refuse of every kind was carried away. Klief. and Keil hold that the binyān was made for the purpose of receiving the ofal of the sacrifices and the sweepings of the gates. Curry ε says the carcass of the sin-offering was burnt at this building. ζ

It is very probable that by the binyān we are to understand the same as the בנין of 2 K 23¹¹ (places in which horses and chariots were kept) and the בנין of 1 Ch 26¹⁸ (a part of the temple west of the house, of which the priests had charge).

In Euk 41¹⁸ we read of the binyān and its 'galleries': for the last word we should certainly read, with Corn. and others, 'walls.' θ This is confirmed by calculation. Adding 90 cubits, the N. to S. dimension, to the widths of the two enclosing walls (5+5=10), we get 100 cubits. Besides, in no other place do we read of there being galleries in the binyān.

General measurements of the house.—The house and its belongings formed a square of 100 cubits a side, α as shown below—

From E. to W. we have these details (see Fig. 7):—

|--|-------------|
| ab Porch wall, Euk 40 ⁴⁸ | 5 cubits. |
| cd Porch, 40 ⁴⁹ | 12 " |

| 1, 2, etc., Side chambers, 41 ⁵ | 4 " |
| Wall of side chambers, 41 ⁶ | 5 " |
| Total | 100 cubits. |

This calculation proves that the munnāh (M) did not extend to the W. side.

These are the dimensions from N. to S.—

ν AV 'suburbs,' RV 'precincts.' Both בנין and בנין are derived by Gesen. (Thez.) from Pers. farvār, a summer-house. open on all sides to admit air. He considers the 'parbar' of 1 Ch 26¹⁸ to have been an open porch adjoining the temple. In Rabbinical Hebrew (Mishna, etc.) parbar means temple court, and also suburbs of a city. See, further, art. PARRAR.

Decoration of the inside of the house.—The walls α of hékál, débir, and porch were wainscotted, as were also the closed windows. β The wall decoration was arranged in compartments or fields, γ in each of which a cherub and palm tree were engraved, the cherub having faces of man and lion, one face looking upon the other. δ On the side walls of the porch, palm trees alone were carved.

Windows.—Little is said about the windows of Ezekiel's temple. Those of the gateway,^c the porch,^f and the house⁷ are characterized as 'closed,' i.e. 'latticed.' In 1 K 6^a the windows of Solomon's temple are further characterized as 'beamed.' This second feature is probably understood of Ezekiel's temple too. See more fully above (p. 70^M) on windows of Solomon's temple.

Priests' cells in the Inner Court.—N. and S. of the gizrah there were 4 rows of cells in which the priests ate the holy food and deposited their garments, two rows being on the N. and two on the S. First there was one abutting upon the gizrah and lying along its whole length of 100 cubits. Then came a parade or walk 10 cubits broad of the same length. Next to this, parallel to the gizrah and the first row of cells, was a half row, starting at the west, the remaining space

Contents of the house—In the hēkal of Ezekiel's temple there was nothing except the cedar wood altar,^a which was 2 cubits in both length and breadth,^β and 3 cubits high. It had raised corners,^γ wrongly called horns ^δ by the LXX, and is described as a 'table (set) before Jehovah.'^e The altar of burnt-offering is also called the table of Jehovah.^ζ It cannot be the altar of incense that is meant, for we find no such table mentioned earlier than P. No doubt we are to understand the altar-shaped table of shewbread (Fig. 7, T), as in Solomon's temple, this table occupying the same position in both temples. Of other tables or of lampstands not a word is written. Nor is anything said about what the dēbir contained. This may, of course, be due to the brevity with which the house is treated; but as a matter of fact we do not read of the ark after the destruction of Solomon's temple.^η

Ezekiel's altar is much more elaborate than that of Solomon's temple, and owing to the large number of technical terms and other difficulties it is harder to reconstruct.

The altar was in form as if made up of four square blocks of stone, the lowest being the largest, the next being smaller to the extent of one cubit being taken up by a wall. The chambers had 3 storeys, but no pillars supporting them, as the 30 cells of the outer court had. The cells on the upper storey were narrower than the two below, so that in the direction of the house there was a balcony, or rather corridor. The entrance to the cells was at the E. end, and was apparently on lower ground than that on which the cells were. Bertholet concludes from this that the entrance was thus on the outer court level.

The MT does not say anything as to the number of cells there were, but the LXX gives the number as 30 in its best copies (A, etc.): i.e. 15 N. and the same number S., 10 in each full row and 5 in each half row. The total would, according to this, be identical with the cells along the outer wall.

a i.e. the walls enclosing the openings rendered 'openings.' These walls were themselves covered with beams; cf. D¹ 1 K 6⁴: it was on these beams that the wood-carving was done. Berth., on account of the difficulty of understanding how windows could be covered with wood, rejects this clause; yet it is found in all the MSS and versions.

β 'Galleries' of MT must go — so LXX, Cornill, Davidson.
Other changes are necessary in 41¹⁶.

each side, the third and fourth having a superficial area less than the block below also of one cubit each side. There was thus a ledge or margin κ of one cubit in width at the basis of the three upper blocks (Fig. 8 $d d'$, $e e'$, $g g'$). On the outer half of the lowest margin there was an upright parapet λ ($g h$, $g' h'$), forming a kind of channel into which, according to tradition, the sacrificial blood flowed, whence it was conducted by a subterranean passage to the Wady Kidron. μ The altar was not made of solid stone; its interior was of earth, ν but this was covered with stones, just as the altar of Solomon's temple had a covering of brass. The view favoured in the text above is defended by Villalpando (1808) and other older commentators, and by Smend (see his Ezechiel, where the arguments are given).

altar had, however, the appearance of three blocks of solid stone, with three successive terraces, the lowest of them being bound by a parapet half a cubit wide. The uppermost surface was a square of 12 cubits each way; and as on this the sacrifices were offered, it is called, by way of pre-eminence, the altar.^a Keil and Cornill maintain that the altar proper was a cube of 12 cubits a side, the rest of the structure (all except b'k'k') being added for use or ornament, but forming no part of the altar; but in the text the word 'altar' is used of the entire structure; and this larger sense is defended by Kliefoth, Ewald, Smend, A. B. Davidson, and Bertholet.

The 'ארפל^γ or altar-hearth had four horns (ba, δ'α'), each a cubit high, rising out of its four corners.^δ The uppermost surface was, as stated, a square of 12 cubits on each side. The highest block (A) had a thickness of 4 cubits. The area of the next block (B) was a square of 2 cubits more on each side; that is, it was 14 cubits a side, and it had a thickness of 4 cubits. The third block from the top (C) had for its surface a square of 16 cubits on each side, and a thickness of 2 cubits. The lowest block, the back or base,^ε had for its upper surface a square of 18 cubits a side, and a thickness of one cubit. The height of the upper surface of the whole was 12 cubits, as is seen from the following details:—

|-----------------------------------|------------|
| Basement (בִּסְמֵן) | 1 cubit. |
| Lower block (עֲרֵיבָה) | 2 cubits. |
| Higher block (עֲרֵיבָה) | 4 " |
| Block of altar hearth (אֶלְיָהוּ) | 4 " |
| Horns | 1 cubit. |

The proportion of height and (assumed) basement is $\frac{1}{3}$ (= $\frac{1}{3}$), a favourite ratio with Ezekiel. Note further that the height is identical with the altar surface: thus we get a cube (a k : a' k). In the calculation of height the horns are included. In fact the horns seem to have been an essential part, nay the most sacred part, of the altar.^θ On them the blood was sprinkled; and to them fugitives came, feeling safe if they had hold of them. In early times the altar possessed no horns.^ι Stade,^κ Nowack,^λ and others regard the horns as a survival of the bull image of Jehovah worshipped in the N. kingdom, which was also a representation of deities worshipped by the Egyptians, Canaanites, and Phœnicians. The holy stone or altar, it has been said, was in early times covered by the skin of the animal sacrificed, the skin of the bull having the horns attached. But why, in that case, was not the altar constructed with two horns, the number on one skin, instead of double that number? Villalpando^λ thought the horns trophies of the animals sacrificed to God. Spencer^μ inclines to the opinion that the horns were expressive of dignity, the horn being a decoration worn by distinguished persons.

iii. ZERUBBABEL'S TEMPLE.—The temple erected by the Jews who returned from exile is called Zerubbabel's, because he was the leader in promoting its erection, supporting Haggai and Zechariah in their endeavours to urge the people to build when the latter were inclined to relax. He was grandson of Jehoiachin and probably nephew of Sheshbazzar.^ν In the spring of B.C. 537, forty-nine years after the temple had been destroyed, Sheshbazzar^α was sent by Cyrus, king of Persia, to be governor of Judæa. He received permission to take with him his leading fellow-countrymen from Babylon, to restore their Jewish religion and rebuild the temple.^β Sheshbazzar was accompanied by his nephew Zerubbabel and Joshua the high priest, representing respectively the royal and priestly lines. Cyrus not only gave orders that the temple should be re-erected, but he gave Sheshbazzar power to carry with him the sacred vessels taken by Nebuchadnezzar from the temple, and imposed a tax upon the provinces west of the Euphrates to meet the expenses of the return of the Jews to their own country.^γ Phœnicia and Tyre were to supply the wood from Lebanon, and to send it on rafts to Joppa.^δ Whether all the instructions given by the Persian king were carried out we have no means of knowing.

Seven months after the Return, the altar of burnt-offering was erected,^ε probably upon the same site as the old one. The building of the house was slower work, but a collection was made to meet the needful outlay.^ζ In the 2nd month of the 2nd year after the Return, the foundation-stone was laid.^η Then there was a pause in the work owing to the opposition of the mixed population of Samaria,^θ who, as not being pure Israelites, were not allowed to share in the rebuilding of the temple.^ι

There is no confirmation of the statement^κ that the people of Samaria intrigued with the Persian king to authoritatively stop the work. According to Haggai and Zechariah, it was the indifference of the people that was at the root of the delay. See especially Zec 1-8, where the various difficulties are met in the successive visions.

Nothing further was done until B.C. 520, the 2nd year of the reign of Darius Hystaspis. Sheshbazzar was probably dead now, and the lead was taken up by his nephew and successor Zerubbabel, aided by the high priest Joshua. Much of the new zeal was owing to the earnest pleadings of the new prophets named. Recommended in B.C. 520, the temple was completed in B.C. 516.^μ

Sources of information as to Zerubbabel's Temple.—These are very meagre: indeed we have hardly anything which for certain applies to the temple as it was at or soon after the Exile. There are scattered notices in Ezra and Nehemiah. Hecateus of Abdera, contemporary and friend of Alexander the Great, is said by Josephus^ν to have written a book concerning the Jews, and he quotes parts of it referring to the temple. It is by no means certain that Hecateus wrote the book in question; nevertheless, the quotations made by Josephus are interesting and of value. The OT Apocrypha also has important allusions; especially is this true of the Books of Maccabees. But it is hard to say how far the statements are true of the temple completed in B.C. 516. Josephus is too much controlled by the temple as he saw it, to be a reliable guide concerning the earlier temples.

It is probable that the temple building occupied the same site as the earlier temple. Hecateus says it was a 'great house.' Cyrus gave instructions that it was to be 60 cubits high and 60 cubits broad.^ξ Probably this means that they were to build it as large as they liked—as large, if they would, as, say, some well-known temple in Babylon. We are not told that it was actually built of these dimensions, nor is it likely that Solomon's, which was 60 cubits long, 20 broad, and 30 high, should be so far exceeded by Zerubbabel's. It is not needful to consider the 60 cubits' length as meaning height of porch,^a and the breadth as applying to the chambers as well.

It is inferred from Ezr 3:12 and Hag 2:3 that the second temple was greatly inferior to the first. But when these words were uttered, the temple was not finished: and the inferiority may refer to the absence of the ark and other sacred vessels which were for ever lost after the destruction of the first temple. According to Bab. Talmud (Yoma 22b), the second temple wanted five things which were in that of Solomon: (1) the ark, (2) the sacred fire, (3) the shekinah, (4) the Holy Spirit, (5) the Urim and Thummim.

Hekāl or Holy Place.—The hekāl had within it one holy lampstand, one table of shewbread, one golden altar of incense, together with pouring vessels and spices.^β There would seem to have been the two veils of which we read as being before the hekāl (māsākh) and dēbir (pārōketh) doors of the tabernacle.^γ The fact that Antiochus Epiphanes is represented as plundering the gold, silver, etc., of the temple,^δ is no proof that the walls, doors, etc., were covered with gold, as the MT declares to have been the case with Solomon's temple (see above, p. 700f.), though Schürer seems to think it is.^ε

Dēbir or Most Holy Place.—The dēbir had a veil in front of it, as the hekāl also had. There was nothing in the dēbir according to Jos. (BJ v. v. 5), except that according to the Mishna^ζ the stone of foundation ^η stood where the ark used to be. Upon the Day of Atonement the priests used to put their censers on this stone.^θ Prideaux, without a title of evidence, held that the ark was in the second temple. Tacitus applies the words 'inania arcana' to the adytum or dēbir of the temple.^ι

Courts.—This temple had two courts,^κ but the separation between them was not perhaps rigidly enforced, for when Alexander Jannæus was sacrificing on the altar during the Feast of Tabernacles the people pelted him with citrons, etc. To stop such conduct, he ran a wooden wall around the priests' court. According to Ezr 6:4, three rows of hewn stone and a top row of new wood were to go about the temple, viz. the inner court.^λ

The inner court had in it an altar of burnt-offering made of unhewn stone ^μ—so conforming to the ancient law of Ex 20:24, which Solomon's did not.

According to Hecateus, it had the same dimensions as the first temple, viz. 20 cubits long by 20 cubits broad by 10 cubits high. The Mishna^ξ speaks of a כִּיּוֹר or laver as being in this court; and Sir 50:3 speaks of a 'cistern' as having been made by Simon the high priest. The Syriac leaves out 'cistern' altogether, and renders 'he dug a well.' The allusions are far too uncertain to infer from them that there was a molten sea in the inner court of the second temple.^π

There were cells in the outer court for storing furniture and for other purposes. In 1 Mac 4:38, 57 priests' cells are named.^ρ Josephus makes mention of corridors with pillars.^σ The 'Mihkad gate' of Neh 3:1 was probably one leading into the outer court on the western side (see JERUSALEM, vol. ii. p. 593^ν). The 'prison gate' of Neh 12:3^ν was most likely on the north side (ib.). In later times there was a bridge crossing the Tyropœon or Cheesemongers' Valley from the modern Mount Zion to the temple hill. When Pompey besieged Jerusalem, many Jews took refuge on the temple area and broke this bridge, that the Roman soldiers might be hindered from coming to them. This was probably where the remains of Wilson's arch are now seen, though Rosen.^a thinks the bridge was of Herod's making.

Later history of this temple.—Simon the high priest, son of Onias, repaired and fortified the temple; but the passage in which we have the information^β is very obscure.

In B.C. 168 Antiochus Epiphanes plundered, laid waste, and desecrated the temple.^γ He placed an altar to Jupiter Olympius on the altar of burnt-offering. The brazen vessels taken away by him were given by him to sympathizing Jews at Antioch, and they were transferred to the local synagogue.^δ Three years^ε later JUDAS MACCABÆUS recovered Jerusalem, cleansed and repaired the house, made a new altar, and also fresh vessels.^ζ The Feast of Dedication, still observed among Jews, commemorates the opening ceremony of the restored and cleansed temple. At this time Judas also adorned the front of the temple by hanging up^η gilded crowns and shields,^θ and he also fortified the enclosure by putting high walls around it.^ι These were razed to the ground by Antiochus Eupator,^κ but restored by Jonathan Maccabæus;^λ they were strengthened by Simon his brother.^μ Reference has already been made to the wall put around the inner court by Alexander Jannæus. In B.C. 63 Pompey conquered Jerusalem, and after a long siege took the well-fortified temple hill. He entered the house, and even, in the face of loud protests, the dēbir itself; but he did not touch the sacred vessels.^ν Nine years later (B.C. 54) Crassus plundered the temple of its valuable things most mercilessly, taking away what was worth two millions of pounds in English money.^ξ Herod, afterwards called the Great, a descendant of the Maccabees, was made king of the Jews by decree of the Roman Senate. In B.C. 37 he stormed Jerusalem,^ο and burned some of the temple walls, causing a goodly amount of blood to be shed. From other injury, however, he protected the temple.

iv. HEROD'S TEMPLE.—The sources.—The principal sources of information in regard to Herod's temple are: (1) Josephus, who in Ant. xv. xi. gives a full account of the outer court with its gates and rooms, and in BJ v. v. describes the inner court and also the house. Josephus was a priest, and was therefore familiar with the temple and its services from personal experience. He writes his history, however, from memory, and he is so full of admiration for the sacred enclosure that he falls into obvious exaggeration when giving measurements. (2) The Mishnic tract Middoth preserves valuable Jewish traditions (see Eng. tr. in Barclay's Talmud, reproduced in Fergusson's Temples of the Jews, Appendix i. In Surenhusius' Mishna [vol. vi.] there is a Lat. tr. of the text, as also the text and translation of Bartenora's Commentary). The Middoth is more modest in its dimensions than Josephus, and nearer the truth; but it is also often inaccurate. Rabbi Hildersheim's Die Beschreibung des Herod. Tempel im Tractate Middot und bei Fl. Joseph. states and examines the divergences between these authorities. (3) Maimonides in חוקה י' (part vi.) collects many passages about the temple which are scattered through the Talmud. These relate especially to the priests, temple furniture, etc., and have been put into Latin by Ludwig Compiegne. This tr. is to be met with in Ugolinius' Thesaurus, vol. viii. (4) Dr. John Lightfoot's work on The Temple, etc. (London, 1823), rests mainly upon Rabbinical sources, and is for that reason valuable.

Was Herod's temple the second or the third?—It is usual to speak of Herod's temple as the third Jerusalem temple. Modern Jews, however, followed by many Christian writers, regard it as simply the second temple rebuilt and improved, and so call it the second temple. Christians are led to this conclusion, or got together all the material before the work of rebuilding was begun, and then pulled down and put up as gradually as could be done. Since only priests could enter the house and the inner court, he engaged a thousand of them to act as masons and carpenters in these parts. The building of the house was hastened on with great vigour, and was finished in a year and a half. Surrounding buildings took eight years, but the work went on, and was not ended until the time of the procurator Albinus (A.D. 62-64). The Jews (see Jn 2nd) said the temple had been forty-six years in building, and in fact it was still in building then, and was to be for over thirty years more (but see E. A. Abbott in Class. Rev. 1894, p. 89 ff.). The building is spoken of as exceedingly impressive in its grandeur. Its eastern front was covered with plates of gold, which threw back the rays of the rising sun, and formed an object of rare beauty for miles around. The stone of which it was built was white marble, at least confirmed in it, by a consideration of Hag 2nd 9. Messianically interpreted, the temple erected by Zerubbabel was, they say, to see the Messiah. But the passage is not Messianic, and, if it were, the prediction contained in it is made from the writer's point of view.

It was in the 18th year of his reign (B.C. 20-19) that Herod the Great set about the rebuilding of the temple. In his day there was among the Romans a great rage for restoring Greek cities and their temples, and Herod probably caught the prevailing spirit. Josephus reports (Ant. xv. xi.) the speech in which Herod announces his intention, and gives as his reason a desire to promote the religious welfare of the nation; but the historian says the king's real purpose was to raise for himself an everlasting memorial. The Jews were at first afraid that, if the king pulled down their temple, no other might be for a long time put up in its place. To allay this fear, Herod and a large part of the side walls was covered with gold.

The area of Herod's temple is essentially that of the modern Haram esh-Sherif, with the exception of the north end, at which, in Herod's day, the fortress Antonia was situated, the temple court being to the south of it. The excavations made beneath the Haram and its surrounding walls show that the lie of the ancient walls on the west, south, and east agrees with those of the walls to be seen to-day (see Rosen. Das Haram, 4 ff.; Robinson's BRP iii. 222 ff.). The house itself would be sure to be erected on the site of the one preceding it.

For his temple Herod used double the space that was covered by Zerubbabel's temple,^a and in order to obtain it he erected subterranean vaults in the south of the temple hill, and filled intervening spaces with stones and earth. The bounding line was raised from 4 stadia β to 6, the breadth remaining 1 stadium, the length (N. to S.) being doubled.^a The whole was surrounded by a high wall, covered with spikes,^β the better to protect the place. The temple, including its courts, occupied an area of 1 stadium according to Josephus, or 500 cubits according to the Talmud. Assuming the stadium to be about 600 English feet, and the cubit to be about 18 inches, there is a difference of over 100 feet; but the numbers are round in each case, and the truth lies probably between them. Perhaps, as Fergusson suggests, the Talmud copies the dimensions of Ezekiel's temple: Fergusson's own dimensions, got by careful calculations, agree well with what Josephus says, viz. 585 ft. E. to W., and 610 ft. N. to S.; see Temples of the Jews, p. 77 ff.

Gates.—The principal entrance to the enclosure was on the western side. Middoth γ names one only on that side called 'Kiponos,' but Josephus has four.^δ Probably that named in Midd. is the principal one, as it led to the king's palace and to the city. Two more to the south led to suburbs of the city, one coinciding probably with 'Barclay's' gate, the other with 'Warren's.' Remains of the fourth are to be seen perhaps to the south of 'Wilson's arch.' Josephus speaks of gates on the south, but he does not say how many there were. Midd. mentions the two HulDAH gates, which are to be identified with the two gates buried in the middle of the three aisles was 45 ft. wide, the two side ones having a width of 30 ft. The inner portico was on higher ground than the two nearer the wall. The columns were so thick that three men with their hands stretched out could hardly clasp around one. On the east was what is called Solomon's Porch in the NT,^α and is said by Josephus to have survived from the time of Solomon.^β The east porticoes were, however, the work of Herod, according to the best judges; but it is singular that Josephus should have believed any part of these porticoes to have been the work of Solomon, unless it was much older than Herod's time. During the feasts the Roman soldiers used to walk on the roof of the porticoes in order to see that order was kept. The whole of the outer court was paved with stones. There were for the lower officials pastophoria γ or chambers ranged along the outer walls, probably between the walls and the porticoes, unless, indeed, they were between the double porticoes themselves. In close proximity to the west gate and the chambers was the Beth Din,^δ where the SANHEDRIN met.

In the older sources (Josephus and Middoth) the Holy Place is not the hēkāl, as in the case of the previous Jerusalem temples, but the whole of the inner court, including the women's court, as contrasted with the outer court, which was existing south wall of the Haram—one west of the double gate, the other east of the treble gate. Both these show Herodian workmanship. Through both these gates it was possible to ascend from the vaults below to the temple area. On the east, Middoth refers to one gate on which the palace of Shushan was carved. It has been commonly thought to have been the same as the modern Golden Gate, but the latter is undoubtedly a Byzantine structure. Josephus does not say anything of any east gate. He speaks quite incidentally of one gate on the north; γ Midd. η calls it Tadi θ (or Tari?).

The Outer Court.—This is commonly called the Court of the Gentiles, because Gentiles were allowed to enter it; but in neither Josephus nor in Midd. does it get that name.

The walls of this court were surrounded on the inside by porticoes or cloisters. The north, west, and east sides had double porticoes, with two rows of white marble monolithic columns. The roofs were of carved cedar. On the south were the royal porticoes, the στοὰ βασιλική, which had 162 columns, with Corinthian capitals. These columns formed three aisles. The outermost row of columns were fastened into the wall of the enclosure. The open to heathen, and could be used for buying, selling, etc.^ε The inner court was a rectangle, which included in it the women's court (4), the men's court or court of the Israelites (5), ζ the priests' court (6), and the house which stood in the last (10, 11). The inner court was on higher ground than the outer, there being five steps from the one to the other. Between the wall of the inner court and the porticoes of the outer court there was a free space of 10 cubits, higher than the rest of the outer court, and reached by a flight of fourteen steps. This formed a terrace all round the inner court except the east, and was called the hēl (הל). At the inner edge of this hēl there was a stone parapet called gōrēq (גורק). η On this tablets were put with inscriptions warning non-Jews against passing beyond this boundary. One such was found in recent years by the French consul, Clermont-Ganneau, on which, in Greek, the following words occur: μηθένα ἀλλογενῆ εἰσπαρεῦσθαι ἐντὸς τοῦ περὶ τὸ ἱερὸν τρυφάκτου καὶ περιβόλου. ὅς δ' ἀν λήψῃ ἐαυτῷ αἴτιος ἔσται διὰ τὸ ἐξακολουθεῖν θάνατον, i.e. 'No stranger is to enter within the balustrade and embankment round the sacred place. Whoever is caught will be answerable for his death, which will ensue.' This illustrates Ac 21^{36a}, when St. Paul almost lost his life. The inner court was surrounded by a wall 40 cubits high on the outside, and on the inside but 25, owing to the raised ground inside. From the lower ground to the higher there were five steps.

Gates.—This wall had nine gates—four on the north, four on the south, and one on the east. The west had no gate at all. They had all of them folding doors, covered with gold and silver.^a Of the four on the north side three were in the men's court (5), and one in the women's (4). Three of the north gates were called Nitzius, the Gate of Offering, and the Makad. On the south we read of the Flaming Gate, the Gate of Offering, and the Water Gate. The last opened upon the altar, and appears to have been a continuation of the Huldah Gate. The gate on the east was much more costly than the rest, and it is probably the 'Gate Beautiful' of Ac 3², and 'Nicanor's gate' of the Mishna.^β It was made of Corinthian brass. Between the women's court and the men's there was a gate larger than the others, led to by fifteen steps, at the top of which was the level of the men's court. It was thickly overlaid with silver and gold.

Büchler^γ argues ably that this is the Nicanor gate of the Mishna. Midd. l. 4, as all admit, states that; but it is argued by Schürer,^δ Grätz,^ε Spiess,^ζ Nowack,^η and most, that it is the gate on the east of the women's court that is meant by the above name. Büchler admits that Josephus is against him; but he charges the Jewish historian with inaccuracy, and calls the Talmud to his aid in proving this. Büchler's view is bound up with another position, which he also defends with ability,^θ viz., that the wall of the inner court shut out the women's court altogether, as being part of the court of the Gentiles; the Nicanor gate being, then, that one at the east of the men's court through which one passed into the inner gate. Kell also speaks of the inner court as being reached by a gate at the western end of the women's court.^ι But this is, as Büchler admits, against the common view, which is supported by Schürer,^κ and Nowack,^λ and the received text of Josephus.

Nicanor's gate—assuming the usual view—was 58 cubits high and 40 broad, the others that led out of the lower court being 30 high and 40 broad. Round the walls of the court there ran porticoes with a single piazza, the roof of which rested on lofty and highly-finished pillars. These porticoes were less indeed, but not less beautiful, than the porticoes of the outer court. Between the gates there were cells for storing the various properties belonging to the temple: these are called by Josephus μ γαροφυλάκια.^ρ Concerning the special purposes of these rooms see Now. op. cit. ii. 79 n. 2. There were upper rooms over the gateways, hence justifying Josephus' description of them as tower-shaped. The cells between the gates had also upper rooms; hence we read of the upper room of Bet-Abtinās.^σ Somewhere within the women's court would be placed the thirteen boxes for receiving contributions to the temple. At least one must have been in the women's court, else the widow (Lk 21¹⁴) could not have put in her mite. See TREASURY. According to Midd. ii. 5, there were four cells in the women's court, but both Schürer and Now. think this unlikely.

The inner court was divided into an eastern part, into which women were admitted as well as men, and a larger western portion, which included the men's court and the priests' court. The house and the altar were in the latter, and were surrounded by its rampart. Just as the whole inner court was separated from the outer, and within the inner the men's was shut off from the women's, so the remainder was subdivided into a larger part for priests only. The men's court was 11 cubits wide, and surrounded the priests' court on all four sides.^α The Mishna, however, appears to reduce the space for men to 11 cubits on the east alone. The altar and all the arrangements for sacrificing, as well, of course, as the house itself, were in the priests' court.

The house.—The higher ground of the house was attained by means of twelve steps. The inside area was 60 cubits high and the same in length, by 20 cubits in breadth. There were, as in the other temples, two divisions—the hēkāl or Holy Place,^β which was 40 cubits long, and the debtr or Most Holy Place, which was 20 cubits long. This last was empty, and was entered by the high priest once a year, viz. on the Day of Atonement. The hēkāl or larger room had in it the following:—Table of shewbread,^γ altar of incense, the seven-armed lampstand.^δ The altar stood in the middle, between the temple walls: to its north was the table, and the lampstand was on its south.^ε Only the officiating priests were permitted to enter the hēkāl, to bring in the incense morning and evening, to trim the lamp, which was done once a day, and to supply the table with fresh shewbread, which was done every Sabbath.

The porch was 100 cubits in both height and breadth, and 11 cubits deep. It stood, therefore, like a high wall in front of the house. The breadth of the house, including its surrounding chambers, being 70 cubits,^ζ the porch projected 15 cubits on each side.^η There was an entrance to the porch 40 cubits high and 20 broad. There was, however, no door. Above the entrance Herod placed a golden eagle, which as a Roman emblem was very distasteful to the Jews; and during a turmoil, some time before the king's death, it was destroyed. From the entrance of the porch the hēkāl door, gilded like the court gates, could be easily seen. It was adorned with carvings of golden vines, with grapes, according to Josephus, as large as a man.^θ Tacitus also speaks of this vine.^ι Veil.—In front of the hēkāl door there hung a beautifully coloured Babylonian veil. The hēkāl was shut off by a veil or veils, but there was no wall, nor therefore any door, leading into the debtr. According to the Mishna,^κ there were two veils between the hēkāl and the debtr, with a cubit's free space between them. The outer was loose on the south side, the inner being loose on the north. On the Day of Atonement the high priest entered the debtr with his censor by passing to the south side and getting behind the outer veil, until he reached the north of the inner veil, where he was able to enter the debtr. In the NT this veil is spoken of in the singular, the two perhaps being looked upon as one.^λ The veil outside the door of the hēkāl is never referred to in the NT. See VEIL.

Light.—No natural light came into the house from roof or side wall: it depended, for what light it had, upon the lampstand.

the porch was, there were small chambers in which temple utensils were kept and priests resided. They were thirty-eight in number, and arranged in three storeys, in such a way that on the north there were five on each storey, making fifteen on that side: on the south there were also five on each storey. On the west there were three on the lowest and three on the middle storey, two being on the top. The three storeys reached, together, the same height as the house. The main entrance was on the N.E. of the house, where a small door communicated directly from the porch with the nearest chamber. From this chamber there was a stairway leading to the upper and middle storeys. This stairway was erected at the N.E. corner; just opposite, on the S.E. corner, there was an arrangement for carrying off the water. Above the house proper there was an upper room 40 cubits high, and of the same ground area as the house itself. The entire building, including the intervening wall and the ceiling, attained a height of 100 cubits, i.e. exactly that of the porch. The upper room had on the south a door leading upon the roof of the upper chambers on that side. By means of the stairs on the N.E. the top chambers could be reached. Passing round from N.W. to S. one came to the door leading into the top room of the house. In the floor of this upper room there were trap-doors, through which workmen were let down in boxes, that they might not be able to see any part of the house except where they were repairing.

Including the side chambers, the house had a width of 70 cubits, which is thus made up—

Altar of burnt-offering.—In the east of the priests' court, immediately in front of the porch, was the altar of burnt-offering made of unhewn stone. It was larger than Solomon's altar, it being, according to the Rabbis, 32 cubits in length and breadth, and 10 cubits high. Josephus, however, gives 15 cubits as length and as breadth. The length and breadth given above are for the base, for it rose in three sections, so that at the top it formed a square of 24 cubits. According to Lv 6⁹, fire was to be always burning on the altar. On the east of the altar there was a stairway of unhewn stone leading up to the altar: it was 32 cubits long and 16 broad. Altar and steps were whitewashed twice in the year, viz. at Passover and Tabernacles.^a In the S.W. corner of the altar there were two holes for receiving the sacrificial blood, which passed thence to a passage in the ground, by which it was conveyed to the Kidron. Close by there was a marbled opening, down which men went to cleanse the channel along which the blood ran to the Kidron.

Between the altar and the house there was a space of 22 cubits, taken up largely by the twelve steps which led up to the porch. South of these steps there was a laver or wash-basin, in which priests washed their hands and feet. It was supplied through two pipes from the temple spring: these two pipes were increased to twelve at a later time by a certain ben Katin, who also made arrangements by which the water could be regularly renewed.^β

^a Midd. iii. 1-4.

^β Yoma iii. 10.

North (8) of the altar the sacrificial animals were slain, and to aid in this there were six rows of rings, four in each row, all fixed in the ground. The animals that had to be killed were attached first of all to these rings, and then despatched. Still farther north there were eight low pillars with boards on them, each board having three rows apiece of iron hooks from which the animals after death were suspended. The spot would look much like a butcher's shop. By the side of these pillars there were eight marble tables on which the slain animals were flayed, washed, etc., ready for the altar.^α

Priests' Court.—No one except a priest was usually permitted to enter the priests' court, which was regarded as more sacred than the men's court. Yet lay Israelites were allowed admission when they had sacrifices to offer, that they might, according to the ritual, lay their hands on the victim.^β As before stated, this court was bounded all round, and not merely on the east by the men's court, which was 11 cubits broad.

The temple police.—The charge of the sacred enclosure was in the hands of the priests and Levites. The head of police—the captain of the temple—held so dignified a position that he was ranked with the chief priests. The entire external arrangements of the temple were under his authority. We read in Mark 6 and Luke 6 of 'rulers of the temple,' who were subordinates of 'the captain.' The guardianship of the temple was entrusted mainly to Levites, but partly also to priests. By day they were to see that no one overstepped the boundary beyond which he had no right to go, e.g. Gentiles had to be kept out of the inner court, women out of the men's, laymen out of the priests', and non-officiating priests out of the house; the debt to be entered but once a year, and even then by the high priest only. By night the gates were all shut, and none were allowed within except priests and Levites, who were stationed at different points. Three places of the inner court were guarded by priests; at twenty-one positions Levites kept watch, especially at the various gates. During the whole night the captain walked around to see that each was at his post. If the guard did not immediately arise on the captain's approach, the captain exclaimed, 'Peace to you.' If the guard were asleep the captain would strike him with a stick, and he had the right even to set fire to his clothes. Each day the guards were changed, those who followed receiving the keys from their predecessors at mid-day.^γ The senior of the men in charge kept the key of the court, in which the men were sentry, in a hole covered by a marble slab, to the under side of which was fastened a chain: the key was attached to this chain.

When the time came to close the gates, the marble slab was lifted and the key taken: the priests locked the inner court, replacing the key in the usual place. On the slab under which the key was, the guard in charge laid his clothes, and on them lay down to sleep.^δ How many were at one time in charge of the enclosure we do not know, but according to Josephus 200 men were appointed for the gates alone.

For the fate which befell the temple in the last years of its existence, reference must be made to the histories of Josephus, Grätz, and others. See, especially, short but striking accounts in Cornill, History of the People of Israel,^θ and Cheyne, JRL.^ε Already, in the days of Archelaus, the courts of the temple became the scene of revolt and bloody massacres. During the last Jewish revolt the most horrid scenes were witnessed. In A.D. 70 Roman soldiers were in possession of the fortress of Antonia, close to the enclosure. One of them, though contrary to the wish of Titus the emperor, threw a firebrand into the house itself, which took fire and burned to the ground. Thus perished the last of the Jerusalem temples. All of them were built by a people feeble politically, in art and in literature (except religions) despised; yet these temples are better known, and their records more fully preserved, than is the case with any other ancient temple, Egyptian, Assyrian, or Indian.

LITERATURE.—(A) JEWISH WRITINGS.—Josephus, Ant. xv. xi., BJ v. v.: cf. Spiess, Der Tempel zu Jerusalem nach Josephus, 1890; the Mishnic tract, Middoth; cf. Rabbi Hildersheim, Die Beschreibung des Herods Tempel im Tractat Middoth und bei Flavius Josephus ('Jahresbericht des Rabbiner-Seminars für das Orthodoxe Judentum', Berlin, 1876-77). There is a good edition of Middoth (no Gemara has been handed down) with Latin tr. and Com. by L'Empereur (Lugd. Bat. . . . 1630, small 4to). See also Surenhuius' Mishna. Maimonides, in part vi. of his prin 'r, gives the Rabbinical traditions regarding the temple, its furniture, priests, etc. This was put into Latin by Ludwig Compigne, and is found in vol. viii. of Ugolini's Antiquitates Hebraicae. Monographs on the temple have been written in Hebrew by O. Altschul (Amst. 1724) and others, but none of them are of much importance.

(B) CHRISTIAN WRITINGS.—Of the older treatises by Christian writers the following are noteworthy:—Villalpando and Prado, In Ezech. 3 vols. 1606; Capellus, Templum Sive Triplez Templi Descriptio (Amst. 1643; also included in the Introductio to the London Polyglot); Lamy, de Tabernaculo Foederis, de Sancta Civitate Jerusalem et de Templo ejus (Paris, 1720); Lightfoot (Dr. John), Descr. Templi Hieros. (Eng. in vol. ix. of Pitman's edition of his works in English; also published separately, Lond. 1825).—Lightfoot uses the Rabbinical material, but deals mainly with the temple of Herod; Lund, Die alten Jüd. Heiligtümer, Hamb. 1696, bk. ii. (several other editions). For a detailed recital of the older literature see Winer, RWB 3, s. 'Temple', and Bähr, Der Tempel Salomo's. The following are the most important modern treatises:—Hirt, Der Tempel Salomo's, Berlin, 1809 (strong on the architectural side, but deficient in Biblical scholarship); J. Fr. von Meyer, Der Temp. Salom., Berlin, 1830; Stieglitz, Gesch. der Baukunst, Nürnberg, 1827, p. 127 ff., Beiträge zur Ausbildung der Baukunst, Leipzig, 1834; Bähr, Der Temp. Sal. 1848; Keil, Der Temp. Sal. Dorpat, 1839 (critical and constructive, valuable); Biblical Archaeology, T. and T. Clark, i. 162 ff.; Robinson, BRP (1841) i. 415 ff.; G. Williams, The Holy City (1849), ii. 296 ff.; Ferguson, Essay on the Ancient Topography of Jerusalem, 1847, The Holy Sepulchre and the Tomb, 1865, The Temples of the Jews, 1875, art. 'Temple' in Smith's DB (Ferguson's fanciful views as to the site of the temple, etc., have failed to win conviction except to a very limited extent); Warren, The Temple and the Tomb, 1880, TSEA vii. 309 ff. (in both he answers the arguments of Ferguson); T. H. Lewis, The Holy Places of Jerusalem, 1880; Th. Friedrich, Temple u. Palast Salom., etc., Innsb. 1887; O. Wolff, Der Tempel von Jerusalem und seine Masse, 1887; Stade, Gesch. i. 311 ff. (the author, an acknowledged Biblical scholar, was aided by his colleague von Ritgen, professor of architecture); Perrot et Chipiez, Le Temple de Sol., Paris, 1889, large folio, with fine diagrams; History of Art in Sardinia, Judaea, etc., London, 1890, i. 142 ff.; Conrad Schick, Die Stiftshütte der Tabernakel in Jerus. und der Tempelplatz der jetz. Zeit, Ber. 1896 (by an architect; the scholarship is weak, and proof references almost wholly wanting, though the constructions and plans are good). In addition to the older treatises on Biblical Archaeology by Jahn (in English also), de Wette (4th and last edition improved by Rübiger, 1864), Allioli, and Keil (cf. also Spencer, de Legibus, Dissertatio Sexta), note particularly the works by Benzinger and Nowack, both issued in 1894, and based on the latest results. Nowack's work is the fuller, but Benzinger's the more compact and interesting. See also the Commentaries and other works referred to in the course of this article.

TEMPT, TEMPTATION.—The Heb. and Gr. words which are translated 'tempt' and 'temptation' in EV have a range of meaning which covers every form of testing or putting to the proof, whether of man by God or of God by man.

The Heb. words rendered 'tempt' in AV are—1. Nissāh, which signifies (1) to attempt to do a thing, as Dt 43⁴ (EV 'assay'); (2) to test or prove a thing, such as a weapon, 1 S 17³⁰ (EV 'prove'); but chiefly (3) to test a person: in AV translated 'tempt' of God's testing Abraham, Gn 22¹; elsewhere of men faithlessly and provokingly putting God to the proof, Ex 17², Nu 14²², Dt 6¹⁶, Ps 78¹⁸, 1 S 66⁹, 106¹⁴, Is 7¹².

• Jos. Ant. xvii. ix. 2, x. 2.

2. Bāhan, synonymous in meaning with nissāh, but translated 'tempt' in AV only Mal 3¹⁵, of tempting God. In Mal 3¹⁰ and a few other places it is translated 'prove' in AV and EV; but most frequently the Eng. rendering is 'try.'

The only Heb. word translated 'temptation' is masāh (formed from nissāh above), used of the testing by Jehovah, through signs and wonders, of the heart of Pharaoh and the Egyptians, Dt 43⁴, 719²⁹; and of the trial or testing of an innocent person, Job 23⁸ (EV 'trial')—unless the word here comes from māsa and means despair, RVm 'calamity.' The word is translated 'temptation' also in Ps 95⁸, but there the place Massah (so RV) seems to be intended, as in Ex 17⁷, Dt 6¹⁶, 922³³. See art. MASSAH.

The Greek words translated 'tempt' are—

1. πειράζω, which means (1) to attempt something, as Ac 926¹⁶ (EV 'assay'); (2) to test a person, without evil intent, as Jn 6⁶, Rev 22³; (3) to tempt to evil, as Mt 4¹, 1 Co 10¹³, Ja 113¹⁴. On this verb see Crümer, s.v.; Hatch, Essays in Biblical Greek, 71 f.; Kennedy, Sources of NT Greek, 106 f. For the distinction between πειράζω and δοκιμάζω see Trench, NT Syn. 267 ff.; also Crümer, s. πειράζω, and Berry, s. δοκιμάζω.

The devil is called 'the tempter' (ὁ πειράζων) in Mt 4¹, 1 Th 3⁵.

2. ισχυρίζω, to put to the proof, or test. (a) God, Mt 4⁷, Lk 4¹²; (b) Christ, Lk 10²⁵, 1 Co 10¹⁰—all translated 'tempt' in EV. Amer. RV always 'try.'

3. In Ja 1¹³ πειράσσει (only occurrence) is translated by the verb 'tempt'—'God cannot be tempted (literally, 'is untemptable') with evil,' RVm 'is untried in evil.'

The only Greek word translated 'temptation' is πειρασμός, which is the translation in the LXX of masāh everywhere except Dt 33⁸ (Πειρα) and Job 923 (where a different reading is followed). This word is used in NT for (1) a testing or proving, as 1 P 4¹² (EV 'trial'), He 3⁹, or that which tests or proves a person, as Gal 4¹⁴; (2) enticement to sin, as Mt 6¹³, Lk 4¹³, Ja 1¹², 1 Co 10¹³; and (3) of affliction or calamity, due to persecution or other trial from without, as Lk 22²⁸, Ac 20¹⁹, Ja 1¹², 1 P 1⁶. On this word see Hatch, Essays, 71 f.; Mayor on Ja 1¹², and his Com. 183 ff.; Hort on 1 P 1⁶; Swete on Mk 14²⁸.

About 1611 the Eng. words 'tempt' and 'temptation' were used almost as widely as those Heb. and Gr. words, the only difference being that the verb had ceased to mean 'to attempt.' Examples (outside AV) of 'tempt' in the sense of 'test,' 'put to the proof,' without evil intent, are Jn 6⁶, Wyc. 'But he said this thing, temptyng hym; for he wiste what he was to do'; Dt 13³ Tind. 'For the Lorde thy God tempteth you, to wete whether ye love the Lord your God with all your hertes and with al youre soules'; Dt 8³, in Wilson's Christian Dictionary (1611), 'tempting thee that hee might know what is in thy heart.' In the same sense is 'temptation' used in 1 P 4¹² Rhem. 'My dearest, thinke it not strange in the fervour which is to you for a tentation, as though some new thing happened to you.' And in the allied sense of trial, affliction, we find 'temptation' employed by Tymme in Calvin's Genesis, p. 717, 'But this also was a moste greivous temptation, to be banished from the promised lande, even unto death'; and p. 815, 'This was a verie sore temptation, that holie Jacob, of whome the Lorde had taken care, shoulde almoste he and his perish with hunger.' See also Driver on Dt 6¹⁶ and in Par. Psalt., Gloss. i. under 'Prove.' J. HASTINGS.

TEN COMMANDMENTS.—See DECALOGUE.

TENDER.—The adj. 'tender' is somewhat more restricted in use now than formerly. Probably under the influence of the Biblical 'tender mercies,' it has become mostly figurative, and is chiefly used in a good sense. We might still speak of diamonds as 'tender' with Maundeille (Travels, 106, 'Other diamonds men find in Arabia that be not so good, and they be more brown and more tender'); but we should not speak of wax so, as Wyclif does (Select Works, iii. 103, 'The tendre wex maketh no preynthe in the seel, bot the seel maketh a preynthe in tendere wex'). The meaning in AV is usually 'soft,' 'delicate,' used of children (Gn 33¹³); gently nurtured youths (1 Ch 22²⁵, 29¹, Pr 4³), men (Dt 28²⁴, Is 47¹), and women (Dt 28²⁶); also of herbs (Dt 32², Job 38²⁷), plants (Is 53²), grass (2 S 23⁴, Pr 27²⁵, Dn 4¹⁵, 23), grapes (Ca 2¹², 13¹²), branches (Mt 24²³, Mk 13²⁸) in spring. In 2 Ch 13⁷ Rehoboam is called 'tender hearted'

(צָלָה, LXX δεῖλός τῇ καρδίᾳ, Vulg. corde pavido), a phrase which has now quite a different meaning. The modern meaning is found in Eph 4³² (εὐσπλαγχνος). In Gn 29¹⁷ we read that 'Leah was tender eyed' (לֵאָה רַחֲמִימִים; LXX οἱ δὲ ὀφθαλμοὶ Λείας δασθενεῖς, Vulg. sed Lia lippis erat oculis), where the Heb. as well as the Eng. probably means that Leah's eyes were weak (not 'bleared' as Vulg.), and so, as Dillmann and others suggest, 'without brightness or brilliancy of lustre.' See LEAH. The Heb. word רַחֲמִימִים rahāmīm (in this sense always plu.) is translated occasionally in AV 'tender mercies' (Ps 25⁶ 40¹¹ 51¹ 69¹⁶ 77⁹ 79⁸ 103⁴ 119⁷⁷ 145⁹, Pr 12¹⁰). The sing. 'tender mercy' occurs in NT, Lk 1⁷⁸ (σπλαγχνία), Ja 5¹¹ 'The Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy' (οὐκ ὀκρίμων, RV 'merciful').

The verb 'to tender' in the sense of 'care for' occurs in 2 Mac 4². Thus was he bold to call him a traitor, that had deserved well of the city, and tendered his own nation' (τὸν κηδεμόνα τῶν ὁμοεθνῶν). Cf. Cranmer, Works, i. 136, 'But to be plain what I think of the Bishop of Winchester, I cannot persuade with my self that he so much tendereth the king's cause as he doth his own'; Latimer, Sermons, 96, 'How God tendreth and regards the cause of the widow and the poore.' The verb in this sense is a direct derivative from the adj. (which is from Lat. tener, through Fr. tendre), not the same as the verb to tender (fr. Lat. tendere, through Fr. tendre), meaning to proffer, show. J. HASTINGS.

TENT.—תֵּנָה (οἶκος, σκηνή) is the word commonly used for 'tent'; AV often 'tabernacle,' but RV consistently 'tent,' תֵּנָה (σκηνή) 'habitation,' is usually rendered 'tabernacle,' only once (Ca 1⁸) 'tent.' For distinction between תֵּנָה and צֶנֶז see art. TABERNACLE. תֵּנָה = 'booth,' made by interweaving leaves and branches; once (2 S 11¹¹) AV 'tent,' (RV 'booth,' LXX σκηνή) and AVm (1 K 20^{12, 18} RVm 'hut'). According to the Rabbis, a booth becomes a tent if a bit of cloth is spread over it to protect it from the sun, or stretched under the roof to prevent leaves and twigs from falling on the table (Succah i. 3). תֵּנָה (κάματος) from [צֶנֶז] 'to hollow out,' is once in AV tr. 'tent' (Nu 25⁸ RV 'pavilion,' marg. 'alcove'; cf. Arab. kubbah 'a large vaulted tent,' also 'dome,' 'vault,' whence, with the art., through the Spanish, 'alcove,' orig. a vaulted recess). From תֵּנָה (παρεμβάλλω) 'to encamp,' AV 'to abide in tents' (Nu 9^{20, 22}, Ezr 8¹⁶), comes תֵּנָה 'camp' (LXX ἀρείχστος), tr. by AV 'tents' in Nu 13⁹ etc.; in each case RV corrects.

We may safely take the modern tent as closely resembling that of ancient times. No simpler dwelling can well be imagined. The tent-cover is rough, strong cloth of dark goats' hair. It is commonly supported by nine poles arranged in rows of three; the middle row lengthwise, is somewhat higher, measuring from 6 to 7 ft.: the roof therefore slopes to front and back. The cover is stretched, and the tent held in position by means of long cords fastened to the cloth, and attached to pins firmly driven into the ground. A curtain of the same material, but rather lighter, is hung round the more exposed side of the tent, to shelter from sun and wind. A similar curtain, drawn across the middle, fixed on the tent-poles, divides the tent, the one end forming the men's apartment, the other that of the women (תֵּנָה, cf. Arab. khiḍr). Very seldom, and that only in cases of considerable wealth, the women have a tent to themselves.

The making, pitching, striking, packing, and unpacking of the tents is all women's work. They spin the hair yarn, twist the cords, and weave the cloth in long narrow strips, with very primitive appliances. To form roof or curtain, these strips are sewn together to the required breadth. The greatest care is taken with the roof. When it has been used for a little, and is somewhat shrunken, it becomes quite waterproof, and will turn the heaviest rain. Sometimes cloth for the roof is bought by way of barter, from such villages as Khabab, in el-Lejá, or Judeideh, overlooking Merj A'yūn, which are famous for their hair manufactures. To excel in skilful driving home of the tent-pegs is an immemorial ambition among Arab women.

The furniture of this 'house' or 'house of hair' (bait, bait sha'r, or, less frequently, bait wabar) is extremely simple. In a few tents of the rich may be found cushions and mattresses covered with coloured silk; but for the most part a couple of coarse straw mats serve the purposes of chairs and table by day, and bed by night. A circle of thin leather, about 2 ft. in diameter, drawn into a sort of bag by means of a thong passed through holes round the edge, contains the thin loaves baked in the desert, and is spread flat on the ground at meal-time. The lamp (anciently of clay) or lantern is now generally of tin, made by Jewish travelling tinkers, from empty petroleum cans. Clay ware is too brittle to be of much use. Usually each tent has a metal plate, flat or convex, for baking; a few pots or pans for cooking, the food being eaten from the dish in which it is cooked; perhaps a hand-mill; and if the owner make any pretensions to dignity, mortar and pestle; and the necessary utensils for roasting the beans and making coffee. The fireplace may be a few stones set loosely together, or a hole in the ground just at the edge of the tent. Goat-skins, half tanned, with the hair outward, are made into bags, which hold grain, water, butter-milk, and other liquids; and when swung on a tripod serve to churn butter. The butter is always melted at once, and is carried about in these skins. The saddles of horse and camel, with corresponding saddle-bags of rough hair cloth, complete the tent furniture. Most things are crowded together in the women's apartment; that of the men is always free for the reception and entertainment of guests.

When the tents are few in number, belonging to some small family or division, they are set in a circle; the sheikh's tent is that to the right of the entrance. In larger camps the order varies. One visited by the present writer contained upwards of 150 tents, and from a distance resembled a town of black-roofed houses, arranged in irregular streets. The sheikh's tent is distinguished from the others only by its greater size. It always faces the direction from which strangers are most likely to arrive.

The black tents of the nomads have flitted shadow-like over Syrian field and Arabian steppe from the dawn of human history. The ancient fathers of the Hebrew race dwelt in tents (He 11⁹ etc.). Their wealth consisted mainly in cattle. The tent, so easily portable, is by far the most convenient 'house' for the flock-master, who is ever on the move in search of fresh pasture. After the settlement in Palestine, those portions of the people who followed the herdsman's life continued to dwell in tents, e.g. those east of the Jordan who held the grazing lands towards the desert. This old form of life left its impress in the language of later times, e.g. yy, where the root-idea is the pulling out of the tent-pegs. When the tent-life was long past, men still spoke of going home as going 'to their tents' (Jos 22⁴, 2 S 20¹, 1 K 12¹⁶). The tent and its appurtenances play a considerable part in sacred imagery. Fleeting life is like the shepherd's tent, here to-day, gone to-morrow (Is 38¹²). When the cord gives way the tent collapses; hence the tent-cord as a figure of the thread of life (Job 4²¹). The secure city is a tent whose pegs cannot be plucked up, nor its cords broken (Is 33³⁰). Prosperous growth is pictured as a lengthening of the cords and a strengthening of the stakes (Is 54²). See also in NT 2 Co 5¹⁻⁴, 2 P 1^{13, 14}, Lk 16⁹.

TEPHON (ἡ Τεφών; Thopo; Syr. Tephus).—One of the towns in Judaea fortified by Bacchides (1 Mac 9⁶⁰). Josephus gives the name as Tochoa (Τοχόα, Ant. XIII. i. 3), which is suggestive of Tekoa; but he always writes this place Θεκώα, or Θεκωέ. Tephon was probably an old Tappuah; but whether it was Tappuah 1 or 2, or Beth-tappuah, is uncertain. The occurrence of the name with Timnath and Pharathon suggests Tappuah 2. See TIMNATH.

TERAH (תֵּרַח, Tharra and Tharra).—The father of Abraham, Nahor, and Haran, Gn 11²⁴⁻³², 1 Ch 1²⁶, Lk 3³⁴. Along with his three sons he is said to have migrated from Ur of the Chaldees to Haran, where he died. In Jos 24² it is said that he 'served (עָבַד) other gods,' a statement which gave rise to some fanciful Jewish haggadōth about Terah as a maker of idols (see, e.g., Bereshith rabba, § 17, and cf. Bk. of Jubilees, chs. 11, 12). The question whether Terah is to be taken as a personal name is involved in the same uncertainty as arises in connexion with the names of all the patriarchs (see art. ABRAHAM, and esp. art. JACOB, vol. ii. p. 533 ff.). Knobel compares the name with Tharrana, south of Edessa. W. R. Smith makes Terah = 'wild goat' as totem, comparing Syriac ܬܪܐ, to which Frd. Delitzsch (Prolegom. 80) adds Assy. turāhu with same meaning [but see ZDMG xl, [1886] 167 f. (where Nöld. points out not only that ܬܪܐ in the passage quoted is an error for the correct ܬܪܐ, but also that the root is ܬܪܐ, of which in Heb. the ܐ would not be readily elided); cf. Gray, HPN 110]. Jensen (ZA vi. 70, cf. Hittiter, 150 ff.) thinks it may be the name of a god, comparing the first syllable of N. Syrian or Hittite personal names, such as Tarhular, Tarhumazi, etc. (cf. Mez, Gesch. d. Stadt Haran, 23). Any of these explanations appears preferable to that suggested in Riehm, *HWB*² 1478^a, that the name is to be accounted for because Terah remained behind (late Heb. tārah, Aram. tārāh) in Haran, while Abraham journeyed farther.

TERAH (תֵּרַח; B Tápaθ, A Θάπαθ).—One of the stations of the Israelites in the desert (Nu 33^{27, 28}). It comes between Tahath and Mithkah, and has not yet been identified.

TERAPHIM (תְּרָפִים).—The word is plural according to its form. But its derivation, the purpose of that which it denoted, and the method of its use, still present many obscurities. Several of the older Jewish commentators derive the word from תֵּרֶפֶת tōreph, which means 'foulness,' and especially pudendum; but, if this is correct, it is plausible to suppose that this word, expressive of contempt, was substituted for and finally supplanted the original name, in which case that name is entirely lost (cf. תֵּרֶפֶת for תֵּרֶפֶת). Among the numerous later derivations the one which most deserves consideration is that suggested by Schwally (Leben nach dem Tode, p. 36 n.), who connects the word with תֵּרֶפֶת rāphāh, a derivation which would bring it into contact with the rāphā'im or 'shades' of Is 14.

Teraphim are generally supposed to have been household deities (cf. Gn 31¹⁹, 1 S 19^{12, 16}, but see Ezk 21²¹). Hence it has for long been the habit to compare the reverence paid to them with that which was offered to the Lares and Penates in Roman times. Further, almost every passage in which the word occurs in OT shows that their use was bound up with the practices of magic and soothsaying (cf. especially Ezk 21²¹). The above passage in Samuel makes it also certain that the figures sometimes represented the human form. It is unknown whether these were always full life-size. Thus, on the one hand, the fact that Michal could deceive the messengers from her father by leading them to believe that the muffled teraphim which she had laid on the bed was the figure of her husband, makes it probable that some were so. And, on the other hand, the fact that Rachel (Gn 31²⁴) could hide those which she had stolen from Laban beneath her in the camel-litter, while her father searched the baggage for his lost property, is sufficient to prove that others were considerably smaller. Again, there is nothing in the incident with Michal to show conclusively whether such a figure represented the entire human form, or whether it was simply a head or at most a bust. Thus the suggestion of some among the Jewish commentators (see Moore, Comm. on Judges, p. 382) is not devoid of probability, viz. that the teraphim, at least in the early period, were mummied human heads, for which the refinement of later centuries substituted more or less rude representations in wood or in the precious metals. One might then bring their use (of which among the Hebrews we hear very little) into comparison with the customs of divination by means of such heads among the Hauranians (cf. Chwolsohn, Die Ssabier u. der Ssabismus, ii. pp. 19 ff., 150 ff.). With great likelihood then do Stade (GVI i. p. 467) and Nowack (Heb. Archäol. ii. 23) consider that the teraphim came to represent the figures of ancestors, and make the consulting of them a kind of Manes oracle. This would further make it easy to understand how their use was common to the Israelites and the Aramaeans (cf. Gn 35²⁻⁴), and how Nebuchadnezzar is represented as resorting to this method of divination (Ezk 21²¹). And it would serve to explain, since they were used for oracular purposes, why in 2 K 23²⁴ they are set alongside 'those who consult familiar spirits' and 'wizards.' The reverence paid them as household deities, and the fact that their use was common to all the nations of the region, make it more natural that, though the teraphim were abolished by Josiah, they reappear during the years of the Exile (Zec 10²). And if we recognize that they were used for such oracular purposes, and were not honoured with supreme worship, we can find it easier to understand how men who sincerely worshipped J^r might not note the inconsistency of their presence in their homes. See, further, art. SOOTH-SAYING.

It may be added that in Hos 3⁴ and Jg 17³ teraphim are mentioned along with the ephod, as though they were in some way connected with that. It was an old suggestion by Spencer (De legibus Hebr. ritualibus, i. iii. diss. 7, sec. 2), that the Urim were of the same nature as, and eventually took the place of, the teraphim. The LXX at Hos 3⁴ reads δῆλα for תְּרָפִים, and this may imply that the translator found in the Heb. text אֱלֹהִים.

TEREBINTH does not occur at all in AV, and only thrice in RV, being substituted in Is 6¹³ for 'tell tree,' in Hos 4¹³ for 'elm,' and in Sir 24¹⁶ for 'turpentine tree.' Strong reasons, however, can be urged (see the very full discussion in Ges. Thes. s.v.) for rendering by 'terebinth' whenever the Heb. is אֵל [only in constr. אֱלֹהִים] or אֱלֹהִים, and for reserving the tr. 'oak' (by which these words are commonly rendered in AV and RV)* for אֵל [in Jos 24²⁶ h], unless, as is probable, we should read here אֱלֹהִים. See esp. Del. and Dillm. on Gn 12⁶ cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v., and note that in Hos 4¹³ and Is 6¹³ אֱלֹהִים and אֵל are clearly distinct. The references to the terebinth in Scripture would thus be the following:—

(1) שָׁרָם: Is 19⁷ 'They shall be ashamed of the terebinths which ye have desired,' 57⁵ 'ye that inflame yourselves among the terebinths,' 61¹ 'that they might be called terebinths' † [prob. the figure is derived from the strength and durability of this tree] of righteousness, Ezk 31¹⁴ 'nor that their terebinths § [perh. fig. of pride] stand up in their might.' ELIM, the second station of Israel after passing the Red Sea (Ex 15²⁷ 16¹, Nu 33^{9, 10}), may have derived its name originally from the presence of terebinths, although latterly associated more with *palm*s.

(2) אֵלֶּה: Gn 35⁴ 'the terebinth which was by Shechem,' Jos 24²⁶ [reading אֵלֶּה for אֵלֶּיךָ] 'the terebinth that was in the sanctuary of the LORD,' Jg 6¹¹⁻¹⁹ 'the terebinth which was in Ophrah,' 2 S 18^{9, 10, 14} 'the terebinth in which Absalom was entangled,' 1 K 13¹⁴ 'the terebinth under which the 'man of God' sat,' 1 Ch 10¹³ 'the terebinth in Jabesh under which the ashes of Saul and his sons were buried [this tree is called in 1 S 31¹³ a tamarisk!], Hos 4¹³ (|| אֵלֶּיךָ and אֵלֶּיךָ) 'they burn incense . . . under oaks and poplars and terebinths,' Ezk 6¹³ 'their idols . . . under every thick terebinth,' Is 1³⁰ Judah is to be 'as a terebinth that withereth,' 6¹³ (|| אֵלֶּיךָ) 'as a terebinth and as an oak whose stock remaineth when they are felled.' This tree gives its name to the Vale of ELAH (אֵלֶּה עַל-עַרְבֵי) 1 S 17^{2, 19, 21} (10), and to ELAH Gn 36⁴¹ (= EL-PARAN Gn 14⁶, ELATH Dt 2⁹, 2 K 14²² 16⁹, and ELOTH 1 K 9²⁸, 2 K 16⁹).

In Gn 49²¹ we should probably tr. 'Naphtali is a slender terebinth [reading נִפְתָּלִי for נִלְיָה], the one who sends out 'beautiful pots' [referring to the heroes and national leaders sprung from this tribe]; so Dillm. and many modern commentators. For other suggested renderings, with their justification and the necessary textual emendations, see Gunkel ('Naphtali is a nimble hind, which drops fine lambs,' as an alternative to Dillm.'s rendering), Ball ('Naphtali is a branching vine that yieldeth comely fruit'), Hommel ('Naphtali is a hind let loose, which drops he-goat lambs,' i.e. which has a numerous male progeny [Expos. Times, Oct. 1900, p. 46b]).

(3) מֵאֵלֶּךְ: Gn 12⁶ (so Dt 11³⁰) 'the terebinth of MOREH' ('director's terebinth'), 13¹⁸ 14¹³ 18¹ 'the terebinths of MAMRE', Jg 4¹¹ 'the terebinth in ZAAANANNIM' (cf. Jos 19³⁸ [reading מֵאֵלֶּךְ not מֵאֵלֶּךְ] 'the terebinth of BEZAAANANNIM'), 9⁶ 'the terebinth of the pillar that was in Shechem' (see art. PILLAR [PLAIN OF THE]), 9³⁷ 'the terebinth of MEONENIM' ('soothsayers' terebinth'), 1 S 10² 'the terebinth of Tabor' [where it is possible that we should read דְּבֹרָה 'of Deborah'].

The terebinth is repeatedly (see, amongst above passages, esp. Gn 12⁶ 35⁴, Jos 24²⁶, Jg 6¹¹.¹⁹, Is 1³⁰ 57⁵, Hos 4¹³, Ezk 6¹³) mentioned in connexion with Canaanite or Israelitish religious rites (see art. SANCTUARY, p. 395^b). The tr. 'terebinth' we have contended for is supported by the circumstance that this tree was less common in Palestine than the oak and would thus be better suited to mark a locality, while the higher age it attains would cause it to be esteemed as more sacred.

The terebinth (Pistachia terebinthus, L.) grows in Palestine to the height of 15-17, rarely 20, feet. It has a thick gnarled trunk, numerous long branches with slender twigs, feathery leaves with 7 oval lanceolate leaflets, which are at first of a reddish, but afterwards of a glossy dark-green colour. In Palestine the tree is deciduous, being an evergreen only in more southern latitudes. The male and female flowers grow upon different trees, the fruit consists of small oval berries which are produced in grape-like clusters. Turpentine of a very pure quality may be obtained by making incisions in the stem and branches, and collecting the resin which exudes. In modern Palestine this practice appears to be unknown (Rob. BRP² ii. 222 f.). J. A. SELBIE.

TERESH (תֶּרֶשׁ).—A chamberlain of Ahasuerus, who along with BIGTHAN formed a plot against the king, which was foiled by Mordecai, Est 2¹¹ (BAḲ om., ^{N^{C^A}} ^{מג} ^{שׁוּב} ^{תָּפָס}) 6² (BAḲ om., ^{N^{C^A}} ^{מג} ^{תָּפָס}). It is possible that the name should be read תֶּרֶח, i.e. Theudas (see Willrich, Judaica, p. 19). He is called in Ad. Est 12¹ THARRA.

TERTIUS (Τέρτιος). — The amanuensis through whose agency St. Paul wrote the Epistle to the Romans. In Ro 16²² he joins personally in sending his greetings. St. Paul seems to have generally written by means of an amanuensis, adding just a few words at the end (1 Co 16²¹, Col 4¹⁸, 2 Th 3¹⁷) in his own hand, by way of authentication, perhaps written in large and bold characters (Gal 6¹¹). In the case of the Epistle to the Romans he probably added the concluding doxology (16²⁵⁻²⁷). It is an interesting subject of speculation how far the employment of different amanuenses who wrote out their shorthand notes may have influenced the style of different epistles or groups of epistles (see Sanday - Headlam, Romans, Introduction, p. 1x).

TERTULLUS.—The name is a diminutive from Tertius, as Lucullus from Lucius, etc. It is thoroughly Latin, and occurs in the 2nd cent. as agnomen of Pliny's colleague Cornutus, and as a cognomen borne by Flavius and by Sulpitius. In Ac 24 Ananias arrives at Caesarea to accuse Paul before Felix, accompanied by certain elders, 'and, as pleader (ἑταῖρος), one Tertullus.' Tertullus was doubtless one of the Italian causidici who abounded in the provinces. The proceedings, even in the inferior court of a mere procurator like Felix, would probably be in Latin (Smith's Dict. Gr. and Rom. Antiq., s. 'Conventus'; yet see Schürer, HJP II. i. 50; Lewin, ii. 684) and conducted under Roman forms, requiring the services of a professional advocate. Tertullus was not a Jew, as Blass needlessly infers from his use of the first person plural. The advocate naturally identifies himself with his clients. Tertullus' speech begins with a characteristic captatio benevolentiae. He gives to Felix the coveted praise of Pacator provinciae (v.³), and welcomes the reforming hand of the governor, present at every place and in every matter (v.^{2a}); whereas Tacitus remarks of Felix (Ann. xii. 54), 'intempestivis remediis delicta accendebat' (cf. Hist. v. 9). These singularly gross compliments, evidently condensed by Luke, culminate in a subtler turn: Tertullus hints (v.⁴) that they must be distasteful to so modest a man. The body of the speech is evidently, in its uninterpolated form, a mere jotting by Luke, who mar-have been present (20¹⁷ 27¹), of the heads of the accusation. But these are carefully preserved: Paul is (1) a stirrer up of σάδεις, (2) the ring-leader of a sect, and (3) guilty of an attempt to profane the temple. The charges are most skillfully chosen. Felix, with his experience (v.¹⁰) of Jewish affairs, would realize how dangerous such a prisoner was to the peace of his province. Tertullus is a competent counsel, and knows his man.

The grammar of the speech is dislocated, the participle of v.¹⁸ has no proper principal verb; the interpolated passage only partially supplies this defect. Cases of broken construction are somewhat frequent in the speeches of the latter part of Acts: see 24^{18f}. 26² 16. 23 (an obvious condensation)²³. The author had not worked up his drafts into their final form, or at any rate the finishing touches were not given. A more remarkable example of this may be found in the eighth book of Thucydides, where all the speeches are left in the form of rough abstracts.

On fanciful etymologies suggested for the name (τερατολόγος, Ter-Tullius) see Basil Jones in Smith's DB, s.v. A. ROBERTSON.

TESTAMENT.—This word does not occur in the EV of the OT; and, whereas in the AV of the NT it occurs 13 times, this number is reduced to 2 in the RV by the substitution of 'covenant' in 11 places. In the NT the Gr. equivalent both of 'testament' and of 'covenant' is invariably διαθήκη. In the LXX the same Gr. word is the equivalent of berith ('covenant') except in two passages, Dt 9¹⁸ (μαρτύριον, pl.) and 3 (1) K 11¹¹ (ἐντολή, pl.), while it represents no other Heb. word, according to the best authorities, except about 8 times: Ex 27²¹ 31⁷ 32¹⁵ ('ēdūth, 'testimony'), Dt 9⁸ (dābār, 'word'), 2 Ch 25⁴ (kāthūb, 'what is written'), Jer 41 (34)¹⁸ (dib'rē habbērith, 'words of the covenant'), Dn 9¹² (tōrah, 'law'), and Zec 11¹⁴ ('ahāvūh, 'brotherhood'). This double exclusiveness is a peculiarity of the LXX version, for berith is often represented in the later versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion by συνθήκη, the common Gr. word for 'covenant' in its more exact sense of compact between parties. Apparently, then, the choice of διαθήκη was deliberate, and has severely ruled out συνθήκη, even where the latter would have been more strictly correct, as Ps 82 (83)⁸ the compact made with one another by Edom, Moab, etc.; 1 K (S) 23¹⁸ the covenant between David and Jonathan. Why this deliberate determination, extending even to solecism? The idea mainly associated with berith was religious, that of an independent, voluntary engagement or settlement on the part of God, and the 'least unsuitable' Gr. equivalent for this was διαθήκη, an arrangement by one, not συνθήκη, an agreement between two; for though διαθήκη meant, in ordinary Greek, a disposition by will, the verb διατίθεσθαι covered authoritative arrangements generally. This 'one-sided' sense of διαθήκη (the acceptance of which is in harmony with Dr. Davidson's interpretation of berith in art. COVENANT) comes out very clearly in such uses of it as in Sir 14¹²⁻¹⁷ 'the covenant of the grave' (the imposition of death), 'the covenant . . . "Thou shalt die the death."' In Sir 24²³ διαθήκη is made equivalent to the Law, and in 3 (1) K 11¹¹ berith is ἐντολαί (commandments), which Solomon had not kept. But the Divine 'arrangement' was a gracious one: 'the Divine διαθήκη is a promise' (Vaughan on Ro 9⁴, cf. Eph 2¹²); hence St. Paul, while he uses διαθήκη only 9 times, uses ἐπαγγελία 25 times, because it lays stress on God's free grace; cf. Gn 15¹⁸ ('the Lord made a covenant with Abraham . . . I will give, etc.), Ex 34¹⁰ ('I will make a covenant . . . I will do marvels'), Is 59²¹ ('This is my covenant . . . my spirit shall not depart'). It is true that there are conditions to be fulfilled; but the idea is that God imposes these as part of His beneficent arrangement; just as a will imposes conditions, but is not a covenant in the strict sense of the term. (Cremers asserts that Philo uses διαθήκη in no other sense than that of 'one-sided' disposition).

The LXX translators made their choice of διαθήκη before its older signification was seriously affected by the extensive spread of will-making among the Greeks, and the assimilation by them of 'Roman ideas on wills' (Ramsay, Galatians, p. 360). Thus they had still at their disposal in the word the connotation of the solemnity and publicity of an irrevocable disposition by which, as a religious act, the maker of the disposition voluntarily, and by his own authority, bound his heir and, concurrently, himself in the presence of the community and its gods, assigning to the heir primarily the religious duties and rights of the family, and imposing arrangements which the heir had to carry out, and which he could at once undertake, and into the advantages of which he could at once enter, while he who made the disposition was still living. A word with such a connotation suited the idea of an irrevocable promise made by God to His chosen people, freely and on His own absolute authority, a promise of a religious inheritance into which they could at once enter by fulfilling the conditions which God, on the same absolute authority, imposed (Ramsay, Galatians, p. 361 ff.).

Διαθήκη is of course often used in the NT in the OT sense, Lk 17², Ac 3²⁵, Ro 9⁴, Eph 2¹². In some passages engagement and testamentary disposition seem to be combined (He 9¹⁶, 1 Co 11²⁵), the διαθήκη being a testament in the light of the death, an engagement in the light of the blood shed as a pledge (Evans). The sense of 'will,' the ordinary Gr. sense, is an exclusively NT usage; and this usage varies in its aspect according to the conceptions of the readers for whom the Epistles in which it occurs were designed. Thus the Epistle to the Hebrews—even if it was intended for a Church in Jerusalem and not in Rome—was written to a people who knew only the Roman will, out of which the rabbinical will in Palestine arose, and on which it was modelled. Hence the will there spoken of is regarded as in force only after the maker's death (9¹⁶⁻¹⁷), and consequently the writer is led to argue that a death is connected with every Divine διαθήκη, specially with the last will, that of Christ; and according to Roman law the last will was alone valid. In Gal 3¹⁵, on the other hand, where again a human will, a will dealing with an inheritance (3¹⁵), furnishes the parallel, the writer conceives of a will known to his readers as irrevocable and unalterable, even by the maker, when once it has been made by him and ratified by public authority, and argues from this analogy that the Law could not, as a hostile codicil, abrogate the Promise. Further, the devolution under this will was a devolution of religious responsibilities and rights, and those who inherited these under the will became there and then sons as inheriting and continuing the faith of Abraham (3⁷). Such a will was not Roman but Greek, or rather Græco-Syrian, and its regulations are found in the Roman-Syrian law-book, which recognized Græco-Syrian law as still largely in force in the Eastern provinces. This law regarded will-making as per se son-making; and where sons were thus made by adoption (Gal 4⁵), which was not a Jewish practice of any importance, they could not be put away; they were even in a better position than sons by birth. Thus the line of thought is that the believing Gentiles inheriting and continuing the faith of Abraham became thereby adopted sons, with a title more secure than the 'Jews by nature.' But at Ro 8¹⁷, 'If sons, then heirs,' the idea is reversed. Here we are in the atmosphere of Roman law; and the idea in Roman law was that children must inherit.

It is noticeable that the Latin word fœdus, signifying a covenant between parties, is also applied to an independent, 'one-sided' disposition, arrangement, imposition. When Lucretius (ii. 254) writes of fœdera fati he means nothing else than the arrangements imposed by fate; and Vergil (Georg. i. 60) and Ovid (Met. x. 353), as well as Lucretius (v. 924), speak of the fœdera imposed by nature. But the classical usage of διαθήκη as 'will,' and the close connexion of the word in the OT with the idea of κλήρος (inheritance), together with the intensification in the NT of the idea of sonship, combined to bring testamentum into greater favour than fœdus as the rendering of διαθήκη, especially as fœdus suggested equality and testamentum superiority. Finally, as a consequence, testamentum became the title of the documents containing the attested promises of blessings willed by God and bequeathed to us in the death of Christ.

TESTAMENTS OF THE XII PATRIARCHS.—

i. TITLE AND CONTENTS.—This most valuable pseudepigraph has never received the attention it deserves, but the next few years will witness a full atonement for past neglect. This writing consists, as the title indicates, of the dying commands of the twelve sons of Jacob to their children. The idea is in part derived from the Testament of Jacob in Gn 49. Each Testament treats of some virtue or vice which finds special illustration in the life of this or that patriarch. In some cases the virtue or vice in question appears in the title. This holds true of the Greek MS C throughout. But in this respect C is late; for in O* and R all mention of the virtues and vices is omitted, and where they appear in P (as they do in a few cases) they differ in all but two instances from C. In the Armenian Version the titles of Simeon, Benjamin, Issachar, and Zebulun contain no reference to ethical characteristics, and those of Levi and Gad differ from their forms in CP. It is probable, therefore, that the name of each Testament was originally merely Διαθήκη in the Greek Version, followed by the name of the particular patriarch to whom it was ascribed, and νόμος in the original with a similar sequence. (Compare the Hebrew title of the Testament of Naphtali נְתַנְיָהוּ נֹמֹס, published by Gaster, and observe that נֹמֹס is used technically of a man's last will and testament, 2S 17²³, 2K 20¹, Is 38¹). According to R, it is true that the title of each Testament is merely the name of the patriarch. The title of the entire work was probably 'The Twelve Patriarchs'; for it is mentioned simply as Πατριάρχαι in the Stichometry of Nicephorus, the Synopsis Athanasii, and other lists.

In the next place it is to be observed that in each of the Testaments three elements can be distinguished. (1) The patriarch gives a brief history of his life, in which he emphasizes his particular virtue or vice. This history is generally a midrashic expansion of certain biblical statements, but in some cases it contains materials that are in direct conflict with them. (2) The patriarch next proceeds to 'improve' on the incidents just set forth in his own career, and exhorts his children to imitate the virtues or to shun the vices that were conspicuous in it. (3) Finally, the patriarch deals prophetically with the destinies of his descendants, emphasizes the premier rank and authority of Levi and Judah, and foretells the evils of overthrow and captivity that they will bring upon themselves should they fall into sin and disown the hegemony of Levi and Judah. These predictions are for the most part of purely Jewish authorship, but not a few are distinctively Christian.

ii. CRITICISM.—To account for the conflicting Jewish and Christian elements which appear side by side in the work, Grabe (*Spicileg. Patrum*², 1714, i. 129-144, 335-374) suggested that the book was written by a Jew and subsequently interpolated by a Christian. This hypothesis, however, failed till recently to gain the suffrages of scholars, mainly owing to the opposition of Corrodi (Krit. Gesch. des Chiliasmus, ii. 101-110). For nearly two centuries after Grabe little progress was made. Nitzsch (de Test. XII Patriarch. libro VI pseud., Wittenberg, 1810) described the author as a Jewish Christian of Alexandria, who had imbibed many Essene doctrines; whereas Ritschl (*Entstehung der altkathol. Kirche*¹, 322 ff.) assigned the book to a Gentile Christian, mainly on the ground of Benjamin 11, a chapter which, we now know, is a Christian interpolation; but in the second edition of the work abandoned this view and advocated a Nazarene authorship.

It is needless here to enter on a discussion of the views of Kayser (Die Test. der Zwölf Patr., in Reuss and Cunitz's Beiträge zu den theolog. Wissenschaften, 1851, pp. 107-140), who, falling back on Grabe's theory of interpolation, traced the book to Ebionite circles; or on those of Vorstman (Disquisitio de Test. XII Patriarcharum origine et pretio, 1857), who submitted Kayser's theory to a severe criticism, and concluded that the Testaments showed no trace of Ebionism, but were the product of Gentile Christianity. This conclusion, which upholds Ritschl's first view, was subsequently upheld by Hilgenfeld (ZWT, 1858, pp. 395 ff.; 1871, 302 ff.), while the view of Nitzsch was adopted by Langen (Das Judenthum, 1866, pp. 140-157) and Sinkler (Test. XII Patr. 1869, pp. 16-34; Appendix with collation of R and P, 1879; art. 'Test. XII Patr.' in Smith's Dictionary of Christian Biography, iv. 865-874).

It must be confessed that, so far, few results of permanent value were arrived at, but in 1884 a great advance was made through Schnapp (Die Test. der XII Patr. untersucht, Halle, 1884), who revived in an improved form Grabe's hypothesis of Christian interpolation of an originally Jewish work. Schnapp's theory is that in its original form the book consisted of biographical details respecting each of the patriarchs, and of appropriate exhortations founded on these details. Thus the work embraced only two of the three elements mentioned above. At a later date this book was worked over by a Jewish writer, who enriched all the Testaments with sections dealing with the coming destinies of the various tribes and with other details of an apocalyptic character. Finally, the book was re-edited by a Christian, who in some cases made large additions, and in others merely modified the text in order to adapt its predictions to Christianity.

Subsequent research has notably confirmed part of the above theory. Thus Conybeare's collation of the Armenian Version in the JQR [1893], 375-398; [1896], 260-268, 471-485, proved that very many of the passages marked by Schnapp as Christian interpolations were absent from that version.

Since Schnapp's work the Testaments have been rehandled from various sides, by Kohler (JQR, 1893, pp. 400-406), Gaster (PSBA, 1893, 1894), Marshall (PSBA, 1894), Charles (Encyclopædia Biblica, 1899, i. 237-241), and Bousset (ZNTW, 1900, 142-175, 187-209). Bousset's articles are of great value, and will call for frequent reference.

Since many of the above articles were published before Kautzsch's Apokryphen und Pseudepigraphen des Alten Testaments, 1900, it must be confessed that it is with disappointment that scholars have turned to Schnapp's introduction to and translation of the Testaments in that volume. Both are quite inadequate from the standpoint of our present knowledge.

1. Christian Interpolations.—These were, as we have seen, rejected by Schnapp merely on internal grounds in 1884, though he could occasionally have justified his conclusions from R. But even in his translation* of 1900 he has repeatedly failed to call attention to the fact that his conjecture is confirmed by MS evidence, and in many passages he has attributed too much to the interpolator, where a study of his textual authorities would have enabled him to make much smaller and neater excisions. But not only can the student summon rich textual materials to his aid, he can also in not a few cases detect the interpolator's hand in certain poetical passages where the foreign element destroys the rhythm and parallelism. Thus Levi 18, Judah 25, Simeon 6, Dan 5 are either wholly or in part Hebrew poetry. Only the first of these has been recognized by Schnapp as being such. We quote a few lines as an illustration—

Τότε ἰκέψυ ἡ γῆ Χάμ, καὶ αἱ λαοὶ ἀσπείλονται.
καὶ καταπαύσει ἡ γῆ πάντα ἀπὸ ταραχῶν, καὶ πάντα ἡ ὑπὸ οὐρανὸν ἀπὸ πάλιν.
Τότε Σὺμ ἰδοὺσθεσθῆναι, ὅτι Κύριος ὁ Θεὸς μέγας τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ, φαινόμενος ἐπὶ γῆς
ὡς ἄνθρωπος καὶ σωζόν ἐν αὐτῷ τὸν Ἀδάμ.
Τότε δοθήσονται πάντα τὰ πνεύματα τῆς πλάτης αἱ καταπάτησιν, καὶ ἄνθρωποι βασιλεύσουσι τῶν ποταμῶν τριμυάτων.

It will be seen that v. 6 destroys the parallelism. We must reject as interpolations μέγας τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ and σωζόν ἐν αὐτῷ τὸν Ἀδάμ from a comparison of the two Armenian recensions (see Bousset, ZNTW [1900], 147). The ὡς ἄνθρωπος is against the parallelism. The verse probably read—

*Ὅτι Κύριος ὁ Θεὸς φανήσεται ἐπὶ γῆς.

By means of textual authorities the Christian interpolations can be removed from Reuben, Issachar, Judah, and Zebulun. Those in Simeon can be reduced to one or two phrases in 6, 7, and likewise those in chapter 8. Dan 5, 6, 7 cannot be wholly purged by means of textual authorities, nor yet Naphtali 4, 8.—In Joseph 19 the Greek is defective and the Armenian corrupt; but Schnapp is wrong in branding the bulk of it as a Christian interpolation, it is probably a fragment of an early Maccabæan Apocalypse.—As regards Benjamin, though the distinctively Christian phrases are omitted by the Armenian at the close of 3, yet the promise of redemption through Joseph is suspicious. Though ἀμμος ὑπὲρ ἀνδρῶν παραδοθήσεται could be said of him, yet the next phrase ἀναμνητῆτος ὑπὲρ ἀσεβῶν ἀποθαινέται cannot be justly referred to him. In 9 the Christian interpolations in the Gr. are wanting in the Arm., save the words ὑβρισθήσεται (cf. Lk 18²⁷) and ἐξουθενώθησεται (Lk 23¹¹), which appear Christian. In Levi 2, 3 the text of COP is very corrupt, but by means of recension α of the Armenian and R it is possible to recover the primitive Jewish text. This latter text described the three heavens, but this account was intended by the interpolator to be an account of the seven heavens. To this question we shall return presently. In Levi 4 and 10 and in 14⁵† Christian interpolations are present alike in Gr. and Arm., and one or two phrases at the close of 16. The famous passage in Levi 8, which claims for the descendant of Levi the triple honours of prophet, priest, and king, becomes intelligible through the aid of R and the Arm., and is of Jewish origin. It refers to John Hyrcanus. To this section we shall return later.

The Christian interpolations, therefore, which cannot be eliminated by textual authorities, do not extend beyond certain phrases or sentences in Sim. 6, 7, Levi 4, 10, 14, 17, Dan 5, 6, 7, Napht. 4, 8, Asher 7, Joseph 19, Benj. 3 (?), 9.* Thus by means of recent research about three-fourths of the Christian interpolations have been removed from the text.

* Schnapp has printed in his translation all the passages he considers Christian interpolations, in spaced type. This is a very convenient arrangement. We shall touch upon most of these in the sequel.

† Where a form such as 14⁵ is used in reference to the Testaments, it means ch. 14, line 5, in Sinker's edition.

2. The Source and Character of the Christian Interpolations.—Schnapp was of opinion that all the Christian passages were inserted in the text by a single Christian interpolator. The present writer in 1899 (Encyc. Biblica, i. 239) contended that the evidence pointed rather to a succession of interpolators. Bousset, however (ZNTW [1900], 174), has since maintained Schnapp's view, on the ground of the unusual affinities subsisting between the interpolated passages. Assuming, then, that all the interpolations were from one hand, Bousset has not much difficulty in determining the probable period of the interpolator to be between A.D. 150 and 200. But his assumption cannot be maintained, as we hope to show presently. In the meantime, excluding the conflicting statements, we have the following theological doctrines in the Christian additions:—

Thus 'the Lamb of God,' Benj. 3¹⁸, 'the Only-begotten,' Benj. 9⁶, should be born of a virgin of Judah, Jos. 19²⁸, a man, indeed, Napht. 4¹¹, a man from the seed of Judah, Jud. 24², yet at once God and man, Sim. 7⁴. 'God' should 'take a body,' Sim. 6¹⁰, and appear as 'God in the flesh,' Benj. 10¹⁸, and dwell with men on earth, Napht. 8²⁵. He should be 'sinless,' Jud. 24⁴, Benj. 3¹⁹, 'the Light of the world,' having come 'to lighten every man,' Levi 14⁹, 'the Branch of the Most High and Fount of life for all flesh,' Jud. 24⁸. He should be a High Priest, Reub. 6²⁵, and 'the Saviour of Israel,' Napht. 8², 'the Saviour of the Gentiles,' Dan 6¹⁸, the Saviour of the world, Levi 4¹¹, 17⁵, Benj. 3¹⁸, and 'save Israel and all the Gentiles,' Asher 7⁸ (Benj. 3²⁰), yes, all mankind, Levi 2¹⁹ (Sim. 6¹¹, 16). On earth He should be baptized, Levi 14⁸, and acknowledged by the voice of the Father from heaven, Levi 18¹⁵, should afterwards be seized by the high priests, Levi 14⁸, 'insulted, set at naught and lifted up on a tree,' Benj. 9²⁷, crucified, Levi 4¹¹, 'die for the godless,' Benj. 3¹⁸. The veil of the temple should be rent, Benj. 9¹⁰, Hades robbed through His sufferings, Levi 4¹: He should redeem His sons from Beliar, Zeb. 9¹⁶, 'take the captives from Beliar, even the souls of the saints,' Dan 5²⁴, ascend from Hades, Benj. 9¹¹, rise from the dead, Levi 16¹⁷, ascend into heaven, Levi 18¹⁵, Benj. 9¹².

The above is a fairly full Christology to be worked into a Jewish book. We have now to draw attention to conflicting statements on the doctrine of the Incarnation.

In accordance with the account just given, it is said in Benj. 10¹⁴ that 'the King of heaven will appear on earth in the form of a man' (ἐν μορφῇ ἀνθρώπου). On the other hand, the doctrine is probably Docetic in Zeb. 9¹⁹ 'ye will see God in the fashion of a man' (ἐν σχήματι ἀνθρώπου), and undoubtedly so in Asher 7⁸ 'God in the semblance of man' (θεὸς ἐν ἀνδρὶ ὑποκρίμενος). Again, there is a third view represented, the Patripassian, in Sim. 6¹⁰, where we read of 'the Lord, the great God of Israel,' appearing on earth as man. In Asher 7⁸ the language betrays the same standpoint: 'The Highest (ὁ Ὑψίστος) will visit the earth—as man, eating and drinking with men'; and in Levi 4¹ 'the sufferings of the Highest.' The contrast is brought into fuller relief by such a declaration as that in Levi 4¹¹ 'Till the Lord visit all the nations through the mercy of His Son.' Again there is a want of uniformity as regards the descent of Christ. Thus He is said to be from Judah only, Napht. 6², from Judah and Levi, Gad 3¹⁻³, Dan 5², from Levi and Judah, Sim. 7⁴, Lev. 2¹⁸, 19.

Together with the above phenomena, we should observe that the Christian additions are very differently attested by the Gr. MSS COPR. R has the fewest of these, and in many cases attests single-handed the non-interpolated text against COP and the two Arm. recensions; OP attest it in a few cases, and C in at least one (Levi 18¹¹). Of the two Armenian recensions, α agrees most with R, and β with COP. Finally, each Gr. MS has Christian additions peculiar to itself, and

* Bousset (op. cit. p. 173) makes the list slightly shorter.

† In addition to the above, observe the important passage (Benj. 11) regarding St. Paul, which mentions his writings and achievements; also the expansion of the account of the three heavens into one of the seven heavens in Levi 2, 3; but this expansion may be due to a Jewish hand.

similarly the Armenian Version (cf. Sim. 7¹⁴) and apparently each of its recensions.

From the above facts, therefore, we conclude that the Christian additions are due to several hands, and were made at different periods, probably from the middle of the 2nd cent. onwards.

3. Integrity of original Jewish Testaments.—We have seen how thoroughly critical research has confirmed Schnapp's theory that the Christian references in the text are the result of interpolation. We have now to consider his second hypothesis, that the apocalyptic sections do not belong to the original work, which confined itself to biographical details and practical exhortations founded on these. Thus two different sources are postulated. But Schnapp has not succeeded in establishing this hypothesis as he did the former. He has tried to show, indeed, that in the Testament of Joseph we have two partially conflicting accounts of Joseph's history, derived from different authors—i.e. 1-10^a and 10^b-18. But, even if we agreed with him that these sections sprang from two distinct sources, this concession would not support his hypothesis. On the other hand, his analysis of this Testament may be quite wrong. We may have here merely a transposition of the text such as is found in the Ethiopic Enoch, chs. 91-94. Nearly every difficulty disappears if we read it in the following order—1. 10-16. 2-9. 17-20. In the Testament of Levi the section ch. 2, ὡς δὲ ἐτοιμαζόμεν . . . 6, ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ μου, certainly conflicts with its present context. This vision does not refer to the events before and after, except in 5^a, but has a general fitness, in that its object is the glorification of Levi. The writer of the Testament may have embodied this section from already existing materials, or it may have been added subsequently by an interpolator. But, neglecting further consideration of Schnapp's hypothesis of two Jewish sources, we may observe that the evidence points rather to a groundwork, written, as we shall presently see, in the 2nd cent. B.C., in praise of the earlier Maccabæans, and enlarged with certain interpolations of a conflicting character in the 1st cent. B.C. These interpolated sections, which constitute an attack on the later Maccabæans, are Levi 10. 14-16, Juddh 21-23, Dan 5 (certain paragraphs), Zebulun 9, Sim. 7^a. With these sections we shall deal presently when establishing the dates of their origin and that of the groundwork.

iii. DATE.—The earliest reference to our book by name is not earlier than Origen (Hom. in Josuam, 15^a [ed. Lommatzsch, xi. 143]: 'In aliquo quodam libello qui appellatur testamentum duodecim patriarcharum, quamvis non habeatur in canone, talem tamen quendam sensum invenimus quod per singulos peccantes singuli satanae intelligi debeant'). An earlier reference may exist in Fragment 17, Irenæus (ed. Stirren, i. 836, 837). External evidence, therefore, is of slight service for our present purpose. The internal evidence, however, is happily clear and decisive.

The groundwork of the Testaments constituted an apology on behalf of the Maccabæan high priests. Thus in Reub. 619-20 the words ἀνδραγατῶντες ἐν πόλεμῳ ἀρετῆς καὶ ἀπαύτου can only be interpreted of a high priest who is also a warrior.† Such a description would suit John Hyrcanus. Earlier in the same chapter this double function is referred to more clearly, δικαστὴν ὡς πρὶν καὶ θυρίαν ὡς πρὸς πάντας Ἰσραὴλ. And a few lines later, ἐὺλογησάτω τὸν Ἰσραὴλ . . . ὅτι ἐν αὐτῷ ἐβλίστατο Κύριος βασιλεὺς πάντων τοῦ λαοῦ (R). But the reference becomes still clearer in Levi 819-21 ὁ τρίτος ἐπαγγελήσεται αὐτῷ ὄνομα καὶνόν, ὅτι βασιλεὺς ἐν τῷ (Arm. Gr. MSS give ἐν τῷ wrongly) ἰούδα ἀναστήσεται, καὶ ποιήσει ἱερῶν τὴν νύκτα, κατὰ τὴν τίσιν τῶν ἰδίων, ἐς πάντας

* So also Bousset on the whole (op. cit. 189 ff.) in 1900. The present writer had drawn attention to this fact in his Eschatology, Hebrew, Jewish, and Christian, 1899, and to the early elements in the Testaments in Encyc. Biblica, i. 237-241.

τὰ ἴδωρ.* These clauses point clearly to the civil and priestly functions of the Maccabæans subsequent to a.c. 153, and a few lines further on the attribution of prophetic powers to this family (ὡς δὲ παρουσία αὐτοῦ ἀγαπητῆ, ὡς προφήτης ἰδύσται [O]) enables us to identify the very member of this dynasty to whom our author alludes. This was John Hyrcanus,† who, according to Josephus (BJ i. 11. 4; Ant. xiii. x. 7), combined in his own person the threefold offices of prophet, priest, and king (τρία γὰρ τὰ πραττέμενα μόνος ἔχει τὴν τε ἀρχὴν τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ καὶ τὴν ἀρχιεροσύνην καὶ προφητείαν). This limits the date of the work to a.c. 135-105. To the above period belongs the eschatology of the Messianic hymn in Dan 523-33, according to the best textual authorities, with the exception of such an expression as τὰς ψυχὰς τῶν ἁγίων καλῶσι εἰς αὐτὸν (so Arm.) in Dan 526, and of one or two phrases.‡ The same is true of the Messianic hymn in Jud. 24 and the account of the resurrection in Jud. 25.

Unhappily, the second Apocalypse in Jos. 19 is too hopelessly corrupt, even in the Armenian,§ to arrive at any definite chronology. Finally, in Napht. 514-16 the successive nations are mentioned that brought Israel into bondage; the last of these is the Syrians: Ἀσσύριοι, Μῆδοι, Πέρσαι, Ἑλληνικοὶ, Γαλατικοὶ, Καλδαῖοι, Σύριοι, ἀφρονεῖσθαι ἐν αἰμαλώσει τὰ δώδεκα στήθερα τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ. Thus the passage was written prior to the domination of Rome, i.e. before a.c. 63.

The book, therefore, so far as we have considered it, was written between B.C. 135 and 63. Since, however, no reason has appeared for bringing the terminus ad quem later than B.C. 103, the work may safely be assigned to the years B.C. 135-103.¶ It would thus form a sequel to Eth. Enoch 83-90, which was written before B.C. 161. It reproduces some of its phraseology in Jos. 19.

But certain passages, to which we have already referred, belong, like Eth. Enoch 91-104, and the Psalms of Solomon, to a later date. In these the Maccabæan king-priests are the object of the fiercest invective. These attacks are made in Levi 1014-16, where, as in Ps-Sol 2. 4, the priests are charged with destroying the Law and teaching false doctrine (cf. Eth. En. 94²), with seducing Israel (cf. Eth. En. 9410410), with profaning the temple, with committing fornication, and marrying the daughters of the Gentiles. Again, in Jud. 23, Judah is charged with every kind of abomination and idolatry (cf. Eth. En. 997-9). But the notes of time are still more manifest in Jud. 221-3, which speaks of internal divisions and civil wars and the overthrow of the Maccabæan dynasty by aliens (ἰταῖοι δὲ αὐτοῖς διαμρίσκει κατ' ἄλλήλους καὶ πόλεμον συνεχῶς ἵστανται ἐν Ἰσραὴλ, καὶ ἐν ἀλλοφίλοις συντιθέσθονται ἡ βασιλεία αὐτῶν [Arm. Gr. MSS]). The aliens may be taken to be the Romans or the Herodian dynasty (which was of Idumean origin). In Zeb. 947 the civil strife between Aristobulus II. and Hyrcanus II. is clearly depicted: Μὴ σχιζήσῃ ἐν δύο κεφάλαις . . . Ἐν ἰσχυραῖς ἡμεῖς . . . διαμετρήσονται ἐν Ἰσραὴλ, καὶ δύο βασιλεῖς ἐγκαταστήσονται. Since the writer in the last passage says that this civil war will be ἐν ἰσχυραῖς ἡμεῖς (cf. Levi 10, ἐν συντελείᾳ τῶν αἰώνων; also Levi 14), it follows that the composition of Levi 10. 14-16, Jud. 22, Dan 513-23, Zeb. 9, cannot be of a much later date, and may be reasonably assigned to the years a.c. 60-40. It is more difficult to determine the date of Jud. 21. This chapter stands by itself in attacking the monarchy and in upholding the priesthood. Bousset (op. cit. 192) assigns it to the time of Hyrcanus II.

iv. LANGUAGE.—The time of composition in itself determines this question in the main. The various writers of the work belonged in all cases to the ranks of the HASIDÆANS, who maintained the doctrines afterwards upheld by the Pharisees. The original, we therefore presume, was written in Semitic, and, in all probability, in Hebrew. The present writer has elsewhere pointed out (Encyc. Biblica, i. 239-241) that (1) Hebrew constructions and expressions are frequent, (2) that paronomasiae which are lost in the Greek can frequently

* This kingly high priest is the theme also of Levi 182—

Τότε ἰσχυρὸς Κύριος ἰσὶα καὶνόν, ὅτι πάντες ἐλόγησαν Κυρίου ἀποκαλυφθέντας.
Καὶ αὐτὸς ποιήσει πρὶν ἂν ἔλθῃ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς ἐν πλῶθι ἡμερῶν, Καὶ ἀντατῇ αὐτοῦ ἐν οὐρανῷ ὡς βασιλεὺς (P Arm.).

† So already Kohler, JQR v. 402; and subsequently Bousset.

‡ The Messianic hope here appears as in Eth. En. 83-90. The Messiah is said to proceed from 'Judah and Levi.' This is certainly wrong for 'Judah' or 'Levi' or 'Levi and Judah'; cf. Dan 69, Reub. 6, Sim. 5. 7, Levi 2, Iss. 5. The order 'Judah and Levi' is found in Christian interpolations, as Bousset has already recognized; cf. Gad 8, Jos. 19. According to Jud. 24, the Messiah is to be descended from Judah. This no doubt is what is meant in Eth. En. 9037-33; for the Messiah is there distinguished from Judas Maccabæus, who is represented as fighting till the advent of the Messianic kingdom. Bousset assigns both these hymns to the latter half of the 1st cent. a.c.; but the character of the eschatology is wholly against this assumption.

§ See Preuschen's translation in ZNTW [1900], 138.

¶ This date holds good of the narrative portions also. See Bousset, op. cit. 197-205.

be restored by retranslation into Hebrew, and (3) that certain passages which are obscure or unintelligible in the Greek become clear on retranslation into Hebrew. We shall content ourselves with one or two examples of the above statements.

Thus in Reub. 8: αὐτῶ ἐξέλιξε = בחר בו; Levi 8:19 ἰσαληθῆσται αὐτῶ ὅσομα καὶνόν = שרם לו שם קרן. Napht. 19: παυρογύρε ἰσέησε 'Paççà... διὰ τοῦτο ἐαλίθην Νεφθαλάμ = ... לחלח לה נפחא' לכן נקראו. Finally, in Napht. 65: ἰδοὺ σλαῖον ἤρχετο... μαστὴν ταριχῶν, ἐντὶς ταυτῶν καὶ κυβερνήτου, the phrase μαστὴν ταριχῶν, which = תרץ מלח, has arisen from a corrupt dittography of תרץ מלח = יורש הארץ. This last fact was pointed out by Gaster (PSBA, Dec. 1893, Feb. 1894) in his edition of the Hebrew text of a Testament of Naphtali, and may be regarded as conclusive; for the above phrase is found in this Hebrew Testament—כלא מלח... דנה אנהי הולכת.

v. VERSIONS (Greek, Aramaic, Syriac, Armenian, Slavonic, Latin).—The earliest versions were the Greek, the Armenian, and probably the Syriac. (a) Of the Greek Version six MSS are known. Of these, the Cambridge MS (C) of the 10th and the Oxford MS (O) of the 14th cent. have already been made known through Sinker's edition of the Greek text (The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, 1869); the Vatican MS (R) of the 13th and the Patmos MS (P) of the 16th cent., through the Appendix he published in 1879. The two remaining MSS are still unpublished, but are being used by Sinker in forming a new Greek text. It is to be presumed that in the new text R will be mainly followed and not C as in the old edition.

(b) The Aramaic Version.—This version was not brought to light till quite recently. Only one complete leaf and a half of the entire MS have been preserved. The MS was brought by Schechter from the Cairo Genizah in 1896, and its contents recognized in 1900 by H. L. Pass, who, together with J. Arendzen, published the text in the JQR [1900], 651-661. The fragmentary folio contains a passage somewhat similar to Jud. 5. The complete folio has portions of Levi 11-13. Although at times the Greek and Aramaic agree word for word, they more often diverge both as to contents and to order. The Aramaic is much fuller. It is noteworthy that it agrees in this respect with the Syriac fragment against the Greek. To this point we shall return in dealing with that version.

(c) The Syriac Version.—Of this version only a fragment remains, preserved in a Syr. MS [Brit. Mus., Add. 17,193—Cat. ii. 997], dated A.D. 874. This MS consists of a series of 125 extracts from different sources, No. 80 of which is derived from Levi 12. This extract contains three sentences which are unattested by the Greek, and it was probably on this ground that Preuschen (ZNTW [1900], 108) declared that its evidence was valueless as regards the existence of a Syriac Version. Now, it is worthy of remark that these additional three sentences are present word for word in the newly discovered Aramaic; and yet, so far as all three versions have a common text, the Syriac and Greek agree against the Aramaic. Thus, Gr. and Syr. give ὁκτώ where Aram. = ὀκτωκαίδεκα, and where the former give ὀκτωκαίδεκα the latter = ἐννεακαίδεκα.

(d) The Armenian Version.—It is to F. C. Conybeare that we owe our first knowledge of the value of the Armenian Version, through his collation of the Armenian with Sinker's Greek text of the Testaments of Reuben, Simeon, Judah, Dan, Joseph, Benjamin (JQR [1895], 375-398; [1896], 260-268, 471-485). In 1896 the first Armenian edition of the text was published by the Mechitarist Fathers at Venice in a small volume, including many other non-canonical writings of the OT. This edition is based on five MSS.* Subsequently Preuschen wrote a learned article (ZNTW [1900], 106-140), in which he shows, in dependence on the Venice edition, that there were two recensions of the Armenian text α and β, of which the former is much the briefer and earlier, and contains likewise fewer Christian interpolations. In this article he gives a German translation of the Testament of Levi. For further details see op. cit. 130-140.

(e) The Slavonic Version.—This version exists in two recensions, which are published by Tichonravow in his Monuments of Old Russian Apocryphal Literature [1863], i. 96-145 and 146-232. With the help of Bonwetsch, Bousset tested this version and found it worthless for textual purposes. It is most nearly related to the Greek text of O (P).

(f) No earlier Latin Version is known than that of Robert Grosseteste. This was made from C, and is valueless, therefore, from a critical standpoint.

vi. VALUE OF THE TESTAMENTS.—This work has been simply a sealed book till the present, owing to the difficulty of discriminating the various elements in the text. Now that we have achieved this task in its main outlines, we discover that we have in the groundwork of the Testaments a unique work of the 2nd cent. B.C.; for, with the exception of Jubilees, it constitutes the only Apology in Jewish literature for the religious and civil hegemony of the Maccabees from the Pharisaic standpoint. To the few Jewish interpolations which belong to the next cent. a large interest attaches; for these, like Eth. Enoch 91-104 and the Psalms of Solomon, constitute an unmeasured attack on every office—prophetic, priestly, or kingly—administered by the Maccabees. But, turning aside from the historical to the religious bearings of the book, we may notice shortly its eschatology, its teaching on the various heavens, and its peculiar view as to the twelve tribes of Israel.

(a) The Eschatology.—We shall confine our attention to three Messianic passages, Levi 18, Jud. 24, 25, and Dan 5²². According to Levi 18, the Messiah is to spring from Levi and be the eternal High Priest and civil ruler of the nation, Levi 18¹⁶. During his rule sin should gradually cease, Levi 18¹⁷; Beliar be bound, Levi 18^{20, 21}; the gates of Paradise be opened and the saints eat of the tree of life, Levi 18^{19, 21}. We have here an eternal Messianic kingdom on earth as in Eth. Enoch 83-90. In Jud. 24, 25 and Dan 5²²⁻²³ the forecast is on the whole the same, save that the Messiah is to spring not from Levi but from Judah (Jud. 24², Dan 5²² †), as no doubt also in Eth. Enoch 90^{27, 28}. These hymns would be earlier, if we are right, than that in Levi 18, and would thus be written before enthusiasm for John Hyrcanus had reached its height. According to these hymns, the resurrection (of the righteous?) is to take place during the Messiah's reign (Jud. 25), the evil spirits are to be cast into eternal fire (Jud. 25¹⁰), the saints to live in Eden (Dn 5²⁰), and all the nations to rejoice (Jud. 25¹⁶), and God to abide with men (Dan 5²¹). Here also we have an eternal Messianic kingdom on earth, in which the Gentiles participate.

* There are seven other MSS known to scholars. Two of these have been collated by Conybeare, belonging respectively to the London Bible Society and to Lord Zouche; see ZNTW [1900], 108-110.

† In Dan the text says 'Judah and Levi.' Since this is the order of these names in the Christian interpolations, we must emend the phrase into 'Levi and Judah,' or simply 'Levi' or 'Judah.' But, since the Messiah is nowhere else in the Testaments said to be sprung from 'Levi and Judah' (though it is declared that by means of Levi and Judah God will deliver Israel), we must fall back simply on 'Levi' or 'Judah' as the original text. We take it that 'and Levi' is an intrusion here. See p. 723^b note †.

(b) The three heavens and the seven heavens.—From R and the Armenian Version of Levi 2. 3 it is now clear that these chapters contained originally a description of only three heavens. R alone preserves the true text here; for the two recensions of the Arm. α and β are both confused and corrupt, the former mentioning only two heavens, and the latter four. It was Lueken (Michael [1898], 92) who first recognized this fact. Its further elucidation we owe to Bousset (ZNTW 159-163). Thus it appears that a belief in the three heavens prevailed early in the 2nd cent. B.C. It has thus an older attestation in Judaism than that of the seven heavens, but which is in reality the earlier we cannot at present say.

(c) The Twelve Tribes.—The Twelve Tribes are supposed to be in existence at the date of the composition of this work, and in Palestine. Thus in Napht. 5¹⁶ the Syrians are said to hold sway over them. In Reub. 6¹³ the high priestly ruler (i.e. John Hyrcanus) is 'to judge and offer sacrifice for all Israel till the consummation of the times'; and 'to bless Israel and Judah' (Reub. 6¹⁷). The very fact that the book is addressed to the Twelve Tribes, although it speaks of the ultimate dispersion or destruction of Reuben (6⁹), Dan, Gad, and Asher (Asher 7¹³), points in the same direction. Bousset calls attention to the fact that the Letter of Aristas states that Eleazar the high priest sent six men of each of the Twelve Tribes to Ptolemy. This naturally presupposes the presence of the Twelve in Palestine or its neighbourhood. The idea that the Jewish kingdom embraced once again the entire nation, could easily arise when the Maccabees extended their sway northwards over Samaria and Galilee and eastwards beyond the Jordan. This displaced the older belief that nine tribes were still in captivity (see Eth. Enoch 89⁷), written 20 to 30 years before the Testaments). But with the growing degradation of the later Maccabees the older idea revives. According to the Psalms of Solomon (17²⁸, 24, 30), the dispersed tribes are to be brought back. This thought reappears frequently in the 1st cent. A.D., and then in new forms. The nine or ten tribes were in the far East enjoying great prosperity (Philo, Leg. ad Gaium, 31; Jos. Ant. xi. v. 2; Sib. Or. ii. 170-173), or, according to a later view, they were lost, and their place of abode was unknown to men, but God was keeping them safely till the Messianic times (4 Ezr 13³⁰⁻⁴⁷). This form of the idea, which is now the current one, is not attested till after the fall of Jerusalem, A.D. 70.

LITERATURE.—The principal authorities have been cited in the body of the above article. See, further, Schürer, GVV iii. 262 (HJP n. iii. 124). Since the above article was written, an English translation of the Armenian Version has been published (Uncanonical Writings of the OT found in the Armenian MSS of St. Lazarus, Issaverdens, Venice, 1901, pp. 351-478). As the translator has made no attempt to distinguish between the two recensions, this translation is worthless from a critical standpoint.

TESTIMONY.—In the OT this word is scarcely, if at all, used in the ordinary sense of 'witness' or 'evidence,' although it has this meaning frequently in the NT. We will reserve the treatment of this sense of the term and partly of the OT 'testify' for art. WITNESS, and devote the present art. to the special OT usage.

The Heb. terms are [עֵדוּת] and עֵדוּת or עֵדוּת. The existence of the first of these has been postulated to account for the plur. עֵדוּת, which is found (alone or with suffixes) in Dt 4⁴⁵ 6¹⁷, 20, Ps 25¹⁰ 78⁶⁶ 93³ 99⁷ 119², 22, 24, 46, 50, 79, 90, 119, 125, 138, 146, 152, 167, 168. Such a course appears, however, to be unnecessary, for in every instance עֵדוּת might be vocalized עֵדוּת, or עֵדוּת might be taken as a contraction of עֵדוּת ('edwōth'), the plur. of עֵדוּת (so Stade, § 320b; Siegfried-S'ade, Buhl). The form עֵדוּת is found in 1 K 2², 2 K 17¹² 23³, Jer 44², 1 Ch 29¹, 2 Ch 34³¹, Neh 9³², Ps 119¹⁴, 21, 36, 50, 111, 123, 144, 157. In both these sets of passages the name 'testimonies' is applied to God's laws as being a solemn declaration of His will or a protest against deviation from its performance (see Driver, Deut. p. 81, who compares עֵדוּת = 'testify or protest against' [not 'unto'], 2 K 17¹⁵, Jer 11⁷, Ps 50⁷ 81⁵, Neh 9²⁸, 29, 30). * 'The testimony' (עֵדוּת) is a technical term, esp. in P, for the Decalogue (LXX τὰ μαρτύρια, Ex 25¹⁶, 21 40²⁰) as being par excellence the declaration of the Divine will. Hence the expressions 'tables of the testimony' (LXX αἱ πλάκες τοῦ μαρτυρίου, Ex 31¹⁸ 32¹⁵ 34²⁹); 'ark of the testimony,' which contained these tables (LXX ἡ κιβωτός τοῦ μαρτυρίου, Ex 25²² 26³⁵, 24 30⁶, 28 31⁷ 39²⁵ 40³, 5, 21, Nu 4⁵ 7²⁸, Jos 4¹⁶ [Dillm.; but Bennett, Steuernagel, et al., עֵדוּת 'ark of the covenant']); † 'tabernacle of the testimony or witness' (LXX ἡ σκηνή τοῦ μαρτυρίου [so in Ac 7⁴⁴, Rev 15²]), Ex 38²¹, Nu 1⁵⁰, 23 bis 10¹¹ [all mishkan hā'edūth], Nu 9¹⁵ 17⁸, 18³, 2 Ch 24⁸ [all 'ōhel hā'edūth']. See art. TABERNACLE, p. 655. The testimony' is an abbreviation for 'the ark of the testimony' in Ex 16²⁴ (LXX ἐν τῷ τῷ θεοῦ) 27²¹ (ἐν τῇ διαθήκῃ) 30⁶ (ἐν τῇ κιβωτῷ τῶν μαρτυρίων) 36 (ἀπέναντι τῶν μαρτυρίων), Lv 16¹³ (ἐν τῶν μαρτυρίων) 24³ (ἐν τῇ σκηνῇ τοῦ μαρτυρίου), Nu 17¹⁰ (ἀπέναντι τοῦ μαρτυρίου) 20 (ἐνώπιον τῶν μαρτυρίων). A later usage extended the term hā'edūth from the Decalogue to the Law in general: Ps 19⁸ 78⁹ (|| עֵדוּת) 81⁶ (|| חֹק 'statute') 119²⁸ 122⁴.

For עֵדוּת ('the testimony') of 2 K 11¹²=2 Ch 23¹¹ we should prob. read עֵדוּת ('the bracelets,' see Wellh.-Bleek, p. 258 n.), although LXX has τὰ μαρτύρια and τὰ μαρτύρια in the respective passages.

In Sir 45¹⁷, where the LXX has 'to teach Jacob the testimonies' (B τὰ μαρτύρια, A μαρτυρίαν), the Heb. text has 'so he taught his people statute' (חֹק).

J. A. SELBIE.

TETH (ט).—The ninth letter of the Heb. alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 9th part, each verse of which begins with this letter. It is transliterated in this Dictionary by ṭ.

TETRARCH (τετράρχης, WH tetraparchēs).—A ruler of a fourth part of a country or province, or at Sparta a commander of four companies of soldiers. The compound occurs first in Eur. Alc. 1154 in reference to Thessaly, which in early times and again in the constitution given by Philip of Macedon was divided for civil administration into four districts (Demos. Philipp. iii. 26). In Galatia, too, each of the three tribes had its four tetrarchs (Strabo, 566 f.), until Pompey reduced the number (App. Mithrid. 46, Syr. 50; Livy, Ep. 94), retaining the name. Thenceforward little attention was paid to the original signification of the title, which was freely applied to dependent princelings in possession of some of the rights of sovereignty. They were of subordinate rank to kings or ethnarchs, and were especially numerous in Syria (Pliny, Hist. Nat. v. 74 et al.; Cicero, Milo, xxviii. 36 et al.; Horace, Sat. i. iii. 12; Tacitus, Ann. xv. 25; Caesar, Bell. Civ. iii. 3; Plutarch, Anton. 36; Jos. Ant. xvii. x. 9; et al.). The title as used in NT retains in part its etymological meaning in two cases. For both Antipas (Mt 14¹, Lk 3¹, 19 9⁷, Ac 13¹) and Herod Philip (Lk 3¹) inherited each a fourth part of his father's dominions (Jos. Ant.

* Cf. עֵדוּת, used of prophetic testimony or injunction, in Is 616 20.

XVII. xi. 4; Wars, II. vi. 3). At the same time, since their father had himself received the same title without geographical significance from Antony (Jos. Ant. XIV. xiii. 1; Wars, I. xii. 5), and as Antipas is styled king (Mt 14⁹, Mk 6^{14a}) almost as often as tetrarch, it is not unlikely that the latter title was applied to him without any designed allusion to its strict meaning. In a similar sense Lysanias [which see] is called tetrarch of Abilene in Lk 3¹, the district of Abila in the Lebanon having been severed from the Ituræan kingdom subsequently to the death of Lysanias I. and placed under the rule of a younger man of the same name. In support of St. Luke's accuracy may be cited two inscriptions in CIG, Nos. 4521, 4523. See, for further details and for the literature of the subject, Schürer, HJP I. ii. 7f. R. W. MOSS.

TEXT OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.—A history of the text of the OT, in the proper sense of the word 'history,' it is not possible to write, even if one were content to start from the period in which the OT was closed. For in the first place we do not know the date when, or the way in which, this closing was effected. Further, we have no MSS of the Heb. OT from the first eight centuries of the Christian era, at least none whose date is certain. Unfortunately, moreover, we are as yet without critical editions either of the most important early Versions (LXX, Pesh., Targg.), or of the ancient Jewish literary works (Talmuds, Midrashim) in which a great number of Bible passages are cited and explained. And, finally, the history of the text is much older than the close of the Canon. Even during the period when the writings which are now gathered into one in the OT had still a more or less separate circulation, the text underwent a variety of changes, due partly to the carelessness of copyists, and partly to intention, what was considered objectionable being dropped out, and additions being made. The proper course of procedure, then, appears to us to be to work backwards from a fixed point, viz. the printed text. We will discuss—

- i. The printed editions.
- ii. The manuscripts.
- iii. The work of the Mas(s)oretes (and the punctuation).
- iv. Earlier traces of the Heb. text of the OT.
- v. The importance of the ancient Versions.
- vi. Observations on the history of the growth of the OT.

i. PRINTED EDITIONS OF THE HEB. OT.—A. FIFTEENTH CENTURY.—The first portion of the Heb. Bible ever printed was the Psalter, 1477 (small folio, prob. Bologna), with D. Kimhi's commentary. Only the first psalms have the vowel points, in a very rude form (Ginsburg, Introd. 780-794). || The first ed. of the Pent. appeared in 1482 (Bologna folio, pointed), with Targ. Onk. and Rashi. || Ed. princeps of the Prophets, 1485 (Soncino, folio, 2 vols. [the 2nd has no date]), with D. Kimhi's com., neither vowel points nor accents. || Ed. princeps of the Hagiographa, 1487, 86 (Naples, folio, 3 parts). The vowel points are most unreliable, the printers having done their work very carelessly. There are no accents. The accompanying comm. are Kimhi on the Psalter, and Immanuel on Proverbs. || The first ed. of the whole OT appeared at Soncino in 1488, folio; it had vowel points and accents, like almost all the following editions; || 2nd ed., Naples, c. 1491-93 [neither date nor place is given]; || 3rd ed., Brescia, 1494. Luther used this ed. in translating the OT into German; || Pesaro, 1494 (1, see Wolf, Bibliotheca Heb. ii. 364, iv. 109; B. Riggenbach, Das Chronikon des Konrad Pellikan, Basel, 1877, p. 20).

B. SIXTEENTH CENTURY.—Heb. OT, Pesaro, 1511-1517, folio, 2 vols. || The Complutensian Polyglot, Alcalá, 1514-1517, Vetus testamenti multi- plici lingua nūc primo impressum, folio, 4 vols. (Heb., LXX, Vulg., Targ. Onk.). No accents; the vowel points cannot be relied upon. The editors used, for the compilation of their Heb. text, the Lisbon Pent. (1491), the Naples OT (1491-1493), and the MS of the OT in the Madrid University Library No. 1. The consonantal text is, according to Ginsburg (p. 917), remarkably accurate and of great importance. || First Rabbinical Bible, folio, 4 vols., Venice, 1516-1517. The editor, Felix Pratensis, was the first to indicate, in a purely Hebrew Bible, the Christian chapters* on the margin of the Heb. OT, and to divide Samuel, Kings, Ezra, and Chronicles each into two books. He was likewise the first to give, though not consistently, the consonants of the Kêrê in the margin. || The first Venice quarto Bible (1516-1517) is only a re-issue of the folio, without the Targums and the commentaries. || The second Rabbinical Bible, folio, 4 vols., Venice, 1524-1525, with the Mas(s)ora collected and arranged by Jacob ben Chayim ibn Adonijah. 'No textual redactor,' says Ginsburg (p. 964), 'of modern days, who professes to edit the Heb. text according to the Mas(s)ora, can deviate from it without giving conclusive justification for so doing.' || Third Rabbinical Bible, 1547-1548; fourth, 1568, Venice, folio, 4 vols.; || Biblia Sacra, Hebraice, Græce et Latine, Antwerp, 1569-1572, folio [OT vols. i.-iv.]; printed at the expense of Philip II. (hence surnamed Biblia Regia), ed. Arias Montanus. || Of the great number of other editions we will mention here but two: " קראס Hebraica Biblia Latina planeque nova S. Munsteri translatione . . . adiunctis insuper è Rabinorum commentarijs annotationibus, Basel, 1534-1535, folio, 2 vols. [2nd ed. 1546]; and הקראס רבן Biblia Sacra elegantiori et majuscula characterum forma, qua . . . littere radicales [plene et nigre] & serviles, deficientes & quiescentes &c. [vacue] situ et colore discernuntur. Authore Elia Huttero, Hamburg, 1587, folio.

C. SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.—Fifth Rabbinical Bible, Venice, 1617-1619; sixth, Basel, 1618-1619, revised and edited by J. Buxtorf the elder; unfortunately, he altered the vowel points in the Targums according to the Aram. portions of Daniel and Ezra. || The Paris Polyglot, printed at the expense of the Paris barrister, Guy Michel le Jay, 1629-1645, folio [OT vols. i.-iv.]. || Much better, and indeed the best of all the Polyglot Bibles, are the Biblia sacra polyglotta, ed. Brian Walton, London, 1657, folio [OT vols. i.-iv.]. || The basis of nearly all the newer editions are the Biblia Hebraica . . . lemmatibus Latinis illustrata à J. Leusden, Amsterdam, 1667, publisher Athias. || Biblia Hebraica . . . ex recensione D. E. Jablonski, Berlin, 1699. The latter follows Leusden's edition, but has collated also other edd. and some MSS. In the Preface he states that he has found and corrected more than 2000 errata in the Bible of 1667.

D. EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.—Biblia Hebraica . . . recensita . . . ab Everardo van der Hooght, Amstelædami et Ultrajecti, 1705. This OT is very often extolled as the best octavo ed. of the Bible, but without sufficient reason. The ed. of the Biblia Hebraica, Amstelædami, 1725, pub. by Salomo ben Joseph Props, is far superior. || Seventh Rabbinical Bible: ספר קראס, pub. by Moses of Frankfurt, Amsterdam, 1724-1727, folio, 4 vols. || J. H. Michaelis, Biblia Hebraica, ex aliquot manuscriptis et compluribus impressis codicibus, item masora . . . diligenter recensita. Accedunt loca scripturæ parallela . . . brevesque adnotationes, Halle, 1720. This is the first printed attempt at a critical edition. The Erfurt MSS collated by Michaelis are now in Berlin. || The Mantua Bible, 1742-1744,

* The division of the books of the Bible into chapters was the device of Stephen Langton of Canterbury (1205 A.D.), who introduced it in the Vulgate.

4°, pub. by Raphael Chayim Basila, contains Salomo Norzi's mas(s)oretic commentary on the OT. || B. Kennicott, Vetus Test. Heb. cum variis lectionibus, Oxford, 1776, 1780, folio, 2 vols., gives the text of van der Hooght, without the vowel points and accents. The MSS are for the most part very perfunctorily collated (cf. Bruns' ed. of the Dissertatio Generalis, and see below, ii. J).

E. NINETEENTH CENTURY.—Biblia Hebraica . . . recensita ab E. van der Hooght. Editio nova emendata a J. D'Allemand, London, 1822, and often. || Bibl. Heb. . . . recensuit Aug. Hahn, Leipzig, 1831, and often. || Bibl. Heb. . . . curavit C. G. G. Theile, Leipzig, 1849, and often. || [Christian] David Ginsburg, עשרים וחמשה ספרי הקדש סדריהם, עם חלושים והגהות, London, 1894, 2 vols.

F. EDITIONS WITHOUT VOWEL POINTS AND ACCENTS.—Bibl. Heb. non punctata . . . accurantibus Joh. Leusdeno & Joh. Andr. Eisenmenger, Francofurti, 1694, 1699. || Bibl. Heb. sine punctis, Amstelædami et Ultrajecti, 1701, 1699. || תקן הספר, Pent. ed. S. Baer, Roedelheim, 1866, and often. || Bibl. Sac. Heb.: Pent., Jos., Jud., Sam., Psalms . . . sine punctis ediderunt R. Sinker et E. T. Leeke, Cambridge, 1870. || The Psalms in Heb., without points, Oxford [Clarendon Press].

G. S. BAER'S EDD. OF SEPARATE BOOKS (those issued down to 1890 have prefaces by F. Delitzsch), Leipzig: Genesis, 1869; Jos., Jud., 1891; Sam., 1892; Kings, 1895; Isaiah, 1872; Jer., 1880; Ezekiel, 1884; Minor Proph., 1878; Psalms, 1880; Prov., 1880; Job, 1875; Megilloth, 1885; Dan., Ezr., Neh., 1882; Chron., 1888. H. CRITICAL EDITIONS.—The Sacred Books of the OT: a critical ed. of the Heb. text, printed in colours . . . under the editorial direction of Paul Haupt: Leipzig, Baltimore, and London, 4°. The following have appeared at the date of this article: Genesis by C. J. Ball, 1896; Leviticus by Driver and White, 1894; Numbers by J. A. Paterson, 1900; Joshua by W. H. Bennett, 1895; Judges by G. F. Moore, 1900; Samuel by Budde, 1894; Isaiah by Cheyne, 1899; Jeremiah by Cornill, 1895; Ezekiel by Toy, 1900; Psalms by J. Wellhausen, 1895; Proverbs by A. Müller and E. Kautzsch, 1901; Job by C. Siegfried, 1893; Daniel by A. Kamphausen, 1896; Ezra-Nehemiah by H. Guthe and L. W. Batten, 1901; Chronicles by R. Kittel, 1895.

A critical edition of the Aramaic portions of the OT is given by the present writer in his *Grammatik des Biblisch-Aramäischen*³, Leipzig, 1901 (Dn 3¹²⁻¹⁵, 20-24, 42¹⁻⁷ also with supralinear punctuation).

ii. THE MANUSCRIPTS.—A. Rolls.—The oldest form of book is the roll (גזית, volumen). Even at the present day the books which are read aloud in the principal part of the synagogue service are written in the roll form: namely, the Pentateuch (קטף התורה), from which a pārasha is read every Sabbath, and the five Megillōth (quinque volumina), namely, the Song of Songs (read at the Passover), Ruth (at Feast of Weeks), Lamentations (on anniversary of Destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans), Ecclesiastes (at Feast of Tabernacles), Esther (at Feast of Purim).

The material of the rolls is usually parchment; in the East, leather was also employed. At the beginning and the end there is a wooden roller (עץ החיים 'the tree of life'), and the columns that have been read are rolled up on the first of these. Neither vowel signs nor accents are present. In seven parchment rolls at Tzufutkale the present writer noticed a point at the end of each verse, in two of them two points. The letters ט ע ס נ ו נ ט have generally small ornamental strokes (קונוס coronulae). Between each book of the Torah four lines are left blank. The whole Pent. is divided into 669 sections (pārashas פָּרָשִׁי), which are called, according to the character of the spaces which separate them, open (apertae פְּתוּחָה, marked פ) or closed (clausae סְגוּלָה, marked ס). The 54 Sabbath pericopes are marked פפפ and ססס respectively (with the exception of the 12th, Gn 47²⁸, at whose commencement the intervening space is only that of one letter). Six words, whose initial letters are ט ש כ ביה (Ps 68⁹), stand, particularly in Spanish (Sephardic) MSS, at the beginning of a column: Gn 1¹, יהוה Gn 46⁸, הָבֵאִים Ex 14²⁸, שֵׁנִי Lv 16⁸, כֹּהֵן Nu 24⁸, and וְאֵלֶיךָ Dt 31²⁸; in others, particularly the German (Ashkenazite) MSS, the ו and כ are represented by Dt 16¹⁸ שְׁמַעְתֶּם (or 12²⁸ שָׁמַר) and 23²⁴ שָׁמַר. Instead of יהוה some MSS have יְשׁוּעָה of Gn 49¹⁴ at the commencement of a column. Many copyists begin each column with a new verse, some begin each with the letter וואו, וְוִי קְטַמְתִּים. The poetical passages Ex 15 and Dt 32 are written (and even printed) in artistically constructed divisions. On these and other rules to be observed by the writers of rolls, see the Literature. Epigraphs are rare. The rules that have to be observed by a modern copyist of a Torah roll may be learned very conveniently from S. Baer's ed. of the Pentateuch, תקן הספר הקדש, Roedelheim, 1866 and often.

B. MSS in book form. These may contain the whole Bible, or one or two of its four principal parts (Pent., Prophetæ priores, Prophetæ posteriores, Hagiographa). The material is either parchment or paper (on the employment of the latter see Steinschneider, Handschriftenkunde, p. 18 f., and cf. art. WRITING). The size is very frequently quarto; in ancient times folio is commoner than octavo. Almost all codices have vowels and accents. The omission of the double point soph pasuk at the end of the verse is rare (four codd. at Tzufutkale, and cod. Brit. Mus. Orient. 4445; see Ginsburg, Introd. p. 473); still rarer is the placing of only a single point (cod. Tzufut. 102).—Most MSS contain also mas(s)ora, i.e. observations on the number of times that particular words and word-forms occur: mas(s)ora parva (Kêrê and Kêthibh; the indication of the number of occurrences of a word or word-form, e.g. כ=twice, יס=134 times) on the side margins; mas(s)ora magna (detailed lists with citation of passages) on the top and bottom margins; mas(s)ora finalis; some MSS have Mas(s)oretic material also at the beginning. The extent of these observations was regulated by the space available, the inclination of the copyist, and the remuneration offered by the man who ordered the copy. Some copyists wrote part of the mas(s)ora magna in figures (animals, leaves, etc.) formed by elaborate flourishes, so that the reading is at times a matter of no little difficulty. Such embellishments have also proved not infrequently detrimental to the accuracy of the copy.

Highly valuable, but unfortunately found only in a portion of the MSS, are the epigraphs, especially when these give the date, the country, and the name of the scribe.—The punctuation and the mas(s)ora are frequently not from the hand of the writer of the consonantal text, but have been added by one or two other scribes. The punctuator is called ḥatam.

C. A scientific examination and collating of all ancient or otherwise important MSS of the OT has not as yet been undertaken. Collections of various readings are given by Sal. Norzi, J. H. Michaelis, and B. Kennicott (see above, i. D), J. B. de Rossi (below, J), S. Baer (i. G), and Ch. D. Ginsburg (i. E). Some of the most important MSS are—

(a) Codex of the Former and the Latter Prophets, written by Moses ben Asher 827 years after the destruction of the temple, i.e. A.D. 895, now in the Karaite synagogue at Cairo. See M. Weissmann in the Heb. weekly Hamaggid i. (1857), Nos. 47, 48, 50, ii. 16; Jacob Sappir, אבן ספיר, Lyck, 1866, fol. 14; on the other side Ad. Neubauer in Studia Biblica, iii. (Oxford, 1891) pp. 25-27.—

(b) Bible written by ḥatam בן ḥatam; the vowel points, the accents, and the mas(s)ora are added, according to an epigraph, by Aaron ben Asher. It is now in the possession of the Jewish community at Aleppo. See Sappir, fol. 12, 13, 17-20; Strack, Prolegomena, pp. 44-46, and in Baer-Strack, Die Dikduks ha-Tamim des Ahron ben Moscheh ben Ascher, Leipzig, 1879, pp. ix-xiv. W. Wickes (Treatise on the accentuation of the twenty-one so-called prose-books of the OT, Oxford, 1887, p. ix) contends that this epigraph 'is a fabrication, merely introduced to enhance the value' of the codex. The present writer is still doubtful whether Wickes is right. Ginsburg (Introd. p. 242) does not call in question the credibility of the epigraph.—(c) St. Petersburg Bible written at Cairo in the year 1009 by Samuel ben Jacob, who declares that he copied the codex of Aaron ben Asher. See Harkavy-Strack, Catalogue, pp. 263-274. Wickes (l.c.) says, indeed, that the codex 'is much younger,' but the present writer feels certain that he is wrong. Ginsburg, too, believes in the trustworthiness of the epigraphs.—(d) Prophetarum posteriorum codex Babylonicus Petropolitani [B3], edidit H. L. Strack, Leipzig, 1876 (449 and 37 pp.), fol. max., written A.D. 916. Regarding the readings of this MS see Ginsburg, Introd. pp. 215-230, 439-441, 475 f.

D. The age of many MSS is much controverted. Cod. Brit. Mus. Add. 4708 (Latter Prophets) was assigned by the late Dr. M. Margoliouth to the 6th cent.; Mor. Heidenheim judged that it might have been written between the 6th and the 8th cent.; B. Kennicott (cod. 126) ascribed it to the beginning of the 15th century. Ginsburg says: 'The writing is such as we meet with in the Sephardic codices of the 12th and 13th centuries,' and, so far as the present writer can judge without having examined the MS for himself, Ginsburg is right. || The Bible Cambridge 12 bears the date '7 Adar, 616,' i.e. 18th Feb. 856 A.D. We wonder that so sagacious and learned a scholar as the late S. M. Schiller-Szinessy accepted this date as correct (see his Catalogue, p. 13). Cf. L. Zunz, Zur Gesch. u. Literatur, Berlin, 1845, p. 214 f.; Ad. Neubauer in Studia Biblica, iii. pp. 27-36.

The number of unquestionably genuine ancient epigraphs in Bible MS is not large. At Tzufutkale the present writer in 1874 noted the following, which emanate from the writers of the MSS themselves: 922 A.D.=1234 Seleuc., cod. 34, Moses ben Naphtali, known as a contemporary of Aaron ben Asher; 930 A.D.=1241 Seleuc., cod. 35/36, Salomo ben ḥatam, mas(s)ora written by Ephraim ben ḥatam; 943 A.D.=4703 of the Creation, cod. 39, Isaak ben Jochai; 952 A.D.=4712 of the Creation, cod. 40, Joseph ben Daniel; 961 A.D.=4721 of the Creation, cod. 41; 989 A.D.=1300 Seleuc., cod. 43, Joseph ben Jacob; 991 A.D.=4754 of the Creation, cod. 44, Moses ben Hillel; 1051 A.D.=4811 of the Creation, cod. 11, Moses (?) ben Anan.—Unfortunately, the Karaite Abraham Firkowitsch (both in his first collections and in the latest just mentioned, which since 1875 has likewise been in St. Petersburg) either himself wrote entirely a great many epigraphs, or falsified them by altering dates and names. For instance, in cod. Tzufut. 11 he changed 4811 of the Creation into 4411=651 A.D.!

Much fresh information is to be hoped for from the treasures of the Genizah of Old Cairo brought by S. Schechter to Cambridge; see the description of the Genizah by E. N. Adler in the JQR, 1897, p. 669 ff.

E. Why is the number of ancient MSS of the Heb. OT so small? Why have we no MSS as old as those of the NT, the LXX, and the Peshitta? The reasons are: (1) Not a few Bible MSS, especially Pentateuch rolls, were destroyed by fanatical Christians during the persecutions of the Jews in the Middle Ages, particularly in the time of the Crusades. (2) A much larger number, however, of MSS were destroyed by the Jews themselves by means of the genizah (מקום). Already the Talmud (Megilla, 26b) tells of how a worm-eaten Pentateuch roll is buried beside the corpse of a sage; cf. Shulhan 'Arukh, Joreh De'ah, 282, § 10. This custom was later extended to all Heb. MSS of Biblical and non-Biblical texts, frequently, indeed, with the modification that a room, generally a cellar, in the synagogue was devoted to their concealment. To the dryness of the Egyptian climate we owe the abundance of the material which, as was mentioned above, has been found in the synagogue of Old Cairo. But it was not only such MSS as had been damaged by the tooth of time, by fire, by water, or by constant use, that were deposited in the genizah; further, all Torah rolls that contained more than three mistakes in a column had to be concealed (see Talm. Menahoth, 29b; Shulhan 'Arukh, Joreh De'ah, 279). This rule partly explains how the MSS that have come down to us represent in the main one and the same text. Codices which deviated from the text of the recognized naḥdāntim and the mas(s)oretic principles were considered 'incorrect,' and were consigned to the genizah. A very notable instance of this is the codex of 916 A.D. found by Abr. Firkowitsch (cf. A. Firk., אבן ספיר, Wilna, 1872, p. 12, No. 29). Hence the present writer is unable to adopt the view of J. Olshausen, P. de Lagarde, and most moderns, that all Heb. MSS go back to a single standard copy (cf. also his discussion in G. A. Kohut's Semitic Studies, Berlin, 1897, pp. 563-571).

iii. THE WORK OF THE MA(S)SORETES.—Whence comes the text of our extant MSS? In all essentials, of course, from older MSS. But there is no doubt that all copyists meant to work לפי תורתם (cf. לפי תורתם), and to derive from the post-Biblical verb סר 'hand down.' The older form of writing it, however, is סר. This word is taken from Ezk 20²⁷ (where it signifies 'binding', from the root סר), but in post-Biblical usage it assumed quite a different sense (as סר of Is 41²³ 45¹¹ means in New Heb.

not 'coming things' but 'letters'). סר in New Heb. means primarily 'tradition', e.g. Mishna, Shekalim, vi. 1; hence the derivation from סר (Aboth, i. 1) might be per se admissible, and even the pronunciation סר, the oldest witnesses, as has been said, are in favour of סר. In the next place, סר stands for the tradition relating to the interpretation of Scripture. R. Akiba says (Aboth, iii. 13), 'Masoreth is a fence to Torah,' i.e. the prescriptions of the oral Law make transgression of the written Law difficult. Further, however, the word Masoreth was applied to the tradition relating to the Bible text, and those who busied themselves with this tradition were called סורסות, or Ma(s)soreses.

B. The 24 books of the OT were considered, at all events as early as the 1st cent. of the Christian era, as holy (see Jos. c. Apion. i. 8 [cf. *PRE*² vii. 427 f. = ix. 751 f.]). It was an object to preserve the text of these books, in particular and above all that of the Pentateuch, and its traditional understanding for coming generations. This was accomplished first by attention to the consonantal text.

(a) Conscientious care on the part of the copyists was ensured by numerous rules about the writing out of Bible codices, especially of synagogue rolls (cf. above, ii. G).

(b) They counted the verses and the words of each of the 24 books and of many sections; they reckoned which was the middle verse and the middle word of each book; nay, they counted the letters both of particular sections and even of whole books. The Talmud, Kiddushin, 30a, says: 'The ancients were called Sopherim because they counted ספר 'to count' all the letters in the Torah. They said: Waw in נח Lv 11⁴³ is the middle letter in the Torah; ו in ורש Lv 10¹⁶ is the middle word; ו in ורש Lv 13³⁵ is the middle verse; Ayin in ורש Ps 80¹⁴ is the middle letter in the Psalms, and ו in ורש Ps 78³⁸ is the middle verse.' R. Joseph asked: 'To which side does waw in 'gahon' belong? Answer: Let us bring a Torah, and I will count. Surely, Rabba bar bar Hanna has said that they did not go away until they had brought a Torah and counted' (cf. Morinus, Exercitationes biblicae, Paris, 1669, p. 442). They counted also the frequency of the occurrence of words, phrases, or forms, both in the whole Bible and in parts of it. Shabbath, 49b: 'As the sages sat together, the question was raised, To what do the 39 principal works that are forbidden on the Sabbath day correspond? Hanina b. Hama said: To the [39] works at the building of the tabernacle; Jonathan b. Eleazar said in name of Simeon b. Jose: They correspond to the 39 occurrences of the word למנוח in the Torah. Then Rab Joseph asked, Does Gn 39¹¹ belong to the number or not? Abaji replied, Let him bring a Lawbook and count.'

(c) They collected notabilia into groups, and thus not only helped the recollection of these, but also facilitated the control of the MSS. For instance, 8 words written with final waw are read with he (cod. 916 A.D., Jer 2²⁴); 14 words written with final he are read with waw (cod. 916 A.D., Ezk 37²²). There is a great fondness for anything alphabetical; e.g. we have an alphabetical list of words which occur only twice in the OT—once with and once without waw at the beginning: ו in ורש 1 S 1⁹ and ורש Gn 27¹⁹ etc. (cod. 916 A.D., Jer 10¹⁹).

(d) The scriptio plena and scriptio defectiva and other peculiarities of the traditional text were very often noted in the Haggadā (esp. in the Midrashim), and not seldom also in the Halākhā. These notes serve on the one hand as a proof that the form of writing remarked on was actually received from tradition; and on the other hand they helped to ensure that this particular form was retained in the Bible codices. For instance, in Gn 23¹⁶ the name Ephron is written the first time עפרון (plene) and the second time עפרן (defective). On this the midrash Gen. rabba 58 remarks: 'Pr 28²² "He that hath an evil eye hasteth to be rich, and considereth not that poverty shall come upon him"; that is Ephron who wished to get possession of the riches of the just one, but afterwards he came into poverty.' In Hag 1⁸ Kethibh has אכר, Kere אכרה. Talmud, Yoma, 21b asks: 'Why is ה not written? Answer: Because five [ה as numerical sign=5] things which were present in the first temple were wanting in the second, the ark of the covenant with kapporeth and cherubim, the holy fire, the Divine gracious presence (Shekinah), the Holy Spirit, and the Urin and Thummim.'

C. By means of the invention of punctuation (vowel signs and accents) between the 6th and 8th cent. it was sought to ensure the preservation of the traditional pronunciation; perhaps there was also the intention of lightening the task of learners of the language. Unfortunately, we are without precise details as to the history of this invention; the only point that is practically certain is that Syriac influence must be assumed. (In Syr. a point above the letter indicates the fuller, stronger pronunciation; a point under it the finer, weaker vocalization or even the absence of a vowel). Attention to these signs involved a large addition to the studies of the later Ma(s)soretes. For instance, 18 words beginning with lamed occur twice—in the one instance with shewa (or hirek with following shewa), in the other with pathah (cod. 916 A.D., Is 8³⁰); alphabet of words ending in q which occur once (cod. 916 A.D., Is 34¹²).

D. Two systems of punctuation are completely known to us: (a) that employed in most MSS and in all printed editions, the so-called Tiberian, named from the city of Tiberias, where the study of the Ma(s)sora flourished for centuries. This system has special accents for the three books, Psalms, Proverbs, and Job.—(b) the supralinear punctuation, so named because all the vowel signs are placed over the consonants; it was in use, alongside of the Tiberian system, among a portion of the Jews of Babylonia (hence its usual designation, 'Babylonian punctuation') and Yemen (in Yemen till the 18th cent.). The signs for the principal vowels a, u, i are formed from the matres lectionis א, ו, י; the disjunctive accents have mostly the form of the letter with which their name begins: e.g. זקף zakeph, טרחא tarha. The accentual system is certainly dependent upon the Tiberian; the vowel system, too, gives the impression, at least to the present writer, of less originality. The most important MS in which this system is employed is cod. Proph. post. Bab.-Petropol. 916 A.D.—The simple supralinear punctuation system adopted in many later Yemen codices is derived from the complicated system of cod. Petropol. 916 A.D. (G. Margolionth, it is true, is of the opposite opinion).—(c) M. Friedländer describes 'A third system of symbols for the Heb. vowels and accents' in JQR, 1895, pp. 564–567. (In two fragments of Bible text found lately in Egypt and acquired by the Bodleian Library; see Neubauer's Catalogue, No. 2604, xi., and 2608, i.). Cf. C. Levis in AJS xv. 157–164, and P. Kahle in ZATW xxi. (1901) pp. 273–317.

E. As the very name indicates, it was not the aim of the Ma(s)soretes to give anything new, but to preserve for future generations the Bible text exactly as it had come down to them, and this in regard not only to the consonantal text but also to its pronunciation. 'Tendency' of any kind was foreign to them. Instead of הילל in Is 14¹³ we should certainly read הילל, but the former pronunciation is proved by Aquila and the Peshitta to have been in use before the punctuation. The name of the well-known Canaanite god can hardly have been Molekh, but Melekh; but already LXX, Aq., Symm., Theod. have Μόλχ=MT מלך.

F. The distinction between Ma(s)soretes and punctuators is no absolute one. The Ma(s)sora, as is shown by cod. 916 A.D., was complete before the end of the 9th century. Aaron b. Moses b. Asher, 'the great teacher' (הרב אשר הגדול), whose activity fell within the first third of the 10th cent., enjoyed already in his lifetime a great reputation, and as early as the year 989 the Bible codex supplied by him with punctuation and Ma(s)sora was regarded as the model codex and as authoritative. This is the judgment, too, of the writer of the St. Petersburg Bible MS B19a (1009 A.D.), Moses Maimonides, of David Kimhi and of the later Jews. Aaron ben Asher himself had a rival in Moses b. David b. Naphtali, whose views were different not only regarding many minutiae of punctuation (daghesh, metheg, accents), but even, at least in some passages, regarding the consonantal text (see Ginsburg, Introd. pp. 241–286). In like manner there were not a few differences amongst the older Ma(s)soretes. The tradition about the text was not a uniform one, and it must be acknowledged that there were different schools of Ma(s)soretes. According to the readings of the codices employed as standards must have been the different indications in the Ma(s)soretic rubrics; and S. Baer is not justified when, in the case of two statements that differ, he simply as a rule pronounces one to be wrong and corrects it from the other.

G. The content of the Ma(s)sora was collected into special books or reproduced in Bible MSS. Of those collections the best known is the book which is named from its opening words אקלה ואקלה (ed. Frensdorff, Hanover, 1864); cf. Ginsburg, Introd. p. 464. In the MSS the detailed statements of the Ma(s)sora magna, varying indeed greatly in extent, according to the inclination or the ability of the scribe, are found on the top and bottom margins, some at the end of a codex or a book, only a few at the beginning. For the fullest collection of such material we are indebted to Ch. D. Ginsburg.

iv. EARLIER TRACES OF THE HEB. TEXT OF THE OT.—The work of the Ma(s)soretes was ended (see above, iii. F) at the latest in the 9th cent., and lies before us in this form in the St. Petersburg codex of the Latter Prophets, 916 A.D., and in other MSS. What other means have we now of ascertaining what was the form of text in earlier times?

A. On the margins of many codices, sometimes also at the end, there are notices of differences between various authorities, and of readings found in MSS that are now lost. From these notices we gather, for instance, that the Jews of the West (ספרד), i.e. Palestine, differed from those of the East (אשכנז, בבל), i.e. Babylonia, even in regard to their Bible text. This difference, moreover, concerned not only the Prophets and the Hagiographa, but also the Pentateuch, not only the consonants, but also the punctuation; cf. Ginsburg, Introd. pp. 197-240. The Eastern Madn'ha'e were not always at one among themselves; the views of the scholars of Šura differed on not a few questions from those of the scholars of Neharde'a. Cf. Strack, 'Ueber verloren gegangene Handschriften des AT' in Geo. Al. Kohut, Semitic Studies, Berlin, 1897, pp. 560-572.

B. The quotations in the Talmuds and the oldest Midrashim. The present writer has called attention to the importance of these quotations in his Prolegomena critica in VT Heb., Leipzig, 1873, pp. 59-111, esp. p. 94 ff. A prerequisite, which has not yet been supplied, for such investigations is critical editions of the Jewish literature just named.

C. As to the activity of the Šopherim (γραμμαρῆς), i.e. those students of the Law who preceded the Ma(s)orettes, and laboured during the last centuries B.C. and at the beginning of the Christian era, we have, unfortunately, only very scanty information. The principal passage is Talmud, Nedarim, 37b, 38a: 'A law given to Moses on Sinai (i.e. a very ancient tradition) is the following: כִּסְמִי כִסְמִי, the pronunciation fixed by the Šopherim, e.g. שָׁמַיִם shamayim, accented on the penult; כִּסְמִי, the cancelling [of שָׁמַיִם] by the Šopherim before גִּן Gn 18²⁴, Nu 31³, Ps 68²⁸, and before שִׁשְׁבַּר Ps 36⁷; קָרָן וְלֹא קָרָן, words read which are not written in the text, e.g. קָרָן 2 S 8³, אִשׁ after 2 S 16²³, Jer 31³⁸, לֵךְ after יִי Jer 50²⁰, אֵל before לֵךְ Ru 2¹¹, אֵלֵי Ru 3¹⁷; קָרָן וְלֹא קָרָן, words written but cancelled in reading, e.g. אֵל after the second יִלְכֶּה 2 K 5¹⁸, אֵלֵי before הַצִּבּוֹת Jer 32¹, the second יִירָד Jer 51³, the second חָקֵק Ezk 48¹⁶, אֵל Ru 3¹².* This record does not give all the instances: there were many differences as to the presence or the absence of the waw conjunctive. There were more words read but not written, and written but not read; see Frensdorff, Okhlah we'okhlah, Nos. 97, 98; and Ginsburg, Massor. ii. p. 54 f. We learn from the above extract that the Šopherim were not simply copyists but revisers of the text.—A large part of their work consisted in removing everything which could give offence in any way to pious souls when the sacred texts were used in the course of public worship. Further, the Divine names, especially the Tetragrammaton, had to be protected against irreverent, and above all against frequent, utterance (see §§ v., vi., and Ginsburg, Introd. pp. 345-404).

It may be assumed as certain that the results of the common labours of the Šopherim in Jerusalem were utilized in the Bible codices that were prepared under their superintendence. These codices would then serve as the basis of future copies. When differences were remarked between MSS, especially those kept in the sanctuary, it was the custom to follow the majority; cf. Pal. Talm. Ta'anith, iv. fol. 68a [according to Šopherim, vi. 4, Resh Lakish is the author of the record]: 'Three codices of the Pent. were in the court of the temple. In Dt 33²⁷ one read שְׁמֶן, two סֶמֶן; they accepted the text of the two, and rejected that of the one. In Ex 24⁶ one read וְעָשִׂי, two וְעָרִי; they accepted the text of the two, and rejected that of the one. In one codex הָיָא was written nine times, in two eleven times; they accepted the text of the two, and rejected that of the one.' (וְעָשִׂי was, according to Talm. Meg. 9a, one of the alterations made by the seventy-two elders in translating the Pentateuch into Greek. הָיָא, as is well known, is written in the Pentateuch for both masculine and feminine gender; הָיָא occurs in MT of the Pentateuch only eleven times).

v. THE IMPORTANCE OF THE OLD VERSIONS.—As really old MSS of the Heb. OT are not available (ii. C-E), the ancient Versions have been examined in order to discover the character of the text at a period earlier than that for which the MSS and the Mas(s)ora give their evidence. On these Versions see the separate articles in the present work. Here it may be generally remarked that an exhaustive use of these aids is impossible so long as we are without critical editions. Such editions we do not as yet possess, whether of the LXX, the Targums, the Peshitta, or the work of Jerome.

Of all the Versions the most important for our purpose is the Alexandrian, i.e. the LXX (see the Literature in Strack's Einleit. in das AT, § 87, and art. SEPTUAGINT above). Although, as has been just remarked, a critical edition is not yet in existence (for Dr. Swete gives only the text of cod. B with the variants of the oldest uncials), this much can be affirmed with certainty that the Heb. text which was the basis of the Alex. translation frequently differed from the MT. But from the circumstance of this difference it by no means follows that the Heb. text used for the LXX was a better one than the MT. (This assumption is a capital error in the painstaking work of A. W. Streane on Jeremiah). Owing to the variety of translators, a special examination is required for every part of the OT. The LXX is of most use for the recovery of the Heb. text in the books of Samuel, Ezekiel, and partially Kings. For instance, in 1 S 8¹⁵, where MT has בְּחִירִים, LXX has rightly τὰ βουκόλια ὁμῶν, i.e. בקִּירִים. But in many passages the text was corrupt even prior to the LXX: for example, 1 S 6¹⁹ '50070' and 2 S 15⁷ '40.'

The Hebrew exemplars from which the Alexandrian translators worked had, at least in most of the books, the scriptio continua; that is, there was no separation of the words: for example, 1 Ch 17¹⁰ אֵלֵי וְאֵלֵי appears in LXX as καὶ αὐτῶν σε = וְאֵלֵיךָ; Pr 2⁷ חֵן וְחֵן, LXX ἡ τοπὴν αὐτῶν; 18² אֵלֵי, LXX εἰς βάθος αὐτῶν (cf. Driver, Notes on Heb. text of Sam. p. xxx f.; Ginsburg, Introd. 158-162).—The matres lectionis were less frequently employed than is now the case in the MT (cf. Driver, l.c. pp. xxxii-xxxiv; Ginsburg, l.c. pp. 137-157.—It is uncertain whether any, or how many, MSS with the old Heb. (Canaanite) script were used by the Alex. translators, and hence whether deviations from the present MT may be explained by interchange of letters which resemble each other in the old form of writing (cf. Ginsburg, Introd. pp. 291-296; A. J. Baumgartner, L'état du texte du livre des Proverbes, Leipzig, 1890, pp. 272-282).

Of the revising activity of the Šopherim many traces are to be discovered from the LXX, a circumstance which shows that this activity had commenced long before. Ish-baal the son of Saul is called in the LXX Ἰεσβασθε, as in MT אִישׁ בָּאָה (see vol. ii. 501 f.). The most of the emendations of the Šopherim (חֲקֵן כִּסְמִי) are found also in the LXX, e.g. Jer 2¹¹ כְּבֹרֵי קֶרֶן דֹּבְשָׁן אֶרֶץ כְּבֹרֵי; but in two passages at least the ancient text is preserved: 1 S 13³ בְּקִלְיִם לֶחֶם, LXX κακολογούντες θεῶν, i.e. אֱלֹהִים בָּ, and Job 7⁹ קֶלֶן, LXX ἐπὶ σολ, i.e. קֶלֶן.

vi. OBSERVATIONS ON THE HISTORY OF THE TEXT OF THE OT.—What means have we of getting back to still earlier times?

A. Comparison of parallel passages. Historical:

* It is worth while to remark that at least two of these examples give the Eastern readings, namely, Ru 2¹¹ אֵלֵי before לֵךְ read but not written, and Jer 32¹ אֵלֵי before הַצִּבּוֹת written but not read.

Gn 5, etc. and 1 Ch 1; 2 S 23^{ss}. and 1 Ch 11; Sam., Kings passim, and Chron.; 2 K 18¹³⁻²⁰ and Is 36-39; 2 K 24¹⁸⁻²⁵ and Jer 52. Legislative: Ex 20 and Dt 5 (the Decalogue); Lv 11^{ss}. = Dt 14^{ss}. Poetical: 2 S 22=Ps 18; Ps 105. 96. 106 and 1 Ch 16^{ss}.; Ps 14 and 53; Ps 40^{13ss}. and 70^{1ss}.; Ps 57^{1ss}. and 108^{1ss}.; Ps 60^{ss}. and 108^{ss}. Prophetic: Is 2²⁻⁴ and Mic 4¹⁻³; Ob 1-9 and Jer 49^{1ss}. Some of the differences which show themselves between parallel passages may be explained by the assumption that they are due to an intention on the part of a later author or redactor (even if this intention was based on nothing more than the principle of variatio delectat). To intention, for instance, must be ascribed the deviations of the Deuteronic Decalogue from Ex 20. Intention, too, explains the diversity of construction of the word אֱלֹהִים 'God,' which is plur. in Ex 32⁴. אֱלֹהִים but sing. in Neh 9¹⁸ (אֱלֹהֵינוּ), and so 2 S 7²³ אֱלֹהֵינוּ, but 1 Ch 17²¹ אֱלֹהֵינוּ. It is very remarkable that the revising activity of the Sopherim is less manifest in Chronicles than in the books that were earlier accepted as canonical. One of David's sons is called in 2 S 5¹⁶ מִנְחֵם, LXX Ἐλισάβετ, but in 1 Ch 14⁷ מִנְחֵם the original form of the name has been preserved (cf. מִנְחֵם of 2 S 2²¹ al. with מִנְחֵם of 1 Ch 8³³ al.).—In many instances, however, we must assume an error in the tradition: Gn 10³.⁴ Riphath and Dodanim, 1 Ch 1 Diphath and Rodanim; 1 K 5⁶ [Eng. 4²³] '40,000,' but 2 Ch 9²⁵ '4000'; 1 K 7²⁸ '2000,' but 2 Ch 4⁵ '3000'; 1 K 7²⁴ 'knops' (pēkā'im), but 2 Ch 4³ 'oxen' (bēkārīm). Both texts cannot be correct; the one or the other rests upon a mistake. Possible sources of error are: freaks of the eye or (in cases of dictation) the ear, wandering of the memory (e.g. the putting down of a synonymous word, cf. 2 S 22⁷ אֶבֶן and Ps 18 שֶׁבַע), false interpretation of abbreviations, or, conversely, failure to recognize the abbreviated form of words. All these sources of change and of error were of course at work also in those passages where, on account of the non-existence of a parallel passage, we cannot so readily recognize them.

B. Carrying the Heb. text, as it presently exists in the so-called square script, back to the ancient Heb. form of writing. It is natural to assume that, in connexion with the change of written characters, errors must have slipped in, whose discovery may be facilitated by restoring the old script. The art. ALPHABET (vol. i. p. 70 ff.) can now be supplemented and improved with the help of the admirable work of M. Lidzbarski, Handbuch des nordsemitischen Epigraphik, Weimar, 1898 (pp. 173-203, 'Die Schrift der nordsem. Inschriften').

C. We have seen that the text of the OT books has undergone not a few changes since their composition. We must be careful, however, not to exaggerate the importance of these changes. The circumstance that we are still in a position to analyze, in the main with perfect confidence, most sections of the Pentateuch, i.e. to separate from one another the sources from which these sections have been composed, is a convincing proof that even the sum of all the changes in question has been far smaller than one might be disposed to think, and far smaller than critics like Aug. Klostermann have held it to be.

i. INTRODUCTION: UNCERTAINTY ABOUT THE TEXT OF THE GREEK TESTAMENT.—For the general reader, as a rule, no question exists about the text of the book which he is reading. The copy in his hand is for him the work of the author. It is only under special circumstances that the question arises how far we may rely upon the text in our hands. Especially since the invention of the printing-press such circumstances have become much more rare, but they are far from having disappeared altogether. It may suffice to recall the obscurity in which the works of Shakespeare and the early editions of them are enveloped, or questions like that as to the origin of some Rubrics in the Prayer-Book.* But in the case of works composed at a time when their multiplication was possible only by means of copying, it requires little thought and experience to bring home this point with full force. It presses upon the mind with increased weight in the case of the NT, which was or is no 'book' at all, properly speaking, but a collection of writings, a great many of which were at the outset not destined for publication and multiplication. When St. Paul wrote his first letter to the Thessalonians he did not write it with the intention that it should or might be published afterwards, and consequently did not give it the form appropriate to such an object. Neither had he—or she, perhaps a poor slave or an old woman—who first copied it the intention of copying it for publication. Hence parts may have already been omitted which did not appear of importance, e.g. the address, or the date and subscription; sentences may have been abbreviated or expressions changed. It is similar with the Gospels. When the first collection of sayings of Jesus or the first narrative of His deeds was set down in writing, the next who copied it might feel inclined to enlarge it or to change any detail according to the form in which he had heard it, without any bad intention.

In spite of this situation of things, not only readers but even editors of the Greek Testament rested for a long time satisfied in the naïve belief that the next best, i.e. worst, text in their hands was the text of the NT. When Erasmus finished, on the 1st March 1516, the first edition of the Greek Testament sold in print, he put at the end: Finis Testamenti totius AD GRÆCAM VERITATEM vetustissimorumque Codicum Latinorum fidem ad probatissimorum authorum citationem et

* A most significant example in German literature has been investigated lately by Prof. Tschackert of Göttingen. What is the original text of the Confessio Augustana? It was handed to the emperor Charles v. on the afternoon of the 25th June 1530, in two copies, German and Latin. Both copies have disappeared. The Confession appeared in print as early as Sept. 1530, and two months later there was a semi-official publication of it by its author, Melancthon; but neither of these gave the original. Therefore Prof. Tschackert examined 35 manuscript copies, all dating from the year 1530, and nine of which once belonged to men who had subscribed the Confession. In an official document like this we expect now that all duplicates shall agree to the very letter. Yet, besides orthographical differences, Prof. Tschackert had to collect hundreds of variants, and the writer of the present article is convinced that the true text has not been restored by him in every case. In one case it concerns a quotation from the NT (Gal 19), where Prof. Tschackert, following his MS N, prints 'der sei verflucht,' 'let him be accursed,' while the present writer believes that the other MSS ARZ give the true reading, 'das sei verflucht,' i.e. 'let it be cursed.'

interpretationem ACCURATE recogniti, opera studioque D. Erasmi Roterodami. This ad Græcam veritatem does not mean only 'the Greek Original' or 'the original Greek' in contradistinction to the Latin translation, but was meant to include the idea of original correctness and integrity. Erasmus was convinced that he had (on the whole) edited the original Greek Testament. In like manner, it was no empty boast, but an expression of their full persuasion, when the Elzevir printers put in the preface of their edition of 1633 the words: textum ergo habes nunc ab omnibus receptum IN QUO NIHIL IMMUTATUM AUT CORRUPTUM DAMUS. For the following comparison with the faithful representation of ancient monuments and inscriptions shows that they were really persuaded that they had given the original text to their readers (qui, cum lapides ac monumenta antiquorum quidam venerentur ac religiose representant, multo magis chartas has ab origine θεοπνευστους vindicandas a mutatione ac corruptela indicamus). And yet the difference is clear. In the case of an ancient monument and inscription, the original is before our eyes, in our hands; in the case of literary works, we are removed from the original by thousands of years, and are brought into connexion with it only through a series of repeated copyings; and every fresh copy—perhaps even the first—was a source of errors, even when the copyists took all possible pains to be correct. We have already pointed out and accounted for the fact that in the case of the NT there was at first a period of textual laxity (cf. Westcott-Hort, §§ 6-14, 'Transmission by writing,' where it is shown how, even when the copyist has the intention of transcribing language (not sense), he, by mental action, passing from unconscious to conscious, may come to introduce free modification of language and even rearrangement of materials). A few examples may show to what differences copying gave rise—

What is the name of the tenth apostle in Mt 10?

|------------------------------------|---|
| (a) One set of our witnesses gives | Θαδδαιος. |
| (b) Another, | Λεββαιος. |
| (c) A third, combining (a + b), | Θαδδαιος & λεββηθις Λεββαιος. |
| (d) A fourth (b + a), | Λεββαιος & i. Θαδδαιος. |
| (e) A fifth, | Judas Zelotes. |
| (f) A sixth, | Judas the son of James. |
| (g) A seventh (= e + b + a), | Ἰουδας ὁ καλεσμενος Λεββαιος & λεββηθις Θαδδαιος. |
| (h) An eighth, | Thathesus Zelotis.* |

Or, what was the clothing of John the Baptist? According to Mk 16 'Camel's hair and a leathern girdle about his loins'? or only 'the skin of a camel' without a girdle (δερμιν περιεζων)? The latter is the reading of D, while the girdle is missing also in several Old Latin MSS.

How does the Apocalypse and the NT conclude? We have—leaving out such minor variations as the addition of 'Amen' or 'Amen, Amen,' or the grace 'of the Lord Jesus,' or 'our Lord Jesus,' or 'the Lord Jesus Christ,' or 'Christ' alone—the variations—

- (1) 'With the saints' (RV).
- (2) 'With all' (RVm).
- (3) 'With you all' (AV).
- (4) 'With us all.'
- (5) 'With all the saints.'
- (6) 'With all men.'†

* WH adopted (a) on the authority of MB 17, 124 c corb vg me the Hier. loc. (apparently), and adduced § 304 among the examples of important or interesting readings, attested by MB, but lost from the rest of all extant uncials; Tischendorf, on the contrary, preferred (b) on the strength of D 122 & Orig. Aug.—and so does Blass now—a reading which is by WH here and in Mk 8¹⁸ declared 'a Western corruption,' these being the only two places where either name occurs. (e) is a well-supported 'Old Latin' reading (a, b, h, found also in the Roman Chronography of 354, see art. THADDAEUS); (g) is found in 243 and the Apostolic Constitutions; (h) in the Rushworth Gospels, on which see JThSt, iii. p. 96.

† The third reading, 'with you all,' has no Gr. MS authority at all, but was retranslated by Erasmus from the Latin Vulgate because the only Gr. MS of Revelation which was at his disposal was defective at the end; it has been retained in the Lutheran Version even after its revision, while the RV replaced

On internal grounds it would be quite impossible to decide which is the true reading; how difficult a decision is on the basis of all arguments (witnesses and internal grounds) is shown by the difference between the latest editors.

For more examples it is sufficient to refer to the margins of the AV (Mt 11¹ 'Some read'; 26³⁶ 'Many Greek copies have'; Lk 10²² 'Many ancient copies add these words'; 17³⁶ 'This 36th verse is wanting in most of the Greek copies'; Jn 18¹³, Ac 25⁶ 'as some copies read'; 1 Co 15³¹, Eph 6¹², Ja 2¹⁸, 2 P 2⁹, 11, 2 Jn 9¹); but especially to those of the RV which are crowded with such remarks as 'Some (many) ancient authorities read (insert, omit, etc.)' from Mt 1¹⁸ down to Rev 22²¹. Cases like the Doxology of the Lord's Prayer, the close of the Second Gospel, the conna Johanneum (1 Jn 5⁷), will readily occur to the mind of the reader.

It is not possible here to count up all the ways in which errors may originate; every one who has to do with copying and printing has some testimony to bear regarding it. One of the commonest is, for instance, the so-called homoioteleuton, by which arise what our printers call 'match' or 'funeral,' whereby a passage is either written twice or totally omitted; the latter being, of course, the more dangerous case. By such an omission in the editions of Erasmus the words *χαρις*¹—*χαρις*² (Ja 4⁶) were wanting in the Bibles of Luther till 1568 or even longer. Another equally frequent source of error is the transposition of letters (especially where liquidæ are concerned) or of words. In Jn 8¹² six possibilities are represented in the position of the words: 'Jesus spake unto them'—

- (1) αὐτοῖς ἐλάλησεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς, EB,
- (2) αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἐλάλησεν, EF,
- (3) ἐλάλησεν αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς, D 1, 33,
- (4) ἐλάλησεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς αὐτοῖς, Cyril, iv. 484,
- (5) ὁ Ἰησοῦς αὐτοῖς ἐλάλησεν, TR,
- (6) ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἐλάλησεν αὐτοῖς, N²;

and a seventh, the combination of (1) and (4), is given by N* αὐτοῖς ἐλάλησεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς αὐτοῖς.

A third source is the addition of words which the copyist found missing; the subject, for instance, as 'God,' 'the Lord,' 'Jesus.' By such a (wrong) supposition, e.g., the text is explained which ascribes the Magnificat, Lk 1, to Mary instead of Elisabeth (see Introd. ad loc.).

In view of all the perils to which literary works like the NT have been exposed, it is really astonishing to find how much has been preserved, and, on the whole, how faithfully. And we willingly subscribe to the words of Bengel, placed at the end of the editio minor of the NT in the original Greek, which is at present the nearest approach to the goal, that of WH: Ipsa summa in libris omnibus salva est, ex Dei providentia: sed tamen illam ipsam providentiam non debemus eo allegare, ut a lima quam accuratissima deterreamus. But also the sequel will still hold good: Eorum, qui præcessere, neque defectum exagitantibus, neque ad eum nos adstringemus: eorum, qui sequuntur, profectum neque postulabimus in præsentibus, neque præcludemus in posterum: quælibet ætas pro sua facultate veritatem investigare et amplecti, fidelitatemque in minimis et maximis præstare debet.

ii. MATERIALS FOR RESTORATION OF THE TEXT.

—The means of arriving at the original text, and the rules for the application of these means, are of course the same for the NT as for other literary works of antiquity; only that for the NT we are in a much better situation than for most other works, as, for instance, the Greek and Latin classics, or the OT, owing to the abundance, variety, and comparative excellence of the documents at our disposal. These documents are: Manuscripts, Versions, Quotations. The colophon it by the first (and second). Also the fourth does not seem to have any MS authority, but to be, as Ed. Reuss styled it, pium correctoris aut typothetæ suspitium in a Basle edition of 1546, from which it passed over into the edition published in the same year and place by Melancthon, who mentions, however, immo in his Appendix (Introd. p. 159 is to be supplemented). With (5) compare the reading of D* (for 3) in He 13²⁶.

of the first edition of Erasmus, quoted above, mentions these three classes of documents.

1. Manuscripts (cf. WH, §§ 98-106).—The first place in the class of MSS would be held by those of the authors themselves if they were extant—the autographs. The possibility of their existence cannot be denied, seeing that we have documents written on papyrus, i.e. on the same writing material which was used in NT times, and from regions not far removed from the birthplace of the NT, of twice, almost three times the age which the autographs of the NT would have to-day (see art. WRITING, p. 950^b). But, as a matter of fact, the NT autographs have been lost. Already Irenæus appeals only to careful and old copies (ἐν πᾶσι τοῖς σπουδαίοις καὶ ἀρχαίοις ἀντιγράφοις), and the testimony of those who have themselves seen the author (καὶ μαρτυροῦντων αὐτῶν ἐκείνων τῶν κατ' ἐψὺν τὸν Ἰωάννην ἐυρακότων), and to internal evidence (καὶ τοῦ λόγου διδασκόντος ἡμᾶς).

On the style in which the autographs of the NT may have been written, and the whole question how we have to conceive of them, see Introd. p. 29 ff., and art. WRITING, p. 951. Of expressions referring to books and writing we have in the NT: βιβλίον, βιβλίον, βιβλίον (only in NT [Rev.], with the variant βιβλιδιον), μεμβράνη, χάρτιν, πάλαμος, μίλην, γράφειν, etc.

The hope which Bengel expressed with reference to the much disputed passage 1 Jn 5⁷ etiam atque etiam sperare licet, si non autographum Johanneum at alios vetustissimos graecos . . . in occultis divinae providentiae forulis latentes suo tempore productum iri, has been fulfilled lately in a way that could not have been expected at his time.

Erasmus (1516) had at his disposal for his first edition only one or two MSS, the oldest being of the 10th cent.: Stephen used for his Regia (1550), besides the printed edition of Ximenes, two uncials (DL) and 13 cursives. The London Polyglot (1657) was for the first time able to make use of the Codex Alexandrinus. More additions to the stock of witnesses were made by Mill (1707), Bengel (1734), especially Wetstein (1751); but of the two MSS which are now reckoned best, the Vaticanus was not yet accessible in a trustworthy form, and the Sinaiticus was not yet discovered.

Tischendorf knew in his 7th edition (the last which he fully completed) for the Gospel 52 uncial MSS or fragments of such, at the head of them the codex Sinaiticus, ascribed by him to the middle of the 4th cent.* When Gregory completed the Prolegomena to Tischendorf's editio octava, he counted for the Gospels alone about 25 uncials more; and in the most recent work on the subject, Gregory's German revision of the said Prolegomena (Textkritik des Neuen Testaments: Erster Band, 1900), he describes 97, promising the description of 4 more for the appendix. It is similar with the other parts of the NT. And while hitherto very few MSS had been known on papyrus (the writing material of Apostolic times), and none earlier than the age of Constantine, now several fragments on papyrus have been found recently, and two at least are assigned to the 3rd cent. (see WRITING, p. 952^c).

Of cursive or minuscule MSS (see on them art. WRITING, p. 954^a) about 3000 are now known, if we include the Lectionaries; and 2000, so it is estimated by Gregory, wait for description and classification. As a whole the cursive MSS are less valuable than the uncials, but several of them are very important, even more than uncials, because the text of a cursive MS, in spite of the recent date of the MS, may be much older than that of an uncial. It is impossible to give here a list either of the uncials or, still less, of the cursives; some of the former have been treated in separate articles, see A, ALEPH, B, C, D, L; we must refer to Tregelles' revision of Horne's Introduction (vol. i. 1856), Tischendorf-Gregory, Scrivener-Miller³, Gregory, i. (see Literature).

* Compare also the table in WH, § 19, showing the late date at which primary MSS have become available.

Special attention is due, though they have not received it hitherto, to the Lectionaries, i.e. the manuscripts of ecclesiastical lessons taken from the NT (WH, §§ 103, 104; Scrivener, i. 74 ff., 327 ff.; Gregory, Textkritik, i. 327 ff.). 'Comparatively few of them have as yet been collated. Some of these have been found to contain readings of sufficient value and interest to encourage further inquiry in what is as yet an almost unexplored region of textual history, but not to promise considerable assistance in the recovery of the apostolic text' (WH, l.c.). Liturgical books are always conservative, are official books, and can be localized with much more certainty than other MSS of the NT. Gregory is inclined to believe that the order of lessons read on Sundays originated perhaps as early as the first half of the 2nd cent., that for the Saturdays towards the end of the third quarter of this century, and that for the week-days towards the end of the same century (p. 337). In the Apostolic Constitutions, ii. 57, it is prescribed that, after the Lessons from the OT, are to be read the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles of Paul, and after this, by the deacon or presbyter, the Gospels of Matthew and John, Luke and Mark. No mention is here made at all of the Catholic Epistles and the Apocalypse. This is exactly the old Canon of the Syriac Church (see SYRIAC VERSIONS, p. 647). The redactor of the Constitutions knows, apparently, the First and Second Epistle of Peter, but he does not make use of James, 1-3 John, Jude, and Rev.; for the references to Ja 1^{6,7} and Rev 22^{14,19} (ed. Lag. p. 203, 10, 204, 9) must be changed into Didache, ch. 4, Dt 4² (see Zahn, Geschichte des Kanons, ii. 182 f.). Up to the present day no lessons from Rev. are found in the system of the Greek Church; and there seem to be preserved Lectionaries which even do not contain lessons from the Catholic Epistles either; see Apost. 65 (Scriv. = 68 Greg.), a MS in the possession of the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, iii. 25, though it may be only of the 14th cent. (according to Gregory; 12-13th acc. to Scrivener). A MS like this, which has preserved such an old system of lessons, is likely to contain also a text of ancient character. Up to the present, however, these MSS have not been examined on this point.

2. Similarly the second class of our documents has been enriched, namely, the ancient Versions.

See WH, §§ 107-122; art. VERSIONS, and the separate art. ARABIC, vol. i. p. 136; ARMENIAN, ib. 153; EGYPTIAN, ib. 668; ETHIOPIAN, ib. 741; LATIN, vol. iii. p. 47; SYRIAC, p. 645; VULGATE, p. 873.

The very first edition of the Gr. Test., the Complutensian Polyglot of Cardinal Ximenes (1514-17), placed side by side with the Greek Text the Latin Vulgate,* and even remodelled the former after the latter in various places (especially 1 Jn 5⁷; see art. SEPTUAGINT, p. 440^a). On Erasmus see above (p. 732^b). Beza (1519-1605) made a modest beginning with the use of Oriental Versions, publishing a triglot edition of the NT, 1569 fol., Greek, Latin, and Syriac, the latter edited by Immanuel Tremellius, and using for Acts and 1 and 2 Cor. an Arabic Version, put at his disposal by Franciscus Junius. These versions were presented in a convenient combination by the 'Polyglots', especially that of Walton, 1657 (Syriac, Ethiopic, Arabic, and, for the Gospels only, Persian). J. Fell (1675) took care to insert in his apparatus the Gothic and the Coptic, as versiones antiquissimas et a regionibus quae patet orbis maxime distantibus orientes. But the older of the Egyptian Versions, the Sahidic, was first mentioned in 1778, and edited in 1759; and of an older Syriac Version, only one, and this a mutilated MS, had been made known by Cureton as late as 1858, till the Syriac-Sinai palimpsest was discovered by Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson in 1892. F. C. Burkitt is inclined to ascribe the latter MS to the end of the 4th cent.; and there is no doubt that the version contained in it is in some way or other connected with the Diatessaron of Tatian, the pupil of Justin Martyr, i.e. a work of the third quarter of the 2nd century.

* On the Gr. MSS used by St. Jerome, see, besides the Epilogus of Wordsworth-White (pp. 663-671); E. Manganot, Rev. des Sciences Ecclésiastiques (Jan. 1900); J. H. Bernard, Hermetica (xi. No. xvii. 1901, 335-342).

3. The mention of Justin may lead to our third class of documents, the Quotations (cf. WH, §§ 123-126, 'Fathers'). The finds of the last century have greatly enriched this source (cf. Clem. ad Corinthios, Barnabas, Hermas, Aristides, Didache, etc.); and for those Fathers whose works had been previously known, but only in inadequate editions, trustworthy editions are now everywhere in the course of preparation or publication; cf. the Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum, edited by the Academy of Vienna (now more than 40 vols.), and Die Griechischen Christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte, to be published by the Academy of Berlin (up till now 7 volumes, including 3 of Origen).

For illustrations of how untrustworthy the printed editions have hitherto been, partly owing to the fault of the editors, see Introd. p. 145 ff., from Origen, Cyril, Cyprian; on Ephraem Syrus see F. C. Burkitt in Texts and Studies, vii. 2.

And yet the importance of the quotations is very great. Some of the Christian writings belong to the 1st cent.,* of most of which the date and birth-place are exactly known: thus they help us as landmarks for the fixing of texts handed down in MSS of unknown origin. Especially valuable are those passages in which the Fathers refer to the manuscripts in their hands (ἀντίγραφα, exemplaria, libri) and their variants, from Irenaeus downwards (see above, p. 734*), and it is strange that these passages are not yet collected and sifted.

Most welcome will be Sancti Irenaei Novum Testamentum, edited by W. Sanday, advertised as in preparation by the Oxford University Press; on Clement of Alexandria see P. M. Barnard (T. and St. v. 5, but only for Gospels and Acts); on Tertullian, Rönsch, Das Neue Testament Tertullians; see also Introd. p. 144 ff. From Augustine alone P. de Lagarde collected 29,540 quotations from the NT, together with 13,276 from the OT (now in the Library of Göttingen (MS Lagarde, 34)); Dean Burgon, with the help of several ladies, filled 16 thick volumes of quotations, which were acquired after his death by the Trustees of the British Museum. See Ed. Miller, Textual Commentary upon the Holy Gospels, i. i. pp. xii. 1, xx ff.

On the other hand, it is clear that all depends on the exactness with which the author has quoted his text. Amongst the earliest quotations we may reckon the use made in the NT itself by one writer of an earlier writing, for instance by Luke and Matthew of Mark, by Jude of 2 Peter, or vice versa.

4. Number of Variations increased by new materials.—Bewildering as this cloud of witnesses is, still more bewildering is the mass of variants presented by them. Already in the time of Mill the number of variations in the NT was estimated as 30,000. Scrivener reckoned in 1874 at least four times that quantity, Schaff (Companion, 1892) stated that now it cannot fall much short of 150,000, i.e. more variants than words, or, as the NT consists of 7959 verses, about 20 variants for every single verse. And yet every new document that comes to light increases them. Take so short a letter as that of Jude. The discovery of the codex Sinaiticus alone brought to light 9 readings not recorded before in Tischendorf's 7th ed., among them the addition of καὶ ζωῆς after σωτηρίας in v.², and the substitution of πάντων ψυχῶν for πάντας τοὺς ἀσθεβεῖς in v.¹⁵.

* 'There are perhaps as many as a hundred ecclesiastical writers older than the oldest extant codex of the NT; while between A. D. 500 and A. D. 600 (within which limits our five oldest MSS may be considered certainly to fall) there exist about two hundred Fathers more' (Dean Burgon, Last Twelve Verses of Mark, p. 21).

The first part of the Amherst Papyrus, published by Grenfell and Hunt, 1900, supplied the single verse He 1¹ written (along with Gn 11) in a small uncial hand of the late 3rd, or more probably early 4th cent., at the top of a papyrus leaf containing a letter from Rome. It furnishes the reading τοὺς πατέρας ἡμῶν not recorded before. In the same volume was published a single vellum leaf, dating apparently from about the 5th or 6th cent., containing Ac 211²² with lacunae; it furnished as singular readings v.¹² πρὸς τὸν ἄλλον; v.¹³ ἐχλεύαζον λίγους, the latter reading being practically that of D (ἐχλεύαζον λίγους), with which D had stood hitherto alone, instead of χλεύαζοντες (or διαχλεύαζοντες) ἅλως.* Even in the case of documents known from early times a fresh revision will enrich (or correct) the critical apparatus of our present editions. Cf., for instance, the notes of the present writer on cod. D in ZWTh, 1895, 157 ff., and the collation of this codex in NT Gr. Suppl. p. 66. The reading σαρακαλοῦμαι (proca. hist.) in Ac 211², not mentioned by Blass in 1895 (Gött.), has been received by him into his text in 1896 (Lips.). On certain readings of B see Introd. p. 289. On 1 P 11¹⁶ Tischendorf states that ΚΘ have ἐν γίγναται, in reality they have δὲ γίγν. etc. F. C. Burkitt was the first to make out, in 1899 (JThSt, i. 278), that the Old Latin MS k read in Mk 15³⁴ by its first hand maleficiis, corroborating thus ἀνιδεῖας of D. In regard to the Gothic translation of Ulfilas, Tischendorf does not mention the very curious reading managains, Jn 7¹⁰=turbæ, for ἱεδαῖας (see cod. f), and the fact that there are various readings on the margins, as καυχώμεθα 1 Co 13², ἀναγινώσκοντες Gal 4²¹, ἡμᾶς Eph 1¹⁰.

The same holds good of the Versions and of the Fathers, that a new revision will greatly enlarge or rectify the critical apparatus of our present editions. Cf. Mk 7⁷ συμα: ἀγαπᾶν D a b c; yet cf. Clem. of Alexandria, who is older than any of our MSS: ἐ μὲν γὰρ τοῖς χυλίοις ἀγαπᾶν λαοί (583); ἵσθι γὰρ καὶ ὁ λαὸς ὁ τοῖς χυλίοις ἀγαπᾶν (614). The use of ἀγαπᾶν is of course a reminiscence of Ps 78³⁶; see Clem. Strom. iv. 32 (Dind. ii. 334, l. 2, compared with 333, l. 27, where Ps 58¹¹ is a misprint for '78') ἀπὶ τοῦ ἀγαπᾶν L 2nd Clem. Rom.; but in Clem. ad Cor. i. 15 only cod. A has ἀγαπᾶν, cod. H ἀπὶ τοῦ. The reading βασιλῶν or βασιλῶν (cod. O) Mt 5²², in the Apostolic Constitutions, ii. 22; ἀρχαῖαν for πρότιν in Lk 15²², ib. ii. 41 (cf. κηρῶν in the Syriac translation of 1 Clem. ad Cor. 47 for ἀρχαῖας).

We leave out—for want of space—all variations concerned with the later additions to the text, as headings, summaries, numbering of sections, stichoi, quotations, miracles, Eusebian sections, notes on the voyages of Paul, noting of church lessons, etc.; though some of these particulars are of great importance for the history of the text, especially for the classification of MSS. Only by way of example we may mention that Tischendorf gives, for the inscription of the Epistle of Jude, eleven, and for its subscription twelve different forms; for the heading of the Apocalypse their number actually rises to eighteen. We confine ourselves strictly to the text.

If any of our readers is startled by this mass of variations, though it will no longer cause him dogmatical anxieties and heart-burnings as it did to J. A. Bengel in former times, he may console himself, in the first place, by observing that the variety is not nearly so great as it might have been, and as it actually is in a closely allied department, —that of the Apocryphal literature (Gospels, Acts, etc.).

Let us compare the statement of A. C. Headlam, on the Clementine literature (JThSt, iii. 48), and simply cast a glance at the very first item in Tischendorf's 2nd ed. of the Evangelia Apocrypha, the so-called 'Proteuangelium Jacobi.' Take as an example Tisch. 24, where the original text said that 'the chapters of the temple wailed and were rent from the top to the bottom' at the murder of the father of John the Baptist by Herod. One manuscript writes that the priests rent τὰ ἱμάτια αὐτῶν, another changes this into καὶ ἐθρήνησαν θρήνον μέγα.

We have nothing like this in the canonical NT. Even the greatest variations offered by D

* How common such variations are may be seen from Wis 11¹⁴, where the very same example occurs: ἀπὸ τοῦ χλεύαζοντες KAB, ἀπαιτῶντες ἐχλεύαζον C.

(in Luke and Acts, which have been called 'monstra potius quam variae lectiones') are tame compared with these. Nevertheless, we should be only too glad to have a thread of Ariadne to guide us through the labyrinth of NT criticism.

5. Rules of Textual Criticism.—To meet this want, the rules drawn up for literary criticism in general have been applied to the NT in particular. We can only touch on some of them. First of all, that of Bengel: proclivi scriptioni praestat ardua, which is commonly quoted in the shorter but less balanced form: difficilior lectio placet or difficilior lectio principatum tenet. Under this rule falls that of Griesbach: Brevior lectio praeferenda est verbosiori; also that which Wordsworth-White formulated (in the Oxford Latin NT): Vera lectio ad finem victoriam reportat [i.e. where a phrase occurs several times with variations, that reading is the true one which is attested at the later places: 'saepe enim scribere quod primo loco pro mendo habent, secundo pro vero agnoscunt'].^{*} But it is clear that these rules have a very limited application. Internal judgment is liable to much error, even if the textual critic has a special gift—and has developed it by practice—of divining what the author is likely to have written (intrinsic probability), and what a copyist is likely to have made him seem to have written (transcriptional probability).

Of greater importance is the external evidence, the MSS, Versions, Quotations. But here again some warnings are necessary. For instance, the rule of Sauppe: 'Do not overrate your Codex,' that which you may have discovered (as Tischendorf did with \aleph), or in which you are for some reason or other specially interested. Or the rule from the Ten Commandments for a philologist—we think they are by the late Professor A. Lehrs of Königsberg—'Thou shalt worship no Codices.' Or the saying: 'Common sense is older than any Codex'; or in Latin: 'Ratio et iudicium centum codicibus potiora.'

How are we to sift and judge the evidence? That it is not allowable to count the witnesses is now generally acknowledged; in theory, too, it is acknowledged that we have to distinguish between the age of the MS and that of its text; but in practice too great weight is still allowed to the oldest of our MSS. Neither is it sufficient to follow an eclectic course,† to decide each case by itself, to stop at the comparison of single readings. This is only the first step; and for this it is sufficient to take the most significant variations, i.e. (a) such as offer a considerable divergence of meaning with a small variation of form, whether it be brought about (a) accidentally or (b) by purpose; or (b) such as offer identity of meaning with great variation of form; or, finally (c), additions, omissions, and transpositions.

Such passages are, for instance, for (a) from Revelation ‡—

^{*} Cf. further: 'id verius, quod prius,' called by Dean Burgon an axiom which holds every bit as true in Textual Criticism as in Dogmatic Truth (Last Verses, 76).

† How dangerous an eclectic course is may be seen from the latest recension of the NT, that of B. Weiss, who reads in Lk 5² πλοῖμα δις (diminutive, and δις as second word), a reading which none of our witnesses offers—

\aleph D . . . δις πλοῖμα.
B . . . πλοῖμα δις.

Mk 3⁵ πωρῶσει, almost all.

νεκρώσει, D, old lat. syr^{dia}.

^{*} WH adduce for this reading also Clement of Alexandria, 614: ἔστι γὰρ καὶ ἡ λαλὴ ἡ τοῦ χιλιεῖν ἀπαύσις (see above, p. 735). ἔστι καὶ ἄλλας παραδείδας τὸ σῶμα, ἵνα καυχῶνται, 'for so the parallelism to τοῦ χιλιεῖν makes it necessary to read; the only extant MS has καυθίσονται.' As the passage is of primary importance, the present writer consulted the future editor of the works of Clement (for the Berlin edition), Dr. Stählin, who does not think this change justified, pointing to the preceding εἰς δι, which refers to a violent martyrdom. We may refer further to Clement, 588 ff., where Clement, after several references to 1 Co 13, mentions examples of heathen who endured the fire (Postumus, Anaxarchus), and goes on to say: μῖνι δὲ ἱλασθῆναι καὶ . . . τὴν παρὰ τὴν ὑπερίστην . . . τὰς θύρας ἀναστῆναι γίλιαις ἀδελφῶν αὐτῶν πρὸς τὸ σῶμα παραδόντα τοῖς τοῖς μόνον ἔχουσιν δυναμῖναι. Here there seems to be a reference to 1 Co 13³ as well as to Mt 10²⁸.

† Here, as in Lk 3²², 1 Co 13³, the decision of WH seems influenced by their predilection for \aleph B. To what is remarked (Introd. p. 324 ff.) on these two passages add the following: Whatever view may be taken of the relation of 2 Peter to Jude, it seems clear (1) that the reading must be the same in both Epistles, either ἀπάταις or ἀγάταις; the one Epistle quoting from the other—Peter from Jude, or Jude from Peter. (2) To the present writer, at least, it is clear that ἀπάταις is the true reading. The apparatus of Tischendorf is very misleading, as the translation of Jerome (cousins in Peter, opulus in Jude) testifies in both cases for ἀπάταις = diversions, pastimes. Cf. in Jude the reading εὐχαῖαι in cod. 66^b; Protev. Jacobi, 6. 1: διαλάττω αὐτῶν; 7. 2 (cod. L): εἰς πλάνην αὐτῶν = pseudo-Matthias 8. 4 ad solatium; Sir 1416 ἀπάτην τὴν ψυχῆς σου = 'let thy soul fare delicately' (Taylor, Heb. p. 316); Syriac 170 (lit. = τέρψις) for διακλινῶν in the Protevangelium. Bigg (Commentary, 1901, pp. 212, 282, 333) declares ἀγάταις in both places to be the right reading.

‡ Here WH remark: 'The smooth reading of A, etc., has every appearance of being a correction of the difficult double ἐλεᾶτε of \aleph and B . . . Some primitive error evidently affects the passage. Perhaps the first ἐλεᾶτε . . . is intrusive.' Cf., on this verse, the elaborate paper by R. A. Falconer in the Expositor, Sept. 1901; but note that the Didache, or, rather, the still older writing which forms the basis of the first part of the Didache, clearly testifies for ἐλεᾶτε. In the only extant MS of the Didache, it is true, εἰς μὴν ἐλεᾶται has fallen out, in its Latin text also ἀλλὰ οὐς μὴν ἐλεᾶται before it and πρὶ δὲ οὐ πρὸς αὐτῶν after it; but after the Apostolic Canons (Greek and Syriac) we must read in the Didache οὐ μόνον πάντα ἀνθρώπων, ἀλλὰ οὐς μὴν ἐλεᾶται <οὐς δὲ ἐλεᾶται>, πρὶ δὲ οὐ πρὸς αὐτῶν, οὐς δὲ ἀγαπῶσι ἰσὺ τὴν ψυχῆς σου. The passage seems one of the best examples of the value of quotations, and yet the latest commentator does not even quote it (Bigg), and Falconer declared that nothing can be made of the supposed reference in the Didache on the question whether there are three or two clauses in the verse.

It is sufficient to recall the doxology in the Lord's Prayer, the end of Mark, 1 Jn 5⁷.

Transpositions—

Jn 7³⁸⁻⁸¹ stands after Lk 21³⁸ in the closely-related MSS 13-69-124-346, the principal members of the so-called Ferrar group.

In Romans 'the great doxology' (16³⁵⁻³⁷) is found also after 14²³ in AP 5, 17, here alone in the 'Syrian' text (Greek, Gothic, and Syriac). On the inferences which may be drawn from this fact, see WH, Appendix, Lightfoot, Bibl. Ess. 287 ff., and Zahn, Einleitung, on the one hand, and on the other Fr. Spitta, Untersuch. über den Brief des Paulus an die Römer (Zur Gesch. und Litt. des Urchristentums, iii. 1, 1901). Textual criticism here passes over into higher criticism. Cf., further, B. W. Bacon, 'The Doxology at the end of Romans' (JBL xviii. 167-178).†

These examples show that, according to WH at least, κ and B, and especially the combination NB, have preserved in most cases the true reading. But WH came to this decision not on the basis of the intrinsic merits of these readings, but led by their important principle: Knowledge of documents should precede final judgment of readings (§ 38); and: All trustworthy restoration of corrupted texts is founded on the study of their history, that is, of the relations of descent or affinity which connect the several documents (§ 49). This is undoubtedly the true principle, and may be called the historical or genealogical method of textual criticism. It consists in the attempt to retrace the history of the text in the opposite direction from that which it has taken, i.e. from recent times backwards, step by step, if possible to the very original. In many cases (compare the Heb. OT

* To the witnesses for the omission of εἰκῇ is to be added the Didascalia as edited by Lagarde (p. 53²⁶); the Constitutions, ii. 53 (p. 79¹), ed. Lagarde, not mentioned in his Index; and the MS of the Didascalia published by Mrs. Gibson in the Studia Sinaitica, add εἰκῇ, p. 8.

† In a note at least we may touch on the question of Conjectural Emendation. There has been so much misuse of this art, that of late it has fallen somewhat into contempt; and, on the other hand, there are so many good documents for the NT at our disposal, that its place is very inconsiderable (WH, §§ 83-96); but to say that Conjectural Emendation must never be resorted to, even in passages of acknowledged difficulty (Scrivener, 4, ii. 244), or to say that it is not allowed 'prêter de l'esprit à l'Esprit saint' (Lagarde, Revue Biblique, 1900, 206), is to go too far. The reading εὐνοίας of the TR in Ja 4² seems to be a conjecture of Erasmus put forward in his second edition; ἀπορίμων, mentioned by WH among the suspected readings, is a conjecture of Nössel, approved by J. C. Vollgraff (de trivis locis interpolatis in Evangelio secundum Marcum, Mnemosyne, 1901, 148-161). When the present writer hit upon the reading ἰνι πόντος instead of ἰνι τῶν or ἰνι πόντος (Rev 18⁷), received into the text by Baljon, it was by mere conjecture, though it was confirmed afterwards by the reading super mare of Primasius (the confusion of πόντος and μένος is very common, see Eus. HE iv. 15, v. 15, 23). Baljon's edition gives a convenient collection of the conjectures of his countrymen. Fr. Blass received into the text of his Evangelium secundum Mattheum cum variae lectionis defectu (Lipsia, 1901) 7 conjectural emendations, marking them with a star (*): 7²² ἀρεταίαν, 16²³ ἵνα σου, 17²⁷ ἠρώ, 22²¹ ἵναι (for ἀνατάξαι), 23¹ ἵνα σου . . . ἱελλήν, 26²⁰ αἰρε for ἵνα σου, 27⁴⁰ ἀνατάξαι. VOL. IV.—47 and the Greek and Latin Classics) the scantiness of our materials does not allow of such a method; in the case of the NT it is, on the contrary, made difficult by the wealth of materials and the complicated character which this history must have had. And the great question of the textual criticism of the NT at present is, whether the study of its history led WH to correct conclusions. Only the principal results can be mentioned here: for all particulars see vol. ii. of their great edition, or the Appendix of their manual edition.

This study led them to recognize (1) that the text of Chrysostom and other Syrian Fathers of the 4th cent. is substantially identical with the common late text (§ 130). This text must be due to a 'recension' in the strict sense, with an elaborateness which implies deliberate criticism (§ 185). This part of their theory is very generally accepted, except by the defenders of the traditional text, like Burgon and Ed. Miller. But, further, WH believed themselves able to distinguish (2) an Alexandrian text, the chief characteristics of which are said to be temperate forms of incipient paraphrase and of skilful assimilation, with careful attention to language, and without bold paraphrase or interpolation from extraneous sources (§§ 181-184); (3) a Western text, not limited to the West, but widely used; not single and created at once, but various and progressive, with its two chief characteristics, boldness of paraphrase and readiness to adopt extraneous matter; represented, especially by codex D, Old Latin MSS, but also the Old Syriac (§§ 170-176); finally (4) the neutral and comparatively pure text, to be discovered, especially by comparison of κ and B, the ancestries of which WH believe to have been separate from a remote antiquity, so that an exceptional purity of text would be found in readings common to NB.*

§ 297: one of three alternatives must be true; either the respective ancestries of κ and B must have diverged from a common parent extremely near the apostolic autographs;

Or, if their concordant readings were really derived from a single not remote MS, that MS must itself have been of the very highest antiquity;

Or, lastly, such single not remote MS must have inherited its text from an ancestry which, at each of its stages, had enjoyed a singular immunity from corruption.

This is the most elaborate theory about the text of the NT put forward in the 19th cent. as the

* As examples of important or interesting readings attested by NB, but lost from the texts of all other extant uncials, WH quote (§ 304), e.g., Mt 5²² omission of εἰκῇ, 10³ ὁ ἀδελφός (see art. THADDEUS), 11¹⁹ ἵνα σου for τῶν σου, Mk 9²⁰ omission of καὶ περὶ αὐτοῦ, 16⁹⁻²⁰ omission, Eph 1¹ omission of ἰς Ἐξίον.

WH do not, of course, deny the presence of wrong readings in NB (see § 308), still less in κ or B, but they are slow to acknowledge them. Cf. their note on Mt 27⁴⁹, which is, to all appearance, an intrusion from the Gospel of John. 'Two suppositions alone are compatible with the whole evidence. First, the words may belong to the genuine text of the extant form of Mt. . . . Or, secondly, they may be a very early interpolation.' They are extant in NBCL, etc. WH included them within double brackets, but did not feel justified in removing them from the text altogether, and were not prepared to reject altogether the alternative supposition. Dean Burgon, on the other hand, Last Verses, p. 80: 'There does not exist in the whole compass of the NT a more monstrous instance of interpolation. . . in defiance of reason as well as of authority,' cf. pp. 313-318. Though the verse is not attested by Ephraem's Commentary on the Diatessaron or the Arabic revision of it, we see no reason why we should doubt the statement of the scholion that the sentence was present εἰς τὸ καὶ ἱστορεῖται ἐν ἐγγυλίων Διόδωρου, καὶ Τατιανῷ καὶ ἄλλοις διὰ τὸν ἅγιον τατίαν (cod. 72, where Διόδωρου may have arisen from διὰ δ', i.e. διὰ τατιανῶν). Comp., further, Mk 42¹ ἰδοὺ τὸν λυχνίαν, attested by *NB 13-69-316 33: 'the concurrence of four such documentary authorities, all independent, implies the highest antiquity, the number rendering accidental coincidence very unlikely.' To the four authorities quoted by WH is to be added a fifth, Σ, and just on that account it becomes more likely that the coincidence is accidental; comp. He 7¹ is, rejected in spite of NBCLD; 9² the addition of καὶ τὸ χρονον θυμιατοῦ in B and its omission in v. 4.

result of its study during thirty years. Fifteen years after its first publication the then surviving editor brought out a new edition with some Supplementary Notes, required by the discovery of fresh documents, especially the Syriac palimpsest from Sinai; at the same time declaring that no arguments had been advanced against their general principles which were not fully considered by themselves in the long course of their work, and, in their judgment, dealt with accurately. And in their Introduction itself it is declared (§ 105): 'Nothing can well be less probable than the discovery of cursive evidence sufficiently important to affect present conclusions in more than a handful of passages, much less to alter present interpretations of relations between the existing documents.' Again, in the concluding paragraphs on the 'Conditions of further improvement of the text' (371-374) they wrote: 'It would be an illusion to anticipate important changes of text from any acquisition of new documents,' and did not hesitate to express the conviction that no trustworthy improvement can be effected except in accordance with the leading principles of their method; further, 'that the general course of future criticism must be shaped by the happy circumstance that the fourth century has bequeathed to us two MSS, of which even the less incorrupt must have been of exceptional purity among its own contemporaries, and which rise into greater prominence of character the better the early history of that text becomes known.'

The present writer is not prepared to contradict these statements. Yet, on the other hand, it cannot be denied that there is a growing doubt whether the importance of the so-called Western variations has not been underrated and the purity of the text of NB overrated.* See, besides the contributions of Fr. Blass of Halle, the latest statement by C. H. Turner in JThSt, iii. 3, p. 111 f.: 'If the authority for the words of the Evangelists is to be sought primarily or even partially from the "Western" text, it must be admitted that a problem lies before us which, if it may well call forth all the energies of Christian scholars, will make heavy calls alike on their patience, their caution, and their courage.'†

The other question is whether WH estimated the testimony of NB correctly. What if NB or their ancestors were not separated from a remote antiquity, but one codex was influenced by the other? WH were inclined to believe that B was written at Rome, and that all its ancestors may have been there, while to N they ascribed an Egyptian origin. Tischendorf, on the other hand, believed he could demonstrate that one and the same copyist worked at both MSS. Quite recently the suggestion has been thrown out that B originated under the influence of Athanasius (Rahlfs, Nestle, Zahn), and is perhaps the very copy which was procured by Athanasius for Constans. If so, it is a question how an exceptional purity can have been handed down till that time. On the other hand, this fact would explain how B seems to have left no children; the private copy of an emperor would not be given out that other MSS might be copied from it; certainly not at first. It is at all events strange that no MS seems to have been found as yet which might be pronounced with certainty to have been copied from B.* In some books of the OT N and B have an almost identical text; in others they present us with quite different recensions; in the Book of Judges B contains a version not quoted by the Alexandrian Fathers from the 2nd to the 4th cent. (Clement, Origen, Didymus), but for the first time by Cyril, which therefore some scholars have been inclined to ascribe to Hesychius. In the NT it is easier, as Burgon stated, 'to find two consecutive verses in which the two MSS differ the one from the other, than two consecutive verses in which they entirely agree.' But this, instead of sensibly detracting from our opinion of the value of their evidence, as Burgon believed, on the contrary enhances it where they agree. It is intelligible that, as long as cod. B stood alone among extant MSS in the omission of Mk 16²⁰, scholars were slow to follow it; even after N had come to its support, Burgon was not justified, but might be excused for coming, after an investigation of more than 250 pages, to the conclusion 'that cod. B and cod. N must be henceforth allowed to be in one more serious particular untrustworthy and erring witnesses. They have been convicted, in fact, of bearing false witness in respect of St. Mark 16²⁰, where their evidence had been hitherto reckoned upon with the most undoubting confidence.'† But now, since F. C. Conybeare found in 1893 the Armenian manuscript which between v.⁸ and v.⁹ has the words 'Ariston eritzou,' i.e. of the 'Presbyter Arist[on]' (see the facsimile in Swete's Commentary and in Introd. pl. ix), and has preserved even the name of the man to whom (directly or indirectly) we owe the longer conclusion of the Second Gospel, no reasonable doubt is any longer possible. Therefore in this important case NB turn out to be our best witnesses among extant MSS. This awakens, of course, a strong prejudice in their favour. But what, on the other hand, about the 'Western non-interpolations'? and the other places where D alone seems to have preserved the original reading? See WH, §§ 240-242, 283. Certain apparently Western 'omissions' are shown by their internal character to be original, i.e. non-interpolations; that is to say, only those Western documents remained free from interpolations which found their way into all other documents. Their presence in

* The reading φανερών (He 12 for φαν), which is attested by Tischendorf only from B*,—a second hand changed it into φαν, a third restored it, and wrote on the margin ἀφανίσταται παλαιά, ἀπὸ τοῦ παλαιοῦ, καὶ μετακείνῃ,—has now been found in an Egyptian treatise (see J. A. Robinson, Texts and Studies, v. 5, p. x).

† It is a great drawback that our critical editions do not permit of an easy glance over the differences of these principal MSS: there is Hansell's edition (NT graece: Antiquissimorum codicum textus in ordinem parallelum dispositus; notae crit. et collationem Cod. Sinaitici adiecta Ed. H. Hansell, Oxonii, 3 vols., 1864, 524 sh.), and now that of Schjott (NT graece ad fidem testium vetustissimorum recognovit necnon variantes lectiones ex editionibus Elzeviriana et Tischendorfiana subjunxit, Hauniae, 1897).

† This conviction as regards B arose from the fact, first pointed out in its importance by Burgon, that the scribe of B, after ending the Gospel with v.⁸ in the second column of a page, has, contrary to his custom, left the third or remaining column blank, evidently because one or other of the two subsequent endings, and apparently the longer of the Textus Receptus, was known to him personally, while he did not find it in the exemplar which he was copying. That the same scribe, by retaining on the margin the sectional figures in the Epistles of Paul, has preserved for us the knowledge that the Epistle to the Hebrews had formerly a different position from what it has now in B, may be mentioned here with due thanks to him, and as proof how the smallest particulars may be of importance in textual criticism. That in the OT part one of the scribes was in the habit of using for the name Ιερουσαλ the abbreviation Ιεα, the other Ιερλ, enabled E. Abbott to recognize their different hands without even seeing the codex, while the Roman editors were not able to discern it from the handwriting which lay before them.

* Even Burgon speaks favourably of D, despite of its many 'monstra potius quam varia lectiones' (Last Twelve Verses of Mark, p. 20).

† There has just appeared the Prospectus of the great undertaking of Prof. H. von Soden of Berlin: Die Schriften des Neuen Testaments in ihrer ältesten erreichbaren Textgestalt hergestellt auf Grund ihrer Textgeschichte; Berlin, A. Duncker, 2 vols.—2328 Codices have been examined, 454 more than are mentioned by Gregory, with the result that the text of NB is held to be decidedly that of a recension, not the neutral or original, as WH believed. This forthcoming edition will henceforward form a new starting-point [24th March 1902].

even the best of these documents appeared to WH such an extraordinary phenomenon that they were led to the thought—worked out later by Blass—that ‘the Western and the non-Western texts started respectively from a first and a second edition of the Gospels, both conceivably apostolic.’ WH decided finally to leave them in the text, but to mark them by double brackets []. Apart from the singular addition to Mt 27⁴⁹ (see above, p. 737^b n.), these Western non-interpolations are all found in the last three chapters of Luke (22^{19c}, 24³, 5, 12, 36, 40, 51, 52).

Of other places where D alone (or nearly alone) seems to have preserved the original reading, B. Weiss mentions (Die vier Evangelien, pp. 48, 180) Mk 13²¹ the omission of ψευδύχριστοι καὶ, and the reading ποιήσουσιν for δώσουσιν; Lk 12²¹ πῶς οὐτε ἦθει οὐτε ὕψιναι, Mk 3¹⁴ etc.

In his Philologica sacra (1896) the present writer pointed out other passages of this kind, e.g. Mt 6⁸ πρὶν ὑμᾶς ἀνοῖξαι τὸ στόμα instead of αἰτῆσαι αὐτόν; 26⁷² δοιᾶζει for δῆλόν σε ποιᾶει; Lk 18³⁰ ἐπα-πλάσιονα, etc. Blass has received a great deal into his edition of St. Matthew (1901). And the great question of the day is the weight to be allowed to D. But it seems that new materials must come to light before a decision can be reached. In the meantime the task will be (1) to collate as many MSS, Versions, and Fathers as possible; (2) to collect all statements of the Fathers about what may be called editions or recensions of the NT; (3) to compare these statements with the results of our collations.

That Marcion edited a NT (Gospel of Luke and Epistles of Paul) is well known. Are traces of his work to be found in any existing MS or MSS? and, if so, in which? Of Tatian we know not only that he composed his Diatessaron, but also that he tampered with the text of Paul: τοῦ δὲ Ἀποστόλου, φασὶ, τολμήσαι τινὰς αὐτὸν μεταφράσαι φωνὰς ὡς ἐπι-διορθούμενον αὐτῶν τὴν τῆς φράσεως σύνταξιν (Eus. HE iv. 29). Has the Diatessaron left its traces in D or anywhere else? and what is the relation of the so-called Western text of the Pauline Epistles to Tatian? When the Epistle to the Philippians begins in D₂ etc.: Ἐγὼ μὲν εὐχαριστῶ τῷ κυρίῳ ἡμῶν (v.³) instead of Εὐχαριστῶ τῷ θεῷ μου; when FG will not allow a πορθεῖν but only a πολεμεῖν of the Church through Saul (Gal 1^{12, 22}), not a ζυμοῦν but a δολοῦν as the result of the leaven (1 Co 5⁶, Gal 5⁹), on which side is the ‘metaphrasis,’ and from whom did it proceed? Who were the ορθόδοξοι who took away (ἀφελαντο) a passage from the Gospel of Luke, so that it is found only ἐν τοῖς ἀδιορθώτοις ἀντιγράφοις, in the ‘uncensored copies’ according to Epiphanius (Ancor. 31)? See on Lk 19⁴¹.

What about the ‘Codices quos a Luciano et Hesychio nuncupatos paucorum hominum adserit perversa sententia, quibus utique nec in veteri testamento . . . nec in novo profuit emendasse, cum multarum gentium linguis scriptura ante translata doceat falsa esse quae addita (cod. E edita) sunt,’ according to Jerome’s preface to his Latin Gospels? What about the ‘Evangelia quae falsavit Hesychius apocrypha’ in the so-called Decretum Gelasii? to which some MSS add a similar statement about Lucian.

What about the 50 copies of the Bible which Eusebius procured by order of Constantine for the Churches (not of his ‘empire,’ correct Introd. p. 54, but) of his capital, which Eusebius sent off ἐν πολυ-τελὺς ἡσκημένοις τεύχεσι τρισσὰ καὶ τετρασσὰ? Does this mean that they were written in three or four columns or bound in three or four volumes? and still more, did they leave no traces at all? or is the Sinaiticus really one of them? What about the recension of the Pauline Epistles which was undertaken according to the subscription in cod. H,— its fragments are now dispersed in Athos, Kiev, Moscow (at two places), St. Petersburg,* Paris, and Turin,—and other testimonies by a certain Euthalius (or Euagrius) of Sulke? Basil the Great († 379) corrected a copy with his own hand: may it not be traced? His younger brother, Gregory of Nyssa, is the sole authority besides Marcion for that peculiar form of the second petition in the Lord’s Prayer: ἐλθέτω τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμά σου ἐφ’ ἡμᾶς καὶ καθαρῶς ἡμᾶς. How did this creep into the codex 604 (of the 12th cent., in the British Museum), which exhibits 2724 variations from the Textus Receptus and 270 readings peculiar to itself? Has the last word been spoken about the origin of the Ferrar group? Where are the accurate copies (ἐσπουδασμένα) or the ancient in Jerusalem to be sought for, deposited on the Holy Mount (ἐκ τῶν ἐν Ἱεροσολύμοις παλαιῶν ἀντιγράφων τῶν ἐν τῷ ἁγίῳ ὄρει ἀποκειμένων), with which, according to their subscription, cod. A and some cursives have been collated?

We might go on asking such questions,—and that these questions do not belong to those which a fool asks, and which no wise man answers, may be exemplified by the reading of the Ferrar group in Mt 1¹⁶ which WH, in their (first) edition did not find worth mentioning; and now there appears suddenly an old Syriac fragment from the far East, containing that reading, which was hitherto known only in some Latin witnesses from the far West, and in those four solitary Greek MSS written probably in Calabria towards the end of the Middle Ages,—a reading which seems to have some connexion with the very composition of the First Gospel.

‘Criticism,’ said Ph. Schaff, in his excellent Companion to the Greek Testament and the English Version (at the opening of the fifth chapter, which treats of the Nature and Object of Textual Criticism),—‘Criticism is a dry study.’ Dry? Surely we do not know a study of more interest. It requires, it is true, as the same writer said, ‘an unusual amount of patience and attention to the minutest details.’ Yes, but then it will be rewarded. ‘The smallest particle of gold,’ said Bengel, in the connexion from which Westcott-Hort took the word with which they closed their task, ‘is gold, but we must not allow that to pass as gold which has not been proved.’

‘Codices emendandis primitus debet invigilare sollertia eorum qui scripturas nosse desiderant, ut emendatis non emendati cedant,’ said Augustine (de Doctrina Christiana, ii. 14, 21). It is a satisfaction that in the same country in which and from which the British and Foreign Bible Society circulated, for almost a century, more than a hundred thousand copies of the Textus Receptus of Elzevir-Stephen-Erasmus, the most decided attempt has been made to fulfil the task imposed by these words of Augustine, to fulfil the command of one greater than Augustine,—the word of St. Paul, πάντα δοκιμάζετε, τὸ καλὸν κατέχετε (1 Th 5²¹), or of the Master Himself, though it is not recorded within the compass of our present New Testament: γίνεσθε δοκιμοὶ τραπεζίται.

† Justice must be done at least in a footnote to the edition (not mentioned by Scrivener or Nestle) of Ed. Harwood, Latin MSS have we a similar exactness in date. The result is, on the whole, a very thorough corroboration of the printed text; but this does not diminish our thankfulness for the new edition. For while hitherto we were not sure about the basis of the texts in our hands, we have now the firmest foundation. And there are not wanting passages where the printed text finds no witness in any of the MSS collated by Pusey-Gwilliam. They do not affect, so far as the present writer is yet aware, the Greek text, but only the Syriac wording; cf. Mt 5¹⁷ 6⁷ 7¹⁴. But we must first be sure of the Syriac text before we can proceed, and this end is reached by the edition of Pusey-Gwilliam, which, it is to be hoped, will give a new stimulus to studies concerning the text of the four Gospels.

If one word may be added about the best method to be pursued in these studies, it would seem best first to single out those sections which were contained in Tatian's Diatessaron, and to study their language, in all extant Syriac texts; then to compare their language with that of the rest of the Gospels. In this way it ought to be possible to get an answer to the fundamental question, whether Tatian made use of a pre-existing Syriac Version of the Gospels, or whether our Syriac Gospels are based on Tatian. To quote one example: all our Syriac texts (sin, cur, pesh, together with the Ethiopic Version and the Arabic Tatian) arrange the gifts of the Magi (Mt 2¹¹) in the order 'gold and myrrh and frankincense'; so also the Syriac translation of the Protevangelium Jacobi (21²). Epiphanius (p. 1085 D, where he reads ἡρώδης τὰς τήρας αὐτῶν, adding the strange statement ἡ τοῦ θησαυροῦ, ὡς ἔχει ἐν τῶν ἀντιγράφων), has the order 'myrrh and frankincense and gold.' Is the agreement in the Syriac (Arabic, Ethiopic) texts accidental, or does it go back ultimately to Tatian? EB. NESTLE.

THADDÆUS.—The name in Mt 10³ (AV 'Lebbæus, whose surname was Thaddæus'; RV only 'Thaddæus') and Mk 3¹⁸ of the apostle who is called by Luke (6¹⁶, Ac 1¹³) 'Judas of James.' In Matt. most critics now read only Θαδδαῖος (Lachmann, Tregelles, WH [who quote this reading, § 304, as proof for the unique excellence of NB], Revisers, Weiss, with NB sah vg; Evang. Ebionit.), others only Λεββαῖος (Alford, Tischendorf, Blass, with D 122 & Origen; 'Western' reading); the TR (AV) combined both readings, Λεββαῖος ὁ ἐπικληθεὶς Θαδδαῖος (cf. e.g. Constit. Apost. vi. 14, viii. 25, where in a marginal note the names are reversed: Θαδδαῖος ὁ καὶ Λεββαῖος ὁ ἐπικαλούμενος Ἰούδας Ζηλωτής); some Old Latin MSS, finally, have Judas Zelotes, a reading which found its way into the Chronicon of the year 354 and the Roman Canon of 382 ('Judas Zelotis apostoli epistula una').

See on the latter reading Zahn, Grundriss der Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanons, 1901, p. 60; Neue Kirchliche Zeitschrift, xii. (1901) p. 743; R. A. Lipsius, Die apokryphen Apostelgeschichten, Ergänzungsheft (1890), p. 209; and the passage of the Apostolic Constitutions quoted above (ed. Lagarde, p. 282; ed. Pitra, p. 59, note).

In Mark all editors agree in reading Θαδδαῖος, Λεββαῖος being again the 'Western' reading; in Luke one of the MSS collated by Wordsworth-White adds to Judam Jacobi on the margin 'i.e. Tadeus,' just as Luther added in Matt. to the Received Text the marginal note 'ist der fromme Judas.' This identification (Thaddæus = Lebbæus = Judas of James*) is indeed the most natural result of a comparison of the Gospels; cf. vol. ii. p. 199, artt. JUDAS, and JUDE (THE LORD'S BROTHER), and vol. iii. p. 92, art. LEBBÆUS. But whence this twofold or threefold name?*

* The same Judas is apparently meant in Jn 14²², though the Syrians identify this Judas with Thomas.

The solution has been sought in the linguistic identity of the name Lebbæus, from Heb. לב ² 'heart,' with Thaddæus, from Aram. ܬܕܐܝܐ = Heb. ܬܕܐܝܐ 'female breast'; so still, e.g., Sieffert (PRE vii. 277); Resch, Paralleltexte, iii. 827. But this is more than doubtful. There is more probability in the view adopted by WH, that Λεββαῖος or Λεββαῖος is some form for Levi,† caused by Mk 2¹⁴ 'Levi the son of Alphæus.' This is denied by Bengel ('Λεββαῖος non est idem, quod Levi'), but accepted by Nilles, Calendarium ecclesiæ utriusque, i. 184 (on 19th June): Ἰούδα ἀποστόλου. 'S. Judas, qui et Thaddæus et Levi et Zelotes,' etc. A similar view had been proposed already by Grotius on the ground of Origen, contra Celsum, i. 62 (ed. Koetschau, i. 113).‡ Grotius quoted further from Theodoret (Quæstiones ad Nu 16): Θαδδαῖος ὁ καὶ Λεββ. Dalman (Grammatik, p. 142) denies that Λεββαῖος has anything to do with Levi, and is more inclined to see in it an abbreviation from לבן or לב, or to combine it (Worte Jesu, p. 40) with a Nabatean name לבא. The other name ܬܕܐܝܐ (Erubin, 23c) he connects with the Gr. Θεὸς as an abbreviation from Theodotos, Theodosios, or Theodoros.§ The etymology of both names, Lebbæus and Thaddæus, is at present quite doubtful. The Jacobite Syrians vocalized Labbi and Thaddi, the Nestorians Labhaj and Thaddaj, Pusey-Gwilliam spell Labbi and Taddai.

Matters became even more complicated in the post-canonical literature. Eusebius (HE i. 12) states that Θαδδαῖος was one of the Seventy, and then tells the story of his mission to Abgar of Edessa. But already Jerome (on Mt 10⁴, ed. Val-larsi, 1769, vii. 57 = Migne, xxvi. 61) understands this of the Apostle, writing: 'Thaddæum apostolum ecclesiastica tradit historia missum Edessam ad Abgarum regem, qui ab Evangelista Luca Judas Jacobi dicitur et alibi appellatur Lebæus quod interpretatur corculum, credendumque est eum fuisse trinomium.' How great the confusion became may be shown by the Acta Thaddæi (first published by Tischendorf, Acta Apostolorum apocrypha, 1851, p. 261 ff.). This piece begins: Λεββαῖος ὁ καὶ Θαδδαῖος ἦν ἀπὸ ἑβέσσης τῆς πόλεως . . . ἦλθεν εἰς Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις Ἰωάννου τοῦ βαπτιστοῦ . . . ἐβαπτίσθη καὶ ἐκεκλήθη τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ Θαδδαῖος . . . καὶ ἐξελέξατο αὐτὸν [Ἰησοῦς] εἰς τοὺς δώδεκα, κατὰ μὲν Ματθαῖον καὶ Μάρκον δέκατος ἀπόστολος. Nevertheless, the piece is headed in one of the MSS used by Tischendorf: πρῶτος καὶ κοίμης τοῦ . . . ἀποστόλου Θαδδαίου ἐνὸς τῶν ἰβδομήκοντα, in the other as ἐνὸς τῶν ιβ'. Zahn (Forschungen, i. 366, 382) believes that the whole confusion is due to Eusebius, who substituted

* In the 'Preaching of Simon son of Cleophas' (Studia Sinaitica, v. 62, 65, ed. Gibson) we even read: 'Simon son of Cleophas, who was called Jude, which is, being interpreted, Nathanael, who was called the Zealot, and was bishop in Jerusalem after James the brother of the Lord'; see Zahn, Forschungen, vi. 293.

† Cf. Jastrow, Dictionary of the Targumim, p. 689, where ܬܕܐܝܐ Labya is quoted as the various reading for Levi.

‡ Ἰσταν δὲ καὶ ὁ Λαββ—this is the true reading, not Λαββ—τοῦ ὁμοῦ ἀκολουθεῖται τῷ Ἰστανῷ· ἀλλ' οὕτως γὰρ τοῦ ἀρβύμου τῶν ἀποστόλων αὐτοῦ ἦν, εἰ μὴ κατὰ τινα τῶν ἀντιγράφων τοῦ κατὰ Μάρκον εὐαγγελίου. From the same combination between Mk 2¹⁴ and 3¹⁸ WH explain the 'Western' reading Ἰάκωβον for Λαββ in 2¹⁴. Interesting, in this connexion, is the article of Hesychius (rec. M. Schmidt, ii. 338): Ἰάκωβος Ἀλφαιου, ὁ καὶ Θαδδαῖος καὶ Λαββὶ παρὰ τῷ Μάρκῳ, παρὰ δὲ τῷ Ματθαίῳ Λαββαῖος, παρὰ δὲ Λουκᾷ Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου. Schmidt wishes to read Ἰάκωβος καὶ Θαδδαῖος ὁ καὶ, etc.

§ Instead of ܬܕܐܝܐ Est 221 62 Θαδδᾶς (ܬܕܐܝܐ) may perhaps be read; see Willrich, Judaica, p. 19.

† The same interpretation (surname of Scipio Nasica) is found in Jerome's Liber interpretationis (Lagarde, Onomastica sacra, p. 62), where the name Thaddæus is entirely omitted. It is curious that also in the list of the names of the apostles (i.e. p. 174) Thaddæus, Lebbæus, and Judas are missing.

for the name Addai ܐܕܝ of the Syriac legends the Gr. name Thaddæus. It is very strange that the Syriac translation of Eusebius' HE, in one of its MSS (A), substitutes in 10 cases out of 15 the spelling ܐܕܝ (with ܕ, not ܬ), which has not been found hitherto anywhere else, for ܬܕܝ for the name ܬܕܕܐܝܘܨ; see the edition of Wright-McLean, p. 49¹⁸ 53¹⁰ 54³ 55⁴. (The same version gives everywhere ܐܕܝ for Agabus). When in the Book of the Bee (ed. Budge, p. 124) Aggai (ܐܕܝ), the disciple of the Syriac Addai, is followed by Thaddai ('his father' as is added in the recension published by I. H. Hall in the Journal of the Amer. Or. Soc. Proc., Oct. 1888, pp. lxxv, lxxxi), giving the series Addai—Aggai—Thaddai, the question arises whether this is the result of contamination of Greek and Syriac legends. The names themselves recall Ἀδ[δ]αὶ δ[δ]ακάδος καὶ Ἀγγαῖος Λευῖτης in the Acta Pilati, ch. 14, etc.

According to some statements, Thaddæus was from Jerusalem and of the tribe of Judah (Book of the Bee, Barhebraeus), and preached the gospel in the African language (Gospels of the XII Apostles, ed. J. R. Harris, pp. 26, 29); while the Syriac Addai is said to have been from Paneas. Bar Bahlul (p. 939) refers Labbi to the tribe of Simeon.

The apocryphal 'Gospel of Thaddæus' (Evangelium Thaddæi), mentioned in some MSS and editions of the Decretum Gelasii, seems to be due to a clerical error (PRE³ i. 663).

For the extra-canonical statements on Thaddæus see Lipsius, Die apokryphen Apostelgeschichten, ii. 142-200, and his art. 'Thaddæus' in Smith and Wace's Dictionary of Christian Biography, iv. 875-881. As a Christian name Thaddæus never seems to have been very frequent.*

THARRA (BA ܐܬܪܐ, Luc. Θεοδύτης).—Ad. Est 12¹=TERESH of Est 2²¹ 6².

THASSI (A ܐܬܫܝ, ΝΥ ܐܬܫܝ(ε)ι).—The surname of Simon the Maccabee, 1 Mac 2⁴. The meaning of the word is quite uncertain. As likely an interpretation as any is 'the zealous,' obtained by connecting with Aram. and New Heb. con 'to bubble up or ferment' (used of new wine). For the history of Simon see art. MACCABEES, vol. iii. p. 185.

THEATRE (θέατρον).—At the disturbance recorded in Ac 19⁴¹, we are told that the crowd rushed to the theatre, and that it was there that the somewhat tumultuous meeting, afterwards described, took place. We also learn from Josephus (Ant. XIX. viii. 2) that it was in the theatre at Cæsarea that the events described in Ac 12²⁰⁻²³ took place.

For general descriptions of the Greek and Roman theatre, reference must be made to the ordinary Dictionaries of Antiquities. The theatre at Ephesus was on the slope of Mt. Coressus, and was famous as being one of the largest, if not the largest, in the ancient world. A description of the remains with a plan may be found in Woods, Discoveries at Ephesus, ch. iv. p. 68. A large number of inscriptions also were found on the site, which have been published in full in Hicks' Greek Inscriptions in the British Museum. These are specially important as illustrating the very varied part the Greek theatre played in public life, as the place not only of amusement, but of every form of large assembly. The results are well summed up by Lightfoot, Essays on Supernatural Religion, p. 299—

'The theatre appears as the recognized place of public assembly. Here edicts are proclaimed, and decrees recorded, and benefactors crowned. When the mob, under the leadership of Demetrius, gathered here for their demonstration against St. Paul and his companions, they would find themselves surrounded by memorials which might stimulate their zeal for the goddess. If the "town clerk" had desired to make good his assertion, "What man is there that knoweth not that the city of the Ephesians is sacristan of the great goddess Artemis?" he had only to point to the inscriptions which lined the walls for confirmation. The very stones would have cried out from the walls in response to his appeal.'

The same Greek word is also used in 1 Co 4⁹ 'for we are made a spectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men,' where the meaning is the scene or spectacle in the theatre.

THEBAIC VERSION.—Now generally called the Sahidic Version. See EGYPTIAN VERSIONS, vol. i. p. 669^b.

THEBES.—See NO-AMON, vol. iii. p. 555.

THEBEZ (ܬܒܝܐ 'brightness' (?) ; B Թեբէ, Թաբաւ, A Թաբաւ, Թաբաւ; Thebes).—The place at which Abimelech was killed by a millstone which a woman threw down upon him from a tower that was holding out after the city had been taken (Jg 9⁵, 2 S 11²¹; Jos. Ant. v. vii. 5). Eusebius and Jerome (Onom.) say that in their day there was a village called Thebes, about 13 Rom. miles from Neapolis, on the road to Scythopolis. The Roman road from N. to S. can still be traced, and on it, about 10 miles from Nablus, is Tábas, which Robinson was the first to identify with Thebez (BRP³ ii. 317, iii. 305). Tábas is a large village, surrounded by olive groves and cornfields, on the western slope of a broad fertile valley. Its oil and corn are held in high estimation; and the villagers, who are divided into three factions, own large flocks of sheep and goats. There are numerous rock-hewn cisterns, on which the people depend for their water-supply; and rock-hewn dwelling-places, of which many are still occupied. There is a tomb of Neby Toba in the village, which the Samaritans believe to be that of Asher, son of Jacob. The village suffered greatly from the earthquake of 1837 (PEF Mem. ii. 247; Guérin, Samarie, i. 357; Baedeker-Socin, Pal. 224).

THEODOTUS (Θεόδοτος).—1. One of the messengers said to have been sent by Nicanor to Judas Maccabæus, 2 Mac 14¹⁹. 2. The author of a plot to assassinate king Ptolemy Philopator, which was frustrated by Dositheus, a renegade Jew, 3 Mac 1².

THEOPHILUS (Θεόφιλος).—The name of the person to whom the Third Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles were addressed (Lk 1³, Ac 1¹). It has been supposed by some (and the supposition is an early one*) that the name is, after all, only a general name applicable to any Christian, as meaning 'beloved by God' or 'the friend of God.' Others (e.g. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, p. 388) hold that the use of this name puts forward the Acts, as a complete work at least to the time of Domitian, and supports the idea that the book is a composite one, consisting of the original notes of St. Luke ('called the 'Travel-Document'), added to and increased by a later editor. The name is certainly that of an individual; and this statement is confirmed by the title κράτιστος prefixed to the name in Lk 1⁸, as it is prefixed to the names Felix and Festus in the Acts (23²⁶ 24³ 26²⁸). The title implies that the person to whom it was ascribed belonged to the equestrian order—he must certainly have been a Gentile. Attempts have been made to fix the place of his residence at Antioch, Alexandria, in Achaia, or at Rome, but there are not sufficient data to go upon to establish any of these theories. Other theorists have gone so far as to deny that he was a Christian, or to say that, at any rate, he knew very little about Christianity.* A step still further has been taken in an attempt to identify him with a high priest of his name (Joseph. Ant. XVIII. iv. 3) who held office for about five years, and was perhaps the high priest to whom Saul, afterwards Paul, went to ask for 'letters to Damascus unto the synagogues,' that he might take any Christians who were there prisoners to Jerusalem. Whether Theophilus was a learned and cultivated man or not we do not know, but the dedication to him of the Third Gospel is in style the most elegant piece of writing in the NT. Tradition has not been busy with him as it has with most of the early Christians.

H. A. REDPATH.

THERAS, 1 Es 8⁴¹ (A Θέρρα, B om.)⁶⁰ (BA Θερρά).—The name of the place and river where Ezra's caravan halted, called AHAVA in Ezr 8²¹⁻³¹, and now usually identified with the modern Hit on the Euphrates. The origin of the form of the name in 1 Es is uncertain. Jos. (Ant. XI. v. 2, eis τὸ πέραν τοῦ Εὐφράτου) possibly read πέραν for Θέραν.

THERMELETH (Θερμελεθ), 1 Es 5³⁶.—The equivalent of TELMELAH, a Bab. town in Ezr 2³¹, where Cod. B gives the same Gr. form of the name.

Literature.

i. DATE.—The date of this Epistle in relation to St. Paul's life is fixed within the limits of a few months. It was written during the eighteen months which he spent at Corinth at the end of his Second Missionary Journey (Ac 18¹¹). For it was written after he had left Thessalonica, and while the memories of his first visit there were still fresh (chs. 1. 2 passim, esp. 2¹ γέγονεν); after he had gone on to Athens and had left it (3¹); after he had been rejoined by Silvanus and Timothy (1¹, Ac 18⁵); while Silvanus and Timothy, of whom Silvanus is not mentioned in any subsequent journey, are still his companions (1¹); and, lastly, while he is in some central place where he hears news readily from Macedonia and Achaia, and even from wider sources (1⁸ ἐν παντί τῷ πρῶ, i.e. perhaps the Asiatic and Syrian Churches [so Zahn, Einleitung, p. 147]; but may it be that Aquila and Priscilla had told him that they had heard even at Rome of the conversion of the Thessalonians? and might Jason have been the channel of communication? Ac 17⁵ 18², Ito 16²¹). It was, then, at Corinth—but not very early or very late in that stay; not very early, as time must be allowed for the mission and return of Timothy (3⁶), for the occurrence of some deaths at Thessalonica (4¹³), for the active brotherliness of the Thessalonians to manifest itself to other Christians in Macedonia (4¹⁰), and the news of their faith to have spread widely even beyond Macedonia and Achaia (1⁷⁻⁸). Nor again very late, if 2 Thess. is genuine, for room must be left for the circumstances which led to the writing of that Epistle. The exact date will depend on the system of chronology adopted. It must lie between 49 and 53 (see CHRONOLOGY OF NT).

ii. CIRCUMSTANCES.—St. Paul and his companions, full of hope owing to the Divine call which had led them to preach in Europe, and encouraged by the spiritual success which, in spite of the insults to their Roman citizenship (2¹), they had gained at Philippi, reached Thessalonica. This was a larger and more important centre than Philippi. It was the capital of one of the four divisions of Macedonia; it was a great commercial centre (? cf. 4¹⁰ ἐν τῷ πρῶ, im Handel [Luther], in Geschäften [Weizsäcker]), holding easy communication with East and West both by sea and by land (cf. 1⁸ 4¹⁰); it was a free town with its public assembly and its local magistrates (Ac 17⁸ eis τὸν δῆμον; v. 6 ἐπὶ τοῖς πολιτάρχαις, cf. CIG 1967), and a mixed population of native Greeks, Roman colonists, and Orientals, the Jewish settlement being large enough to have a synagogue. St. Paul began as usual with the synagogue, preaching there for three weeks, appealing to the Jewish Scriptures, proving that Jesus was the Messiah, and that His sufferings and Resurrection were in accord with the Scriptures. The result was that some Jews threw in their lot with Paul and Silas, and so did a larger number of Greek proselytes and of leading ladies. The Acts thus bears witness to the fact that a majority of the Church were of Gentile origin, but speaks only of Gentile proselytes, whereas the Epistle implies converts from heathenism (1⁹ 2¹⁴). The Epistle, though it implies that St. Paul's stay was prematurely cut short, yet seems to require more than three weeks, and Ph 4¹⁰ shows that St. Paul twice received supplies from Philippi during the time, even though he was supporting himself by his own work (2⁹). It is therefore probable that the three weeks of Ac 17² were confined to exclusive work in the synagogue; that after that St. Paul, as at Corinth and Ephesus, made some new place, perhaps the house of Jason (Ac 17⁹), his abode and place of teaching for Gentiles; and the chronological data would admit of a stay of six months (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, p. 228). It was a time of hard work: St. Paul and his companions rose early, working before daylight to support themselves (2⁹, II 3⁸); they preached with effectiveness and conviction (1⁵); they laid stress on the worthlessness of idols, on the reality of the living God (1⁹); they told of the wrath that was coming on the world, when God would punish the heathen world for its impurity (1¹⁰ 4⁶) and the Jews who refused to accept the gospel (2⁹, II 1⁶); of the death of Jesus, of His Resurrection, of His power to deliver from this wrath (1¹⁰ 4¹⁴ 5⁹⁻¹⁰). They added that God had now established His kingdom and called heathen into it (2¹²); that such a call required a holy life, a separation from impurity (4²), an active life of work (4¹¹, II 3¹⁰); that Christianity would lay them open to persecution (3⁴); but that after certain signs had appeared (II 2⁸) Jesus would return suddenly, like a thief in the night (5²), and they would be with Him for ever. Their preaching met with great success (1⁸ 2¹³) in spite of much conflict (2²); the gifts of the Spirit, especially that of prophecy, were manifested (5¹⁰⁻²⁰); the Divine word made the converts strong to bear persecution (2¹³⁻¹⁵). There is no indication of the size of the Church; but some of the chief men, perhaps Jason (Ac 17⁵), Aristarchus, and Secundus (Ac 20⁴), took the lead in active work and preaching (5¹²⁻¹⁴), and probably St. Paul, as elsewhere, officially appointed them to this position; apparently, also, some form of almsgiving was organized (II 3¹⁰).

These results roused the jealousy of the Jews. They misrepresented the teaching of Christ's kingdom as treason to the emperor: working on the heathen populace, they attempted to bring St. Paul before a hastily called meeting of the assembly; but, failing to find him, they took Jason, his host, and other Christians before the native magistrates (cf. ὑπὸ τῶν ἰδίων συμφολετῶν, 2¹⁴). These were bound over to keep the peace, i.e. probably to send Paul and Silas away; and the same night they withdrew to Berea. Probably, even while there, they planned a return to Thessalonica, but were unable to carry it out (2¹⁸ ἀπαξ: there would scarcely be time for two such proposals at Athens). From Berea St. Paul passed on to Athens, leaving Silas and Timothy there, but sending back word that they should join him as quickly as possible (Ac 17¹⁵). The writer of the Acts gives the impression that they did not do so until after he had reached Corinth (18⁵); but this impression must be supplemented from this Epistle. They came at once to him while at Athens, perhaps bringing news of some fresh persecutions at Thessalonica (3² ταῦτα and 4¹). Paul, Silas, and Timothy were anxious to return; the tie between them and their converts had been very close; their stay had been interrupted before their work was done; they had only meant to be absent a short time; their converts were young, and might be tempted by persecution or cajolery (3²) to renounce their faith (2¹⁷ 3⁶); their opponents, whether Jews or, more probably, heathen, knew well how to misrepresent their motives; their very taunts (πλάνη, ἀκαθαρσία, δόλος, κολακεία, πλεονεξία, ζητοῦντες δόξαν, perhaps ἐν βάρει ὕπνῳ) are echoed in this letter (2³⁻⁵). But there were obstacles; perhaps the guarantee which Jason had given to the magistrates was still enforced (Ramsay, l.c.). So Paul and Silas (ἐπεμψαμεν, 3²) decided to send Timothy to Thessalonica, and Silas probably returned to visit some other Church in Macedonia. Possibly St. Paul in his growing anxiety sent yet another messenger (κάγω . . . ἐπεμψα, 3⁶).^{*} While they were absent, St. Paul moved on to Corinth, and Silas and Timothy both rejoined him there.

The news that Timothy brought was in the main good: the faith of the Thessalonians had stood the test of persecution (1⁸ 3⁶); their love showed itself in hospitality and charity, even to other Macedonian Christians (1³ 3⁶ 4⁹⁻¹⁰); they strove to edify each other (5¹¹); they tried to walk obedient to Christ's commands (4¹); they were loyal to their teachers, and wished to see them once more (3⁶ 7¹). At the same time the calumnies against the new Christian teachers were still prevalent, and the converts were still persecuted; they were also exposed to the ordinary perils of a new Church in a heathen town; they were tempted to fall back into impurity (4¹⁻⁶); some of the poorer members, perhaps abusing the charity of the richer, were living a life of idleness and dependence (4⁹⁻¹²), others were careless and forgetful of the coming of Christ (5¹⁻¹¹). There was a tendency, perhaps due to 'the old

^{*} It is possible that St. Paul sent a short letter with Timothy, and that the Thessalonians also replied by a written answer (cf. Expositor, Sept. 1898, pp. 167-177, where J. Rendel Harris ingeniously reconstructs the Thessalonian letter).

Macedonian spirit of independence' (Lightfoot, Bibl. Ess. p. 248), to disorder and contempt of those in authority (5¹²⁻¹⁵; ἀτακτος, ἀτάκτως, ἀτακτεῖν only in these two Epp.; στήριξεν 4 times, 2 elsewhere). There was a danger of a misuse of spiritual gifts at the meetings of the Church (5¹⁹⁻²¹); while some had lost friends by death and were afraid that these would not share in the blessings of Christ's Advent (4¹³⁻¹⁸). On receipt of this news St. Paul writes this Epistle; he writes in the name of Silas and Timothy as well as himself, so that, with a few exceptions (2¹⁸ 3² 5²⁷), he uses the plural number and speaks for them all; probably he dictated it to Timothy and added the conclusion (5²³⁻²⁸) in his own handwriting (cf. II 3¹⁷). Their hope is still to return to Thessalonica, but meanwhile they write to express their delight at the good news, to defend their own conduct as teachers, and to complete what was left wanting in the faith and life of their converts. The words of 4¹ καθὼς καὶ περιπατεῖτε, ἵνα περισσεύητε form the connecting link between the two parts. He aims at 'binding closer the link between the community and himself, and at more effectually severing the link between it and heathenism' (Jülicher). [For the circumstances cf. Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, vi., vii.; Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, ix-xi; Spitta, Zur Gesch. und Litt. des Urchristenthums, i. pp. 111-154; Zahn, Einleitung, pp. 145-160.]

iii. ANALYSIS.—After a salutation, entirely free from all official titles or allusions to controversy, written as from friends to friends, as by men who are still anxious not ἐν βάρει εἶναι ὡς Χριστοῦ ἀποστόλοι (cf. 2⁶), the writers give thanks for the spiritual state of the Thessalonians, reviewing their personal relations with them in the past, both at Thessalonica (1⁴-2¹⁵) and at Athens (2¹⁷-3⁶), their feelings in the present on the receipt of the news from Timothy (3⁶-9), and their hopes for the future (3¹⁰-13).

The didactic part deals with questions of personal morality (4¹⁻¹²), with teaching about the dead (vv. 13-18), and the need of watchfulness (5¹⁻¹¹); ending with regulations for the community-life (vv. 12-28).

A. Personal (12-315).

Gratitude for their spiritual virtues is based upon the conviction which the writers felt (ἀποκρίν) of the election of their converts by God (1⁴ 4); and this is proved (i.) by the effectiveness and assurance of their first preaching, and by the results in the lives of the Thessalonians (vv. 5-7); (ii.) by the reports of others, who bear witness both to the success of their preaching (καὶ ἡμεῖς) and the reality of the conversion of the Thessalonians (vv. 8-10); (iii.) by the knowledge of the Thessalonians themselves (εἰναι γὰρ εἰδέναι), who can bear witness to the boldness of their preaching, to the purity of their motives, to their tenderness, and the absence of all self-assertion, to the example of self-sacrifice, to their fatherly entreaties (2¹⁻¹²). This preaching produced the true results in the lives of the converts; they had been bold to endure persecution—as the Churches in Judea had from the Jews, the determined opponents of the gospel (vv. 13-16). Consequently, when obliged to leave Thessalonica, they had longed to return; Paul himself had twice planned a visit, but had been prevented; and so at last Paul and Silas had sent Timothy. Paul himself had sent yet a second messenger to comfort and strengthen them and to reassure himself (3¹⁻⁵). The news that Timothy has brought is like a new gospel, a new life to them, making them thank God and desire to revisit and to complete such faith (vv. 6-10). So they pray that God will make a visit possible, and meanwhile increase the love of the Thessalonians (vv. 11-15).

B. Ethical. Guidance for the future (41-528).

They must press forward in the spiritual life; they must be specially on their guard against all forms of impurity, for God specially punishes that sin, and it is inconsistent with the Christian calling and the gift of the Spirit (4¹⁻⁹). They must increase their brotherly love, active as it already is (vv. 9-10); they must live an orderly, industrious life, that they may gain the respect of the heathen and be independent (vv. 11-12). They need not be anxious about their dead friends: the union of Christians with the Risen Christ ensures their resurrection (vv. 13-14), and a special word of the Lord has revealed that the dead will meet the Lord, even before the living (vv. 15-18). But they must not relax their vigilance, for the Lord comes as a thief in the night, and they must watch and be sober, ready to gain the salvation which He will bring (5¹⁻¹¹).

Finally, the community-life is regulated; the members of the Church (ἐκκλησία, v. 12) are to pay due honour to those in authority, and they (ἐκκλησία, v. 14) are to keep discipline and be long-suffering. Joy, prayers, and thanksgiving are to be constant; and spiritual utterances are not to be discouraged but tested (vv. 12-22).

The Epistle ends with a prayer to the God of peace for their complete preservation; with a request for their prayers; a command to greet one another with the holy kiss; a solemn charge by Paul himself that the Epistle be read to all the members of the Church, and a simple benediction (vv. 23-28).

iv. VALUE.—The value of the Epistle is twofold: it represents most closely St. Paul's preaching to the heathen world, and therefore is to be compared with the speeches at Lystra and at Athens (cf. Sabatier, *L'Apôtre Paul*³, pp. 88-101); St. Paul's antagonists were Jews defending national prejudices; Judaizing Christians are perhaps alluded to in 2^a, but quite incidentally: and also it is not only the earliest of St. Paul's Epistles, but possibly the earliest extant specimen of Christian literature.

It shows us St. Paul as the missionary, in the absence of any special controversy; as the consoler and the prophet. We see his self-denial for the sake of others (2^a; cf. 1 Co 9-11); his intense sympathy with his converts and dependence on their sympathy (2^a 11, 17 3^a 10); his power of self-adaptation (2^a 11 ἐν ἡλικίᾳ ἐγενήθημεν; cf. 1 Co 9²⁰); his sensitiveness to the opinions of others; his assertion of the purity of his own motives (2^a 5); his appeal to his own conduct as an example (1^a); his insistence on spiritual progress, based upon a hearty recognition of the good already achieved (1^a 4, 10 5¹¹); his indignation with those who thwart God's work (2^a 4⁶); his sense of union with Christ (4¹); his prayerfulness (1^a 3¹¹⁻¹³ 5²); his gratefulness (1^a 3⁹). This is exactly the character which reappears, intensified by controversy, in 2 Corinthians.

The witness to the organization and faith of the Church is equally interesting. The local Church forms one congregation (1¹). The only official title that occurs is ἀπόστολοι, which is apparently used to include Silvanus and Timothy as well as St. Paul; these apostles hold a position of superiority (ἐν βάρει (?) 2^a), including the right to be maintained there as in other Churches (2^a); they speak generally in a tone of entreaty (4^{1, 11} 5^{12, 14}); once St. Paul, separating himself from the others, uses the language of solemn authority (5²⁷). But, under the apostles, there are already officers who preside—probably both for discipline and for worship (5¹²⁻²¹). There are meetings with the holy kiss, the symbol of brotherhood (5²⁸), and with prophetic utterances (5^{19, 20}); probably at such a meeting the letter would be read (5²⁷). There is a link of sympathy and charity between them and other Churches (1^a 2¹⁴ 4¹⁰).

The faith of the Church is directed to God (1³), a God of life and truth (1⁹) and judgment; a Father, who has called them and marked them out for salvation (4⁷ 5⁹). Christ is thought of mainly in His future capacity as Judge. Christian life is a waiting for Him (1¹⁰). Christians have to be always watchful (5¹⁻¹²); He may come at any moment, and will come to inflict punishment on sin, as well as to give joy to His followers (4⁸ 2¹⁹; ἡ παρουσία of Christ's coming, four times in 1 Thess., twice in 2 Thess., once only elsewhere in St. Paul). But Christ is more than this: His death was the means of salvation in the past (5⁹); He is now ὁ κύριος, ὁ κύριος ἡμῶν, the OT language about Jehovah being applied to Him (5²); He is God's Son (1¹⁰); He is united with the Father as the mystic source of life both for the living and the dead (1^a 2¹⁴ 4¹⁰). He is the object of prayer, working with the Father in bestowing earthly as well as spiritual blessings (3¹¹ κατευθύναι, 1^a 5^{18, 23}). The Holy Spirit is given to all Christians to enable them to conquer evil (4⁸); it gives them joy under persecution (1^a 4), and inspires the utterances of the prophets (5¹⁹). This Epistle gives us the fullest division of human nature into spirit, soul, and body (5²³). The picture of the Christian life has all the freshness and glow of early days. It is true that it needs steadying and disciplining, but it is strong and radiant. The converts welcome the good news; they put it to active proof; the message is handed on, as by a trumpet note, to others; they imitate their teachers and become objects of imitation to others; they are taught of God; there is mutual affection and confidence between teachers and taught; there is an atmosphere of love, of joy, of life; they live 'en plein jour.' [For the theology cf. Weiss, Biblical Theology, pt. iii. § 1, cap. i.; Lechler, Apostolic and Post-Apostolic Times, pt. ii. § 2, cap. i.; The Speaker's Commentary, iii. pp. 691-701].

RELATION TO THE OT AND TO CHRISTIAN LITERATURE.—The OT is never appealed to as authority or directly quoted; but its history is referred to (2¹⁶) and its language perhaps consciously adapted (2¹⁶ 4⁸ 5⁹ 5²³ 2¹⁷). There is a certain similarity of language between 4¹⁵⁻¹⁷ and 2 Es 54², but the thought there is different, the writer considering the justice of God's dealing with different generations of men, and the language is not sufficiently similar to suggest literary dependence on either side; if there is any, probably 2 Esdras is the later work.

There is no reference to Christian literature, but it is possible that 1^a 10 point to the germ of some profession of faith in the Father and the Son made at Baptism (ἀποδοίς here only in St. Paul); it is possible again that 4² (ἐπαγγελίαι διὰ τοῦ Κ. Ἰησοῦ) refers to the definite enactments of Ac 15²⁸, and that 4¹⁴ is a semi-quotation from a creed. There seems a reminiscence of St. Stephen's speech (Ac 7⁵¹) in 2¹⁶; and of our Lord's eschatological discourse in 2¹⁶ (Mt 23³⁵ 36) 4¹⁵⁻¹⁷ (Mt 24³¹ 37, 39) 5² 5 (Mt 24⁴²) 5² (Lk 21³⁴, Mt 24⁴²); but the majority of these are too much the common language of all Apocalypses to allow us to build on them with certainty.

A comparison of 3⁴ with Ac 14²² 2 Ti 3¹² suggests a semi-quotation of our Lord's words, e.g. Mt 24⁹, Jn 16³³, but a suggestion that there is a reminiscence of our Lord's sayings recorded in Jn 6²⁰ in 1^a and of Jn 17¹⁹ in 1^a (P. Ewald, Das Hauptproblem der Evangelien-Frage, pp. 85, 93) is more doubtful.

In 4¹⁵ ἡ παρουσία Κυρίου is a possible quotation of some saying unrecorded in the Gospel (cf. Zahn, p. 159); and 5¹⁹, which is often found combined with the ἀγραφὰ ἡμετέρας δεξιᾶς ἐπαίξεσθαι, is perhaps another (cf. Resch, Agapha, p. 116). All these cases point rather to an oral tradition than to written documents.

v. AUTHENTICITY.—The authenticity is now generally admitted, though there are still opponents (cf. Holtzmann, Einf. 3 p. 237). The external evidence outside the NT is less strong than for some Epistles, as this Epistle did not lend itself readily to quotation; but it was included in Marcion's canon (circ. 140), and that implied some previous Catholic collection. The language of 2^{16b} (ἐφάσε . . . τέλος) is found in exactly the same form in the Test. XII Patr. (Levi, ch. 6; but see below). There are possible reminiscences of 4¹⁵⁻¹⁷ in Didaché xvi. 6; and of 1^a and 4² in Clem. Rom. ch. 42 (but not of 5² in Clem. 38, where the thought is different). But the strongest support is given by 2 Thess., which, whatever its date, implies the existence and the recognition of the Pauline authorship of our Epistle. No doubt of its authenticity was raised before the 19th century.

The internal evidence equally supports the genuineness, in spite of a few difficulties. The objection that the Epistle implies a longer lapse of time than a few weeks is met by the consideration that the Acts will permit of an interval of nearly a year between the foundation of the Church and the writing of the letter. The difficulties of reconciliation with the Acts about the movements of Silas and Timothy and the persecution by heathen have been discussed above. As far as they are difficulties, they affect the historical character of the Acts rather than of 1 Thessalonians.

A few other objections deserve notice. It is urged that St. Paul's eager defence of his motives (2¹⁻⁵), and incidentally of his apostolic rights (2⁶), implies a later stage in his life, when Jewish Christians had attacked his apostleship. But such depreciation of his motives would be natural to Jews longing to thwart him (cf. 2¹⁶), or to heathen, indignant at the conversion of their friends. The incidents of Ac 15, and probably of Gal 2¹, lay behind him, and would account for the incidental allusion in 2¹; while, even apart from any attack of opponents, he might think it well to contrast his motives with those of other teachers with whom he might be confused—such as Jewish impostors like Elymas (Ac 13¹⁰ ἐλεῖς τὸν δαίμονα), heathen rhetoricians or sophists, taking pay for their teaching (ἐλατίζεσθαι); or, again, he may have desired to dissociate himself from the impure teaching (τὴν ἀκαθάρτην) of the priests of the Cabeiri (Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, p. 257).

Again, 2¹⁶ has been interpreted as implying the previous destruction of Jerusalem. If this were so, it would be more rational to strike out the last sentence as the interpolation of a scribe pointing out the fulfilment of St. Paul's words; but the words do not necessarily mean more than that 'sentence has been pronounced upon them; the wrath of God is gone forth; the kingdom of God passed from them when they rejected the Messiah'; they are parallel to the thought of 1 Co 2⁸, Ro 11¹⁸, 28, and Ac 13⁴⁶ 13⁴⁷; and the use of the phrase in the Test. XII Patr. perhaps shows that it was a half-stereotyped Rabbinical formula for declaring God's judgment. Moreover, the present participles ἀπεκρίναντο, κατέκριναν, and the phrase εἰς τὴν ἀναπληρωσάν are inconsistent with the destruction of Jerusalem.

Once more, 4¹⁷ offers an apparent inconsistency with 2 Co 5²; but a change of expectation on such a point would not be unnatural, and a careful comparison of 5¹⁶ with 2 Co 5¹⁶ will show that there is no real antithesis.

Lastly, the solemn command of 5²⁷ may have been due to the presence of disorderliness and dissension (5¹⁴ 15), and would be natural, even without such a supposition (cf. Col 4¹⁶).

The objections, then, can be fairly met, while on the other hand the style, the character of the writer, the many points of contact with 2 Cor., the simplicity and directness of the thought, the primitive stage of Church organization, the state of the spiritual gifts, the question about the dead which must have arisen very early in any Church, the absence of any motive for forgery, the apparent discrepancies with the Acts, the improbability that a later forger would put language in St. Paul's mouth which at least seems to imply that he expected the Parousia in his lifetime, — all these carry conviction of its genuineness. The arguments on both sides are well stated in Holtzmann (l.c.), and the genuineness well defended by Jowett, Weizsäcker (Das Apostol. Zeitalter, p. 250), Jülicher (Einl. 3 pp. 41–45), and most fully by von Soden (SK, 1885), and Bornemann, § 5.

vi. INTEGRITY. — The integrity of the Epistle has been questioned both on a large and on a small scale.

(1) Pierson and Naber (Verisimilia, Amsterdam, 1886) treat it as a composition of two authors. The first was a pre-Christian Jewish writer, writing a hortatory address to Gentiles before the first coming of the Messiah to foretell His advent, and to exhort them to live a life of Jewish morality. The second was a Christian bishop, whose date is not given, named Paul, who inserted into the Jewish treatise a few Christian phrases and a justification of his own motives and preaching. This analysis is based upon the variety of tone, — now that of an authoritative prophet, now that of a humble pastor — the want of close sequence of thought between the paragraphs, and the difference in the usage of particular words (ἡμέρα, ὑπομονεῖν), and the scantiness of specially Christian teaching. But the criticism is pedantic, and often inconsistent with itself in details: it requires from a letter the exact structure of a scientific treatise, and allows no play to varieties of mood and thought within one writer's mind.

(2) A list of suggestions of interpolations on a smaller scale will be found in Clemen, Die Einheitlichkeit der Paul. Briefe (Göttingen, 1894). The most important affect 2¹⁵, 16 and 5²⁷. The objection to 2¹⁵, 16 as a whole is groundless, the attack on the Jews being as natural to St. Paul as it had been to St. Peter or St. Stephen (Ac 23³⁴ 7⁵²); but v. 16¹⁰ ἐφθάσε . . . τέλος might be an editorial comment added after the destruction of Jerusalem, to point out the fulfilment of St. Paul's words (εἰς τὸ ἀναπληρῶσαι); yet, as we have seen, they are quite natural in St. Paul's own mouth at the time.

5²⁷ might also be a later addition, emphasizing the importance of the Epistle; but there, too, a natural reason for the words is to be found in the circumstances of the moment (cf. Schmiedel, Hdcom. ad loc.; Moffatt, Hist. NT, p. 625).

The chief questions of textual criticism affect the reading in 2⁷ (see Westcott-Hort, NT, ii. App. p. 128) & 12³ 3⁴ 4¹ 5² (ib. p. 144) 4.

LITERATURE. — Of ancient commentators, Chrysostom, though discursive, is excellent in entering into the writer's point of view; and the moral homilies — e.g. those on friendship (1 Th 2²⁰), on the fear of hell (1 Th 4⁸, 2 Th 1⁹), on intercession (2 Th 2¹⁷) — are very spiritual and pointed. Theodore of Mopsuestia (c. 415 A.D.) has more of the modern exegetical instinct, and explains the exact meaning and the historical and practical references well, but at times forces the language to suit his own views. Theodoret, while dependent on these two, shows independence of judgment. His notes are clear and sensible, and he is especially careful to draw out the dogmatic inferences of the Epistle.

Of modern writers, Jowett, A. J. Mason (Ellicott's Comm. for English Readers), Bishop Alexander (Speaker's Comm.), and J. Denney (Expositor's Bible) are most interesting on Introduction and doctrinal teaching. More careful exegesis will be found in Ellicott, Alford, Findlay (Cambr. Bible for Schools), Lightfoot (Notes on Epistles of St. Paul, 1895), F. W. Schmiedel in the Hdcom. z. NT, and, most completely of all, in Bornemann-Meyer⁸. Useful notes on 2⁸ and 5⁴ will be found in Field, Notes on Trans. of NT (ON 2); and on 2⁸ by F. Zimmer in 'Theologische Studien D. B. Weiss dargebracht' (Göttingen, 1897); Askwith, Introd. to Thess. Epp. (1902).

Literature.

i. DATE AND CIRCUMSTANCES. — The genuineness of this Epistle is more contested than that of any other attributed to St. Paul, except the Pastorals. If it is not genuine, the exact date and circumstances are merely a literary setting, of little historical value. Yet, even so, a definite situation was in the writer's mind and must be examined.

The following points fix that situation. Apparently the temple is still standing (2¹), i.e. the date is before A.D. 70. Further, Paul, Silvanus, and Timothy, after having founded the Church at Thessalonica (2⁸ 3¹⁻¹⁰) and written a letter, probably 1 Thess., to it (2¹² and perh. 2³ 3⁴), are still working together (1¹) in some place where they are thwarted by perverse and malicious men (3²), and where there are other churches in the neighbourhood (1⁴). This will suit exactly the time of Ac 18¹⁻¹¹ (cf. 2 Co 1¹ with 1⁴); late in the stay at Corinth, but probably before the appeal to Gallio had stopped the Jewish persecution. At this time news about the Thessalonian Church reached them at Corinth (3¹¹ ἀκούομεν); perhaps brought by the messenger implied in 1 Th 3⁶, perhaps by the bearer of 1 Thess. on his return, perhaps by some chance passer-by. They were still exposed to persecution, and were still bravely enduring it; but there were tendencies to disorder and insubordination; idlers were presuming on the charity of their neighbours; and there was a tendency to excitement caused by an expectation of the speedy setting-in of 'the day of the Lord'; spiritual utterances, not duly tested (1 Th 5²⁰⁻²²), increased the expectation; sayings of Paul, Silvanus, and Timothy were exaggerated to countenance it; possibly a forged letter in their name was circulated, or (more likely) the language of 1 Th 4. 5 was distorted in the same interest (2⁷). The three teachers feel that their converts must be praised and comforted, yet stimulated and steadied. They write a common letter — always in the plural, except that once one of them, probably Paul, intervenes with a special appeal to his own teaching

ii. ANALYSIS.—

11. 2 Greeting.

- A. Gratitude for their spiritual state, especially for their loyal endurance under persecution (2⁴).

Strengthening of them by the thought of

(1) the justice of God (2);

(2) the special manifestation of that justice, which will accompany the Appearance of the Lord Jesus (6-10).

Prayer to God to complete their Christian life, that Christ may be glorified in them on 'that day' (11-12).

- B. Fuller teaching about that day.

Warning against being misled into thinking it immediately at hand (21-2), and a reminder of Paul's past teaching (3), which implied (a) a mystery of lawlessness and of error already at work; (b) a restraining power or person; (c) a removal of that restraint at some future date; (d) a great apostasy; (e) the appearance of the man of sin; (f) the appearance of the Lord destroying the man of sin and all who have been deceived by him (3. 4. 6-12).

Thanksgiving to God that He saved them from this doom (13-14).

Exhortation to abide loyally by their past teaching (15).

Prayer to God to comfort and to steady them (16-17).

- C. Request for their intercession (31-2). Assurance of God's faithfulness (2), and of their teacher's faith in them (4).

Prayer to God to give them love and patience (5).

- D. Regulation of their community-life.

They are to shun all disorderly brethren (9); for such disorder is contrary to the example which their teachers had set (7-8), and their repeated command (10). Such brethren must earn their own bread (11-12). The rest must be forbearing, but yet break off intercourse with any one who persists in disobeying this written command (13-15).

Prayer to the God of peace to give peace to them all (16).

Autograph salutation in Paul's own handwriting (17). Benediction (18).

iii. LITERARY DEPENDENCE.—(1) The Epistle presupposes the existence of 1 Thessalonians. For II 2¹⁵ explains itself readily by reference to I 4¹⁻⁸ 5¹⁻¹⁰; II 3⁸ to I 4¹¹; II 3¹⁴, perhaps, but less probably, to I 4¹⁰⁻¹²; and II 2² may imply a misunderstanding of I 4¹⁷ 5²⁻³. Further, there is a remarkable similarity of structure, e.g., in the form of greeting (I 1¹, II 1¹⁻²), of thanksgiving (I 1², II 1³), of prayers (I 3¹ 5²³, II 2¹⁶ 3¹⁶), of transition (I 4¹, II 3¹). And this extends to many verbal points, as will be seen by a comparison of the following places:—

I 1¹³ with II 1³.
I 1¹⁴ with II 2¹³.
I 1¹⁶ with II 1¹⁴.
I 1¹⁸ with II 1¹⁴.
I 2⁹⁻⁹ with II 3⁹.

I 2¹² with II 1⁵.
I 3² with II 2¹⁷.
I 4¹⁻¹⁰ 5¹¹ with II 3⁸.
I 5⁹ with II 2¹⁴.
I 5¹⁴⁻¹⁵ with II 3¹².

The writer of 2 Thess. must have lately written 1 Thess., or have known it as a piece of literature.

(2) Previous apocalyptic teaching is also presupposed. No one passage of the OT is appealed to, but the apocalyptic descriptions 16-10 23-12 weave together phrases from Is 2¹⁰ 19. 21 11⁴ [found in a similar context in Ps-Sol 17³⁷ 30] 49³ 66⁵⁻¹⁴, Jer 10²², Ezk 28², and Dn 11³⁶. There are also striking resemblances between the language here and that of our Lord's eschatological sayings; cf. 1⁹ with Mt 25³¹⁻⁴⁶; 2¹ with Mt 24³¹ (ἐπισυνάξουσιν); 2² with Mt 24⁹ (θροεῖσθαι, here and Mk 13⁷ only in NT); 2³ with Mt 24⁵; 2⁴ with Mt 24¹⁵ (ἐν τόπῳ ἀγίῳ), Mk 13¹⁴ (ἐστηκότα δρον οὐ δεῖ); 2⁷ with Mt 24¹² (ἀνομία); 2⁹ with Mt 24²⁴. Such similarities may be due to the fact that each draws independently from the common stock of apocalyptic imagery, and they do not prove a literary dependence on any written Gospel, but they make probable a knowledge of some oral tradition of that discourse.

(3) A knowledge of other Gospel sayings may lie behind 1⁵=Mt 5¹⁰, 3²=Mt 6¹². The command in 3¹⁰ is a quotation of a Rabbinical saying, but possibly it had been already used by our Lord Himself, and may have been taken by St. Paul from Him (cf. Resch, Agrapha, pp. 128 and 240).

iv. AUTHORSHIP.—Church tradition universally ascribed the Epistle to St. Paul. It is directly attributed to him by Polycarp (c. xi.), who quotes 1⁴, though by mistake he quotes it as addressed to the Philippians. Reminiscences of the apocalyptic language may underlie Justin Martyr, Dial. xxxii. cx.; Didache, c. 16; and more prob. Ep. Vienne and Lyons, ap. Eus. v. 1 (ἐπέσκηψεν δ' ἀντικείμενος; προοιμαζόμενος ἤδη τὴν μέλλουσαν εἶσεσθαι παρουσίαν αὐτοῦ . . . Χριστοῦ . . . καταργῶν τὸν ἀντικείμενον . . . οἱ υἱοὶ τῆς ἀπωλείας), but in no case can the reference be called undoubted. Marcion included the Epistle in his Canon as Pauline, and so did the Latin and Syriac translators.

The internal evidence on the whole supports this view. The general structure of the Epistle, the style and phraseology, the affectionate tone, the frequent intercession for the readers, the request for their prayers, the appeal to his own teaching and example, the sharp insistence on his own authority in a matter of discipline, are all characteristic of St. Paul. But two main objections are raised.

(a) The relation of the style to that of 1 Thessalonians. In spite of the points of likeness (see above), there is a difference; the tone is more official (εὐχ. ὁφείλομεν), the feeling less vivid, the sentences more involved, the same things are being said, but said with less point and directness; they suggest a second person adapting Pauline thought (Spitta, pp. 116-119). But the variety seems equally explicable as that of one writer writing after a short lapse of time, and in a different mood. A comparison of the style of 2 Timothy with 1 Timothy, of Colossians with Ephesians, of 2 Co 11 with 1 Co 9, will show very similar variety.

(b) The eschatology is said to be un-Pauline. It is true that no such detailed anticipations are to be found elsewhere in St. Paul (but 2 Co 6¹⁵ τὴς συμφώνησις Χριστοῦ πρὸς Βελιάρ may refer to the Antichrist tradition). But such teaching was naturally esoteric; and, even here, the writer seems intentionally to avoid being explicit, through fear, perhaps, of giving the Roman authorities a handle against himself or his converts (cf. the reticence of Jos. Ant. x. 4, about the interpretation of Daniel's prophecies). Further, some such teaching was common among the Jews, so that St. Paul would have inherited it; and, lastly, it is almost universal in Christian writers (Synoptists, John [5²], James, 1. 2 John, Apoc.), so that the probability is in favour of St. Paul having shared the expectation in some form.

But is the form implied here Pauline? This again is difficult to answer, because of the difficulty of deciding what the writer was pointing to. There lay behind him in the history of the doctrine the following stages. (1) A common Oriental myth of a struggle between the power of evil, represented by a dragon (Bab. Tiāmat) and the Creator of the world (Marduk), in which the dragon had been bound, but would revive for another conflict with God before the end of the world (see articles RAHAB, SEA MONSTER, and REVELATION). The connexion of this with the following is only a conjecture, but a very possible conjecture. (2) A Jewish expectation, springing up during the Exile, of an attack upon Israel by foes led by some human leader or (later) by Satan or Beliar, which would be frustrated either by J^u or the Messiah. Such a victory is described in Ezk 38. Something similar recurs in the prophecies of Daniel (7. 8 and 11) about the conflict with Antiochus Epiphanes. The expectation did not cease with the death of Antiochus; it was applied to the thought of deliverance from the Roman empire in 2 Es 5¹, Ps-Sol 17, Orac. Sib. iii. 60, Apoc. Baruch, c. 40, Asc. Is. c. 4 (cf. MAN OF SIN). (3) This anticipation had become Christian. Our Lord had contemplated a leader 'coming in his own name' (Jn 5³) and demanding allegiance; some person, 'the abomination of desolation, standing in the holy place (ἐστηκότα)'; many false prophets, a growth of lawlessness, a destruction of Jerusalem, and a coming of the Son of Man (Mt 24, Mk 13, Lk 21). Similar teaching had been given at Thessalonica by the writer frequently (ἔλεγον, 2⁶), but it was shared by his fellow-teachers (ἐκπαιδευμένους... ὡς δι' ἡμῶν, 2¹⁻²), and the phrases ἡ ἀποστασία, ὁ ἄνθρωπος, ὁ ἀντικείμενος, ὁ κατέχων are quoted without explanation as from a well-known body of teaching. (4) A new point had probably been given to the expectation among the Jews in A.D. 39 or 40, by the attempt of Caligula, frustrated only by his death, to erect his own statue in the temple of Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. XVIII. viii.; Tac. Hist. v. 9). This would help to explain the language of 2¹, and Spitta suggests that St. Paul and his colleagues had adapted a Jewish form of the apocalyptic teaching written in view of Caligula's attempt; but there is no necessity for such a suggestion, interesting and possible as it is.

This history of the doctrine helps us to define the probable application which is implied in this teaching. It is not indeed necessary to suppose in St. Paul's mind any clear identification with a definite person or a definite time; yet the language is more natural on such a supposition, and the interpretation will come in one of two directions.

(a) Probably the opposition comes from Jewish soil. τὸ μυστήριον τῆς ἀνομίας is the opposition of the Jews to the spread of Christianity (cf. 3¹⁻², 1 Th 2¹⁶, Ac 18⁶ and passim); the ἐνέργεια πλάνης is the blinding of the eyes of the Jews to the gospel (Ac 13⁴⁻⁶, 1 Co 2⁶, 2 Co 3¹⁴, Ro 11²⁵); ὁ κατέχων is the Roman empire controlling the Jews 'assidue tumultuantes' (cf. Ac 18²) and preventing their illegal attacks on the Christians; ὁ κατέχων, the Roman emperor, or perhaps on the analogy of Dn 10¹³,²⁰ some archangel who presides over the order of the empire (so Goebel, ad loc.); ἡ ἀποστασία is the final rejection by the Jews of their Messiah, or possibly some Christian apostasy such as is contemplated in He 10^{35a}; ὁ ἄνθρωπος τῆς ἀμαρτίας is some false Messiah, expected to lead the Jews in a final rising against the Roman empire; and his destruction lies in the overthrow of the Jewish polity and the salvation and establishment of the Christian Church. This interpretation is most in accord with the Synoptists and with the subsequent Church tradition, as well as with St. Paul's own circumstances at the moment.

(β) The opposite view has been frequently maintained of late, which sees the explanation in heathen opposition and especially in the worship of the Cæsars. The lawlessness and deceit will then be that of heathen wickedness and error; the restraining power, the antagonism of the Jewish State (Warfield), or the imperial authority (Jülicher); the man of sin, the emperor or some heathen personification of evil proclaiming himself as God; the apostasy, that of the Jews, or, as on the former theory, of some Christians; and the coming of the Son of Man will be the ultimate annihilation of Cæsarism and the establishment of Christianity as the religion of the world. This view would be more in accordance with the past history of the application to Antiochus Epiphanes, with the attempt of Caligula, and with the reference to Nero in the Apocalypse; but it seems less in accord with St. Paul's own circumstances at the time.

Either of these views gives a setting possibly Pauline; the language, no doubt, is indefinite; it is capable of being applied to the theory of a Nero redivivus (c. 69 A.D.), or to some Gnostic opposition to Christianity in the 2nd cent.; but none of the language requires such an interpretation. Nor, again, is this view fatally inconsistent with St. Paul's expectation elsewhere. 1 Th 5¹⁻² certainly foretells a sudden surprising appearance of the day of the Lord; but that is consistent with a previous preparation of events, the length of which is left, as here, wholly indefinite. Ro 11²⁶ also implies a hope that 'all Israel will be saved,' which seems scarcely consistent with a great Jewish antagonism; but the language cannot be rigidly pressed; the failure of a Jewish false Messiah might be a stage in the conversion of the Jewish nation; and it is possible that St. Paul's expectation on this point may have changed. Again, 1 Ti 4¹, 2 Ti 3¹ point to an expectation of an apostasy within the Christian Church; but that would not be inconsistent with the view maintained here.

Recent investigations have emphasized the strength of the tradition both Jewish and Christian; but they have also shown the versatility of its application; it is applied to the danger which threatens the truth at any moment. Daniel gives it a heathen application to Antiochus Epiphanes; the writer of the Psalms of Solomon to Pompey; St. Paul, thwarted by Jews, applies it to them; St. John sees many Antichrists in teachers untrue to Christianity; the writer of the Apocalypse, when the Roman empire had become a persecuting power, applies it to the Roman emperor; the writers of the Ep. of the Churches of Vienne and Lyons see in the persecution there an anticipation of the final conflict: 'he that opposeth' swoops down upon the Christians; Christ in the martyrs 'brings to naught' him who opposeth; the apostate Christians are 'the sons of perdition.' This application is all the more interesting that it is incidental, and the passage is not quoted. Consequently there may be many applications and many fulfilments yet in the future, as long as the cleavage between faith and unfaith, error and truth, remain. [Cf. MAN OF SIN, vol. iii. p. 226; PAUL, vol. iii. p. 709; Bousset, Der Antichrist (Göttingen, 1895, Eng. tr. 1896); in Encyc. Bibl. s.v.; Thackeray, The Relation of St. Paul to Contemporary Jewish Thought, pp. 136-141; Stanton, Jewish and Christian Messiah, iii. c. 2; R. H. Charles, Eschatology, p. 380 ff., and art. 'Apocalyptic Literature' in Encyc. Bibl.; Schürer, HJP II. ii. 154 f.; B. B. Warfield in Expositor, 1886, ii. pp. 30-44; G. G. Findlay, ib. 1900, ii. pp. 251-261].

There is, then, no reason for denying the authorship to St. Paul. Spitta in a valuable examination of the Ep. (Zur Gesch. und Litt. des Urchristentums, i. pp. 111-154) suggests Timothy as the real author, supposing that St. Paul, instead of dictating as usual, left Timothy to compose it, and that Timothy is referring in 2⁵ to his own separate teaching at his last visit to them; St. Paul then adds a general authentication in 3¹⁷. In this way he attempts to explain the difference of style between 1 Thess. and this Ep., and the difference of the eschatological view. But these differences are not so great as to call for such an explanation; further, St. Paul would not authenticate a letter which contained any substantial difference from his own teaching; the Thessalonians would naturally refer ἔλεγον of 2⁶ to the leading apostle whose name stands first (1¹) and who is named in 3¹⁷, the only other use of the singular; and 2¹⁻² imply that the teaching of the one teacher (2⁶) was shared by all. If another author were needed, Silvanus seems a more natural suggestion, for he, as a prophet, might be the source of the prophetic passage; but the theory creates more difficulties than it solves.

Those who reject the Pauline authorship altogether suppose that at some later date an expectation of the immediate coming of Christ arose and produced excitement and neglect of daily duties; that some one in authority tried to meet the peril implied in the excitement by writing a letter which described the stages that would precede that coming, and in order to gain weight for it composed it in the name of Paul, deliberately modelling it upon 1 Thess., the Pauline Epistle which was most cognate in subject. Of the many suggested situations, that of Schmiedel seems the best, who would connect it with the expectation of a return of Nero, and so place it after Nero's death (June 68), and before the destruction of the temple (August 70). It would then deal with the same circumstances as the Apocalypse (ch. 13). But there is no detail here, which connects 'him that opposeth' clearly with Nero redivivus, and the very elaborateness of the theory is against its truth.

v. INTEGRITY.—The difficulties of 2¹⁻¹² have naturally led to suggestions of interpolation. Pierson and Naber (Verisimilia, pp. 21-25) treat 1⁸⁻¹⁰ 2¹⁻¹² 3 (except 7-13, 16-18) as parts of a pre-Christian Jewish apocalypse, worked up into a Christian form by some unknown bishop of the name of Paul (cf. preceding art.). Schmidt, S. Davidson, and others treat the main body as Pauline, with 2¹⁻¹² as a late insertion of about 69; Hausrath treats 2¹⁻¹² as the only Pauline fragment worked up into an Epistle at a later date. But there is no MS support for any of these theories, and 2¹⁻¹² cannot be separated from 1⁸⁻¹⁰, which latter section shows striking similarities with the Jewish expectations; cf. esp. 1⁸ and 2⁹ with Sib. Orac. iii. 67 f. of the coming of Beliar—

ἀλλ' οὐχὶ τὸ ἀποκάλυψαι ἔστιν ἐν αὐτῷ ἀλλὰ πλάνη, καὶ δὴ μέρητος πολλοῦ τοῦ πλανήσου πιστῶς τ' ἐλπίδος ὅτι Ἑβραῖους ἀνέμους τοὺς καὶ ἄλλους ἄνους, οὕτως οὕτω θεῶν λόγος ἐστὶν, καὶ οὐκ ἔστιν

(cf. Clemen, Die Einheitlichkeit der Paul. Briefe, pp. 17, 18; Moffatt, Historical NT, p. 626).

vi. VALUE.—Short as the Epistle is, it is of great value, both doctrinal and historical. It marks the high position attributed from the first to Christ, the language of the OT about Jehovah being applied to Him (1⁷), and He being ranked with the Father as the one source of comfort and strength (2¹⁷ παρακαλέσαι . . . στήριξαι, each in the singular). It shows us the strength of the expectation of the Second Advent in the Early Church; the deep sense of the struggle between good and evil, between truth and falsehood, its consummation in definite persons, and the final triumph of the good and true; the faith in the ultimate justice of God to right the injustice of this world. It shows the method in which the apostle met the feverish impatience that would antedate the end: (a) laying stress on those elements in the traditional expectation which implied lapse of time and an overruling Providence which fixed the right moment for the coming (ἐν τῷ αὐτοῦ καιρῷ, cf. Ps-Sol 17²³ ἐν τὸν καιρὸν ὃν οὐκ ἴδεις σύ, ὁ θεός); (b) insisting on the duty of each man earning his own livelihood and discouraging all cringing dependence on Church charity; (c) strengthening the bonds of discipline, pressing the authority of his own commands, and calling upon the Church to rise to the duty of keeping its ranks free of unworthy members; 3¹⁴ marks the commencement of Church discipline. It sanctions the tendency to read the signs of the times and to see the great struggle between good and evil working itself out in contemporary events; and even if we cannot for certain identify St. Paul's application, or even if it was not fulfilled exactly as he expected, yet as the great expectation had grown with centuries and was rooted in principles, so it remains still, claiming a more adequate fulfilment. For applications made in subsequent Christian times see Smith's DB, s.v. 'Anti-Christ.'

Historically, the section 2¹⁻¹² was of great importance; for the identification of the Roman empire with ὁ κατέχων led to its being treated as the great protecting power, and so gave special point to the prayers for it and for the emperor (cf. Tertullian, Apol. 32: 'est et alia major necessitas nobis orandi pro imperatoribus, etiam pro omni statu imperii rebusque Romanis, qui vim maximam universo orbi imminentem ipsamque clausulam sæculi acerbitates horrendas comminantem Romani imperii commeatu scimus retardari'). The language of 3¹⁷ is also valuable, as indicating that St. Paul had a larger correspondence than we now possess, and probably hints at a danger of forged letters even at this early date.

LITERATURE.—See at end of preceding article, and add Goebel, Die Thessalonischen Briefe, a crisp, terse, sensible commentary. The authorship is best discussed, as against St. Paul, by Spitta (see above), Schmiedel, Hdcom. pp. 7-11: as for St. Paul, by Jülicher, Einkl. 4 pp. 45-51; Zahn, pp. 160-182; Moffatt, Historical NT, pp. 142-148; Bornemann in Meyer's Commentar zum NT. Interesting suggestions for the emendation of the text (in 1¹⁰ ἰερῶν, 2¹ ὡς δὲ ἡμεῖς) will be found in Westcott-Hort, ii. App. p. 128; Field, Notes on Trans. of NT, p. 202.

W. LOCK.

THESSALONICA (Θεσσαλονίκη), a city of Macedonia, still known by that name under the but slightly altered form of Saloniki, has long held a prominent place in history, and still ranks, after Constantinople, as the most important town in European Turkey. It is situated on the innermost bay, or north-eastern recess, of the larger gulf, which now takes its name from the modern town, but was known to the ancients as the Thermaic Gulf, after an earlier town on the same site, called Therme. It is built in the form of an amphitheatre on the slopes at the head of the bay; and it is seen from a great distance, crowned by its citadel above, and conspicuous by white-washed walls several miles in circuit. 'The situation,' says Tozer, 'recalls the appearance of Genoa from the way in which the houses rise from the water edge, and gradually ascend the hillsides towards the north. It is admirably placed for purposes of communication and trade, as it lies in the innermost bay of the winding gulf, and forms the natural point of transit for exports and imports; besides which it commands the resources of the immense plain, which reaches in a vast arc as far as the foot of Olympus, and receives the waters of three important rivers, the Axios, the Lydias, and the Haliacmon' (Geog. of Greece, 1873, p. 204). It is said to have borne earlier the names of Emathia and Halia: certainly it bore that of Therme, by which it is known to Herod. (as a halting-place of Xerxes on his way to Greece, vii. 121, 123, 124, 127, 128, 183) and Thucyd. (i. 61, ii. 29), and which it probably owed to hot mineral springs (thermæ), still existing in its vicinity. The name Thessalonica (as to the origin of which various conjectures are brought together by Tzetzes, Chil. xiii. 305 ff.), which is first employed by Polybius (xxiii. 4, 4; 11, 2; xxix. 3, 7), would appear to commemorate a victory over the Thessalians, of which nothing definite is known as to time, place, or victor (Philip?). It was most probably given to the city by Cassander (who rebuilt it about B.C. 315, and transferred to it the inhabitants of several small townships in the vicinity; Strabo, vii. fr. 21) in honour of his wife of that name, who was daughter of Philip, and step-sister of Alexander. The place soon gained importance, becoming, on the conquest of Macedonia by the Romans, the capital of the second of its four divisions (Liv. xlv. 29), and, on the conversion of the country a few years later into a province, practically the capital of the whole, and residence of the Roman governor; called

'the mother of all Macedonia' (Anthol. Gr. ed. Jacobs, ii. p. 98, Epig. 14), although the name 'metropolis,' occurring on coins of the city, is of later date. The Romans had docks (navalia) there (Liv. xlv. 10); the great Egnatian highway traversed the city from west to east, the remains of arches at either end of a long street still marking the site of its gates; Cicero during his exile found friendly shelter there for seven months with Plancius the quaestor (Orat. pro Planc. 41; Ep. ad Att. iii. 8 ff.). In the first Civil war it supplied a basis of operations for Pompeius and the Senate (Dio Cass. xli. 20); in the second it espoused the cause of Antonius and Octavianus (Plut. Brut. 46; Appian, Bell. Civ. iv. 118), which brought to it apparently the privilege of becoming a free city (liberæ conditionis, Pliny, HN iv. 36), for there are several coins inscribed with the words ΘΕΣΣΑΛΟΝΙΚΕΩΝ · ΕΛΕΥΘΕΡΙΑΣ, probably to be associated with the victory at Philippi, from the reverse bearing the joint names of Antonius and Augustus. This privilege implied autonomy (hence the mention of τὸν δῆμον in Ac 17²), and the appointment of their own magistrates, who were in this instance designated πολιτάρχαι, as is apparent from Ac 17⁶, where the term is rendered RULERS OF THE CITY (which see). Tafel, in his comprehensive monograph (De Thessal. eiusque agro dissertatio geographica, Berol. 1839), follows out the fortunes of the city as under the later Empire a main bulwark against the Gothic and Slavonic invasions (of which he enumerates six); and, during the Middle Ages, thrice captured,—by the Saracens in 904, by the Normans under Tancred in 1185, and by the Turks in 1430. It has still a population of about 70,000, whereof 20,000 are Jews.

When St. Paul, along with Silas, visited Thessalonica on his mission to Macedonia and Greece, the Jews there, who were numerous and influential enough to have founded a synagogue, were his most active opponents. The discussions with them on three Sabbaths persuaded few Jewish hearers, but a much larger number ('a great multitude') of 'the devout Greeks'—i.e. proselytes—'and of the chief women not a few' (Ac 17⁴). But the Jews, who were not won over, called to their aid some worthless idlers of the market-place (ἀγοραῖοι), excited a tumult, beset the house of Jason, and, not finding there those whom they sought, dragged Jason and others before the politarchs, accusing them of having received disturbers of the world's peace, and of contravening the imperial decrees by owning another king in Jesus. Upon this alarm, the politarchs took securities from the accused and dismissed them; but the brethren at once sent away Paul and Silas by night to Berea. The subsequent fortunes of the Church which their brief ministry had formed called forth from the apostle (courteously associating with himself Timothy as well as Silvanus=Silas) the two Epistles to the Thessalonians. See preceding two articles.

WILLIAM P. DICKSON.

THEUDAS (Θευδᾶς; the name is supposed to be a contraction of Θεόδωρος).—In the speech of Gamaliel contained in Ac 5^{34ff.} the speaker is represented as referring to the rebellion of a certain Theudas, who professed to be some one great: 400 men followed him; but he was killed, and his following came to nothing. At a later date, Gamaliel goes on to say, Judas of Galilee arose at the time of the taxing, and his following too were scattered. In Josephus (Ant. XX. v. 1) we have an account of one Theudas. While Fadus was procurator, he tells us, a certain magician whose name was Theudas persuaded a great part of the people to take their effects and follow him across the Jordan. He pretended he could divide the river by his power as a prophet. Fadus attacked him suddenly, cut off his head, and dispersed his followers. It is perfectly clear that if this Theudas be the same person as is mentioned in the Acts, the author of that book has been guilty of an anachronism. For he puts into the mouth of Gamaliel, who must have spoken before A.D. 37, a reference to a revolt which occurred about A.D. 45 or 46. This discrepancy is one of the chief difficulties in the Acts of the Apostles, and various suggestions have been made to account for it.

1. Reference has already been made to the suggestion that the mistake arose through the blundering use of Josephus (vol. i. p. 30). It is not necessary to add anything to what is said there, except that a careful reperusal of the passages does not tend to make the hypothesis more credible.

2. Bishop Lightfoot (Smith's DB i. 40) points out that Theudas (=Theodorus, Theodotus, or Theodorus) would be quite natural among the Jews as the Gr. equivalent to several Heb. names; and that Josephus (Ant. XVII. x. 8; BJ II. iv. 1) tells us of many disturbances which took place at this time without giving names. He also quotes an opinion of Wieseler's that Theudas may be the Gr. form of the name of Matthias, son of Margalothus, mentioned by Josephus (Ant. XVII. vi. 2). But the identification is hardly probable.

3. Blass (ad loc.) seems to suggest that the name Theudas has been interpolated in the passage of Josephus from the Acts, because the Christians thought that the two passages illustrated one another. We have some reason for thinking that Josephus was interpolated by the Christians; but in this instance it is hardly probable that anything of the sort was done.

We do not know enough to explain the difficulty. It is perfectly possible that the explanation of Lightfoot may be correct; it is quite possible that the mistake of St. Luke may only be one of name, and it is very bad criticism to condemn an author for an apparent discrepancy when our knowledge of the circumstances is so limited. But, assuming that the Acts are incorrect, we may ask what this implies. It implies that, to a certain extent at any rate, the speech of Gamaliel was the author's composition. This may mean only that he supplied one of the incidents which Gamaliel referred to, having from some source a general knowledge of the attitude of the speaker; or it may mean that he took this manner of putting before his readers what he had reason to believe was a tendency of a section of the Jews.

THICKET.—See FOREST.

THIGH (רֵגֶל, מֵרֶכֶשׁ).—The girding of the sword upon the thigh is referred to in Ex 32⁷, Jg 3¹⁶ (Ehud girded his sword upon his right thigh, whence, being left-handed, he could most conveniently draw it, v. 21), Ps 45³, Ca 3². Jacob's thigh was dislocated by his opponent in wrestling, so that next day he limped upon it, Gn 32²⁵ (26) [J]. In an editorial note this circumstance is assigned as the basis of the Jewish custom of declining to eat of 'the sinew that shrank,' v. 32 (23). See art. FOOD, vol. ii. p. 39^a. In the jealousy ordeal one of the effects looked for in the event of a wife's guilt was the falling away (נָפַל) of her thigh, Nu 5²¹, 22, 27 [P]; see Dillm. ad loc. In the wasf in praise of the Shulanmite it is said, 'the roundings of thy thighs (תְּחִבֵּי יְרֵכֶיךָ) are like jewels,' Ca 7¹. Smiting upon the thigh appears in Jer 31¹⁹ and Ezk 21¹² as a token of consternation. For the phrase 'smite them hip upon thigh' (הִכּוּ אֶחָד אֶת־חֵיקוֹ אֶת־חֵיקוֹ הַשֵּׁנִי), see art. HIP.

Special attention is due to a set of passages in which the thigh appears as the seat of procreative power. In Gn 46²¹, Ex 1⁸ [both P], Jg 8³⁰ a man's descendants are spoken of as proceeding from his thigh (יָרֵךְ). Cf. W. R. Smith, Kinship, 34, RS² 380. This throws light upon the placing of the hand under the thigh [= the genital organ] in taking an oath, Gn 24², 47² [all J]. The sacredness attributed to this organ in primitive times (see Holzinger or Gunkel on Gn 24²) would give special solemnity to an oath of this kind. Moreover, seeing that 'it is from the thigh that one's descendants come, to take an oath with one's hand upon the thigh could be equivalent to calling upon these descendants to maintain an oath which has been taken, and to revenge one which has been broken' (Dillmann).

It is not clear how we should understand Rev 19¹⁶ 'He hath on his mantle and on his thigh (ἐπὶ τὸ ἱμάτιον καὶ ἐπὶ τὸν μηρὸν αὐτοῦ) a name written, King of kings and Lord of lords.' The καὶ may be epexegetical, when the meaning would be that the name is written on his mantle where this falls upon his thigh (so Düsterdieck, B. Weiss, Holtzmann). Spitta suggests that μηρὸς [this is its only occurrence in NT] may be the name of an article of uniform, perhaps the sword-belt.

THINK.—This verb is frequently used in AV in the sense of 'devise,' 'intend,' as Gn 50²⁰ 'But as for you, ye thought evil against me' (יָדַעְתֶּם עָוֹן כְּנִסְתֶּם); LXX ἐβουλευσάσθε ἐς πονήριον, RV 'ye meant evil'; Ex 32¹⁴ 'And the Lord repented of the evil which he thought to do unto his people' (יָדַעְתִּי יָדַעְתִּי עָוֹן); RV 'which he said he would do'; Nu 24¹¹ 'I thought to promote thee unto great honour' (יָדַעְתִּי לְהַרְבֵּה לְךָ); LXX εἶπα τιμῶσω σε); Neh 6⁶ 'It is reported . . . that thou and the Jews think to rebel' (יָדַעְתִּי לְרִיב); LXX λογίζεσθε ἀποστατήσαι. So Jn 11³³ Wyc. 'Pro that day thei thoughten [1688 soughten] for to sle him'; Mandeville, Travels, 87, 'This Tartary is holden of the great Caan of Cathay, of whom I think to speak afterward.'

To think on or upon is to remember, as Gn 40¹⁴ 'But think on me when it shall be well with thee' (יָדַעְתִּי אֲנִי אֶחָד מִן הַחֲלָמִים); LXX ἀλλὰ μνήσθητί μου διὰ σεαυτοῦ, RV 'But have me in thy remembrance'; Neh 5¹⁹ 'Think upon me, my God, for good, according to all that I have done' (יָדַעְתִּי לְךָ); RV 'Remember unto me, O my God, for good, all that I have done'; 6¹⁴ 'My God, think thou upon Tobiah and Sanballat according to these their works' (יָדַעְתִּי לְךָ); LXX μνήσθητί, RV 'Remember'; Jon 1⁸, Sir 18²⁵ 51⁸. So He 10¹⁷ Wyc. 'I schal no more thenke on the synnes and wickednessis of hem' (οὐ μὴ μνησθῆσμαι, Vulg. non recordabor).

In Anglo-Saxon there were two distinct verbs, thencan to think, and thyncean to seem, the latter used impersonally. These verbs began to be confused very early, and in course of time were always spelt alike. In poetry we still use 'methinks,' where the pron. is in the dative, and the word means 'it seems to me.' In Rich. III. iii. i. 63, the Quartos have 'Where it thinks best unto your royal self,' but the Folio reads 'Where it think'st best,' probably from confusion between 'it thinks' (= it seems) and 'it think'st thou.' Knox in his History, p. 315, says, 'But to this hour I have thought, and yet thinks my self alone more able to sustain the things affirmed in that my Work, than any ten in Europe shall be able to refute it,' where the ungrammatical 'I thinks' may be due to familiarity with the form 'methinks.'

In AV we find the verb 'think' = seem in 'me thinketh,' 2 S 18²⁷ 'Me thinketh the running of the foremost is like the running of Ahimaaz.' Cf. Gn 41³ Tind. 'And him thought that vii other kyne came up after them out of the ryver'; Lv 14³⁵ 'Me thinketh that there is as it were a leprosy in the house'; Mandeville, Travels, 117, 'And them thinketh that the more pain, and the more tribulation that they suffer for love of their god, the more joy they shall have in another world.' This is the verb that is used in the phrase 'think good,' Dn 4³ 'I thought it good to shew the signs' (RV 'I hath seemed good unto me'); Zec 11¹² 'If ye think good, give me my price'; 1 Th 3¹ 'We thought it good to be left at Athens alone' (ἰδοὺ δεῖσθαι).

J. HASTINGS.

THISBE (BS Θισβη, A Θισβη).—The place from which Tobit was carried away captive by the Assyrians (To 1²). Its position is described as being on the right hand (south) of Kedesh-naphthali in Galilee above Asher. No trace of the name has yet been found. Some commentators maintain that Thisbe was the home of Elijah the Tishbite, but this is very doubtful. The LXX reading of 1 K 17¹, which makes the prophet come from 'Tishbeh (or perh. Thisbon) of Gilead,' seems more likely to be correct. See ELIJAH in vol. i. p. 687^a.

C. W. WILSON.

THISTLES, THORNS.—There is probably no country on earth of the same extent which has so many plants with prickles and thorns as the Holy Land. One would be tempted to believe that this is a providential provision to protect them from the ravages of goats, asses, and camels, were it not that the mouths of these creatures are provided with a mucous membrane so tough that it seems impervious to thorns. One of the spectacles most striking to a stranger in this land of surprises is that of a flock of goats, browsing in a patch of Eryngiums, or Cirsiums, or prickly Centaureas, and crunching down the heads, a couple of inches in diameter, composed of stiff thorns, and then masticating them with evident relish. The camel deals even with the noli-me-tangere spheres of the Echinops, the huge heads of the Onopordon, Carlina, and Cynara, and the thorny plates of the Indian fig. Zilla myagroides, Forsk., a most impracticable crucifer, with a juice as pungent as its long stiff thorns, is the favourite desert food of the camel. He tears off and devours the twigs of the thorny Astragali. Only a few thorny plants, with little succulence to tempt, and with extraordinary defensive armour, such as the acacia trees, the buckthorn, and some of the more erinaceous Astragali of the alpine regions, and Calycotome villosa, escape the devourers. Notwithstanding this, the thorns flourish and multiply, and, in many places, take possession of the land. Thistles grow to a height of 10–15 ft. Thorny Astragali cover acres of ground on the high mountains. Poterium spinosum, Rhamnus punctata, and Calycotome villosa are everywhere. So abundant is the first of these, the thorny burnet, in one region of Hermon, as to give its name to the district, which is called Mukāta'at el-Billān, i.e. District of the Thorny Burnet. A large part of the lime produced in the country is burned with this shrub, which is 'cut up' (Is 33¹²) with pruning-hooks. It is then bound in huge bundles, and transported on the backs of men or animals to the kilns. Often an acre or more around a lime-kiln is seen covered with these large heaps of most combustible fuel. It produces a high heat, and makes excellent lime. These and other thorns are also used in ovens, and for culinary purposes (Ec 7⁶). Owners of asses thresh out various species of thistles and thorns, and use them for feeding their beasts. It is probably in allusion to this custom that Gideon is said to have 'taught [threshed] the men of Succoth (along) with thorns of the wilderness and briers' (Jg 8¹⁶). It is not strange that, with such a number of prickly plants as exist in Palestine, there should have been many names in Heb. to express them. Few or none of these denote species, and the VSS have not attempted to tr. them with any uniformity. We subjoin an analysis of these terms.

1. אֵדָד ādād, ῥάμνος, rhamnus, occurs twice as the name of a plant (Jg 9¹⁴, 15 AV 'bramble,' m. 'thistle,' RV 'bramble,' m. 'thorn,' Ps 58⁸ AV and RV 'thorns'). It occurs once as a proper name in the expression 'the threshing-floor of Atad' (Gn 50^{10, 11}). The Arab. ādād is defined as the branches of the ausaj. The ausaj is 'a species of thorn, having a round red fruit, like the carnelian bead, which is sweet, and is eaten,' or 'a species of thorn trees, having a bitter red fruit, in which is acidity . . . when it grows large it is called gharkad . . . some regard it as the 'ulleik.' It is clear that the term 'ausaj,' and therefore 'ādā,' must have been applied to a number of plants. 'Ulleik,' most commonly signifies the bramble or blackberry, but also the smilax, and other prickly climbers. The gharkad is Nitraria tridentata, Desf., a plant confined to salt marshes, of which the fruit is called in Arab. 'enab-edh-dhib, i.e. 'wolf's grapes.' Dioscorides (Avicenna, ii. 232) seems to include a number of plants in his vague description of 'ausaj.' The other descriptions would apply to the boxthorn, of which there are 3 species in the Holy Land, Lycium Europæum, L., L. Arabicum, Schw., and L. Barbarum, L., all of which have thorns and red berries. Or they would, in part at least, apply to the jujube, of which there are also several species, Zizyphus vulgaris, L., the 'ennāb, Z. Lotus, L., and Z. Spina Christi, L., the nebb or sidr. All of these would have been included under the term Rhamnus, the buckthorn, a genus from which Zizyphus has been set off in modern botany. This genus contains one thorny species, R. punctata, Boiss., with its variety Palestina, which is found everywhere in Palestine and Syria. This species would admirably suit the needs of the passages. It is a thorny shrub, 2-6 ft. high, with obovate-oblong to elliptical leaves less than an in. long and about $\frac{1}{2}$ in. wide, insignificant flowers, and small fruits. It is well known under the Arab. name 'ajram,' is used for light fuel, and suits exactly the contrast intended in Abimelech's speech between the 'ādā' and the lordly cedar. To speak of sitting under the shadow of this contemptible straggling bush is the acme of irony. Being far more general than the boxthorn, especially in the hill-country where Abimelech spoke, it is more likely to have been in his mind. The boxthorn would never have been spoken of by the Greeks as páuros, which is the classical name of the buckthorn. The writer has never met with the former in the hill-country. It is a plant of the coast and Jordan Valley and the interior plateaus.

2. בַּרְכָּאִתִּים barkāntim (Jg 8⁷⁻¹⁶). According to Moore (Judges, ad loc.), 'in the Egypt. dialect of Arabic bergan is the name of Phacopappus scoparius, Boiss. = Centaurea scop., Sieber, a composite plant, with thorny heads.'

3. דַּרְדָּר dardār (Gn 3¹⁸, Hos 10⁸, each time coupled with q̄q̄). The Arab. dardār signifies the elm or the ash, but shaukat ed-dardār is generic for the thorny Centaureas, star thistles or knapweeds, which are not proper thistles, i.e. of the genus Cirsium. In both the passages cited the LXX has tribolos, Vulg. tribulus. At least 2, perhaps 3, plants were known to the Greeks by this name: Trapa natans, L., the water chestnut, and Tribulus terrestris, L., a prostrate herb of the order Zygophyllaceæ, with pinnate leaves, resembling those of the milk vetch, and a fruit composed of bony cells, with a prickly back. These are liable to get into the shoe or between the sandal and the foot, and produce a veritable tribulation. The caltrop, an instrument suggested by them, was used in war to impede the charge of cavalry. Some have identified the tribulus with the thorny Centaureas.

4. חֵדֶלֶק (Pr 15¹⁹, LXX δαρθα, AV and RV 'thorn'; Mic 7⁴ [LXX text differs] AV and RV 'brier') refers to some unknown kind of thorn, certainly in the first passage one of those used for hedges. The most common of these in Palestine and Syria is Eleagnus hortensis, M.B., the silver berry or oleaster, known in Arab. as zaizafūn. It has stiff, sharp thorns, and grows in a dense fashion which well fits it for this purpose. The ordinary brambles, species of Rubus, are also much used for hedges, especially along the coast. Also Palurus aculeatus, Lam., one of the so-called Christ thorns, a plant of the order Rhamnaceæ, growing in the interior tablelands. Also Cactus Ficus-Indica, L., the prickly pear, Smilax aspera, L., the green brier, which makes a most efficient hedge, and the boxthorn, which is common in hedges about Jaffa, Lattakia, and elsewhere. The hawthorn, Crataegus, of which there are several species, is not used in this way.

5. חֹהָח hōhah. This is variously tr. (2 K 14⁹ 'thistle,' RVm 'thorn'; 2 Ch 25¹⁸ 'thistle,' AVm 'furze bush' [Calycotome villosa] or 'thorn,' RVm 'thorn'; Hos 9⁶ 'thorns'; Is 34¹³ AV 'brambles,' RV 'thistles'; Job 31⁴⁰ 'thistles,' RVm 'thorns'; Pr 26⁹ 'thorn'; Ca 2⁸ 'thorns'; 1 S 13⁸ חֲמִים 'thickets' [better thorn brakes, unless we read with Ew., Wellh., Driver, et al. חֲמִים 'holes']; Job 41² AV 'thorn,' RV 'hook,' m. 'spike'; 2 Ch 33¹¹ AV 'thorns,' RV 'in chains,' m. 'with hooks'). From the above inconsistencies, which are quite parallel to those of the LXX and Vulg., it is clear that no specific meaning can be attached to hōhah. It would seem, however, rather to designate thorns and thorny shrubs and trees than prickles and prickly herbs like thistles.

6. מִשְׁכִּיכָה mēšikāh (Mic 7⁴) is a 'thorn hedge.' Of what kind we have no means of determining (see 4).

7. נִי'ד ni'āzūz. The Arab. ni'd corresponds with this, and signifies a thorn tree growing in Arabia. It may be one of the thorny acacias. In the two passages in which it occurs (Is 7¹⁹ 55¹³) it is tr. 'thorns.' In the latter (LXX στροβί) it is said that it will be replaced by the bērōsh. See FIR.

8. סִירִים širim. This seems to refer to the lighter thorns, like the thorny burnet, which often grows in ruins (Is 34¹³), and many of the star thistles, etc. The burning of these produces a crackling (Ec 7⁶ AVm 'sound,' where there is a word-play between šir 'pot' and širim 'thorns'). 'Folden together as thorns' (AV Nah 1¹⁰, RV 'like tangled thorns') would well suit such as the burnet, and many others in Palestine. As hōhah came to mean 'hook,' from the resemblance to a thorn, so širōth is once used in this way for 'fish-hook' (Am 4³).

9. שִׁלֹן šillōn, AV and RV 'brier' (Ezk 23⁴); שִׁלְלִיתִים šallōtīm, AV and RV 'thorns' (Ezk 2², but text dub.), are stout thorns, such as are found on the midrib of the palm leaf, corresponding exactly to the Arab. sulā.

10. שָׂרָבִים šārābīm is from an obsolete root signifying perh. to be refractory or rebellious. In the single passage where it is used (Ezk 2⁶), the context points to some stiff, refractory thorn, of which šārābīm was prob. the ancient name. It is associated with the stout thorn of the palm, šillōn (9); but we have no Arab. clue, as in the other case, to help us to a knowledge of what it was. AVm tr. it 'rebels'; but this is forced. Instead of 'briers and thorns' (שָׂרָבִים וְשִׁלְלִיתִים), Cornill, Bertholet, et al., would read 'resisting and despising' (שָׂרָבִים וְשִׁלְלִיתִים).

11. סִירָד širpād.—A plant of neglected and desert places, mentioned with ni'āzūz (Is 55¹³), to be replaced by the myrtle as ni'āzūz will be by the fir. The LXX has κόρυδα = Inula viscosa, L., the elecampane, a plant which grows on all the hillsides of Palestine and Syria. It is a perennial of the order Compositæ, growing from 2-3 ft. high, with lanceolate to linear-lanceolate leaves, and yellow heads, about $\frac{1}{2}$ in. long. It is very glutinous, and has a strong, disagreeable smell. It is a plant worthless either as forage or fuel. It possesses only two merits. The first is that brooms made of the green stems with their leaves on are used to sweep the floors of the native houses, and help to rid them of the fleas, which adhere to the slime which covers the plant. The other is that it grows on dry, rocky hillsides, and mitigates by its greenness the otherwise deserted and barren aspect of the landscape. Now it happens that the myrtle grows on similar hillsides, often side by side with the elecampane. The contrast between this worthless plant and the myrtle, with its delicious fragrance, its beautiful foliage, exquisite flowers, and edible fruit, is quite sufficient for the requirements of the passage. 'Brier' of AV and RV, and urtica = 'nettle' of Vulg., besides lacking the authority of the LXX, would not convey a meaning so forcible as the elecampane. The Arab. name for the plant is irk el-tayyūn.

12. זִנְנִים zinnim is used twice: Job 5² (LXX κακῶν), where both MT and meaning are doubtful (Bevan, Journ. of Philol. xxvi. 303 ff. reads plausibly צִנְנִי הָרָקָה, and renders 'and their wealth bars lay hold of it'); and Pr 22³ (LXX τριβόλαι), where the froward wander into desert places, where they are sure to meet with thorns. Another form of the same, צִנְנִי zinnim (Nu 33²²), where it is associated with צִנְנִי [see 18], Jos 23¹³), simply refers to thorns as piercing the flesh, not to any particular plant.

13. קִץ kiz is a generic term for thorny and prickly plants, tr. indifferently 'thorn' (Ezk 28²⁴ where it refers to an individual thorn, Hos 10⁸), or 'thorns' (Gn 3¹⁸, Is 32¹³), pl. צִנְנִים or צִנְנִי kizim (Jg 8⁷, Jer 4⁸ etc.).

14. קִמְשֹׁנִים kimmeshonim is once (Pr 24³¹) tr. 'thorns,' but the sing. form קִמְשֹׁן (Is 34¹³) and קִמְשֹׁן (Hos 9⁹) 'nettles.' See NETTLES.

15. סִכְכִּים sikkim, the pl. of סִכְךָ = Arab. shauk, generic for thorns (Nu 33²²), tr. 'pricks.'

16. שָׁמִיר shamir occurs only in Isaiah, and always associated with צִנְנִי shāmīr (5⁸ 7²²⁻²³ 9¹⁸ 10¹⁷ 27⁴); always tr. 'thorns,' as shāmīr is tr. 'briers.'

17. צִנְנִי shāmīr means both 'thorn' and 'adamant.' In the former signification it occurs only in Isaiah, and each time but one (32¹³), where it is associated with קִץ in company with shayith. It is uniformly tr. 'briers.' Its Arab. equivalent, samūr, is the desert Acacia Seyyal, or A. tortilis.

Most of the above names were probably specific and well understood in the days when they were used; but, as has been seen, few, if any, can certainly be identified. The NT words for 'thorns and thistles,' ἀκανθαι and τριβόλαι (Mt 7¹⁶, Lk 6⁴⁴), and 'thorns,' ἀκανθαι (Mt 13⁷), and 'thorn' (rather 'stake'), σκόλον (2 Co 12⁷), are indefinite. There are not less than 50 genera and 200 species of plants in Syria and Palestine furnished with thorns and prickles, besides a multitude clothed with scabrous, strigose, or stinging hairs, and another multitude with prickly fruits.

Crown of Thorns.—It is impossible to tell of what species our Saviour's crown (στέφανος ἐξ ἀκανθῶν, ἀκάνθινος στέφανος) was composed. It is certain, however, that it must have been made from a plant growing near to Jerusalem. It is often identified with Zizyphus Spina-Christi (see Tristram, Nat. Hist. of Bible, 429). It might well have been Calycolome villosa, Vahl, the kundaal of the Arabs. Crowns of this are plaited and sold in Jerusalem, as representatives of our Saviour's crown. The facility with which the branches of this shrub are wrought into the required shape, and the evident adaptation of the resulting crown to the torture intended, make it highly probable that this was the material used. Poterium spinosum, L., is also wrought into such crowns, but makes a much softer and less efficient instrument of torture than the last. A cruel one could be made of Rhamnus punctata, Boiss., also of Ononis anti-quorum, L., the shibruk of the Arabs.

THOMAS (Θωμάς = כְּמֹנִי).—One of the Twelve, always placed in the second of the three groups of four in which the names of the apostles are arranged in the NT lists. In the oldest extant list (Mk 3^{16c}) the names are not distributed in pairs, and he is No. 8, as also in Lk 6^{14c}; but in the later lists he is coupled with Matthew and assigned the seventh place (Mt 10^{2c}), or given the sixth place, coupled with Philip (Ac 1^{13c}). No incident is recorded of him by the Synoptists, but from John we learn that he played a conspicuous part in the anxieties and questionings which followed the Resurrection, which perhaps accounts for the higher position assigned to him in the lists as soon as the names began to be arranged or classified; cf. Jn 21², where he is placed after Peter and before the sons of Zebedee. John thrice describes him as Θωμάς ὁ λεγόμενος Δίδυμος (11¹⁶ 20²⁴ 21²). Θωμάς is a 'twin' [only Gn 25²⁴ 38²⁷, Ca 4⁶ 7³, always in plur.], and of this Θωμάς is a transliteration, ὁ δίδυμος being the Gr. translation. This last would be the form of the title most natural among the Greek-speaking Christians of Asia Minor, for whom the Fourth Gospel was written. His personal name is not given in the NT, but he is called 'Judas Thomas' in the apocryphal Acta Thomæ, in the Syr. Doctrina Apostolorum, and also in the Abgar legend (Eus. HE i. 13), which represents him as sending THADDEUS to Abgar with Christ's letter. The name 'Judas' was a common one, and it may well have been his; at any rate the ascription of it to him led in time to his identification with Judas 'of James,' and Judas the 'brother' of the Lord (Mk 6³), and so to the widespread tradition that the Apostle Thomas was the twin brother of Jesus (Acta Thomæ, § 31). The identification of Thaddæus (Mt 10³, Mk 3¹⁸) with Luke's Judas 'of James' (Lk 6¹⁶, Ac 1¹³) accounts for a later Syrian tradition which makes Thomas and Thaddæus the same person. Another story makes one Lysia the twin sister of Thomas.

The three notices of Thomas in John reveal a personality of singular charm and interest. When the other apostles would have dissuaded Jesus from the risk of going to Bethany where Lazarus lay dead, and Jesus had said that He would nevertheless go, Thomas at once declared his intention of sharing the danger: 'Let us also go that we may die with him' (Jn 11¹⁶). His eager devotion could not endure the thought of separation, and so the announcement at the Last Supper that the Master was about to depart filled him with perplexity: 'We know not whither thou goest; how know we the way?' (Jn 14⁵). Like the other disciples, he could not but suppose that the Crucifixion had put an end to his hopes, although it does not appear from the narratives (as has sometimes been assumed) that Thomas had severed his connexion with the other companions of Christ, for 'the eleven' are mentioned as still a coherent body (Lk 24³³⁻³⁵ [Mk] 16¹³), and Thomas is found in their company on 'the first day of the week,' presumably for worship and conference, even after he had expressed his doubts as to the Resurrection (Jn 20²⁶). When, however, the Christ appeared to the other apostles at Jerusalem, Thomas was not with them, although the reason of his absence is not recorded (Jn 20²⁴). They were invited to assure themselves by the test of touch that the vision was not that of a phantom but of the Risen Jesus (Lk 24³⁹), and even this did not convince them until He 'did eat before them' (Lk 24⁴¹⁻⁴³). Thomas, on being informed of the vision of the Lord, refused to believe until he too had satisfied himself by sight and touch that there was no misapprehension (Jn 20²⁶); but when this test was offered to (and applied by?) him, his recognition of his Master was immediate and adoring: 'My Lord and my God' (Jn 20²⁸). No greater confession of faith is recorded in the NT. These three incidental notices of Thomas depend entirely, as has already been pointed out, on the authority of the Fourth Gospel; but there is nothing in any of them which is either incredible in itself, or inconsistent with the Synoptic accounts, and the psychological truth and naturalness of the resulting picture of the man confirm belief in the trustworthiness of the Johannine narratives.

The Acta Thomae or *Πράξεις Θωμᾶ is a Gnostic work probably going back to the 2nd cent., and written by one Leucius the author of several apocryphal Acta. It begins by telling that, at the division of the field of the world among the apostles, India was allocated to Thomas; that he was at first unwilling to go there, but was persuaded by a vision of Christ, who sold him as a slave to an Indian merchant. After some adventures by the way (which display the Gnostic tendencies of the writer; see Salmon, Introd. to NT p. 334 f.), he arrived in India, and there (being a carpenter) was entrusted by his master with the building of a palace, but expended the money on the relief of the poor. His missionary efforts were at last crowned with success. The connexion of his name with India, for which these Acta are the earliest authority, was widely accepted after the 4th cent. in both East and West. The Malabar 'Christians of St. Thomas' still count him as the first martyr and evangelist of their country. It is probable, however, that these Christians were evangelized from Edessa, and that the traditional account of their origin is due to a confused memory of one of the pioneer missionaries from that place, who was called Thomas after its patron saint. For there is a quite distinct (and seemingly earlier) account of the missionary activity of the apostle which makes Parthia the scene of his labours (Eus. HE iii. 1; see also Clem. Recogn. ix. 29, and Socrates, HE i. 19), and Edessa his burial-place (Rufinus, HE ii. 6, and Socrates, HE iv. 18). According to the Roman Martyrology his remains were brought from India to Edessa, and thence, it was said, to Ortona in Italy during the Crusades. The oldest extant tradition as to the manner of his death is that it was from natural causes (Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. 9. 78).

THOUGHT.—In 1 S 9⁶ 'Come, and let us return; lest my father leave caring for the asses, and take thought for us,' the phrase 'take thought' means 'be anxious,' 'grieve.' The same verb (מָחַשׂ) is translated 'sorrow' in 10⁴ 'Thy father hath left the care of the asses, and sorroweth for you.' RV has 'take thought' in both passages, but Amer. RV gives 'be anxious' in both. In Ps 38¹⁸ both versions render the Hebrew word 'I will be sorry.' 'Thought' was once freely used in English in the sense of 'anxiety' or 'grief.' Thus Cranmer, Works, i. 162, 'Alas, Master Secretary, you forget Master Smyth of the Exchequer, who is near consumed with thought and pensiveness'; Somers Tracts, 'In five hundred years only two queens have died in childbirth. Queen Catherine Parr died rather of thought'; Shaks. Hamlet, III. i. 85—

'And thus the native hue of resolution
Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought'; and iv. v. 177—'And there is pansies, that's for thoughts.' Cf. Wyclif's use of the verb, Select Works, iii. 9, 'As a bird of a swallowe, so I schal crie, I schal thinke as a dowve.' In AV 'thought' occurs in this sense only in the phrase 'take thought.' Besides 1 S 9⁶ (above) the examples are Mt 6²⁵, 27, 28, 31, 34 b; 10¹⁹, Lk 12¹¹, 22, 23, 26 (all μεριμνᾶω), and Mk 13¹¹ 'take no thought beforehand'

* The best edition of the Gr. and Lat. texts of these Acta is that of Bonnet (1883); for the Syriac Acta see Wright, Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles (1871); and for the Ethiopic version of the story, Malan, Conflicts of the Holy Apostles (1871). THRACIA (Θράκη) was the country lying east of Macedonia, bounded on the north by the Danube and on the south by the Aegean Sea, the Dardanelles, the Sea of Marmora, and the territory of Byzantium (a 'free city,' connected with the Roman province of Bithynia from B.C. 74). Thrace is never mentioned in the NT, nor did any action alluded to in the NT take place in that country. Philippi and Neapolis, indeed, had originally been in Thrace; but the boundaries of Macedonia were extended far towards the east by the conquests of the Macedonian kings, and included both cities. Before the Roman period the boundary between Macedonia and Thrace was the boundary between civilization and barbarism, and this varied as civilization enlarged its limits. Originally the name Thracia was used in a very loose and vague fashion, and the Macedonians were even sometimes spoken of as a tribe of Thrace, which in that case practically meant the land north and north-east of Greece. The Macedonians were akin to the Thracians, but came under the influence of Greek civilization earlier.* It was not until A.D. 46 that Thrace was incorporated as a province in the Roman empire.

In 2 Mac 12²⁶ a Thracian soldier is mentioned as saving the life of Gorgias, governor of Idumaea† under Antiochus Epiphanes, in a battle against Judas Maccabeus, about B.C. 163. The Thracian tribesmen, barbarous, hardy, and inured to war, were much used as mercenaries by the Greek kings of Syria, Pergamum, Bithynia, etc. This is several times mentioned by Polybius (v. lxxv. 10, lxxix. 6); and inscriptions along with other evidence entirely corroborate him. Thracian mercenaries were settled as colonists in many of the garrison cities founded by those kings, e.g. in Apollonia of Pisidia (where they are often mentioned on coins, etc., in the full title of the city) and in other places: the Thracian mercenaries were sometimes called Traleis or 'warriors'; see Ramsay, Histor. Geogr. of Asia Minor, p. 112, Cities and Bish. of Phrygia, i. p. 34; Fränkel, Inscr. Pergam. i., No. 13, p. 16.

THREE CHILDREN, SONG OF THE (or, more accurately, as in Codex B: 'The Prayer of Azarias' and 'the Hymn of the Three'), is one of the additions to the book of Daniel, extant only in the Greek Bible and in versions taken from the Greek. It contains 67 verses, and is inserted between v.¹² and v.²⁴ of Dn 3 in the canonical text. In Codex A our 'addition' forms also two of fourteen canticles appended to the Book of Psalms. The ninth and tenth of these canticles are called respectively προσευχή Ἀζαρίου (Prayer of Azarias) and ὕμνος τῶν πατέρων ἡμῶν (Hymn of our Fathers).

i. CONTENTS.—The apocryphon contains three sections: (1) the Prayer of Azarias; (2) descriptive narrative; (3) thanksgiving of the Three for their deliverance from the fiery furnace.

* It is maintained by some scholars that Thrace, in that early wide extension, is alluded to in Gn 10². In that verse the sons of Japheth are said to be Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, and Tiras; but see TIRAS.

† Idumaea is suspicious: it has been thought to be an error for Jamnia.

(1) The Prayer of Azarias, vv. 1-22 (Gr. 24-45).—In Dn 3²² it has been narrated that the three men, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, fell down bound into the midst of the burning fiery furnace. After 3²³ Theodotion (whose text is followed in Vulg. and the English Apoc.) proceeds: 'And they walked [in their chains, Syr W] in the midst of the fire, praising God.' The connexion is, in LXX, effected thus: 'Thus then prayed Hananias and Azarias and Michael and sang praises to the Lord, when the king commanded them to be cast into the furnace.' Both then say that 'Azarias stood and prayed in the midst of the fire'; LXX adding 'together with his companions,' which Theod. omits, as he does also the statement of LXX that 'the furnace had been heated exceedingly by the Chaldeans.' The Prayer opens with praise to God for His righteous acts to the nation, acknowledging His justice even in the disasters which He has brought upon Jerusalem. National ruin was completely justified, because of national sins. He complains, however, that the nation by which God had chastised His people was a very lawless one, and that their king was the most wicked king on earth, treating Israel scornfully and tyrannically. He then pleads the covenants with the fathers and the promises of the vast expansion of the nation as the ground of God's intervention to the very small remnant. They had been brought very low: the State was dissolved: State functionaries had ceased to be: State religion was no longer possible; but with the sacrifice of a contrite heart, rather than of myriads of rams, they would seek the Lord and implore Him to remove their shame and transfer it to their foes; that all may know that 'J' is God alone.

(2) In vv. 23-27 of EV (Gr. 46-51) we have a continuation of the narrative of Dn 3²², describing how the king's servants kept on heating the furnace with naphtha and pitch till it was seven times as hot as usual, and the flame reached 49 cubits above the furnace. Then an angel came down, called in Syr. 'the angel of dew,' and by means of a dewy whistling wind made the centre of the furnace cool, forming an inner zone which the flames could not touch. After this 'the three' unitedly began to praise God.

(3) The Hymn of Thanksgiving, vv. 28-48 (Gr. 52-90). This Hymn, like Ps 136, contains, as the second line of each verse, a refrain. As the Psalm repeats throughout the words, 'For his mercy endureth for ever'; so our Hymn, in every verse, ascribes praise to God. For the first six verses the ascription is verbally varied, though identical in meaning. After that, the second line of each verse is ὑμνήσωμαι ἀπὸς αὐτοῦ ἐν παντί αἰῶνα, 'Praise and superexalt him for ever.' In the first place the Psalmist (for such he really is) exults in the fact that 'J' is worthy to be praised in the heavenly temple, sitting on the throne of His glory: from the loftiest heights looking down on the deepest depths. Then he apostrophizes all the works of God and calls on them to praise the Lord: angels, the heavens, the celestial waters, sun, moon, and stars. From things celestial he passes to what we call meteorological phenomena, but which, to the Jewish mind, were changes presided over by an angel,—if not indeed themselves actual entities,—rain and dew, winds, frost and snow, light and darkness, lightnings and clouds. Then the terrestrial creation is addressed, mountains, vegetation, showers, fountains, monsters, fowls, and beasts. After that, men of various ranks and conditions in life: Israel, priests, slaves, the righteous, the humble, and last of all, as Ps 103 terminates with the words 'Bless the Lord, O my soul,' we have in v. 38 'O Hananias, Azarias, and Michael, bless ye the Lord.' The last two verses are from Ps 136, and were probably appended by some later hand.

ii. LITERARY ESTIMATE.—The judgment of Eichhorn (Einleitung, 419, ed. 1795), that the Prayer of Azarias is unsuitable to the circumstances, and that it betrays a lack of literary art to suppose that in a fiery furnace any man could pray as he does, is endorsed by most later scholars (Fritzsch, 115). There are 'no groans,' 'no personal petitions,' 'no cries for help.' The author makes Azarias review the history of the Jewish nation as calmly as an aged saint might do under the fig-tree of solitude at the time of evening prayer. On one supposition, however, the Prayer becomes thoroughly relevant. If we might assume that the author of the Prayer regarded the narrative of Dn 3 as a Haggada, a symbolical, but not historical, account of the Babylonian captivity: as in Zec 3² the angel says concerning Joshua the high priest, 'Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire?'—then the Prayer would be quite suitable. As to the poetical character of the Hymn, critics differ. Fritzsch considered the accumulation of doxologies devoid of all literary skill, and the enumeration of the powers of creation, frigid. Ball, however, replies (Speaker's Com. 307) that the very monotony is effective. 'It is like the monotony of the winds or the waves, and powerfully suggests to the imagination the amplitude and splendour of God's world, and the sublimity of the universal chorus of praise. The instinct of the Church which early adopted the Benedicite for liturgical use was right.' Zöckler sympathizes so strongly with Ball against Fritzsch that he quotes the above in English. The Hymn is modelled after Ps 136, and has equal claim to be considered poetical.

iii. AUTHORSHIP.—The name and date of the composer of the Prayer and Hymn are quite unknown. It is even disputed whether they come from the same author. The chief argument for duality is that v. 19²⁰ implies the cessation of Temple worship. 'There is no . . . sacrifice nor place to offer sacrifice before thee': whereas in v. 31³⁴ there is reference to a Temple, and in v. 32³⁵ to priests. The argument is not valid. The Temple in v. 31 is the heavenly Temple, where the Lord is enthroned on the cherubim. Further, the priesthood was hereditary. A man did not cease to be a priest when the Temple was destroyed; and hence we note that v. 19 does not say, 'There is no priest.'—It is even more eagerly disputed whether the Gr. text is the original, or a translation from Heb. or Aramaic. Eichhorn in his first edition favoured Gr. authorship. In his second edition he adduced reasons for regarding it as a translation, but held the evidence to be indecisive. This uncertainty still remains. Fritzsch, Keil, Bissell, and Schürer are against a Semitic authorship. Ball attaches more importance than they do to Eichhorn's indications of translation. The difficulty is this: every extant version is clearly based on the LXX. Where Theod. differs from LXX, it is usually in very small matters of addition or omission. There are no synonymous, but verbally variant, phrases, indicating that both are translated from the same original. There are no marks that Theod. or any version used a Semitic copy in order to correct LXX. In such cases the only evidence of translation work is to be sought in the awkward, barely intelligible phrases. We have to retranslate these into the hypothetical original, and see if by some slight modification of this we can secure a better rendering. In the case before us the results are disappointing. We may premise, however, that if there ever was a Semitic original, it would be Heb. and not Aramaic. The orthodox Palestinian Jew considered Heb. the language of heaven, and always used it in prayer and praise.—The evidence in favour of Heb. stands thus: (1) The style is intensely Hebraistic, perhaps more so than an Alexandrian Jew would use in original composition. (2) The names of the three men are their original Hebrew names (Dn 17), not the Aramaic names found in Dn 3¹⁶, 19, 22, 26 etc. (3) V. 17²⁰ is very obscure. In LXX it reads literally, 'Let our sacrifice be before thee, and may it make atonement behind thee' (ἐξιλάσαι ἐπισθὲν σου). Theod. reads ἐκτελέσαι ἐπισθὲν σου, 'May it make requital behind thee.' At the end of the verse in LXX there occurs an incorporated marginal gloss: τελειῶσαι ἐπισθὲν σου, 'let it be perfect behind thee.' These three Gr. verbs seem very diverse, but, if we might assume a Heb. original from which they are a tr., the matter is simplified. These Gr. verbs may represent different forms of the Heb. root עָשָׂה. The Hiphil עָשָׂה 'to make peace' may account for ἐξιλάσαι. The Piel עָשָׂה and the Gr. τελείω both mean to 'pay,' 'requite'; and the Qal עָשָׂה means to 'be perfect.' We do not attempt to explain ἐπισθεν. (4) It might seem that the phrase 'to scatter a covenant' in v. 11, instead of 'violate,' was a confusion of עָשָׂה and עָשָׂה: but the same thing occurs in LXX of Gn 17¹⁴ and Lv 26¹⁶, 44. So also the use of ἀπό with κατασχύνεσθαι, 'to be ashamed,' might arise from translating the Heb. יָזָה (Eichh. 428); but both ἐκ and ἀπό are used in LXX with verbs of 'shame,' and thus this also may be a Hebraism, and due to familiarity with the LXX. The evidence of a Heb. original is not irresistible, but probable.

iv. VERSIONS.—The LXX presents the earliest extant text. Theod. edited the LXX with sundry emendations of little significance: none of them so important as in 'Bel and the Dragon' (vol. i. 267). A collation of the two versions is given by Eichhorn (422 ff.), and also in Field's Hexapla (ii. 914 ff.). The Vulg. is in the main an accurate tr. of Theodotion. The Syriac as given by Lagarde is the same text as Walton's, the differences being merely such as occur in transcription. Worthy of note are the readings: 15 (28), 'a place where we may offer spices and a sacrifice'; 17 (40), 'let not thy servant be ashamed' for ἡ δαμάσκηνοσσι σου; 48 (73), 'The angel of devo went down into the furnace.' The Syro-Hexaplar text is a tr. of the LXX.

v. CANONICITY.—Ball gives several citations from Jewish writings of the incidents narrated in the Biblical portions of Dn 3; but it is difficult to find Rabbinic quotations of our apocryphon. Pesachim 118a tells how R. Hiskiah describes the three martyrs as reciting Ps 115, clause by clause, in rotation; and how R. Samuel the Shilonite used to say that Yorkemi, the prince of hail, begged to go down to cool the furnace; but Gabriel offered not only to make the furnace cool within (as the hail would do), but also to make it hot without (Speaker's Apocr. 306 f.).

In the Christian Church, Hippolytus gives a few notes explanatory of the Song. Julius Africanus disputed the canonicity of the additions to Daniel. Origen wrote in reply defending their genuineness, and on several occasions quotes 'the Prayer'; e.g. in Com. on Matt. bk. xiii. 2 he quotes v. 64 (26) 'as it stands in the book of Daniel according to the LXX' as representing the difference between the soul and the body. Cyprian, de Lapsis, c. 31, quotes v. 2 (22) as 'scriptura divina'; and he adduces the Prayer of the 'tres pueri in camino inclusi' as a model of public prayer (de Orat. Dominica, c. 8).

THRESHING.—See AGRICULTURE, vol. i. p. 50.

THRESHOLD.—1. In Neh 12²⁸ תַּחְתִּי הַשְּׁעָרִים (AV 'thresholds of the gates') undoubtedly means 'storehouses of the gates' (so RV; cf. RV 'storehouse' as tr. of תַּחְתִּי הַשְּׁעָרִים [AV 'house of Asuppim'] in 1 Ch 26¹⁸, and of תַּחְתִּי הַשְּׁעָרִים alone [AV 'Asuppim'] in v. 17). The text of the LXX is in this verse defective, but the words ἐν τῷ συναγωγῆν με τοὺς πύλωνας obviously represent תַּחְתִּי הַשְּׁעָרִים. 2. קָ: Jg 19²⁷ the Levite's concubine was found in the morning dead, with her hands upon the threshold; 1 K 14¹⁷ Jeroboam's wife had just reached the threshold of the palace at Tirzah when her son died; Am 9¹ 'Smite the chapters [of the columns supporting the temple roof] till the thresholds shake'; Is 6⁴ 'the foundations of the thresholds were moved at the voice of him that cried'; Ezk 43⁸, referring to the circumstance that the royal palace and Solomon's temple were within the same enclosure and formed one set of buildings, God makes it a matter of reproach that they have set 'their threshold by my threshold, and their door post beside my door post'; Zeph 2¹⁴ 'desolation (תִּבְיָה); but Wellh., Now, et al., after LXX κόρακες, read עֵרַב 'raven(s)'; shall be on the thresholds (of ruined Nineveh). A class of temple officials were 'keepers of the threshold' (שְׁכָרֵי הַתֵּרָזִי): Jer 35⁴ [in sing.], 2 K 12¹⁰ 22⁴ (= 2 Ch 34⁹) * 23⁴ 25¹⁸ (= Jer 52³⁴); 2 Ch 23⁴ [שְׁכָרֵי הַתֵּרָזִי]; in 1 Ch 9¹⁹. 22

* These keepers of the door are in 2 K 12¹⁰ 'priests'; in 2 Ch 34⁹ they characteristically become 'Levites.'

[in the latter verse שְׁכָרֵי הַתֵּרָזִי] similar officials are provided for the tabernacle; the office is a secular one in Est 2²¹ 6², answering more to that of body-guard (cf. the LXX ἀρχισωματοφύλακες in 2²¹). In Ps 84¹¹ the pilgrim declares that he prefers being at the threshold (Β παρὰ πύλινθαι) in the house of God to dwelling in the tents of wickedness. The other occurrences of תֵּרָזִי are: Ezk 40⁶ bis. 7 41¹⁸ bis, 2 Ch 3⁷.

The principal LXX renderings of תֵּרָזִי not noticed above are: τὰ πύλωνα, Jg 19²⁷, 1 K 14¹⁷, Ezk 43⁸; τὰ ὑπὸ πύλωνας, Is 6⁴; τὰ ἐρείσματα, Am 9¹; αἱ πύλωνα, Zeph 2¹⁴, 2 Ch 3⁷; (ὁ φυλάκων or αἱ φυλάκωντες) τὴν αὐλήν, Jer 35 (42)⁴, or τὴν σταθμὴν, 2 K 12¹⁰ (9) 22⁴ 25¹⁸, or τὴν πύλιν, 2 Ch 34⁹, or τὴν ὁδὸν, Jer 52³⁴, or τὴν εἰσόδον, 1 Ch 9¹⁹; (αἱ τὰς πύλωνας) τὴν εἰσόδον, 2 Ch 23⁴; θυρῶν, Ezk 41¹⁸.

3. תֵּרָזִי: 1 S 5⁴ 5 Dagon was found prostrate before the ark, with his head and hands cut off upon the threshold; hence, it is said, the worshippers of Dagon leap over the threshold, to avoid contact with a spot rendered sacred by having been the resting-place of these members of the god. It is impossible to decide whether it is this (Philistine) custom that is referred to in Zeph 1⁹ 'every one who leaps over [or 'upon,' זָרַע] the threshold.' See art. CHERETHITES, vol. i. p. 377^a. The threshold of the temple is referred to in Ezk 9¹ 10⁴ 18 46³ 47¹ (in the last named passage as the source of the stream which is seen in vision to flow forth to fertilize the 'Arabah).

The usual LXX equivalent for תֵּרָזִי is αἰθρῶν: Ezk 9¹ 10⁴ 18 47¹; in 40² and 1 S 5⁴ πύλωνας; in 1 S 5⁴ βαθμοί; in Zeph 1⁹ πύλωνα.

For Trumbull's view (The Threshold Covenant, 303 ff.) of the Passover as a threshold cross-over sacrifice, see art. PASSOVER, vol. iii. p. 689. Cf. also art. FOUNDATION. J. A. SELLIE.

THRONE is OT rendering of the Heb. מִנְיָן [in 1 K 10¹⁹ bis, Job 26⁹ מִנְיָן; in Dn 5³⁰ 7¹⁰ bis Aram. מִנְיָן], which is used for any seat of honour or state, e.g. of the high priest, 1 S 1⁹ 4¹⁸ 18; of an honoured guest, 2 K 4¹⁰; of the pehah beyond the River, Neh 3⁷; of a judge, Ps 94³⁰; of a military officer, Jer 1¹⁸; but far more usually of a king, Gn 41⁴⁰ [E], Ex 11⁵ 12²⁰ [both J], 1 K 2¹⁹, Is 47¹, Ezk 26¹⁶, Est 5¹. Solomon's throne is described in 1 K 10¹⁸⁻²⁰ [= 2 Ch 9¹⁷⁻¹⁹]. It was overlaid with ivory and the finest gold (see Kittel, Könige, ad loc.), and was ascended by six steps, with twelve lions standing upon them. For figures of Assyrian and Egyptian thrones see Richm, HWB ii. 1106, 1684. God as the heavenly King has His throne: Is 6¹, Ezk 1²⁶ 10¹, 1 K 22¹⁹ [= 2 Ch 18¹⁸], Job 26⁹, Ps 11⁴; heaven is called His throne in Is 66¹ (cf. Mt 5³⁴), Jerus. in Jer 3¹⁷, the sanctuary in 17¹² and Ezk 43⁷. 'Throne' is frequently used as = royal dignity, authority, power, e.g. 1 K 2³⁶ ('the throne of David shall be established,' cf. 2 S 7¹⁶ [= 1 Ch 17¹⁴]), Is 16⁵, Pr 16¹²; of God, La 5¹⁸, Ps 47⁸ 89¹⁵ 93⁷ 97² 103¹⁹, Jer 14²¹. For the cult of 'empty thrones' see Reichel, Ueber vorhellenische Götterkulte (Wien, 1897), and Budde's art. 'Imageless Worship in Antiquity' in Expos. Times, ix. (1898) 396 ff.

Similar is the use of 'throne' (θρόνος; once Ac 12²¹ βῆμα, lit. 'judgment-seat,' of Herod) in NT; almost always [the exceptions are Mt 19²⁸ || Lk 22³⁰ 'ye shall sit upon twelve thrones,' etc., Col 1¹⁶ 'thrones' as a rank of angels (?; see art. DOMINION), Rev 20⁴ 'I saw thrones, and they (the assessors of the heavenly Judge) sat upon them'] of the throne of God or of Christ: Mt 5²⁴ (|| Lk 23²²) 19²⁸ (|| Lk 22³⁰), Lk 13², Ac 2³⁰ 7⁴⁰, He 1⁸ 4¹⁶ 8¹ 12², Rev 1⁴ 3³ and very often.

In Ps 45⁷ the Heb. text מִנְיָן הַתֵּרָזִי (thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever); LXX ὁ θρόνος σου, ὁ θεός, followed in He 1⁸ is probably corrupt. In addition to the tr. of EV the following renderings have been proposed: (1) 'Thy throne is God' (Doderlein, supported most recently by Westcott [on He 1⁸] and Hort); (2) 'thy throne of God' ('thy God's throne') (Gae. See, i.

p. 365); (8) 'thy throne is (a throne) of God' (Aben Ezra, Hitzig, Ewald, Boethgen). To all these renderings there are either grammatical or exegetical objections. Bickell and Cheyne would insert נִסְתָּדֵן הָקִיּוֹם 'thy throne [its foundation is firmly fixed], God [hath established it]'. Perhaps the simplest solution is to substitute יְהוָה לְיָהוָה ('thy throne shall be for ever'). This original יְהוָה might easily be misread יְהוֹ (Jahweh), which in turn would be intentionally changed into יְהוָה. So Giesebrecht, Wellh. ('Psalms' in SBOT, following Bruston, Du texte primitif des Psaumes, Paris, 1873), Duhm (in Kurzer Hdcom.). See, further, Driver, *Heb. Tenses*², § 194, Obs.; Cheyne, OP 182.

THUMB (בֶּרֶךְ [in Jg 16⁷ plur. כְּבִרְתֵּי, as if from sing. כְּבִרְתִּי, the form used throughout the Sam. Pent.] joined with יָד 'hand' means 'thumb,' while with רֶגֶל 'foot' it means 'great toe'.—In all the Scripture passages where 'thumb' occurs, it is coupled with 'great toe.' In the consecration of Aaron and his sons, blood was sprinkled upon the tip of the right ear, upon the thumb of the right hand, and upon the great toe of the right foot (Ex 29²⁵, Lv 8²³⁻²⁴). It has been generally held (Dillm., Baentsch, et al., ad loc., Nowack, Heb. Arch. ii. 123) that this procedure symbolized the consecration of the organs of hearing, handling, and walking, the priests becoming thus fitted to hear God's voice, to handle holy things, and to tread holy ground. This explanation fails, however, to account for the selection of these three organs alone, and it does not harmonize well with the circumstance that the cleansed leper was similarly sprinkled (Lv 14¹⁴, 17, 25, 28). There is more probability in the view of Holzinger (Exodus, ad loc.) that, like the horns of the altar, the extremities of the human body, with inclusive sense, are chosen for consecration.—The cutting off of Adonibezek's thumbs and great toes (Jg 16), a mutilation which he declares he had himself practised on seventy kings (v. 7), disabled him from fighting, and possibly disqualified him from reigning (see Moore, ad loc., where parallels from classical writers are cited; cf. also art. ADONIBEZEK).

THUMMIM.—See URIM AND THUMMIM.

THUNDER (רָעַם, βροντή) is the loud sound which accompanies the discharge through the atmosphere of electricity from the clouds. It seems to follow the lightning flash after an interval proportioned to the observer's distance from the place of disturbance. Thunderstorms are frequent in Palestine during the winter season, but very rarely occur at any other time of the year (Schwarz, Palestine, 327). They are always accompanied by rain or hail. In the OT thunder is both poetically described and popularly regarded as the voice of God. It is spoken of as a voice in Ps 77¹⁸ 104⁷, Sir 43¹⁷ (cf. 1 S 7¹⁰). In several passages (Ex 9^{23a}, 19¹⁶ 20¹⁸, 1 S 12¹⁷⁻¹⁸, Job 28²⁸ 38²⁸) 'thunder' or 'thundering' is simply the tr. of קוֹלֹת ('voices'), and even where קוֹל is rendered 'voice' the verb רָעַם ('to thunder') in the context sometimes shows that thunder is meant (2 S 22¹⁴, Job 37⁴⁻⁶ 40⁹, Ps 18¹³ 29⁸; cf. the use of phoral in Rev 4⁸ 8⁵ 11¹⁹ 16¹⁸). Ps 29 is throughout a sublime poetic description of a thunderstorm and its effects, though the noun רָעַם does not once occur in it, but only the often repeated phrase קוֹלֵי יְהוָה. The sequence of thunder after lightning is referred to in Job 37⁴, Sir 32¹⁰, and the general connexion of the two phenomena in Job 28²⁸ 38²⁸. In Ps 104⁷ the creative voice of God which bade the waters go to their appointed place (Gn 1⁹) is identified with thunder. Thunder accompanied by hail is enumerated in Ex 9^{23a} as the seventh of the PLAGUES OF EGYPT (see vol. iii. p. 891). From Ps 77¹⁸ it would appear that it was a thundercloud which came between the Israelites and the Egyptians at the crossing of the Red Sea, and this is probably alluded to in Ps 81⁷. Thunder was one of the impressive phenomena amidst which the Law was given at Sinai (Ex 19¹⁶ 20¹⁸). A thunderstorm decided the issue of a battle between Israel and the Philistines (1 S 7¹⁰, Sir 46¹⁷), and another served to deepen the impression made by Samuel's warning to Israel when they desired a king (1 S 12¹⁷⁻¹⁸). This latter event was all the more significant because it occurred at a most unusual season,—that of wheat harvest.

In Job 39²² thunder is used figuratively for the noise of battle; and in Job 26¹⁴ the difference between a whisper and thunder is used to illustrate the contrast between what man sees of God's ways, and the reality of God's power. In Sir 40¹³ the goods of the unjust are said to go off in a noise like thunder; and in Mk 3¹⁷ 'sons of thunder' is the interpretation of the title βουρρηγές given by Jesus to the sons of Zebedee (see BOANERGES). In Is 29⁸ thunder is among the metaphors describing the disasters impending on Ariel, and it appears in a similar connexion in Rev 8⁵ 16¹⁸. Like other convulsions of nature, it enters largely into the imagery of the Apocalypse (4⁸ 11¹⁹). Voices like thunder are mentioned in 6¹ 14² 19⁶, and in 10³⁻⁴ actual thunders are conceived to have an articulate meaning. In view of this last fact, and of the close OT association between thunder and the voice of God, it seems probable that the 'voice out of heaven' (Jn 12²⁸⁻²⁹) was a thunder-peal, as indeed most of those present thought, and that its significance was recognized and interpreted by Jesus alone. A similar construction may be put on the voices in the narratives of the Baptism and Transfiguration of Jesus, and the whole subject is illustrated by the Jewish doctrine of the קוֹלֵי יְהוָה, which was always supposed to be preceded by a thunder-clap (Barclay, Talmud, p. 16, note).

The Greek word κεραυνός, like Lat. fulmen, denotes thunder and lightning together. It is used in Wis 19¹² of the punishment of the Egyptians at the Exodus (EV 'thunders'), and in 2 Mac 10³¹ of certain human missiles of destruction (AV 'lightnings,' RV 'thunderbolts'). κεραυνώσις is the LXX tr. of רָעַם in Is 30³⁰, where all the phenomena of a thunderstorm occur in the context as metaphors for the disasters awaiting Assyria. AV renders רָעַם 'scattering,' RV 'blast,' RvM 'crash,' Delitzsch 'cloud-burst.'

In Ps 78⁴⁸ 'thunderbolt' is the tr. of הָרָק (mg. 'hailstone'). For the meaning of this word see under COAL, 4. vol. i. p. 451^b. In Job 39¹⁹ AV has 'thunder' as a mistranslation of נִקְנָק (RV 'quivering mane'). JAMES PATRICK.

THYATIRA (Θυάτειρα) was an important and wealthy city in the northern part of Lydia, in a district which was in early times sometimes assigned to Mysia; and it was sometimes called 'the last city of the Mysians,'* owing to the uncertainty about national boundaries in Asia Minor. In its situation in the open fertile valley of the Lycus, a stream that flows south-west from the Mysian frontier to join the Hermus, it must have been a settlement (doubtless a large village beside a temple, after the Anatolian fashion) from the earliest time; and according to Pliny and Stephanus it was then called Pelopia Euippa Semiramis; but these seem to be mere epithets, and the name Thyateira is probably an old Lydian word, meaning 'the town or citadel of Thya': Teira occurs as a Lydian city name. But the importance of Thyatira began when it was refounded with a colony of Macedonians by Seleucus Nikator between B.C. 301 and 281.† Its history as a Greek city dates from that time; and it continued to be a rich and busy commercial city throughout ancient times. The peacefulness and prosperity of its development afford little for the historian to record. Antiochus the Great lay encamped there for a time in B.C. 190, until he was forced to retire on Magnesia; and the decisive battle against the Romans under Scipio was fought between the two cities. Thyatira derived its importance strictly from the valley in which it was situated, and not from lying on a great trade route. Hence it was limited in its development by the restriction of its range, and it never became a metropolis or leading city of Asia, nor was it honoured with the Neokorate in the State cultus of the emperors. Ptolemy, indeed, styles it metropolis of Lydia (v. ii. 16); but the title never occurs in inscriptions or on coins, and is probably erroneously given. The epithets by which Thyatira sought to glorify itself are therefore rather vague in character, λαμπροτάτη, διασημοτάτη, μεγίστη, etc. But in A.D. 215 Caracalla passed through the city, and issued an edict (which came before, and was probably addressed to the Koinon of Asia, and was of course carried into effect by vote of the Koinon), ordering that it should be one of the seats of conventus of the Province (ἐδωρήσατο τῇ πατρίδι ἡμῶν τὴν ἀγορὰν τῶν δικῶν).

* Steph. Byz. s.v. So Iconium was 'the last city of Phrygia.'

† So Stephanus; but Schuchhardt (Athen. Mith. 1888, p. 1 ff.) attributes the new foundation to a later date in the 3rd cent.,

In regard to religion, Thyatira also rejoiced in the title 'the holy city of the προπάτωρ θεὸς Ἡλῖος Πύθιος Τυρμναῖος Ἀπόλλων' (just as Ephesus boasted itself the city of Artemis); and the inscriptions often mention the patron god. The coins often show the horseman-god Tyrimnos, with double-axe on shoulder (a figure common under various names in Lydian and Phrygian cities), and a goddess of the Greek Artemis type, called Boreitene. But Boreitene is simply a surname of the goddess who was worshipped along with the patron god, probably derived from some locality in the territory of the city with which the goddess was specially associated. The Boreitene Artemis was, undoubtedly, closely related to the Ephesian Artemis on the one hand, and to the East Lydian and Pontic Anaitis (Persian in origin, called Persike on the coins of the neighbouring Hierocæsarea) on the other. Apollo Tyrimnaïos is known only from the inscriptions, which show that there was a sacred temenos, with a propylæum, containing doubtless a temple: games called Tyrimnaia, in honour of the god, are also mentioned. The priest of Apollo and the priestess of Artemis were husband and wife (Bull. Corresp. Hellen. xi. p. 478, No. 57), showing how intimate was the relation between the two deities in the Thyatiran cult. This deity was Πρόπολος (with his temple in front of, not inside, the city) and Προπάτωρ (patron of the city, and ancestor of some leading family or families, doubtless priestly families, in it). Tyrimnos was evidently the ancient Lydian sun-god,* identified with the Greek Apollo Pythius. Under the Roman empire the worship of Apollo Tyrimnaïos was united with the cult of the emperors, as we see in the ceremony of the Sebasto-Tyrimnaean festival (τῆς Σεβαστείου καὶ Τυρμνήου πανηγύρεως). The worship of Artemis and Apollo was conjoined with mysteries, which were under the direction of the priestess (CIG 3507).

Further, there was outside of the city (πρὸ τῆς πόλεως) a shrine of the Oriental (Chaldaean, or Persian, or Hebrew) Sibyl Sambethe, or Sambathe, in the sacred precinct of the Chaldaean (πρὸς τῇ and regards Thyatira as a Seleucid garrison founded to resist the growing Pergamene power.

* We cannot adopt the view of Blakesley in Smith's DB and others, that Tyrimnos (as they wrongly call him) was a Macedonian deity brought by the colonists from their own country. They may have brought the name (Tyrimnos was a mythical Macedonian king), but not the religious institution.

Σαμβαθείη ἐν τῇ Χαλδαίου περιβολῇ,* CIG 3509). It may be taken as certain that this shrine was a seat of soothsaying, and that a prophetess was the recipient of inspiration and uttered the oracles at the shrine. It is also highly probable that this foundation arose from an eclectic religious system, combining some Hebrew conceptions with pagan forms and customs. So much may be taken as generally admitted; but to this Schürer (Die Prophetin Isabel in Thyatira†) has added the, at first sight, attractive theory that the woman Jezebel of Rev 2²⁰ was the prophetess at the shrine, who perhaps played the part of the Sibyl herself, and whose character was perhaps not purely heathen but contained a mixture of Jewish elements. We cannot, however, consider this probable. While we must agree with Schürer and many older scholars that 'Jezebel' here denotes a definite woman, the context seems to require a woman of great influence within the Thyatiran Church (like Jezebel within the kingdom of Israel), in all probability an official, active, prominent in religious observances, claiming to be and accepted in the Church (ἀφ' ἑαυτῆς) as one of those prophetesses who were so important in the early Church, using her position to disseminate her own views, maintaining and teaching the doctrine (against which the letter inveighs so bitterly) that it was possible to be a Christian and yet remain a member of ordinary pagan society and belong to the social clubs, which were so characteristic of pagan life, and fulfilled many useful purposes of a charitable or beneficial kind, but were (according to St. John and St. Paul alike) inextricably implicated in idolatrous observances, and conducive to luxury and sensual enjoyment.‡ The person who was condemned so strenuously by the author was not a pagan prophetess, but a danger within the Church, and the Church itself is censured for treating her with allowance and respect instead of casting her out with abhorrence. Yet a time for repentance is granted even to her, before her punishment shall come upon her.

The passage of Rev. places us amid the difficulties besetting the Thyatiran Christians in the early period of the Church. The population of the city was divided into trade-guilds, many of which are mentioned in inscriptions. To belong to the guild was a most important matter for every tradesman or artisan; it aided his business, and brought him many advantages socially. Each guild was a corporate body, possessing considerable powers, directed by elected officers, passing decrees in honour of Roman officials or other persons who had aided it, possessing property or revenues under its own direction, constructing works for the public; many of them, if not all, were benefit societies for mutual aid, and showed vigorous life, and were on the whole healthy and praiseworthy associations.

The objection to the guilds from the Christian point of view was twofold. In the first place, the bond which held a guild together lay always in the common religion in which all united, and in the common sacrificial meal of which all partook; the members ate and drank fellowship and brotherhood in virtue of the pagan deity whom they served. In the existing state of society it was impossible to dissociate membership of a guild from idolatry, and the idolatry was of a kind that by its symbolism and its efficacy exerted great influence on its adherents, making them members of a unity which was essentially non-Christian and anti-Christian. In the second place, the common banquets were celebrated amid circumstances of revelry and enjoyment that were far from conducive to strict morality, as is evident from representations of the feasts in such clubs; see Bulletin de Corresp. Hellén. 1900, p. 592 ff., and authorities there quoted.

* From a single reference it is impossible to determine whether a Chaldaean deity, or a Chaldaean who instituted and regulated the cultus, is meant. M. Clerc (de Rebus Thyatir. pp. 23, 79) puts the shrine of the Sibyl near the Chaldaean's precinct; but the inscription defines the position of the grave as by the Sibyl's shrine in the Chaldaean's precinct.

But, considering the many good characteristics in these guilds, it was a serious question whether the Christian converts were bound to cut themselves off absolutely from them. In Rev 2^{30a} we see that the question had not yet been decisively answered in the Thyatiran Church, but was still under discussion: one influential female member, who was generally believed to be inspired, taught that Christians might continue in their guilds and share in the duties and privileges thereof. On the other hand there was a section of that Church (Rev 2³⁴) which opposed the teaching of the prophetess in this respect; we should probably gather from the whole passage that this section was the minority in the Church. This minority shares in the general condemnation of 2³⁰ for suffering the woman Jezebel: they had not condemned her absolutely, but treated her teaching as mistaken in this one point, while otherwise regarding her as worthy of respect. The minority, however, is not threatened with any further penalty, provided they continue to reject the teaching of the prophetess. Thus the letter to Thyatira reveals to us a very early stage in Christian history. The very first problems, which must have faced the Christians in the Aegean cities, connected with their relation to the pagan society and institutions, are still unsettled. No final decision had yet been come to in Thyatira on the subject; and contrary opinions were maintained by members of the same community. The decision had indeed been pronounced by St. Paul as regards Corinth,* but in somewhat veiled and general terms, and had not as yet become the current and definite principle of all the Churches. As regards date, it might appear that this points to an earlier period than the reign of Domitian, and favours the earlier date for Rev. which many scholars have advocated; but a single detail is not conclusive, and exceptional circumstances must be admitted as possible in outlying communities like Thyatira and Pergamum (Rev 2¹⁴). In Ephesus, the administrative centre of the Asian Churches, the decision of the Church was already fixed (Rev 2⁶). Here it is implied that the error of the prophetess had already been denounced, 'and I gave her time that she should repent' (2²¹). It is only after that previous formal warning that her punishment is now denounced as immediate: her followers have still an opportunity of escaping the punishment, if they repent, but otherwise it will affect them and her together.

The punishment denounced is illustrated by the nature of such guild-feasts, as shown in ancient reliefs. The members and worshippers reclined on couches at the banquet; and it is probable that the αλυσή of Rev 2²³ should be understood, not as a bed (AV and RV), but as a couch: 'I set her on a couch, and her associates alongside of her (no longer for the revelry of their idolatrous celebrations, but) for tribulation' (see Expositor, Feb. 1901, p. 99 ff.).

Apart from this serious fault, the Church of Thyatira is praised highly for its energetic and truly Christian conduct, and for its steady progress: 'thy last works are more than the first.'

The guild of coppersmiths (χαλκεῖς) seems to have been influential in Thyatira (see inscription in Bull. Corr. Hell. x. p. 407, belonging to the early imperial times). The type on coins, Hephaistos forging a helmet, probably refers to the bronze trade; and perhaps the enigmatic allusion to the unknown χαλκολιβάνος would be understood, if more could be learned about the Thyatiran bronze or copper work. Mr. Blakesley has suggested that the description of the Son of God, whose feet were like chalcolibanos (Rev 2¹⁰), may have been suggested by the way in which the tutelary deity of the city was represented in Thyatira.

The guild of dyers is mentioned in several inscriptions. M. Clerc's view, that the dyeing in Thyatira was performed in ancient times with madder-root, rubia (as in the mediaeval and modern trade), not with the juice of the shell-fish (as in Tyre and Laconia), nor with the worm Coccus ilicis (κόκκος), may be regarded as practically certain; and in that case the purple stuffs which the Thyatiran Lydia sold in Philippi (Ac 16¹⁴) were dyed with what is, in modern times, called 'Turkey red' (as the purple proper, the scarlet of the coccus, and the red of rubia seem to have been all included under the generic title purple).

Thyatira lay close to the road connecting Pergamum with Sardis, and hence is placed between the two in the list of the Seven Churches of Asia (Rev 1¹¹). No evidence remains as to how and when Christianity reached the city, except that, if we press the words of Ac 19¹⁰, the new religion was preached there by some of St. Paul's coadjutors and helpers during his first residence in Ephesus.

The modern town of Ak-Hissar occupies the site, approximately, of the ancient Thyatira. It is a busy commercial town, possessing a railway station and a considerable industry in carpet-making, etc. The population is about 20,000, of whom 7000 are Christians.

G. E. POST.

TIBERIAS (Τιβεριὰς) is unlike most cities in Palestine in that we have a definite account of its origin, and can fix pretty accurately the date when it was built. Herod Antipas, the ruler of Galilee, was its founder, and it was named in honour of the emperor Tiberius. In the very beginning of his reign Antipas had already honoured Julia the mother of Tiberius, by rebuilding Betharamatha or Betharamphtha (the Beth-haram of Jos 13⁷), and calling it Julia or Livias. This was on the Shittim Plain east of Jericho. At a later period, some time between A.D. 20 and A.D. 30, Tiberias was built on the west shore of the Sea of Galilee. We are able to fix its site, because Josephus (Ant. xviii. ii. 3) says that there were warm baths at no great distance from it in a place called Emmaus (the Hammath of Jos 19²⁵).

To secure sufficient room for the new city, an old cemetery had to be removed; and this fact, on account of the law of defilement by dead bodies, created a prejudice against it in the minds of the stricter Jews, which took a long time to overcome. Hammath was an ancient fortified town, and, as was customary, the dead were buried without the walls. These graves may have been a part of the cemetery of that old city, since the site of Antipas' new city was nearly a mile to the north of it. It is a curious historical fact that, while at the beginning the Jews thought Tiberias unclean, so that they could hardly be forced to settle there, at last in the course of time they chose it as one of their sacred cities (see below).

People from various quarters helped to make up the first inhabitants of Tiberias. Some foreigners came, some poor people were compelled to make it their residence, and many persons who were 'not quite freemen' were brought thither and given certain privileges in the way of houses and lands. Some of those who settled there, however, are described as persons of wealth and position. The place grew rapidly, gates, colonnades, and marble statues made the streets attractive. Soon Tiberias could boast of 'the finest synagogue in Galilee,' a device of Herod to conciliate the Jews. From all accounts at our command, the city, touching the water of the lake, must have been beautiful, and its social and political importance were assured when Antipas removed thither from Sepphoris, till then the capital of Galilee, the seat of his government. His palace was a building of elegance, with costly furnishings, and in it was a large amount of the royal treasure (Jos. Life, xii. 13).

The Gr. character of the town may be the reason why, although Christ was so thoroughly identified for long with the Sea of Galilee, there is no evidence that He ever visited Tiberias, the new capital of the civil ruler to whom He was subject. The NT has little to say about this city; once the fact is mentioned that 'boats came from Tiberias' near to the spot where the Feeding of the Five Thousand took place (Jn 6²); further than this the Gospels are silent.

At the time of the war with Rome, A.D. 66-70, Tiberias was one of the chief cities of Galilee. It had a council of 600 members. Its citizens were loyal to the national cause. When Gaius wanted to set up his statue in the temple at Jerusalem these people made such a desperate resistance, showing that they were ready to die rather than have their laws transgressed (Ant. xviii. viii. 3), that the foolish project was at last abandoned. The strength of the place is shown by the fact that Vespasian led against it three legions before its inhabitants would open their gates to him. Another change awaited Tiberias, this time one of humiliation, when Herod Agrippa II. degraded it from being the chief city, and restored that honour to Sepphoris, where he kept the public archives and had stored a magazine of arms.

If in this way Tiberias lost political prestige, it gained in another direction, for after the destruction of Jerusalem it became the chief centre of Jewish schools and learning, so that it has a large place in the history of Palestine, and indeed of the world, while its rival Sepphoris is practically forgotten. At one time during this flourishing period its synagogues numbered no fewer than thirteen. Here the Mishna and the Palestinian Talmud were compiled and published, c. A.D. 220 and A.D. 420 respectively. The beautiful situation of the city, some of the noted scholars who either lived or were buried there, the hot springs which helped to make the place famous, and the earthquakes from which it has occasionally suffered, have been mentioned under GALILEE, and GALILEE (SEA OF).

The founder of this city is remembered as the murderer of John the Baptist, and as being present in Jerusalem at the passover when Jesus was arrested and put to death (Lk 23⁷). What was once attractive is now a place of filth and misery. On the shore S. of the town are some interesting ruins, which, could they be properly excavated, might reveal remains and possibly treasures of this royal city of Herod Antipas. Tabariyeh (the modern name of the town) has a population of 5000 or 6000 souls, made up of a few Christians, some Mohammedans, and a large number of Jews. It has a Protestant mission with a school and a resident physician.

TIBERIAS, SEA OF (Jn 21¹).—See GALILEE (SEA OF).

TIBERIUS (Τιβέριος).—The second Roman emperor, A.D. 14-37. The former is the date of Tiberius' accession on the death of Augustus. But there is good reason to suppose that St. Luke (3¹) in his reference to the 15th year of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar, as the beginning of John the Baptist's ministry, is reckoning from the date of Tiberius' association with Augustus in the empire some two years before the death of the latter. For the argument see art. CHRONOLOGY OF NT in vol. i. p. 405 f. The exact year of Tiberius' adoption by his stepfather in the government is not known. Mommsen puts it A.D. 11, other authorities A.D. 13. Perhaps the use of the word ἡγεμονία (AV and RV 'reign') implies that Tiberius was only acting as regent before the death of Augustus. From the evidence of coins struck at this date it is shown that it was customary to regard Tiberius' reign as beginning A.D. 12 or A.U.C. 765. This reign spread over the most momentous period in Christian chronology. In it occurred our Lord's ministry and death (A.D. 29); the Resurrection; the pouring out of the Holy Ghost; the martyrdom of St. Stephen, and the general persecution that immediately followed. All allusions to Cæsar during our Lord's life, e.g. in the case of the tribute money and the taunt levelled against Pilate, 'Thou art not Cæsar's friend,' refer to Tiberius. The last years of his reign witnessed the conversion of St. Paul and the beginning of his preaching.

Tiberius at his accession retained Valerius Gratus as procurator of Judæa, in order to lessen the frequent changes, and thus diminish the extortion in the provinces. Each new governor, expecting only a short lease of power, exacted as much as possible in the shortest time. Gratus deposed Annas and made his son Eleazar, and afterwards Caiaphas, his son-in-law, high priest. Pontius Pilate, the successor of Gratus, was also appointed by Tiberius, and was the nominee of Sejanus, the emperor's unprincipled favourite.

The name Tiberias, given to the city and lake, was intended by Herod Antipas as a compliment to the reigning emperor. See art. TIBERIAS.

TIBHATH (תִּבְחַת 'extensive,' 'level'; B Meṭa-ḥāṣar, A Mareṣṣeṭh; Thebath).—A city of Hadarezer, king of Zobah, from which David took much brass (1 Ch 18⁸). In 2 S 8⁸ the name of the town is Betah, but the original reading was probably Tebah, as in the Syriac version, and as a tribal name in Gn 22²⁴. The site of Tibhath is unknown, but it was possibly on the eastern slopes of Anti-Lebanon, between which range and the Euphrates Aram-zobah is supposed to have been situated.

TIBNI (תִּבְנִי; B Ṭaynēl, A Ṭaymī, Luc. Ṭaysevel).—After the seven days' reign of ZIMRI had ended in his death in the flames of his palace, Tibni disputed the throne for four years (compare 1 K 16¹⁵ with v. ²⁵) with OMRI, whose sway was acknowledged only after the death of Tibni and his brother Joram. Our knowledge of Joram we owe to the LXX, whose addition (in 1 K 16²²) καὶ Ἰωρὰμ ὁ ἀδελφὸς αὐτοῦ ἐν τῷ καιρῷ ἐκείνῳ no doubt preserves an original אהרן בן נחמיה יורם which has dropped out of the Heb. text.

TIDAL (𐎧𐎢𐎢𐎠; A Θαλά, Θαλά, Luc. Θαργά; Thadal).—King of GOIIM, who, along with Arioch of Ellasar and Amraphel of Shinar, followed his suzerain, Chedorlaomer of Elam, in his campaigns in Palestine (Gn 14¹⁻⁹). His name has recently been found* by Mr. Pinches in a cuneiform tablet (Sp. iii. 2. 13) under the form of Tudghula in connexion with Eri-Aku of Larsa, Khammu[rabi] of Babylon, and Kudur-Laghamar of Elam. Tudghula is here called the son of Gazza[ni]. In another tablet relating to the same historical events we read: 'Who is Kudur-Laghamar, the worker of evil? He has assembled the Umman Manda, he has laid waste the people of Bel (i.e. the Babylonians), and [has marched] at their side.' The Umman Manda, or 'Barbarian Hordes,' were the mountaineers who lived to the north of Elam, and the name given to them is the Bab. equivalent of the Heb. Gōiim. It seems probable, therefore, that Tudghula or Tidal came from the mountains N.E. of Babylonia. A. H. SAYCE.

TIGLATH-PILESER (𐎧𐎢𐎢𐎠𐎶; B Ἀλαθφελ-λάσαρ, Θαλαθφελλάσαρ, Θαλαθφελλάσαρ, A Ἀλαθ-φάλλασαρ, Luc. Θελαφαλάσαρ; Assy. Tukulti-Pal-Esarra, '(my) trust is (Ninip) the son of E-Sarra,' E-Sarra signifying 'the House of Hosts.' The Heb. spelling of the first part of the name is peculiar, but precisely the same spelling is found in the Aram. inscriptions of Zinjerli, which are contemporaneous with the reign of Tiglath-pileser. In 1 Ch 5²⁶ and 2 Ch 28²⁰ we find the corrupt form Tilgath-pileser [𐎧𐎢𐎢𐎠𐎶; B Θαλαθανάσαρ, Θαγαφανάσαρ, Θαλαφελλάσαρ; A Θαλαθφελλάσαρ; Luc. Θελαθφελλάσαρ]).

The Tiglath-pileser of OT is Tiglath-pileser III. of the native monuments, whose original name was Pulu (the Pul of 2 K 15¹⁹). He usurped the Assy. crown, the 13th day of Iyyar, B.C. 745, after the fall of the older Assy. dynasty, and assumed the name of Tiglath-pileser from that of a famous Assy. king and conqueror who had reigned four centuries previously. In Babylonia, however, he continued to be known by his original name Pulu.

Tiglath-pileser III., the founder of the second Assy. empire, was a man of great ability, both military and administrative. He introduced a new system of policy, the object of which was to weld the whole of W. Asia into a single empire, bound together by a bureaucratic organization. It was the first experiment in political centralization. He also established a standing army, which he made, by careful training and equipment, an irresistible engine of war. And it was he who first devised the system of satrapies and finance which prevailed in the Persian empire of later days.

Immediately after his accession he marched into Babylonia, where he subdued the Aramæan tribes and united the northern portion of the country to Assyria. In B.C. 744 he chastised the wild tribes on the eastern frontiers of his kingdom, penetrating into the remotest parts of Media. Next he had to defend himself against Sarduris II. of Ararat and his allies from Asia Minor. These he defeated in a pitched battle, capturing no fewer than 72,950 soldiers of the enemy as well as the city of Arpad in N. Syria. Here he received tribute from various princes, including Rezin of Damascus and Hiram of Tyre. Arpad, however, revolted immediately afterwards. In B.C. 742, accordingly, he began the siege of it; but it did not fall till B.C. 740. In B.C. 739 the Assyrians came into conflict with Azariah of Judah (not Yadi in N. Syria, as has recently been suggested; but see art. UZZIAH, and ASSYRIA, vol. i. p. 185⁵), whose allies from Hamath were overthrown, and the 19 districts of Hamath placed under Assy. governors. Meanwhile the Assy. generals had suppressed a revolt among the Aramæan tribes in Babylonia. Transportations of the conquered populations now took place on a large scale. This was the beginning of a policy which was afterwards more fully developed by the Assy. and Bab. kings. Tribute was again brought to Tiglath-pileser by the kings of Asia Minor, Syria, and Palestine, among them being Menahem of Samaria (2 K 15¹⁹).

In B.C. 737 there was another campaign in the east, the Medes and other neighbouring tribes being overrun, and in 736 war again broke out with Ararat. In B.C. 735 Ararat itself was invaded, and, though the capital Dhuspas (now Van) resisted capture, the country round it was ravaged to the extent of 450 miles. Next year (B.C. 734) Tiglath-pileser was summoned to the help of Ahaz of Judah, called Jehoahaz in the cuneiform texts, who had been attacked by Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Damascus. Rezin was defeated in a decisive battle, and fled to his capital, which was thereupon closely invested by the Assyrians. With another portion of his army T. now ravaged 16 districts of Syria, captured Samahla (the modern Zinjerli), and descended on the kingdom of Samaria. Gilead and Abel-[Beth-Maacah] were annexed to Assyria (2 K 15²⁹); tribute was received from Ammon and Moab; the Philistine cities, Ekron, Ashdod, and Ashkelon, were conquered, and Gaza was plundered. Edom was also compelled to submit as well as Samsi, queen of the Arabs of Saba and Sheba. Various cities of N. Arabia, including Tema (now Teima), were taken at the same time. In B.C. 732 Damascus fell at last, Rezin was put to death, and an Assy. satrap appointed in his place. After the capture of Damascus, T. held a court there, which was attended by the subject princes, Kustaspi of Comagênê, Urikki of Kûê, Sibittibaal of Gebal, Eniel of Hamath, Panammû of Samahla, Tarkhu-lara of Gurgum, Suluval of Milid (Malatiyeh), Uas-survi of Tubal, Uskhitti of Tuna, Urpalla of Tukhana, Tukhammu of Istunda, Matan-baal of Arvad, Sanibu of Ammon, Solomon (Salamanu) of Moab, Metinti of Ashkelon, Jehoahaz (Yahu-khazi) of Judah, Kausmalaka of Edom, and Khanun (Hanno) of Gaza. It was while he was at Damascus that Ahaz saw the altar of which he sent the pattern to Jerusalem (2 K 16^{10ff.}). Soon afterwards Uas-survi of Tubal revolted: for this the people were fined, and a new king established over them. Metenna of Tyre was also forced to become tributary to Assyria, and to pay 150 talents of gold to the Assyrian exchequer. About B.C. 730 (or perhaps 733) Pekah of Samaria was murdered by Hoshea, whom T. claims to have appointed to the throne. In B.C. 731 the Assy. king marched into Babylonia, and received an embassy from Merodach-baladan, the Kaldâ prince who ruled in the marshes at the mouths of the Tigris and Euphrates. But it was not until B.C. 728 that he succeeded in occupying Babylon and receiving the crown from the hands of Bel, thereby making his title to the throne legitimate, and becoming king of Western Asia de jure. In the following year, B.C. 727, in the early part of the month Tebet, he died. He had built two palaces—one at Nineveh, the other at Calah (now Nimrud). A. H. SAYCE.

ward to Diarbekr. After passing Diarbekr, it receives the eastern Tigris (which rises in the Niphates mountains) at Osman Kieui. Then it flows through narrow gorges into the plateau of Mesopotamia, where it receives from the east the Greater and Lesser Zab, the Adhem or Radanu, and the Diyaleh or Tornadotus. On the E. bank, opposite Mosul, were Nineveh and Calah, a little N. of the junction of the Tigris and Greater Zab; and on the W. bank, N. of the Lesser Zab, was Assur (now Kalah Sherghat), the primitive capital of Assyria. The Tigris is about 1150 miles in length, and rises rapidly in March and April owing to the melting of the snows, falling again after the middle of May.

TILE, TILING (תִּלְיָה, κέραμος).—In Ezk 4¹ 'tile' is the rendering of תִּלְיָה, which is elsewhere tr. 'brick' (LXX πλῖθος). See BRICK.

In Lk 5¹⁷, in the account of the healing of the paralytic at Capernaum, the sufferer is said to have been let down διὰ τῶν κεράμων (AV 'through the tiling,' RV 'through the tiles'). The parallel passage (Mk 2⁴) is more detailed in its expressions (ἀπεστέγασαν τὴν στέγην . . . καὶ ἐξορύξαντες), and a difficulty has been felt in reconciling these with Luke's phrase. The roofs of Oriental houses are usually formed by laying tree trunks with the branches and twigs from wall to wall. Above these is a layer of earth about a foot thick, and over this is spread a paste of clay and straw, which hardens in the sun and renders the roof impervious to rain. This upper layer needs to be renewed at the beginning of the winter season (Nowack, Heb. Arch. i. 140; Benzinger, Heb. Arch. 116). Mark's account seems to suggest the breaking-up of such a roof as this, while Luke's expression does not, and various explanations of the latter have been attempted. The idea of a door or trap in the roof does not fit either narrative. It has been suggested that διὰ τῶν κεράμων is to be understood in the general sense of 'through the roof,' though, if taken literally, the words would be more applicable to Greek and Roman houses than to those of Palestine. Another explanation is that the court of the house was partly roofed over but had an opening above the centre, which was covered in wet weather by tiles, which could be easily removed (so Godet, following Delitzsch, Ein Tag in Capernaum, 44-46). The best view, however, is that of Tristram (Eastern Customs in Bible Lands, 34, 35), who states that ordinary Galilaean houses of the present day have a court separated from the street by a wall on one side, while on the other three sides it is surrounded by apartments opening into it. The roofs of these apartments are always of earth and lime, firmly pressed down and whitewashed. The roof may be supported by pillars on the side next the court, from which the rooms may be separated only by movable curtains. From the roof proper, however, eaves stretch over the court for six feet or more. These are supported on light rafters, and are covered with matting or with shingles (wooden tiles) lightly tacked together. The principal apartment is on the side of the court away from the street. In the case before us both this and the court itself would be full of people, and Jesus, in order to be heard by all, would be standing at the outer margin of the room. Access could be gained to the roof by an outside stairway, and if the covering of the eaves were removed, as it could easily be, the paralytic could be let down from the edge of the roof proper to the very spot where Jesus was. The expressions in Mark, though applicable to the breaking through of an earthen roof, describe this proceeding equally well.

TILON (Κέρε ἰλῶν, Kêth. ἰλῶν; B Ἰλῶν, A Θιλῶν, Luc. Θωλεῖν).—A son of Shimon, 1 Ch 4²⁰.

TIMÆUS, only Mk 10⁴⁶.—Father of the blind beggar BARTIMÆUS (vol. i. p. 248). If the name be Greek, it must be written Τιμαῖος, and thus WH write even the second name Βαρτιμαῖος; if it be Semitic, like most names in -αῖος in the NT, it must be Τιμαῖος, like Ζαχαῖος, Βαρθολομαῖος, etc. Both suppositions have their difficulties. Again, 'the son of Timæus' (υἱὸς Τιμαίου) seems a mere translation of Βαρτιμαῖος. Ecclesiastical tradition gives to the name the meaning 'blind' (see Onomastica sacra, ed. Lagarde, 176, 35, Βαρτιμαῖος υἱὸς τυφλός; 66, 10 (Jerome): Barsemia filius cæcus, quod et ipsum quidam corrupte Bartimæum legunt). * אָפֶר, אָפֶר means 'blind'; but how are we to get from semē to timai? Jastrow (Dictionary, p. 532; similarly, Krauss, Lehnwörter) mentions from Koh. rabba to Ec 9⁷ יִתְשֵׁן בְּרֵיחַ רִי יִשָּׁן, but Yalk. Koh. 979 has only יִשָּׁן רִי, and with Dalman, Aramäisch-neuhebräisches Wörterbuch, p. 162, we must perhaps read יִשָּׁן = Simeon. The Thesaurus Syriacus (486, 1462) mentions a place תִּמַּי תִּבְּ. The Syriac Versions, including the Arabic Tatian, Syrus Sinaiticus, and the Palestinian Syriac (Laud, Anecdota Syriaca, iv. 141), read Timai bar Timai, the Egyptian Catenæ as published by Lagarde (1886, p. 101), BAPTIMENOC ΠΩΗΠΙ NTIMENOC. Origen connected the name with τιμή (ὁ τῆς τιμῆς ἐπώνυμος); Strauss thought of ἐπεριμῶν in v.⁴⁸; others of אָמַם 'unclean'; Neubauer (Studia Biblica, i. 57) would spell it אָפֶר, against the general rule that τ = פ. The etymology is still obscure, and so is the relation of the account of Mark to that of Luke and Matthew. See Schmiedel, Enc. Bibl. i. 489-491; Nestle, Marginalien, 1893, pp. 83-92; art. TIME.—i. ERAS.—The Bible offers insufficient data for confident generalizations regarding the methods employed at various periods for measuring and indicating the passage of time. We should naturally expect considerable changes in these methods as the Israelites passed through various phases of civilization and modes of living. The literary records, however, do not completely reflect all these modified conditions, and just as Josephus translates the current Jewish dates of his age into their Macedonian equivalents, so earlier writers would probably date past events in accordance with their own rather than with the ancient systems of the calendar. Until the 2nd cent. B.C. we know of no fixed era from which events were dated by the Israelites. The books of the Maccabees show us the Seleucid era (beginning B.C. 312) in full force. This era (minyān Yevanim 'numbering of the Greeks,' or minyān shetaroth 'numbering of documents') was the first to be adopted and the last to be rejected by the Jews; it survived among the Egyptian Jews till the 16th cent. A.D. The ordinary Seleucid era began with the autumn of the year B.C. 312; but Schürer (HJP i. i. p. 37) maintains that the authors of the books of the Maccabees reckon the year from the spring season, though later Jews counted from the autumn (Tishri). Wellhausen rejects Schürer's theory (*IJG*⁴ 258). Several of the Hellenistic cities founded along the seacoast of Judæa and in the north had eras of their own in the Greek period (after Alexander the Great), but the only exact Jewish parallel is found in the time of Simon the Maccabee (143-2 B.C.). 'In the hundred and seventieth year (of the Seleucidæan era) was the yoke of the heathen taken away from Israel. And the people began to write in their instruments and contracts, "In the first year of Simon the great high priest and captain and leader of the Jews"' (1 Mac 13⁴¹). No documents so dated are extant, but it has been doubtfully conjectured [but see art. MONEY in vol. iii. p. 424 ff.] that some silver coins bearing the year numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, and the inscription ירושלם קדש, etc., refer to this era. That the era of Simon was of short duration is certain; even in 1 Mac. (14⁷) it is only employed side by side with the more permanently used Selucidæan epoch.

The prevalent method of dating events both in OT and NT is by regnal years of monarchs, or by synchronism with other events [see CHRONOLOGY]. The Exodus from Egypt was sometimes taken as an era (1 K 6¹, cf. Ex 19¹, Nu 33³⁸); and Ezekiel (1¹) perhaps turns the reformation of Josiah (B.C. 622-1) to this purpose. It is unlikely that the 'thirtieth year,' refers to Ezekiel's own age [but see Budde in Expos. Times, Oct. 1900, p. 39 ff., and Aug. 1901, p. 525 f.], though the patriarchal dates are often collated with the ages of various characters. At the beginning of the Christian era, the Jews were compelled to adopt the year of the Roman emperors as their norm (Graetz, History of the Jews, Eng. tr. ii. 134). The erection of Solomon's temple (1 K 9¹⁰), the commencement of the Egyptian entanglement (Gn 15¹³), the Babylonian Exile (Ezk 33¹ 40¹), and such natural phenomena as a remarkable earthquake ('two years before the earthquake,' Am 1¹), were also in a minor degree used as eras. Soon after the time of Christ, the Jews must have devised a method of counting by anno mundi, for the Talmud assumes that something like 4000 years separated the destruction of the temple from the Creation. The dating by A.M. first occurs in the Seder Hadoroth, a work attributed to Jose ben Chalafta. The Jewish system differs from the Dionysian era (6th cent. A.D.), and, while Ussher dates the Christian era as 4004 A.M., the current Jewish numbering assigns the year 3760 A.M. to the beginning of that era. Thus the Jewish year beginning September 1901 is 5662 A.M. Jews in later times occasionally used the Mohammedan era, and dated from the Hegira. There is no indication whatever that the Jews ever turned the jubilee period to calendar use in the same manner in which the Olympiads were employed. They may, however, have made use of the idea of the dor or 'generation.'

ii. THE YEAR.—In the main, the Jewish year was lunar, with corrections designed to bring about a more or less exact correspondence with the solar seasons. It seems to have been the view of the writer of the first report of the Flood (P) that the oldest Hebrew year was a pure lunar year, containing 12 lunar months and 354 days. In Gn 7¹¹ (cf. 8¹⁴) the Flood is said to have lasted from the 17th of the 2nd month in one year to the 27th of the 2nd month in the next year, or 1 year and 11 days. This reckoning, as Benzinger suggests (Heb. Arch. p. 198), arose through the translation of a solar year into its lunar equivalent. The actual duration of the Flood was in the general Semitic tradition a year, meaning a solar year of 365 days. 'In the presupposition that the oldest ages had a pure moon year, P, when dating the Flood, uses such a year as the basis, and shows his archæological knowledge and his pretended historical exactitude by not giving the round figure a year, but he gives the right total in an inferential manner.' It may, however, well be that we have here a genuine tradition of an ancient pure lunar year; moreover, even when solar corrections were made, some Jewish years were more or less purely lunar. From another factor in the Flood narrative, the 150 days, which amounted to 5 months, a year of $12 \times 30 = 360$ days has been inferred (Schwarz, Der Jüdische Kalender, p. 7). So much is certain, that in the historical time the Hebrew year was solar, though the months were lunar. The Calendar must have been roughly congruous with the cycle of natural life. The old Arabs had a sun-year of 365 days before Mohammed converted it into the pure lunar year of 354 days, which still prevails.

The fact that solar considerations must early have affected the Hebrew Calendar is obvious from the cycle of feasts which on the one hand fell in definitely fixed lunar months, and on the other hand coincided with equally definite seasons of the solar year. In the pure lunar year, Passover would, in a period of about 34 years, make the round of all the four seasons (Schwarz, p. 9). This was an impossibility in the Jewish Calendar. How the correction was effected we have no means of discovering. The lunar character of the Calendar must have prevented the intercalation of an odd 10 or 11 days annually (as Lewisoñ suggests, Gesch. und Syst. d. K. p. 6), yet we are nowhere told of an intercalary month, unless the law as to the deferred Passover (Nu 9¹⁰) be held to be some indication of it. The Talmud (Sanhed. 12a) proves the biblical knowledge of the intercalary month from 1 K 4⁷, but the argument is ineffective. On the other hand, 1 Ch 27, where arrangements for the succession of royal officers are only made for 12 months, cannot be held to prove the total ignorance of intercalation of a thirteenth month. The knowledge of this method was very ancient in Babylon, an intercalated Elul being older than the intercalated Adar. The latter, being sacred to Ashur, must have been the work of astronomers standing under Assyrian authority (Jastrow, Rel. of Babylonia and Assyria, p. 463).

The Babylonian year seems to have consisted of 12 lunar months of 30 days each, intercalary months being added by the priests when necessary (W. Muss-Arnolt, 'The Names of the Assyro-Babylonian Months and their Regents,' in JBL vol. xi. p. 72 f.). In later times, according to Strassmaier and Epping (Astronomisches aus Babylon), months of 30 days alternated with months of 29 days (Nisan, Tammuz, Elul, Tishri, Kislev, Shebat, and Adar had 30 days, while the others had only 29). Muss-Arnolt expresses himself as uncertain whether the intercalary months were fixed, or were added whenever the priestly directors of the Calendar discovered that the disagreement between it and the true year had become serious. We may fairly assume that the latter was the method in ancient Israel, at all events till well into the post-exilic period. Without any definite rules a month was probably intercalated on occasion, when the discrepancy was sufficiently marked (Schwarz, p. 14) to render correction imperative. Some have sought to find the key to the ancient intercalations in the jubilee periods (Zuckermann, Ueber Sabbatjahrcyklen und Jobelperiode; Schwarz, pp. 10-12), with 18 or 19 intercalary months inserted in every 49 or 50 years. All such exact calculations, including those based on eras of 8 or 84 years, and more particularly on the Metonic cycle of 19 years, certainly belong to the post-Christian period. Jewish tradition is very consistent in its evidence that the old method of empiric intercalation both of a monthly day and a yearly month prevailed for many centuries after Christ (see NEW MOON). Schürer (Appendix iii. to Division i. vol. ii.) expounds the generally accepted view of Jewish scholars as against Wieseler (see, however, CHRONOLOGY). Throughout the Middle Ages the empiric method partially held its ground. Nevertheless, calculation (of which we have early indications in Enoch 72 ff.) must have much aided observation, and we read of family traditions in the case of Gamaliel (Rosh Hashana 25a), and the mean duration of the lunar month (about 29½ days) must have been known long before the destruction of the temple (see the evidence for this in Schwarz, p. 19). By the middle of the 2nd cent. A.D. the calculated calendar was on the way to acceptance (Sanhed. 12a), but it was not fully adopted till the 4th cent. under Hillel II. In the intervening period the proclamation of New Moon and of the intercalary months was still dependent on the evidence of eye-witnesses as to the re-appearance of the moon on the one hand, and the relation of the lunar months to the solar seasons on the other. But astronomical calculation was certainly utilized as well, and, by observing 2 days' new moon in places distant from the Patriarchate, some of the difficulties of the Diaspora were removed. (See on this and on other points of the Rabbinic calendar, Zuckermann, Material. zur Ent. der altjud. Zeitrechnung). The fixing of the Day of Atonement was, however, a perennial difficulty until a calculated calendar was finally adopted, based on the Metonic cycle with variations which do not belong to the scope of the present article.

Beginning of the Year.—The Hebrew year had begun in the autumn with the month of September; but side by side with this West-Semitic calendar there had also been in use in Palestine another calendar, that of Babylonia, according to which the year began with Nisan or March. It was the Babylonian Calendar which was now introduced for ritual purposes. While the civil year still began in the autumn, it was ordained that the sacred year should begin in the spring. The sacred year was determined by the annual festivals, and the first of these festivals was henceforth to be the Passover. The beginning of the new year was henceforth fixed by the Passover moon' (Sayce, EHH p. 178). According to Dillmann (Monatsberichte, Societas Regia Scientiarum, Berlin, 1881) both the autumn and the spring new years are pre-exilic. The autumn era was, he holds, an economic rather than a calendar year; but, as Nowack well remarks, to an agricultural people the economic year must have coincided with the calendar year. That at all events an economic year began in the autumn is clear from such phrases as קִיּוֹם הַחֵץ, קִיּוֹם הַחֵץ ('the end of the year,' Ex 23¹⁶ 34²², cf. 1 S 20) used in describing the autumn harvest festival. The narrative of the Flood places the commencement on the 17th of the 2nd month, which on an autumn reckoning would correspond with the rainy season. The sabbatical year began in autumn (Lv 25⁹), though it was not at the beginning of a calendar year (being on the 10th of the month). The royal years also at one time began in the autumn, and the synchronism of the Jewish events with the regnal year of Nebuchadnezzar in Jeremiah (46²) seems to support the same conclusion. Dillmann at all events infers that the second half of the Jewish royal year corresponded with the first half of the Babylonian royal year (the fourth year of Jehoiakim corresponds both to the first year of Nebuchadnezzar, Jer 25¹, and to the twenty-first of his predecessor Nabopolassar, in which the battle of Carchemish was fought).

But besides the autumn year a spring era seems also to have been pre-exilic. The use of the term חֹדֶשׁ הַחֹמֶשׁ for the resumption of royal campaigns (2 S 11¹, 1 K 20²², 2 Ch 36¹⁰) points to a spring era. So also does the order of the feasts. In the oldest form (Ex 23¹⁴⁻¹⁶), as well as in J (Ex 34¹⁸⁻²²), and Deut. (16¹⁻¹⁷), the cycle begins with Passover and ends with Tabernacles. A Babylonian influence, to which was, however, due the introduction of the new names for the months, need not therefore be sought for this fixing of the beginning of the year in the spring (Ex 12², and in Priestly Code throughout), but the period of the Exile no doubt did mark the completion of the change from the autumnal to the vernal equinox. By this arrangement the order of the months began in Nisan, but the succession of years began in Tishri. Josephus is clearly accurate when he says (Ant. i. iii. 3): 'Moses appointed that Nisan, which is the same with Xanthicus, should be the first month for their festivals, because he brought them out of Egypt in that month: so that this month began the year, as to all the solemnities they observed to the honour of God—although he preserved the original order of the months as to selling and buying and other ordinary affairs.' The Mishna (Rosh Hashana i. 1) enumerates four new years—Nisan (for kings and the cycle of feasts), Elul (for the tithes of cattle), Tishri (for years, as at present in the Jewish Calendar, sabbatical years and jubilees, and other agricultural purposes), Shebat (for trees). 'During the Exile,' says Benzinger, 'the new year seems to have been calculated not on the first but on the 10th of the 7th month (Lv 25⁹, Ezk 40), only later was the great Atonement festival fixed on this day.' But it may be doubted whether the 10th of the 7th month was ever the beginning of a calendar year. But the 1st of Tishri with its rite of blowing the shôphâr (see TRUMPET), and its later spiritual associations as a day of penitence, acquired great importance in the Jewish Calendar. (On the history of the New Year Liturgy see Friedmann in JQR, vol. i. p. 62 f.).

Divisions of the Year.—The regular Hebrew word for 'year' is שָׁנָה (Assyr. sanu 'to change,' whence sattu 'year'). In Daniel שָׁנָה means both an indefinite period of time (like the Heb. שָׁנָה), and more definitely a year (Dn 4 and 7²⁵). Buhl compares a similar definition of meaning in the case of the word χρόνος, which in new Greek signifies 'year.' In Daniel, again (12⁷), we meet with a use of שָׁנָה for 'year,' though elsewhere the word more generally denotes an appointed or recurrent period such as the feast (exclusive of the Sabbath and New Moon). Another word שָׁנָה, which occurs only in late Hebrew (Ec 3¹, Neh 2⁹) as a generic term for 'time,' had already acquired in canonical Hebrew (Est 9⁷⁻³¹) the sense of season or festival, which it conveyed in Rabbinic Hebrew.* The ordinary seasons of the year were also distinguished in Hebrew as קָיִץ 'summer' and חֹרֶף 'autumn and winter.' August is usually the warmest month, February the coldest in Judæa. The שָׁנָה was further divided into two parts (Dt 11¹⁴) by the יָרֵחַ 'earlier rain' (October) and קִיּוֹם הַחֵץ 'the later rain' (spring equinox). Generic terms for the differences of temperature were קָרָד 'cold' (Gn 8²²) and חֹם 'heat' (ib.). The sowing period was known as זְמַן הַחֹם (ib.), the harvest-time as זְמַן הַקָּרָד (mid-April till mid-June, the barley and wheat-harvest being meant).

* The Babylonian year was divided into res sattu 'beginning of the year,' misal sattu 'the middle of the year,' and kit sattu 'end of the year.' Two of the terms are paralleled in Hebrew.

iii. MONTHS.—The Hebrew months have always been lunar, and extended from one new moon to another. The oldest Semitic word for month was archu (ܐܪܚܐ), which properly signifies the 'beginning of the month' (Muss-Arnolt, p. 73. Much of the following information is derived from this excellent authority). The same word appears in Aramaean (Ezr 6¹⁵, Dn 4²⁰), Phoenician, and Ethiopic. In Hebrew the word is common in the pre-exilic passages, but it became entirely superseded by shahar. This last word, properly 'new-moon' (which see), is employed (like the Assyrian iddisu) only for the beginning of the month, by other Semitic peoples; its use for 'month' was an innovation of the Israelites.

There are three sets of terms to distinguish the biblical months—(a) old (Canaanite) names, (b) numbers, and (c) the Babylonian names.

(a) Of the first class only four have survived: these names are all derived from climatic and economic conditions. Similarly, the earliest epithets of the months among the Babylonians are connected with agriculture and the pastoral life.

Abib (אֲבִיב) month of the ripening ears, Ex 13⁴ etc.), subsequently the 1st month.

Ziv (זִיב) month of flowers, 1 K 6¹), subsequently the 2nd month.

Ethanim (אֶתָנִים) month of perennial streams, 1 K 8²), subsequently the 7th month.

Bul (בּוּל) rain month, 1 K 6³⁵), subsequently the 8th month.

The last two names also occur in Phoenician inscriptions; Ethanim having been found in Cyprus (middle of 4th cent. B.C.) and Bul in Sidon (4th cent. B.C.; see Driver in Hogarth's Authority and Archaeology, pp. 137, 138, and Buhl-Gesenius, s.v.).

(b) In the time of the Exile these old Canaanite names were dropped, and the months were distinguished by numerals, as in parts of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Kings (in the latter the old names are explained by numbers, 1 K 6¹⁻³⁸ 8²), lastly in Haggai (1¹⁻²) and Zechariah (1⁷⁻⁷¹). See Nowack, Heb. Archäologie, i. p. 217.

(c) From the Exile the new Babylonian names began to find a definite place in the Hebrew Calendar. The proofs for the Babylonian origin of these names may be found in Muss-Arnolt, in Schrader, COT (ii. 69). Cf. Schürer, Appendix iii. Of the twelve names only seven occur in Scripture, but the whole twelve appear in the Megillath Ta'anith, which in its original form dates before the Christian era.

(1) Nisan (נִסָּן), Ξανθικός, Xanthicus, March-April.

The English equivalents are inexact: Nisan mostly corresponds to part of March and part of April. Nisan occurs in Neh 2¹, Est 3⁷. The Gr. form Nisæa (Nisæa (v)) occurs in 1 Es 5⁶, Ad. Est 1⁴, and often in Josephus. The Macedonian Xanthicus is found in 2 Mac 11³⁰⁻³², 38. The first month in the Babylonian year is ni-sa-an(n)-nu, from neu (Heb. נָעַם) 'to move,' or 'start.' It is the opening month of the ecclesiastical year. That the vernal equinox occurred in Nisan is attested by Josephus (Ant. i. x. 5) and also in cuneiform literature (Muss-Arnolt, p. 77). Nisan corresponded to the first zodiacal sign (Aries) in which the vernal equinox fell. That Josephus frequently uses the Macedonian names as equivalent to the Heb.-Bab. does not imply that he thought that the two series of months began on identical days.*

(2) Iyyar (יָאָר), Ἀπριλιος, April-May.

Not named in Scripture, but found in Mishna, Rosh Hashana i. 3; Jos. Ant. viii. iii. 1 (1^{ap}), Hypomnest. 27 (1^{ap}); Bab. a-a-ru. Derivation uncertain; perhaps connected with ayr 'to be bright' (so Delitzsch), or ayr 'to send forth, open, germinate,' whence aru 'flower' (so Muss-Arnolt). This would make the meaning equivalent to Ziv and April (aperire). The Megillath Ta'anith identifies Iyyar with the 2nd month mentioned in 1 Mac 13⁶¹.

* The Dioscorinthus of 2 Mac 11²¹ is quite obscure (cf. note in RVm). It is barely probable that the author wrote Dioscurus (the reading of O.L.), the name of the third Cretan month (see Kamphausen's note in Kautzsch's Apokr. ad loc.).

(3) Sivan (סִיבָּן), Δασιος, May-June.

Est 8⁹; Mishna, Shekalim iii. 1, etc. Gr. Συνίς (Bar 1⁵), also Συνίαι; Bab. si-ma(n)-nu, pronounced later si-sanu. Delitzsch (Hebrew and Assyrian, p. 16) derives from samu 'to appoint' (סָמַךְ), Haupt from asamu 'to mark.'

(4) Tammuz (תַּמְּזָר), Πάνεμος, June-July.
